TRANSLATOR

TO THE

READER.

HE Authour of this History was one of those whom the Spaniards called Meztizo's, that is, one born of a Spanish Father and an Indian Mother. And though he was a Native of Peru, and by the Mother's fide inclined to the simple Temperament, which is natural to that Countrey; yet it feems the Spanish humour was most prevalent in him. so that he delighted much to tell us, as in divers places, that he was the Son of Garcilaflo de la Vega, one of the first Conquerours of the new World, who was by the direct Line descended from that brave Cavalier Garcinerez de Vargas, from whom came the valiant Gomez Suarez de Figueroa. the first Count of Feria, his Great-grandfather, and Ynigo Lopez de Mendoça, from whom the Duke of Infantado was descended; who was Brother to his Great-grandmother and to Alonso de Vargas, Lord of the Blackmountain, his Grand father, from whom came Alonso de Hinestrosa de Vargas, Lord of Valde Sevilla, who was Father to Garçilasso de la Vega, of whom came our Authour. Nor less illustrious doth he tell you, that he was by the Mother's fide, who was the Daughter of Inca Huallpa Topac. one of the Sons of Topac Inca Yupanqui and of Palla Mama Occlo, his lawfull Wife, from whom came Huayna Capac Inca, the last King of Peru, Wherefore this Authour in all his Writings Styles himself Garcilasto Inca. because he derived his Pedigree from the Kings of Peru, who were called Inca's, a name it feems given to none but the Royal Family.

This History is divided into two Parts. The sirst treats of their Government before the time of the Inca's, which was by the Head of their Tribes and Families cassed Curacas; and then it proceeds unto the Original of the Inca's, and of their Government, and in what manner that salvage People was civilized and instructed in the Laws of Humane Nature, and to live in a Political Society by Manco Capac their sirst King; How also the Men were taught by him to plow and cultivate their Lands, and exercise some by their Lawwas to be his Sister) were taught to spin, and weave, and make their own Garments.

It is probable that a great part of this Hillory, as far as concerns the Original of the Inca's and the foundation of their Laws, is fabulous: howford 2.

ever, being, as our Authour says, delivered by Tradition, and commonly believed among it their People of the better degree, it may contain divers Truths mixed with abundance of Fictions and fooligh Inventions. But this is no more than what hath happened to Nations of more refined understanding : for what account can we our felves give of Great Britain before the Romans entred into it? Nav. What can France or Spain fay of the Ancient Inhabitants of their own Countries . or of the manner . how they came first to be Christians? Unless it be that which Ignorant men have devised. and what the Learned men are now ashamed to believe or say after them? And then, what wonder is it that such poor Salvages, born in a part of the World undiscovered to us, untill the year 1484; and of whose Original we have no certain knowledge; nor have any light besides fancy and conjecture. from whence the Continent of America hath been peopled: How then . I fav. can it be expected that these illiterate Creatures should be able to give an account of their Extraction, or of Matters which paffed in thole Ages; of which the Learned parts of the World acknowledge their ignorance, and confess themselves to be in the dark even as to those Matters which concern their own Histories?

Rue herause it is in the nature of Mankind to use reflect Alls on their own being, and retreat with their Thoughts back to some beginning: so these poor Souls derive the Original of their first being from divers Creatures, of which they had the greatest opinion and admiration: some living near a great Lake which supplied them with store of Fish, called that their Parent, from whence they emerged: and others esteemed the Mighty Mountains of Antis to have been their Parent, and to have iffued out of those Caverns, as from the Womb of a Mother; others fansied themfelives to be descended from that great Fowl called Cuntur, which spreads a very large Wing, which pleased some Nations of the Indians, that they would look no farther for a Parent than to that Fowl, and in token thereof, upon days of solemnity and festival, carried the Wings thereof fallned to their Armes. But then , as to their Inca's or Kings , whose Original was to be derived from fomething higher than sublunary Creatures. being of better composition than their poor and mean Vassals, the Sun was esteemed a fit Parent for those who were come from Divine race : so that when they adored the Sun, whom they acknowledged for their God, they gave honour to their Kings who were descended from him. Various have been the opinions among It Historians concerning the Original of this People; of which the most probable, as I conceive, is, that they proceeded from the Race of the Northern Tartar, whom they resemble in the shape and air of their features, and in their barbarous way of living; but then we must fansie, as some Geographers do, that the West side of America is Continent with Tartary, or at least disjoyned from thence by some narrow strait; of which I am well persuaded we have no certain Knowledge.

But to let these Matters pass, and consider the Condition in which the Spaniards found the Inhabitants of Peru, when they first came among st them, they were, I fay, a naked People, simple and credulous, believing every thing that the Spaniards told and promised them: To which they were induced out of an opinion that the Spaniards were Viracocha's or the Offspring of the Sun, whom they adored for God, and in whom they believed, according to the Light of Nature, that there could be no falfity or shadow of untruth. Wherefore they were strangely surprized, whilst in a peaceable manner they were treating with the good men, and whill Friar Valverde, with a Cross in his hand, was preaching to Atahualpa their King: that then, without any Cause given, they should be killed with Swords and Lances, and five thousand of them massacred before the face of their Prince: And vet they would not foregoe this foolish imagination: though afterwards, contrary to the faith given, they law their King imprisoned, and his liberty promised upon a wast ransome of Gold and Silver: which when paid and fully complied with, he was notwith-Standing Strangled in prilon, and no other liberty given him than that freedom which Death beltows upon all mankind. And yet this filly People could not but entertain a high eleem of the Spaniards, as of those who were come to teach them a better Law, and still called them Viracocha's. or People descended from their Father the Sun, imagining that this new The Indians fort of People in Beards and Ruffs had received Commission from that glori- Beards. ous Light, which they adored, for punishment of their Offences, to swear and lie, and violate all the Bands of humane kind. And yet that which farther shews the simplicity and good nature of this People is, that in de-(pight of all the ill usage received from the Spaniards, they would prove Still faithfull to them, upon a principle they had received, that to whomloever they had yielded themselves in War, they were to be faithfull, with fuch uncorrupted Loyalty and Truth, that no confideration either of King. Wife, Father, Family or Countrey could absolve them from the Obligation and Duty they owed to their Countrey (vid. p. 487.) And hence it was that so many Indians fought against their Countrey-men in union with the Spaniards, and ferved them for Spyes, to give them intelligence of whatfoever was designed in the Camp of the Indians.

But this flexible and good nature of this People did not foften the haughty mind of the Spaniards towards them, who esteeming the rest of the World Slaves to them, oppressed the Indians with such servitude and slary as the nature of man was not able to sustain. Of which that wise and good Emperour. Charles the Fifth, taking notice, he dispatched new Orders to Peru, for ease of the Natives, and to exempt them from that inhumane Tyranny which one man ought not to exercise towards another: But this gratious Indulgence of the Prince ferved to raife greater Diffurbances among it the Conquerours, who refusing to quit their Commands and exempt their Indians from their Vallalage and Services, openly opposed the Governours and Officers which were fent to put the new Ordinances in execution: which afterwards proceeded to an open War and Rebellion, which with various successes continued for many years: till at length the King of Spain was forced to moderate the rigour of his new regulations, and condescend to his Subjects, by conserving to them that tyrannical Power which they pretended unto by right of Conquest over the Indians: in which they were so unmercifull, that had not King Philip the Second contrived a supply of Negro's out of Africa to work in the Mountain of Potofi and other Mines, the whole Indian Nation had before this been utterly extinguished.

But God, who is just and compassionate of the Creatures which he hath made, would not suffer these Cruelties to pass unpunished, but caused the Spaniards themselves to be instruments of his vengeance on each other. So Francisco Picarro and Diego Almagro, after having conquered the Countrey, fell at variance about sharing the Government and dividing the Spoil, which was decided by the Sword: Then Gonçalo Picarro pretended to the Government of Peru for his Life, by virtue of the Patent which the Em-perour had given to his Brother the Marquis Picarro, and in defence thereof, and in opposition to the new Laws before mentioned, he raised Wars against the Justices and the Vice-king Blasco Nunnez, whom, after several Fights and Skirmishes he killed in Battel. And though this Picarro was afterwards subdued by the wife conduct of the President Pedro de la Gafca, vet things did not continue long quiet before they broke out avain into new disturbances. So Don Sebastian de Castilla made a Rebellion and headed the Male-contents, who being disappointed of the reward they expetted for the services they had done against Gonçalo Picarro, endeavoured to right themselves by their own Power, and killed the General Don Pedro de Hinojosa. Then Vasco de Godinez killed Don Schastian de Castilla, and set up for himself, but was soon subdued, and put to death Ly Alonfo de Alvarado. Then Egas de Guzman, a bold and blondy Villain pretended to be the Head of a Party, but he and his Complices were foon dispersed for want of Associates to abet their Cause. And lastly. Francisco Hernandez Giron, with about twelve or thirteen more began a Rebellion in Cozco, and with that small number killed most of the Magistrates of the City, and put most of the Inhabitants to flight; with whom afterwards many discontented Souldiers joining, they carryed on a War against the Government for several years with much bloud, and cruelties acted upon each other; for now the common Souldiers were become to mutinous, for want of employment, that they were ready to join with any person that pretended to a resentment : And indeed there was not an ordinary Fellow but who had so great a value for himself on the honour of being a Spaniard and a Souldier, that he swallowed in his vain thoughts all the Riches of the Indies, and fansied that the whole Government and Wealth of Peru was not a sufficient Reward for a person of his high Merit and Extraction. In this manner was Peru conquered, and with this fort of People hath it been fince that time planted, which we have reason to believe have buried themselves in sloth and luxury. How well they have improved that Countrev and used those Riches which God bath given them, and how humanely they have treated the poor Natives; I leave to the Historians of our modern times: and for the Valour and Bravery which of late years they have used in defence of that Countrey; I refer my felf to the Relation of the Bucaniers. And so proceed on with this History.

How the New World was Discovered.

BOUT the Year 1484, a certain Pilot, Native of Helma in the Country of Niebla, called Alonfo Sanchez, ufually Traded in a finall Verifel from Spain to the Canaries; and there Lading the Commodities of that Countrey, failed to the Maderus, and thence freighted with Sugar and Conferves, returned home into Spain; this was his confant course and trafick, when in one of these Voyages meeting with a most violent Tempest, and not able to bear sail, he was forced to put before the Wind for the space of 28 or 29 days, not knowing where or whither he went, for in all that time he was not able to take an observation of the height of the Sun; and so grievous was the storm, that the Mariners could with no convenience either eat or sleep: At length, after so many long and teadious days, the Wind abating, they found themselves near an Island, which it was, is not certainly known, but it is believed to have been St. Domingo, because that lyes just West from the Canaries, whence a storm at East had driven the Ship, which is the more strange, because the Easterly Winds seldom blow hard in those Seas, and rather make sair weather, than tempestuous. But God, who is all-sufficient, intending to bestow his mercies, can make causes produce effects contrary to their nature; as when he drew water from the Rock, and cured the blind with Clay; in like manner his immense goodness and compassion designing to transmit the light of the true Gospel into the new World, made use of these unususal means to convert them from the Idolatry of Gentilism, and from their stolism and dark superstitions, as shall be related in the sequel of this History.

The Master landing on the store, observed the height of the Sun, and so noted particularly in writing what he had seen, and what had happened in this Voyage out, and home: and having supplied himself with fresh water and wood, he put to Sea again; but having not well observed his course thiches, his way to return was the more difficult, and made his Voyage so long, that he began to want both water and lasted longer; and at length he so well succeeded in his enterprize, that he bestowed the New World, with all its riches, upon Spain, and therefore deservedly obtained this Motto to be inscribed on his Armes:

To Castile, and to Leon, The New World was given by Colon.

In this manner the New World was first discovered, for which greatness Spain is beholding to that little Village of Helva, which produced such a Son, as gave Color information of things not seen, or known before; the which secrets, like a prudent person, he concealed, till under assume of silence he first disclosed them to such persons of authority about the Catholick Kings, as were to be affishant and usefull to him in his design, which could never have been laid, or chalked out by the art of Cosmography, or the imagination of man, had not Alons de Sanchez given the first light and conjecture to this discovery; which Colon so readily improved, that in 78 days he made his Voyage to the 1ste of Guanatianico, though he was detained some days at Gomera to take in Provisions.

CHAP. II.

The derivation of the word Peru, and how the Countrey came to be so called.

Since we are to treat of the Countrey of Pern, it will be requifite to enquire, how it came to be so called, in regard the Indians have no such word in their language: to which end we must know, That a certain Gentleman, Native of Krez, called Barco Nunnez, having in the year 1313, been the sirst Spaniard, who discovered the Sea of Zur, or the Pacifick Sea; in reward thereof the Kings of Spain honoured him with the title of Admiral of those Seas, and with the government of those Kingdoms and Countries which he should farther discover and conquer. During those sew years he lived after these Honours (for his Son-inlaw Pedro Arina de Avida being Governour, in recompence of all his services, cut off his head) his great care was to discover, and know what that Countrey was called, which from Panans runs all along the coast of the Sea of Zur; to which purpose he built three or four Vesses, and employed them in several quarters to make their discoveries; every one of which did afterwards return with relations of great racks of land running along that coast: one of which Vessels stretching farther than the others to the very Equinoctial line, and sailing by the shore, they espiced an Indian, as he-was stifting at the mouth of a River, of which there are many, which in that Countrey sall into the Sea; so soon as the Spaniards saw him, they landed four of their men with all privacy imaginable, such as could run and swim well, that so he might not be able to escape them either by land or water. Having so done, they passed with their Ship, as near as was possible before the Hadian, that whilft he amused himself with the strangeness of the object, he might more easily be taken by the ambush which was laid for him: the Indian beholding so unusual a fight as a Ship swimming with all her Sails on the Sea, which he had never before seen or heard of, his eyes were so fixed, and his imagination so taken up with looking, and considering what thing that was, which offered it self to his sight, that he was not sensitive who with gre readily, left they fhould doe him some hurt, said Beru, which was his own proper name, and then added Petu; which was as much as to say, if you ask me my name, I am called Beru; but if you ask me of the place, where I was, it is Petu; for that signifies a River in the Indian language: from which time, which was in the year 1515, the Spaniards have ever called this great and rich Countrey by the name of Peru; other Historians corrupting the letters, call it Piru; instead of Peru: and this place, where this Indian was surprized, we may certainly denote as the utmost border of that Dominion which was under the Jurisdiction and Conquest of those Kings, which were called Boots; and which was ever after named Peru from that very place which is over-against Quit to Charcus, and is the principal Dominion of the Boots, containing 700 Leagues in length; although their Empire did reach as far as Chile, which contains 500 Leagues more, and is another most rich and sertile Kingdom.

CHAP. III.

The Description of Peru, with the Story of Peter Serrano.

THE four limits and borders of that Empire which the Incas possessed before the Spaniards invaded them, were these. To the North it was bounded with the River Ancarmaya, which runs between the Consines of Quita and Passian and signifies in the common language of Peru, the Acure River, being situated almost perpendicularly under the Equinoctial line: to the South its limits are confined by the River Mauli, which runs East and West through the Kingdom of Chili, before it comes to the Arancos, which is 40 degrees of South latitude from the Equinoctial. The distance between these two Rivers they account little less than 1300 Leagues by Land. That which is properly called Peru, contains 750 Leagues in length, reaching from the River Ancarmaya to the Chichas, which is the farthermost Province of the Charcas, and lyes North and South, as also doth that which is called the Kingdom of Chilo, which contains about 550 Leagues in length, reckoning from the farthest part of the Province Chichas to the River Mauli, To the East it is bordered by that Mountain which is inaccessible for men, beasts or sowls, called the Cordistera, because it is always covered with Snow, and runs from St. Marta to the Straits of Magellan, which the Indiant call Rivingu, and is as much as the Countrey of Snow. To the West it hath the Sea of Zur for its Consines, running all along the coast to the Cape Passian, which is under the Equinoctial, and extends to the Mauli, which also falls into the Sea of Zur, from the East to the West the Kingdom is eftermed but narrow, the broadest place of it being from the Province Magnapas to the City Tragillo, which is situated on the Sea-coast, and contains 120 Leagues in breadth, being in the narrowest place which is from the Port Arica, to the Province called Lavicossa, about the space of 70 Leagues. These are the four bounds of that Dominion which the Incas possessed for which we intend, by divine affistence, for to write. But before we proceed forward, it will be requisite to recount the Story of Peter Serva

Peter Serrano escaped from shipwreck by swimming to that desert Island, which from him received its name, being, as he reported, about two Leagues in compass, and for so much it is laid down, in the Waggoner, which pricks three little Islands in the Cart, with divers shallow places about them; so that all Ships keep the distance from them avoiding them with all possible care and circum-

It was Peter Serrow's misfortune to be loft upon these places, and to save his life on this disconsolate Island, where was neither water, nor wood, nor grass, nor any thing for support of humane life, at least not for maintenance of him for so long a time, as untill some Ship passing by might redeem him from perishing by hunger and thirst, which languishing manner of death is much more miserable, than by a speedy suffocation in the waters. With the sad thoughts bereof he paffed the first night, lamenting his affliction with as many melancholy reflexions, as we may imagine, capable to enter into the mind of a wretch in like extremities; fo foon as it grew day, he began to traverse his Itland, and found on the shore some Cockles, Shrimps, and other creatures of like nature, which the Sea had thrown up, and which he was forced to eat raw, because he wanted fire wherewish to roall them: And with this finall entertainment he passed his time, till wherewith to roat them: And with this influence in the patied his time, the watch'd a convenience intill they came within his reach, and then throwing them on their backs, (which is the manner of taking that fort of fifth) he cut the throat, drinking the bloud inflead of water; and flicing out the fleth with a knife which was faftned to his girdle, he laid the pieces to be dried, and roafted by the Sun; the field he made use of to rake up rain-water, which lay in little puddles, for that is a Countrey of ten subject to great and sudden rains. In this manner he passed the first of his days by killing all the Turtles that he was able, some of which were so large, that days by killing all the Turtles that he was able, fome of which were fo large, that their fhells were as big as Targets or Bucklers; others were fo great, that he was not able to turn them, nor to ftop them in their way to the Sea, fo that in a thort time experience taught him, which fort he was able to deal with, and which were too unwieldly for his force: with his leffer fhells he poured water into the greater, fome of which contained 12 Gallons; fo that having made fufficient provisions both of meat and drinks, he began to contrive fome way to fitthe fire, that fo he might not onely drefs his meat with it, but also make a smooth to give a sign to any Ship, which was passing in those Seas; considering of this invention, (for Seamen are much more ingenious in all times of extremity, than men bred at Land) he searched every-where to find out a couple of hard pebles instead of shirts, his knise serving in the place of a steel; but the Island being all covered with a Dead Sand, and no stone appearing, he swam into the Sea, and diving with a Dead Sand, and no frone appearing, he fivam into the Sca, and diving often to the bottom, he at length found a couple of ftones fit for his purpole, which he rubbed together, until he got them to an edge, with which being able to ftrike fire, he drew some threads out of his shirt, which he worked so small, that it was like cotton, and served for tinder; so that having contrived a means to kindle fire, he then gathered a great quantity of Sea-weeds, thrown up by the wayes, which with the shells of Fish, and planks of Ships, which had been wrecwaves, which with the Ihells of Fifh, and planks of Ships, which had been wrecked on those sholes, afforded nourithment for his sue!: and left sudden shownes should extinguish his fire, he made a little covering, like a small Hut, with the shells of the largest Turtles or Tortoises that he had killed, taking great care that his fire should not go out. In the space of two months, and sooner, he was as unprovided of all things, as he was at first, for with the great rains, heat and mothere of that climate, his provisions were corrupted; and the great heat of the Sun was so violent on him, having neither cloths to cover him, nor shadow for a shelter, that when he was, as it were, broiled in the Sun, he had no remedy but to run into the Sea. In this misery and care he passed three years, during which time he saw several Ships at Sea, and as often made his smoak; but none turned out of their way to see what it meant, for fear of those Shelves and Sands, which out of their way to fee what it meant, for fear of those Shelves and Sands, which out of their way to fee what it meant, for fear of those Sneives and Sands, which way Pilots avoid with all imaginable circumspection; so that the poor wretch despairing of all manner of relief, esteemed it a mercy for him to dye, and arrive at that period which could onely put an end to his miseries; and being exposed in this manner to all weathers, the hair of his body grew in that manner, that he was covered all over with bristles, the hair of his head and beard reaching to his waste, that he appeared like fome wild and savage creature. At the end of three years, Sergen, was strangely survived with the appearance of a Man in his three years Serrano was strangely surprized with the appearance of a Man in his Island, whose Ship had, the night before, been cast away upon those Sands, and had saved himself on a plank of the Vessel: so soon as it was day, he espied the finoak, and imagining whence it was, he made towards it. So foon, as they faw each the other, it is hard to fay, which was the most amazed, Serram imagined, that it was the Devil who came in the shape of a Man to tempt him to despair: the New-comer believes Serram to be the Devil in his own proper shape and figure, being covered over with hair and beard: in fine, they were both afraid, flying one from the other. Peter Serrano cried out, as he ran, Tefin, Jefin, deliver me from the Devil: the other hearing this, took courage, and returning again to him, called out, Brother, Brother, don't fly from me, for I am a Christian, as thou art: and because he law that Serrano still ran from him, he repeated the Credo, or Apollo College. file's Creed, in words aloud; which when Serrano heard, he knew it was no

Devil, that would recite those words, and thereupon gave a stop to his slight, and returning to him with great kindues, they embraced each other, with fights and tears have their fac Estate, without any hopes of deliverance: Serrano fuppoling that his Guest wanted refreshment, entertained him with fuch provisions, as his miferable life afforded; and having a little comforted each other, they began to recount the manner and occasion of their fad disafters. Then for the better government in their way of living, they defigned their hours of day and night to certain fervices, such a time was appointed to kill Fish for eating, such hours for gathering weeds, Fish bones, and other matters, which the Sea threw up to maintain their conftant fire; and especial care they had to observe their up to maintain their contain they and especial case they mad to observe their watches, and relieve each other at certain hours, that fo they might be fure their fire went not out. In this manner they lived amicably together for certain days, for many did not pass before a quarrel arole between them, so high, that they were ready to fight; the occasion proceeded from some words that one gave the other, that he took not that care and labour as the extremity of their condition required; and this difference so encreased, (for to such misery do our passions often berray us) that at length they separated, and lived apart one from the other; how-soeyer in a short time having experienced the want of that comfort which mufociety procures, their choler was appeafed, and fo they returned to enjoy converfe, and the affiltence which Friendship and Company afforded, in which condition they passed four Years, during all which time they saw many Ships sail near them, yet none would be so charitable or curious, as to be invited by their Smoak and Flame; so that being now almost desperate, they expected no their smoak and riame; to that being now annot desperate, they expected no other remedy befides Death, to put an end to their Miferies.

Howfoever at length a Ship adventuring to pass nearer than ordinary, espied the Smoak, and rightly judging, that it must be made by some Shipwrecked Persons escaped to those Sands, holited out their Boat to take them in Serrano and his Smoak, and rightly judging, that it muit be made by tome Shipwrecked Perions efcaped to those Sands, holited out their Boat to take them in. Septano and his Companion readily ran to the place where they saw the Boat conning; but so soon as the Mariners were approached so near, as to distinguish the strange Figure and Looks of these two Men, they were so affrighted, that they began to row back; but the poor men cryed out, and that they might believe them too not to be Devils, or evil Spirits, they rehearsed the Creed, and called aloud upon the Name of Jesus; with which words the Mariners returned, took them into the Boat, and carried them to the Ship, to the great wonder of all there present, who with admiration beheld their hairy shapes, not like Men, but Beatls, and with singular pleasure heard them relate the story of their past missfortunes. The Companion dyed in his Voyage to Spain, but Serrano lived to come thither, from whence he travelled into Germany, where the Emperour then resided: all which time he nourished his Hair and Beard, to serve as an Evidence and Proof of his past Life: wheresever he came the People pressed, as a Sight, to see him for Money; Persons of Quality having also the same curiosity, gave him sufficient to destay his charges, and his Imperial Majesty having seen, and heard his Discourses, bestowed a Rent upon him of Four thousand Pieces of Eight a Year, which make 4800 Ducats in Perus, and going to the Possession of this Income, he dyed at Panama, without farther Enjoyment. All this Story was related to me by a Gentleman called Garci Sanchez de Figueroa, one who was acquainted with Servano, Gentleman called Garci Sanchez, de Figueroa, one who was acquainted with Serrano, and heard it from his own Mouth, and that after he had feen the Emperour he then cut his Hair and his Beard to some convenient length, because that it was so long before, that when he turned himself on his Bed, he often lay upon it, which incommoded him so much as to disturb his sleep.

Of the Idolatry and Gods which the Ancient Incas adored, and Manner of their Sacrifices.

POR better understanding of the Life, Customs and Idolatry of the Indians of Pern, it will be necessary to distinguish the times before the Incas, from those wherein their Rule and Empire began, their Gods and Sacrifices and Customs being much different, according to the Ages; for the Men themselves, in the first times, were at best but as tamed Beasts, and others were worse than the fiercest Creatures. To begin with their Gods, we must know, that they were agreeable to the quality of their own corrupt and abominable manners, and every Nation, Province, Tribe and House had its particular God for their Opinion was, that one God would have business sufficient to take care of one Province, or Family, and that their Power was so confined, that it could have no virtue or extent within the Jurissicition of another: and because their Fancies were not so fublimated, as to frame abstracted Notions of Delities, such as Hope, Victory, Peace, and the like, as the Romans did in the time of Gentilism; they adored whatsoever they saw, such as Flowers, Plants, Herbs, Trees, especially, Pines and Elmes; Caves, Stones, Rivers, and particularly in that Province, which is called the Old Port, they had a high Veneration for the Esemenald, because it is the Pretious Stone of that Countrey, and the Diamond and Ruby are in no essent because they are not known to them; they also worshipped the Lion, Tyger and Bear, for their figreeness, and with that submission and humility, that they would not sy from them, but offer themselves to be devoured by them. In fine they adored any thing wherein they observed an Espelency, as the Fox and Monky for Craft, the Hart for his Swiftness, the Falcon for his Agility and Courage, and the Eagle for the Acuteness of his Sight: such was the vanity and folly in the imagination of this savage People, who had no Scriptures to teach and enlighten them, nor Prince to govern and protect them.

tures to teach and enlighten them, nor Prince to govern and protect them.

Howfoever there were other Nations more confiderate in choice of their Deities, adoring none but fuch as afforded them benefit and advantage; as Fountains, and cool Springs which yielded them Drink, Rivers that watered their Paffures: the Earth they called their Mother, and worshipped, because it yielded them Food, the Air, because they breatked in it, and was their Life, the Fire, because it warmed them, and dressed in it, and was their Life, the Fire, because it warmed them, and dressed in it, and was their Life, the Fire, because it warmed them, and dressed in it, and was their Life, the Fire, because it warmed them, and dressed their Meat; some also made choice of Sheep, and Corn, and Cattel, and every thing that abounded most in their Country, and served for nourithment, to be a God, and worthy of Divine Honour. The Inhabitants near the Cordillera worshipped that Mountain for its height, those of the Coast made the Sea their God, which in their language they call Mantechoca, and is as much as to say, the Mother Sea: the Whalo for its prodigious bigness was in no less Veneration than the rest, and every fort of Fish which abounded amongst them was deisted, because they believe that the first Fish in the World above them, takes always care to provide them with a number of the like World above them, takes always care to provide them with a number of the like World above them, takes always care to provide them with a number of the like World above them, and worship nothing either above or below; but giving themselves over to stupidity and south Borders of Pern, that have no thoughts or inclinations to Religion, and worship nothing either above or below; but giving themselves over to stupidity and south borders of Pern, that have no thoughts or inclinations to Religion, and worship nothing either above or below; but giving themselves over to stupidity and south south souther lawing fear nor love, live with the same sent all general parts

Children to these Idols. The manner of these Sacrifices were to rip open their breasts whilst they were alive, and so tear out their Heart and Lungs, with the Bloud of which, whilst warm, they sprinkled their Idols: then they inspected the Lungs and Heart, to take an other of good or bad, and know whether the Sacrifice had been acceptable to the Idol; then they burnt the Entrails, and ate the Flesh themselves with great joy and session; though it were of their own Child, or other Relation of the same bloud.

Bha Valera a certain Authour who in loofe Papers wrote of the Indies, describes those Nations by distinguishing the former from the latter ages, and faith. That those who live in Antis eat Mens Flesh, and are more brutish than the Beatls themselves, for they know neither God, nor Law, nor Vertue, nor have they Idos, or any Worship; unless sometimes when the Devil presents himself to them in the form of a Serpent, or other Animal, they then adore and worship him. When they take any in the War, if he be an ordinary Fellow, they quarter him, and divide him to be eaten by their Wives, Children and Servants, or perhaps fell him to the Shambles; but if he be of Quality, or Noble, they call their Wives and Children together, and like Officers of the Devil, they strip him of his garments, and tye him to a stake, and then alive as he is, they cut him with Knives, and sharp Stones, paring of the form the more stelly parts, as from the Buttocks, Calves of the Legs, and it is provided the principal Men. If women, and the remainder they drink, and eat the Flesh as saft as they can, before it is half broiled, less the miderable Wretch should dye before he hath seen his shell devoured, and intombed in their bowels: The Women, more cruel and inhumane than, the Men, wet the nipples of their Breasts with the bloud, that so the Insants which suck them may take a share of the Sacrifice. All this is performed by way of a religious Offering with mirth and triumph, till the Man expires; and then they complete the Feast in devouring all the remainder of his Flesh and Bowels, eating it with silence and reverence, as facred, and partaking of a Deity. If in execution of all this torment the Patient was observed to sigh and groan, or make any distorted faces, then they broak his Bones, and with contempt threw them into the fields and waters; but if he appeared flout, and enduring the anguish and pains without strinking at them, then his Bones and Sinews were dived in the Sun, and lodged on the tops of the highest Hills, where they were de

But other Indians less cruel, and of a more mild Nature, though they mingled humane Bloud with their Sacrifices, yet they did it not with the death of any, but drew it from Veins of the Arme or Leg, or from the Nostrils, in case of pains in the Head, and from other parts, as the nature or solemnity of the Sacrifice required. Others offered Sheep, and Lambs, Conies, Partridges, and all forts of Fowl, Herbs, and the Cocar-Nut, so much in esteem amongst them, with their Mayz, which is a sort of Wheat, as also Pulse, Ahnise and Cummin, and sweet Woods, which rendred a persume; the which were severally sacrificed according to the nature of the Deity they adored. And thus much shall be sufficient to have been delivered concerning their Sacrifices, and Gods of the Ancient Gentillist.

C 2 CHAP.

Of the Government, Diet and Cloathing of the Ancient Indians.

These People were as barbarous in their manner of living in their Houses and Habitations, as they were in the Worship of their Gods, and Sacrifices is fuch of them as observed any thing of a Political Government, lived in a kind of Society, having houter any time of a context and the society having houter near together, placed without order of Streets or Paffages, appearing rather like Pens or Sheepfolds, than humane Habitations: Others, by reason of the Wars and Variances amongst themselves, lived on Rocks and Mountains, and places inacceffible for their Enemies; others dwelt in little Cottages. feating over the fields and vallies; and every one feated himfelf as well as he thought convenient for commodiousness of Victuals and Water, whether it were in Caves under ground, or in the hollow of Trees, the necessities, rather than the conveniences of living being provided for; and of this fort of People there are some yet remaining about the Cape of Passan, as the Chiribusanas and other Nations, whom the linear have conquered, and who still continue their ancient barbarity, and favage manners: and these are the most difficult of any to be reduced to the subjection of the Spaniards, or the Christian Religion; for having never had Learning, or scarce Language sufficient to understand each other, they live like Beafts, without Communication, Friendship or Commerce.

Those amongst them who had most of Understanding, or of a Spirit most

Thole amongs them who had molt of Understanding, or of a Spirit most daring, stock the privilege to Rule, and govern the others, whom he treated as his Slaves, with such Tyranny and Cruelty, that he made use of their Wives and Daughters at his pleasure, all things being consounded with War and Ruine. In some Provinces, they flead the Captives taken in War, and with their Skins covered their Drums, thinking with the sound of them to affright their Enemies, for their opinion was, that when their Kindred heard the rumbling noise of those Drums, shey would be immediately seized with fear, and put to slight. For the most part they lived by Robberies, and the Spoils each of other; the stronger preying upon the weaker was the cause of several petty Kings; some of which perhaps being of a more gentle nature than others, and who treated their Subjects with less rigour and cruelty, were for that reason adored by them for Gods, fra-ming to themselves some representation of Divinity in the good actions of such men, who had some allays in their cruel and tyrannical Government. In other parts, they lived without Lords, or order of a Common-wealth; but like so many Sheep parset fleet in all simplicity; not that Vertue moderated their malice, but their stupidity and ignorance made them senseless and uncapable of good or

Their manner of Cloathing, or covering their Bodies, were in fome Countries as immodeft as they were ridiculous; their Diet also was so foul and barbarous. that we, who know better, may wonder at the beaftiality. In the hot Countries, which were most fruitfull, they sowed little or nothing, but contented themselves with Herbs, and Roots, and wild Fruits, and with that which the Barthproduced of it effelt, for they, requiring no more than natural fulfenance, jie yed with little, and created no accidental necessities for support of Life. In some Countries they were fuch great lovers of Man's Flesh, that when they were killing an Indian, they would fuck his bloud at the Wound they had given him; and when they quartered his body, they would lick their fingers, that not one drop of bloud should be wasted: in their Shambles they commonly fold Mens Bodies, making Saulages of their Guts, suffing them with slesh, that nothing might be loft. Peter of Cieca in the 26th Chapter of his Book, declares fo much, and affirms, that he faw it with his own Eyes; and that fo far their gluttony provoked them in this kind, that they did not spare those very Children, which they begot upon those Women whom they had taken Captives in the War, but breeding them with fuch care and diet as might make them fat; fo foon as they came to be twelve years of age, and that they were plump and tender, they dreffed them for their Table, and devoured them with their Mothers, unless they were with Child; for then they referved them till they were delivered, and had nurfed up their brood. Moreover to those Men whom they took in the War they gave Women, and their breed they nourithed and fatned, with intent to eat them, as we do Lambs, and Calves, and the young ones of our heards and flocks, without regard to Bloud or Parentage, which even in brute beafts hath fome effect of love and tenderness. But what was most abominable above all, was a custome among the fome Indians to eat the Fleth of their Parents, fo foon as they were dead; accoun-Entrails, which they boiled, or roafted, according to the quantity; if the body was lean, and extenuated, they boiled the flesh to make it the more tender; and if it were gross and flethy, then it was roafted; and for the bones, they buried them with some Ceremony, either in the holes of Rocks, or the hollow Trees: but this fort of People know no Gods, nor adore any thing, and inhabit for the most part in the hotter, and not in colder Regions of this Continent. In the more cold and barren Countries, where the earth is not fo fruitfull, necessity compells them to fow Mayz, which is their Indian Wheat, and other forts of pulse or grain. but they diffinguish neither times, nor feafons for it; and in their fishing and fowling, and in all other things the like barbarity of manners predominates.

As to their manner of Cloathing, the modesty of an Historian obligeth me rather to pass it by, than to describe it, lest I should seem offensive to chast and modest Ears: but to express it with as much decency as I am able; we are to know, that the Indians in the first ages were no other covering than the Skins which Nature gave them. Some perhaps of them for curiofity, or affectation girt themselves about the Waste with a clout of course thread, which they ofteemed a Cloathing fufficient for them. I remember, that in the Year 1570, when I came into New Spain, that I met in the streets of Cartagena with five Indians, all naked, walking one after the other, like fo many Cranes, fo little had the converfation and fociety of the Spaniards in fo long a time prevailed to the alteration of their Humours, Manners or Barbarity.

The Women wear no other garments than the Men; onely the married Wives girt a string about them to which they fasten a clout of Cotton, a yard square, like an Apron, and where they cannot or will not learn to weave, they cover their nakedness with the rine or broad leaves of trees. The Maidens also wear fomething girt about them, to which they add fome other mark, as a fign of their Virginity. Modelly forbids us to enlarge farther on this Subject, it being fufficient what we have declared, that in hot Countries they went naked, without other covering, or ornament, than that which Nature furnishes to brute Beasts; whence we may imagine how barbarous thole Indians were before the times in which the Incas gained a Sovereignty over them.

In colder Countries they used Garments, not for modesty, or decency, but for necessity to defend them from the cold: their cloathing was commonly with the Skins of beafts, and with a fort of Matt, which they wove with ftraw or rufhes. Other Nations of them, who had more ingenuity, wore a fort of Mantles, ill made, and foun with a course thread, and worse woven with wool, or wild hemp, which they call Channar; and fome ornament about their necks, and a covering about their waftes, was all the cloathing which their cultoms and manners required, and in this habit the Spaniards found those Indians, over whom the Incas had not extended their Dominion; and which even to this day continues amongst them: for they have fuch an aversion to garments, that even those who live familiarly with the Spaniards, and are their domestick Servants, are rather forced by importunity to use them, than that they chuse them out of inclination, or any consideration of decency or modefty; the like humour is also common to the Women; so that the Spaniards use in jest to tell them that they were bad Spinsters, and to ask them whether they would not cloath themselves because they would not spin, or would not fpin, because they would not be cloathed.

CHAP. VI.

Of the different ways of Marriages, and diverlity of Languages amongst them. And of the Poisons and Witchcrafts that they used:

Such as these Indians were in their eating and cloathing, such were they in their Marriages, in which they were as bestial, as in their other manners, their Marriages, in which they were as pertian, as in their other manners, exercifing cotition in the fame way as Beafts; for having not Wives in property, they used their Women as Nature incited, or as accidentally they occurred, without regard to Mothers, Daughters, or Sisters, or the nearest proximity of bloud. In some Countries, where a certain fort of Marriage was usual, those Women that were free of their Bodies, were most esteemed, and obtained the best Husbands, because they were accounted active, and busic in their calling, when others of a more chaft and cold Nature, were rejected as drones, dull and unfit for love. In other Countries they observed a different custome; for the unit for love. In other Countries they observed a different cultome; for the Mothers preferved their Daughters with great respect and care, till the time of their Marriage, when bringing them into publick, they shewed the Tokens of their Virginity. In other parts the Father, or near of kindred, claimed a title to the Maidenhead of the Bride by conditions of the Marriage, before she was given to the Husband. Peter de Cieca in the z4th Chapter of his Book affirms the same; and that Sodomy was used amongst them, but yet in secret, and as a crime: though the Devil persuaded them to it in their Temples, as a pleasure which their Gods delighted in, that so under the guise of Religion he might take off that veil of Modesty, which covered humane nature.

There were some, both men and Women, that practifed the art of Poisoning, so that they could kill with it immediately, or in a certain time, or could make mad, or fools, disfigure the countenance, make the body leprous, and the Limbs

Every Province, and every Nation had a different Tongue, or Dialect, those who spake the same Language they esteemed Friends and Kindred, and with them who spake the same Language they effected Friends and Kindred, and with them they kept peace and confederacy, all others were accounted Enemies and Strangers, with whom they maintained a perpetual War, eating those whom they took, as if they had been Animals of another species.

Witchcraft was more commonly used by the Women, than by the Men, who, to gain a reputation to themselves of Wisedom, of Prophecies and Predictions of things to come, like Pythonesses, or sibyls, treated samiliarly with the Devil. These Women, out of malice or Envy practified this Art most commonly on the Men, and which operated the same effect as their Poisons, such was the constitution of these self-use in the single age, and in the time of their Gentilism. tion of thefe Indians in the first age, and in the time of their Gentilism, when they had no other guide but the Devil and their own Natures; and hereof we shall more particularly treat in the sequel of this History, when coming to discourse of the Nations apart, we shall have occasion to mention the barbarisms and beflialities which are respectively appropriated unto the several People.

The Original of the Incas, who were Kings of Peru.

These People living and dying in that mariner, as we have before declared, it pleased God at last that some little light should dawn from the morning, and through the dark clouds of Ignorance and Stupidity dart a small ray of the Law of Nature into their hearts, that learning something of that respect which one man ought to bear unto another, they might by degrees improve in morality, and from Beasts be converted into Men, and made capable of Reason and Understanding; that so, when the same God, who is the Sun of Justice, should think sit to issue out the light of his Divine Rays on those poor Idolaters, they might be found more docible, and cashy disposed to receive the principles of the Christian faith, the which will plainly appear in the progress of this History; and that those, whom the Ineas had subjected, and reduced to some terms of Humanity and Political Government, were much better and easier to receive the Evangelical Doctrine preached unto them, than those incorant weresteen when the measurements. and Political Government, were much better and easter to receive the Evangelical Doctrine preached unto them, than those ignorant wetches who lived in their natural flupidity, and who to this day, after the space of 71 Years, that the Spanfards have been Masters of Pern, have made no step or improvement towards the Doctrine of Morality, or a rational Life. And now that we may proceed forward, to relate these obscure matters, I must acquaint the Reader, that having considered with my self of the ways and methods whereby I might most clearly make known the beginning and original of the Incas, who were the Natural Kings of Pern, I have determined with my self, that there is no more expedite course, nor means hereunto, than to repeat those stories which in my youth I received from the relation of my Mother, and my Uncles, her Brothers, and others of my Kindred, touching this subject, which certainly will be more authenticly and statisfactory than any account we can receive from other Authours, and therefore shall proceed in this manuer. fore shall proceed in this manner.

My Mother, refiding at Cozeo, which was her own Countrey, those sew Kindred and Relations of hers which survived, and escaped from the cruelties and Tyrannies of Acahnalpa, (as shall be related in the History of his life) came almost every week to make her a visit; at which their ordinary discourse was concerning the Original of their Kings, the Majesty, and greatness of their Empire, their Conquests, and Policies in Government, both for War and Peace, together with the Laws they instituted for the good and benefit of their subjects: in short, there was nothing great or prosperous amongst them, which they omitted in the Series of their Discourse.

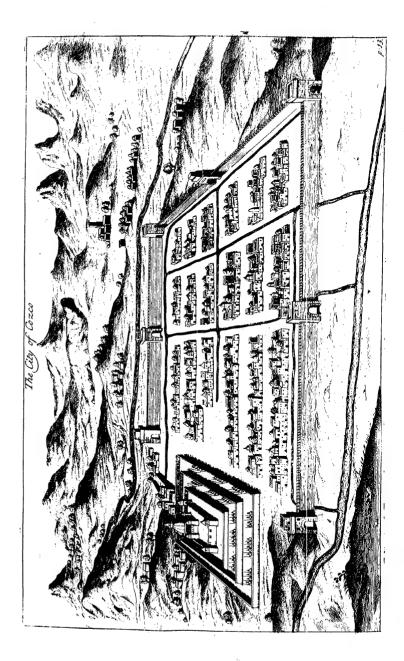

From their past Happiness they descended to their present condition, and bewailed the death of their Kings, by whole deltruction the government fell, and the Empire was transferred. Thefe, and fuch like discourses, the Incas, and the Ladies of quality, which we call Palius, entertained us with at their vifits, which they always concluded with tears and fighs in remembrance of their loft happiness, faying, that from Governours they were now become Slaves, &c. During these haying, that from Governous they were now become slaves, & Lotting their Difcourfes, I, that was a Boy, often ran in and out, pleafing my felf with fome pieces of the ftory, as Children do with the tales of Nurfes. In this manner days, and months, and years paffing, till I was come to fixteen or feventeen years of age, being one day prefent with my Kindred, who were difcourfing of their Kings and Anceftours, it came into my mind to ask the most elderly Person amongst them, and internate his Different in the most elderly Person amongst them, and interrupt his Difcourse in this manner. Inca, faid I, and my Onele, how is it possible, since you have no Writings, that you have been able to conserve the memory of things pass, and of the Original of our Kings? I observe that the Spaniards, and their neighbouring Nations, have their Divine and Humane Histories, whereby they learn the time that their own Kings, and the Princes of other Countries began their Reigns, when and how Empires were altered and transferred; may, so for they proceed, as to tell its how many thousand searce are past, since God created Hesven and Earth: all which, and much more, they have learned from their book; but as for your parts, in what manner can you retain the memory of your Ancestors, or be informed of the Original of your Incas? as who was the first of them, or what was his name? of what lineage, or in what manner he began to reign? what Nations he conquered, and when he gave a being to this great Empire, and with what Explaits our Ancestors atchieved their greatness?

The Inca was much pleased to hear me make these enquiries, because he took a delight to recount those matters, and turning himself to me, Consin, said he, I most willing comply with your request; for it concerns you to hear them, and keep them in your heart, (which is a phrase that they use, when they mean that it should be committed to Memory.) Tou must know therefore, that in ages past all this Region and Conintry you see round us, was nothing but mountains, and wild forest, and the People in those times were like so many brute Beasts, without Religion or Government, they neither sowed, nor ploughed, nor cloathed themselves, because they knew not the art of weaving with Cotton or Wool: They about by two and two, or three and three together, at they happened to meet in Caves, or holes in the Rocks and Mountains; their sood was Herbs, or Grass, Rosts of Trees, and wild Fruits, and Man's Fisher, all the coverings they had mere Leaves or Barks of Trees, and Shins of Beasts: In short, they were altogether savage, making use of their Vionen as they accidentally met, understanding no property, or single enjoyment of

And now I pray observe me with due attention, for I would not be troubled to make revetition of what I have laid. Our Father the Sun, (for this is the language of the Incar, which is a title of Reverence and Respect, which they always adjoin, so often as they name the Sun; for they avail themselves much of the Honour of being descended from him; and his Name is so pretious, that it is blasbhemy for any, and by Law he is to be stoned, who dares to take this Name into his mouth, who is not an Inca, or descended from that Lineage.) Our Father the Sun (faid the Inca) beholding Men such as before related, took compassion of them, and sent a Son and a Daughter of his own from Heaven to Earth, to instruct our people in the knowledge of Our Father the Sun, that so they might worship and adore him, and esteem him for their God: giving them Laws and Precepts, whereunto they might conform their Lives, like Men of Reason and Civility; that they might live in Houses and Society, learn to sow the Land. cultivate Trees, and Plants, feed their Flocks, and enjoy them, and other Fruits of the Earth, as rational Men, and not as brute Beafts. With these Orders and Instructions Our Father the Sun placed his two Children in the Lake Titicaca, which is about eighty Leagues from hence, giving them liberty to go, and travell which way they pleased, and that Leagues from name, Recong times to the front from the food first a little wedge of Gold into the ground, (which he had given them,) being about half a yard long, and two fingers thick, and where with one stroke this wedge should fink into the Earth, there should be the place of their Habitation, and the Court unto which all People should refort. Lastly, he ordered them that when they should have reduced People to these Rules and Obedience, that then they should conserve and maintain them with Reason, Justice, Piety, Clemency and Gentleress, performing all the good Offices of a pious Father towards those Children which he loves with tenderness: and that in imitation of him, and by his example, who doeth good to all the World, affording them light to perform their business, and the actions of Life, marming them when they are cold, making their pastures, and their feeds to grow, their trees to fructifie, and their flocks to increase, matering their Lands with dew from above, and in its season bestowing chearfull and favourable weather: and to manifest his care of all things, said, I every day take a turn round the World, to see and discover the necessities and wants of all things, that so as the true Fomenter and Parent of them, I may apply my self to their succour and redress. Thus after my example, and as my Children, sent upon the Earth, I would have you to imitate me, and to instill such Doctrine into this People, as may convert them from Beasts unto Men: and from henceforth I constitute and ordain you Lords and Princes over this People, that by your Instructions, Reason and Government, they may be conserved. Thus Our Father the Sun. having declared his pleasure to these his two Children, he dispatched them from him; and they taking their journey from Titicaca Northward, at every place where they came to repole. they tryed with their wedge to strike it in the ground, but it took no place, nor would it enter; at length they came to a poor Inn, or place to reft in, about seven or eight Leagues Southward from this City, which to this day is called Pacarec Tampu, which is as much as to firs, the Shining or Enlightned Dormitory. This is one of those Colonies which this Prince planted, the Inhabitants whereof boast of this Name and Title which our Inca bestowed upon it; from whence he and his Queen descended to the Valley of Cozco, which was then onely a wild and barren Mountain. CHAP.

CHAP. VIII.

The Foundation of the Imperial City of Cozco.

FIF first stop (proceeded the Incia) which they made in this Valley, was in the Diefart called Huanacauti, which is to the fouthward of this City, and there they again fruck their wedge of Gold into the Earth, which received it with great facility, and which sucked it in with so much ease, that they saw it no more. Then faid the Inca to his Sifter, and Wife, in this Valley Our Father the Sun hath commanded that we thould flar. and make our abode, and in to doing we thall perform his Pleature; in pursuance whereof it is necessary that we now sevarate each from the other, and take different wave, that so we may affemble and draw the People to 14, in fuch manner as we may be able to preach and propagate the doctrine amongst them, which he hath committed to us. Accordingly our first Governours proceeded by divers ways from the Defart of Huanacauti to convocate the Peaple, which being the first place, of which we had knowledge, that they had hallowed by their Feet, and from whence they went to doe good unto Men, we have describedly (as is manifest) erected a Temple, wherein to adore and worship our Father the Sun, and remember this good and benefit he bath done unto the World, Our Inca the Prince took his way northwayd, and the Princefs to the Southward, and to all the Men and Women which they met in the wild thickets, and uncultivated places, they declared to them, that their Father the Sun had fent them to be Teachers and Benefactours to those Inhabitants, and to draw them from that rude and savage Life, and to another method of living, more agreeable to Reason and Humane Society; and in farther pursuance of the Commands of their Father the Sun, they came to gather them from those Mountains, and rude places, to more convenient Habitations, where they might live in Humane Society, and to affigu them such food, as was appropriated to Men. and not to Beafts. These, and such like matters, these Princes declared to those savages, whom they found in Defarts and Mountains, who beholding these two persons cloubed, and adorned with such Habit as Our Father the Sun had vested them in, and observing that their Ears were bored through, for wearing Jewels, and more large and open than usual, that they might hear and receive the Complaints of the oppressed; (in which we also are like them, who are of their Offspring and Family,) and that by the gentleness of their words, and grace of their Countenance, they manifested themselves to be Children of the Sun, and such as were employed to affemble People into societies, and political ways of living, and to administer such sorts of food as were wholsome and appropriated to Humane Sustenance, they were firnck with such admiration of their figure and Persons, and allured with the promises they made them, that they gave entire credence to their words, adored them as Children of the Sun, and obeyed them as their Princes: And thefe poor wretches relating thefe matters one to the other, the fame thereof so encreased, that great numbers, both of Men and Women, flocked together, being willing to follow to what place foever they (hould guide them.

Thus great multitudes of People being affembled together, the Princes gave order that Provision should be made of such fruits, as the Earth produced for their Suffenance, lest being scattered abroad to gain their food, the main body (bould be divided, and the numbers diminished: others in the mean time were employed in building houses, of which the Prince gave them a model and form. In this manner our Imperial City began to be peopled, being divided into two parts, one of which was called Hanan Cozco, which is as much as the Upper Cozco, and the other Hurin Cozco, which is the Lower Cozco; those which were assembled under the King were of the Opper Town, and those under the Queen were of the Lower: Not that this difference was mide out of any respect to Superiority, for that they were to be Brothers, and Children of the fame Father and Mother, and in the fame equality of Fortune; but onely it ferved to distinguish the followers of the King from those of the Queen; and to remain for an everlasting Memorial of their first Beginning and Original; with this difference onely, that the Opper Cozco should be as the Elder, and the Lower as the younger Children. And this is the reason that in all our Empire this diversity of lineage hath remained, being ever fince distinguished into Hanan Ayllu, and Hurin Ayllu, which is the upper and the lower Lineage, and Hanan Suyu, and Hurin Suyu, which is the upper and the lower Tribe.

BOOK I.

The City being thus Peopled; Our Inca taught his Subjects those Labours which appertained unto the Men, as to plough and sow the Land with divers sorts of Seeds, which were usefull, and sor soods to which end he instructed them how to make Ploughs and Harrows, and other Instruments, fit and necessary for that purpose; he shewed them also the way of enting chanels for the Water, which now runs through this Valley of COZCO, and to make Shoes for their Feet. On the other side the Queen instructed the Women in good Huswisers, as how to shin and weave Cotton and wood, and to make garments for their Husbands, their Children, and themselves, with other Offices appertaining to the House. In sum, nothing was omitted conducing to humane Welfare, which the King did not teach his Men, and the Queen her Women, making them both their Scholars and their Subjects.

CHAP. IX.

The Actions of the first Indian King, called Manco Capac.

And that I may not be tedious in the relation of what this Our first Inca acted, you must know; that he reduced all Eastward, as far as the River called Paucatampu, and eighty Leagues Westward, to the great River called Apurimac, and to the Southward nine Leagues to Quequelana. To these several quarters Our Inca sent out particular Colonies, to the largest a hundred Families; and to the lesser according to their capacity. These are the beginnings of this our City, and of this our rich and samous Empire, which your Father, and his Adhrents have dessoiled us of. These were our sirst Incas, and Kings in the sirst age of the World, from whom the succeeding Princes, and we our setues are descended: but how many years it may be since our Father the Sun sent his Ossermangs mongst us, I am not able precisely to declare, because my Admord may said me in it, but I imagine, they may be about 400 Fears. This our Inca was named Manco Capac, and his Queen Coya Manna of Huaco, who were, as I have said, Brethren of the Sun and Moon. And thus having at large stassified the request you made to me, in relation of which, that I might not incline you to saddes, I abstrained from venting tears at my Eyer, which notwithstanding drop with bloud on my Heart, caused by that inward grief I seel, to see our Incas, and their Empire runned and destroyed.

This large Relation of the Original of our Kings, I received from that Inca which was my Mothers Brother, from whom I requefted it; and which I have caufed faithfully to be translated out of the Indian into the Spanish Tongue; which though it be not written with such Majesty of words as the Inca spake it, nor with that fignificancy of termes as that Language bears, nor so large and particular (to avoid tediousness) as it was delivered to me, howsoever it may serve to give fiftien.

fufficient light to the nature and knowledge of this our Hiftory. Many other things of like fort, though of no great moment, this Inca often recounted in his Vifus and Difcourfes he made me, the which I shall declare in their due places; being now troubled that I made no farther enquiries into other matters, for which I have room here to place them with good authority.

CHAP. X.

Wherein the Authour alledges the Authority he hath for the Truth of his History.

Aving thus laid the first Foundation whereon to build out History, though as to the Original of our Kings of Pern, it may feem something fabulous; it now follows, that we proceed forward to relate in what manner the Indians were reduced and conquered, enlarging the particulars which the Inca gave me, with divers other additions concerning the Natural Indians, and their Kings. which the first Inca, Manco Capac, reduced under his Government, with whom I was educated, and conversed until I arrived to the age of twenty years; during which time I became informed of all the particulars concerning which I write, for in my youth they related thefe flories to me, as Nurfes doe tales, or fables to their Children.

Afterwards, in my riper years, I took a more particular notice of their Laws and Policies, comparing this new Government of the Spiniards, with that of the Incas, namely, what were efteemed faults and trespates, and what feverities and punishments were proportioned to the fame: they informed me also of the Methods which their Kings used in War and Peace, how they treated that VIGIA and the Courtee they will be the controlled to the same they informed me also of the Methods which their Kings used in War and Peace, how they treated that VIGIA and the Courtee they were the same than me alto of the Methods which their Rings nied in War and Peace, now they treated their Vaffals, and what fervices they required from them. They infructed me alfo in their Idolatries, Ceremonies and Sacrifices, teaching me to diffinguish between their more folemn feftivals, and the ordinary holy-days, and how they were to be observed and celebrated; they told me also what was eftermed superafitious, and of abuse in their Religion, what Omens there were of good and bad luck; in short, there was nothing either relating to their Government or Manness of which they gave me not a distinct Account. So that Savidle Idolesia. luck; in fhort, there was nothing either relating to their Government or Manners, of which they gave me nor a diffinct Account, for that should I describe every matter received from them, the particulars would be too large to be contained within the volume of this History. Besides what I have heard, I have been an Eye-witness for the most part of their Idolatrous Worship, Feasts, and other superstitious Customs, which untill the twelvth or thirteenth year of my age were not wholly abolished amongst them. For in regard 1 was born eight years after the Spaniards became Masters of my Countrey; and that, as I said, I was educated amongst the Indians till I was twenty years old, I had opportunity in all that time to observe, and be well acquainted with their Customs; besides all which, so soon as I rook a resolution to write this History. I acquainted my which, fo foon as I took a refolution to write this Hiftory, I acquainted my Schoolfellows, fuch as were taught the art of Grammar, of this my intention, defiring them to fearch into the Archives and Registers of their Countries, and to fend me the various fuccesses of them; the which purpose of mine they so well fend me the various successes of them; the which purpose of mine they so wen approved, that every one most readily contributed to this work, sending me the History of the Exploits and Actions of their respective meas, and is the same which the Spanish Historians relate on this Subject, though not so particularly, and largely as we have done. And in regard the Beginning and Foundation of this History confists of the actions of this suffer the way not be obliged to repeat them in the Lives of his Successors, who having a great value for his Person and Vertuse, made it their chief sine and intension to improve the Humony Action and Vertues, made it their chief aim and intention to imitate the Humour, Actions and Customs of this their first Prince Manco Capac; so that we shall endeavour to represent the most important matters, which he acted, omitting things less pertinent and material. And though many things herein contained may seem fabulous, yet because they are such as the Indians make the Foundation of their History, and of those greatnesses which the Spaniards do now in reality enjoy, I cannot pass them by, without injury and prejudice to the Beginning, Progress and Period of this Monarchy: Howsoever having sucked in a sincerity with my Milk, I shall give a true Account of all that I heard, and received from my Parents, promising, that neither favour nor affection to my People and Bloud shall encline me either to conceal the bad, or beyond Reason applaud the good or natural Vertues of them; for though Gentilism be such a Sea of Errours, that every thing may be believed of it, which is new and prodigious; yet I shall deliver nothing but what the Spanish Historians have before intimated of those Kings and Countries; and that I may not seem to obtrude any thing out of partiality to my Kindred, I shall consine my self within the bounds of the Spanish Writers, intending that these Papers shall serve for a Comment to theirs, and to rectific the Errours they have made, as to Times, Persons and Countries: which indeed is no wonder, if considering the little knowledge they have in the language, they have been guilty of many miltakes relating to that People.

wonder, it confidering the incre knowledge they have in the language, they have been guilty of many miftakes relating to that People.

In fine, whatfoever I hall relate of thefe People, who were deftroyed, before they were known; either in reference to their ancient Idolatry, Government, Laws and Cuftoms, it shall be clearly laid down, without comparing it the divine or humane Histories, or the Governments of our time; because all comparing for a codious; but rather leave those reslexions to the Reader, who finding something of similitude herein to the stories of Holy Writ, and to the Fables of Ancient Gentilism, may apply them according to his own fancy and humour. For my part, I having been a natural Indian born, and educated in Arms, have little or no abilities or strength of my own, and therefore have need of the favour and

CHAP. XI.

Of those People which the sirst Inca sent to inhabit divers

But to return now to the Inca, Manco Capac: After he had founded the City of Coxeo, and divided it into two parts, (as we have already declared) he planted many other Colonies. To the Eaftward of this City he placed those People, which now extend themselves over that tract of Land which runs to the River called Pancar tampus; and thirteen several other Nations he seared on both sides of the Royal way, called Antison, which for brevity sake we omit particularly to nominate, being all or the most part of the Lineage, or Tribe called Paques. To the Westward in the space of eight Leagues in breadth, and about nine or ten in length, he planted thirty several Villages, which spread themselves on one hand, and the other as far as the Royal way of Cannison. These People formed three different Nations, namely Masse, which were distinguished by sour names, viz. Mayn, Cancu, Chinchapucyu, Rimac tampus, the remainder of the People seared themselves in the pleasant valley of Sacsabusuma, where the samous Battel was sought, wherein Gongulo Picatro was taken Prisoner. To the Southward of the City thirty eight or forty other Villages were planted, eighteen of which were of the Nation of Asarmarca, and extended themselves on one side and the other of the Royal high way of Callassym, for the space of chirty Leagues in length, beginning from those parts which are overagainst the Salima, and reach within a little League of the City, where that fatal Battel was fought of Don Diego of Almagro the Elder, and Hernando Piçarro; all the other Nations have five or fix different denominations, which are Quefpicancha, Muyna, Vicos, Quehnay, Huarne, Cavinna. This Nation of Cavinna boaft themselves much of being defeended from Parents, who proceeded from a certain Lake, where they report that the Soulso of such who dye do enter, and thence return again to animate other Bodies. These People adored an Idol of a prodigious figure, and offered a ftrange fort of Sacrifice to it; but the Inca, Manco Capac, destroyed the Idol, and abolished their rites, and compelled them as he did all his other subjects to adore

These People, who were not much above a hundred in number, were but small in the beginning, the greatest not exceeding a hundred samilies, and the lesser consisting of about twenty five or thirty, which afterwards by the privileges and encouragements, which the Inca, Manco Capac, bestowed upon them, (as we shall hereaster declare) they increased exceedingly, many of them extending themselves into a thousand Families, and the lesser to three or four hundred at least; the which immunicies and favous being confirmed, and augmented by Manco Capac and his Successory, the people increased and stourished, till all was destroyed by the barbarous Tyranny of Anashadpa. Now in these our times, and about twenty years past those Colonies which Manco Capac planted on this side, and almost all the People of Peru do not now posses their ancient dwellings; because a Vice-Roy, as we shall shew in its proper place, joined them afterwards, uniting five or fix into one, and sometimes seven or eight, as was most agreeable to his purpose, from whence many inconveniences accrued to that People, which we omit, because they are grievous and ungratefull to repeat.

CHAP. XII.

In what manner the Inca taught and instructed his Subjects.

THE Inca, Manco Capac, as he planted his Colonies, so every where he taught them to plow, and cultivate the Land, how to make Aqueducts and Confervatories for their Water, and all other matters tending to the more commoditions well-being of humane Life; he gave them also some rules of Civility necessary in society for maintenance of Friendship and Brotherhood, as the Laws of Nature and Reason distated; that laying asside all animostites and passions one against the other, they should doe as they would be done by, maintaining without partiality the same Law for others which they allow for themselves: but above all he recommended to them a respect which they ought to bear towards the Bodies of their Wives and Daughters, for in that vice they were the most blameable and barbarous; and in order hereunto he made Adultery, Murther and Robbery mortal crimes, and punishable with death. He ordered that no man should have more than one Wife at a time, and that in their Martiages they should confine themselves to their Tribes, that they might not make a consistion in the Lineage, and that from twenty years and upwards they might marry, because before that time their prudence was not ripe enough to manage their Affairs, nor govern their Families. He employed others to gather the more gentle fort of Cartein of socks, which ran dispersed and wild through the Woods and Fields, causing them to make garments of their Wood), according to the Art which the Queen Mana Octho Huaco had taught them for spinning and weaving; he shewed them also how to make that fort of Shoes which they now wear, and which they called Visitas. Over every one of these Colonies he ordained a Chief, which they called Visitas.

Curaca, and is the same which Cacique signifies in the Language of Cuba, and Santto Domingo, which is as much as a Ruler over Subjects: and these were chosen Santto Domingo, which is as much as a Ruler over Subjects: and these were chosen for their merits; for when any one was more gentle, affable, pious, ingenious and more zealous for the publick good than others, he was presently advanced to Government, and to be an Instructor of the ignorant Indians, who obeyed him with as much reverence, as Children do their Parents; and till these things could be put into execution, and till the Earth could produce these fruits, which by labour and art of Cultivation might be expected, a general store of Provisions were collected into a common place, to be distributed agreeable to the necessities and largeness of Families. And that they might not live without Religion, he prescribed the Rites and Ceremonies for their Idolatry: he appointed out the place and design where and how to erect a Temple to the Sun, that they might facrifice to him: for in regard they esteemed him the great God of all, by whose prace and dength where and now to elect a Temple to the sun, that they high factifice to him; for in regard they efteemed him the great God of all, by whole heat and light they lived, the Fields produced their Fruits, and their Cattle multiplied, and that they received a thouland favours and benefits from him; it was tiplied, and that they received a thouland favours and benefits from him; it was but natural reafon for them to acknowledge their benefits, and especially they esteemed themselves obliged to render service and adoration to the Sun and Moon, for having sent their own Children to them, who had reduced them from a Life of Beasts, to the present condition and state of humane Reason. It was likewise ordained, that a House should be built for Virgins dedicated to the Sun, and that the same should be possessed by none, but such as were of the Royal Bloud and Family, and supplied from thence, so soon as the number of the Royal Race was sufficiently increased. All which he ordained and appointed to his People, that they should invokally observe in grateful acknowledgment of the benefits received. The proposed to the other side, that in reward thereof they might expect the ved; promiting on the other fide, that in reward thereof they might expect perpetual additions of good to them from the bleffings of the Sun who had revealed thefe fecrets, and fent his Meffengers to the Indians to instruct and guide them the ways of Wisedom! all which matters, and much more, the poor Indians believed, and by tradition have conserved to these our days; it being the main point of their belief, that the Inaa was a Child of the Sun; of which and of such like fables they greatly boalt, and that none but fuch as was of Divine progeny was able to have directed or prescribed things of such sublime and elevated an understanding, as these.

CHAP. XIII.

Of the Titles, and Dignities which the Inca for distinction fake, and to procure greater Honour and Reverence beflowed on his own Family.

THE Inca, Manco Capac, having employed himself for many years in the matters before related, for the good and benefit of his Subjects, and perceiving that thereby he had produced in their minds a real sense of gratitude towards ving that thereby he had produced in their minds a real lente of gratitude towards him, and a readineß to yield to him and his, who were Children of the Sun, all due Honour and Reverence; he judged it requifite for the more effectual imprefion of this Awe and Refpect, to dignifie himfelf, and those descended from him, with noble Titles, and Habits different from others. Wherefore first he ordered, that after his Example all his Posterity should go with their Heads shorn, wearing onely one lock of Hair; but this shearing was performed with great difficulty, for they had not yet arrived to the invention of Scissors, but with a sharp slint cut the Hair, as well as they were able; whence it was, that a certain young Incastaid to one of my Schoolfellows, with whom he was taught to write and reade, that that Had the Spaniards introduced no other invention among it us than the use of Scillors Toobing-Glasses and Combs, they had deserved all that Gold and Silver which our Countries produces.

The other Mark of Diffinction, was to have their Ears boared through, which the Women commonly did, with a fharp bramble, and by fome art made the hole fo wide, (as we shall hereafter describe) that it is wonderfull to conceive how it is possible for so small a piece of slesh, as the Velvet of the Ear, to be extended fo far, as to receive an Ear-ring as big as the frame of a pulley, for it was made in the form of those with which we draw up Pitchers from a Well; and of that compass, that in case it were beaten streight; it would be a quarter of a Yard long, and a singer in thickness; and because the Indians wear them thus big, the long, and a finger in thickness; and because the Indians wear them thus big, the Spaniards call them Orejones, or slap-eared Luggs.

For the Dress of their Heads, the Incas wear a Wreath of divers Colours, which they call Llautu, and is the breadth of a finger, but not quite so thick, which they bind about their Heads sour or five times, in form of a Tulbant. These three particulars of cutting the Hair, boaring the Ears, and binding the Head with this Llautu, were the difficitions which Manco Capae appropriated to his family; for though the Subject might wear this Wreath, or Llautu, about their Heads, yet it was to be of black onely, and not of divers colours, which appertained onely to the Royal Blood. This beginn been the Fallion for some time, the was industrial Royal Bloud. This having been the Fashion for some time, the Inca indulging Add that their Hair flould be rounded; and clipped close on the top of their Hair, but in a different manner to those of his Family, and of one from the other; that so the divers Lineages and Nations might be diffinguished by their Heads. And that the Fashion of the mea might not be very different to that of his Subjects; he ordered that their Hair should be rounded; and clipped close on the top of their Heads; as far as their Temples, and that their Locks should hang on each side, to the biottom of their Ears; others he ordered to clip their Hair as sar as might teach to the middle of their Ears, and others shorter, but none was to wear it in fashion of the case. of the Inca. And thus these Indians kept themselves constant to their fallion, not to appear fantastical or varying, lest they should either seem to disapprove the Precepts of their Inca, or contemp the Customs of their own Lineage, which they ever had in great Esteem and Honour.

they ever had in great Effect and Honour.

In process of time the Inca, willing to enlarge the privileges of his People, gave them permission to boar their Ears, though not so wide as the Inca, and that the Pendents to them should vary according to the diversity of their Lineages and Countries. To the Nation called Maju, and Cancu, he gave leave to wear a Twist of Straw, about the thickness of the little singer. To the Nation Poques he ordained a Lock of white Wool to hang as big as the top of the Thumb. To the Nations Muyna, Huaruc and Chillani, he appointed Ear-rings of the common Junk or Reed, which the Indian cell Timera. To the Nation RimalFamps he appropriated an Ear-ring of a certain foft wood, which in the Isles of Barlovento they propriated an Ear-ring of a certain for wood, which in the lifes of Bartovento they call Maguey, and in the general Tongue of Peru, Chuchau, which, when the Bark is pilled off, is gentle, and eafily bended. To the People called Vreas, Tucay, Tampu, and others inhabiting on the Banks of the River Tucay, he gave the privilege, as a peculiar mark and note of his Favour, to wear their Ear-rings of a larger fize than other Nations, but left they should exceed herein beyond their due proportion, he gave them a measure and compass which they were not to pass, the matter of them was to be the reed called Tatura; these were called Ear-twists rather than Pendants, because they did not hang from the Ear, but were twined about it, as a rope is about the mouth of the Pitcher.

Besides these distinctions, the Inca appropriated other marks to every Nation, that fo they might not be confounded one with the other; those Names and Titles which most nearly related to those which the King himself had assumed, being reputed most honourable and of greatest renown: not that the Inca was partial to any, or favoured any beyond Reason or Justice, but as some were of a nature more docible and tractable than others, and laboured to instruct and teach the rude People in the ways of Humanity; to those he granted a higher testimony of his Favours, and fignal marks of honours, all which being confirmed by Revela-tion from the Sun his Father, the poor Indians without envy or emulation each to other, submitted unto, having already by good experience tasted the benefit of their obedience to their Inca:

In process of time the Inca finding himself aged, and burthened with years, fummoned a general Assembly of the chiefest of his Subjects, at the City of Cocco, and in a solemn Oration gave them to understand, that he intended shortly to return to Heaven, and take his Repose with his Father the Sun, (which words the Kings descended from him did always after use before their death) and being now to leave them, the ultimate testimony of all his favours which he had to bequeath to them, was the Appellation of his own Royal Name, that so they and their Posterity might be honoured and renowned through all the world: and as a farther evidence of this affection, he did not onely bequeath this Honour to themselves onely, but to descend to their Posterity, and that without difference or distinction they might all assume the honourable Title of Incast; for having been his first Subjects, and such as had submitted to his Will and Pleasure, he loved them as Children, and therefore rejoyced to bestow upon then his Royal Name and Dignities, in hopes and expectation that they would ever after be obedien to their present King and his Successors, affisting them to reduce under their Dominion such other Indians as had not as yet submitted to their Empire; all which he desired them to lay up in their Hearts and memory, as loyal Subjects; yet notwithstanding he would not have it be understood that he intended to bestow the Name of Pallas on their Women, which was a Title still to be appropriated to their Royal Bloud and Family, for that Women not being capable to bear Arms, and serve in the War against their Enemies, were not worthy of a Title for truly magnificent.

Those Indians which obtained this favour, were properly those who inhabit Penn, and were called Incas, and the Spaniards, and other Nations, out of courtese, call their Women Pullus, and Copus: For there are very sew of the true Royal Bloud of those Kings remaining; and such as do, are by reason of their poverty and necessity unknown and obscure, unless it be here and there one; for the tyranny and cruelty of Arahusha had destroyed them wholly, and those sew which did escape, at least the principal and most famous amongst them, persished by other distresses and calamities, as we shall hereafter make appear in its due place. All the distinction which the Incas, Manco Capac, reserved to himself and his Successions, was a coloured border on his Wreath, in nature of a bringe, which bound his Head from one Temple to the other; the whilch was common to none, but the Inca and the Prince his Heir, who wore it narrower than his Father; and of a fallow colour. What Ceremonies were used at the Instalment of the Prince, and when he was fown, we shall declare in its due place, when we come to speak of the Hosemen which the Incas armed out against their Enemies.

men which the hasa armed out against their Enemies.

These Privileges and Favours proceeding immediately from the gratiousness of their Prince, the hadians received with great Thankfulness and Applause, because the heart made them to believe that it was by the appointment and order of the Sun, who observing their Compliance, docility, and other merits, had confered these marks of his good acceptance on them. And when they sarther considered the greatness of his last Favour, which was the Title of hear, and which was not onely allotted to themselves, but was to desend also to their Posterity, they were wholly ravished with the Bounty and Liberality of his Royal Mind, not knowing how to receive it with other sense than Transport of Admiration; so that it became the common subject of their Discourse, how that their hear had not onely transformed them from Beass into Men, and instructed them in all things necessary and the knowledge of their God the Sun, which was sufficient for ever to have obliged them to remain his Vassas and Slaves, and might justly have imposed on them Taxes and Tributes, but that instead thereof he had conferred on them the Majesty of his own Name, which being so Sacred and Divine, that none dust take it formerly in his mouth, without great Veneration, was now made so common, that every one might pronounce it with an audible voice; by which privilege being become his adopted Sons, they did for ever after dedicate themselves for Slaves and Vassas to him who was the undoubted Progeny and Child of the Sun. The hadians being associated when them, they recurred him all the blessings and praises imaginable, studying what Names and Tites they might confer on him, agreeable to the greatness of his Mind, and his Heroick Vertues; and on this consideration they invented these two Names, one of which was Capac, which fignifies rich, not that they meant him to be rich in Goods, of Wealth of Fortune, but of Mind, fisch as Gentleneß, Piety, Clemency, Liberality, Justice and Magnanimity, with a defire and inclination to communicate his Benefits to all his Subjects; and for that Reason they deservedly gave him the Title of Capac, which fignifies rich and powerfull in Arms: The other Name they gave him was Hinae changac, which is as much as to say, a great Friend and Benefactour to the poor; for as the first denomination intimated the greatness of his Mind, so the other spoke the benefits which he had conferred; so that for ever after he was called the Prince Mance Capac, having been named no otherwise before, than Mance the Inca, for Mance is but the proper Name of a Person, and in the common Language of Pers hath no fignification; though in a particular Dialect which some of them have, (which, as some write me from Person, is entirely loss), it signifies something, as all the other Names and Titles did, which they gave to their Kings, as we shall in the sequel of this Story have an occasion to interpret: The word Inca signifies as much as Lord, or King, or Emperour, though in its strict sense, it is one of the Royal bloud; and therefore the Caracas though they were great Lords, yet they were not called Incas: Palks signifies a Lady of the Royal Bloud; and so for distinction of the King from other Incas, he was called Capa Inca, which is as much as rich, sole and supreme Lord. Hereafter, for the sake of the curious, we shall declare and interpret all the Royal Names of the Men and Women. Moreover the Indians gave to this first King, and his Posterity the Name of Tonip Chimin, which is as much as Child of the Sun; but this we may effecem rather a denomination, proceeding from their false belief, than a true and proper addition to his Titles.

CHAP. XIV.

Of the last Will and Testament and Death of the sirst Inca; Manco Capac.

Mano Capac reigned many Years, but how many it is not certain, some say, thirty, others forty, employing his whole time in the business and actions which we have before mentioned; and now finding the time of his death nearly approaching, he called his Sons together, as well those which he had by his Queen Mana Oello Huaco; as those which he had by his Concubines; which made up a great number; for as he told them, it was fit that the Children or Offspring of the Sun should be many. He also assembled the Chief of his Subjects, and in manner of a Testament he made this long Discourie to thein. He recommended to the Prince his Heir, a true Love and Affection towards his Subjects, and to the Subjects, Loyalty and Service to their King, and Obedience to the Laws, avouching again, that this was one of those Ordinances which the San his Father had in a most particular manner enjoined unto him. With this Lesson he distinsted his Subjects; afterwards in private Discourie which he made to his Children, he encharged them, that they should ever remember that they descended from the Sun, and that therefore they ought for ever to adore him for their God and Father, and that according to his example they should observe his Laws and precepts, that so their Subjects in imitation of them might the more easily be induced to awe and reverence this Deity: that they being gentle and plous, might allure the Indians by Love, and by the force of Benefits, for that those can never be good Subjects, who obey onely out of fear; in short, he told them that they should manifest themselves by their Vertues to be Children of the Sun, approving their words by their actions, for those shall never be believed, who say one thing and perform another. In sine, he said, that that being called by the Sun, he was now going to rest with him, that they should live in Peace and Unity together, and that he beholding their actions from Heaven, would take care to favour and fuccour them in their extremities and diffress. Having uttered these, and other sayings of like nature, Manco Capac dved, leaving the Prince Sinchi Rea, his eldeft Son, which he had by Copa Mana Othe Hace, his Wife and Sifter, to be his Helr and Successor. Those Sons and Daughters which remained, befides the Prince, married one with the other; for they took great care to preferve that bloud which they fabuloufly believed to proceed from the Sun, clear and unmixed, because they esteemed it Divine, and was not to be defiled with any other humane mixture, though it were with those chief and principal Lords, whom they termed Curacas.

The Inca, Sinchi Roca, married with Mann Oello, or Mana Cora (as fome will have it) his eldeft Sifter, after the Example of his Father, and his Grandfather have it) his eldeft Sifter, after the Example of his Father, and his Grandfather the Sun, who, according to their Heathenith Doctrine, married with his Sifter the Moon. This Marriage was concluded not onely for confervation of the Bloud in its pure Chanel, but likewife that the Inheritance, which came as well by the Mother as the Father, might equally defeend to both Sexes. This Marriage in fuch proximity of Bloud, they report, was a Command of the Sun, but that no Brother could marry with the Sifter, except onely the Prince and Heir; for in all others this nearnefs was forbidden, the which was a rule always observed, as we final find in the fequel of this Hittory.

The death of the Inca, Manco Capac, was greatly lamented by his Subjects; his funeral rites were observed, and celebrated for several Months; his Body was embalmed, that they might conserve it by them, and not loose the fight and presence of it; for they adored him for a God, and Child of the Sun, so that they facrificed Sheep and Lambs, tame Conies, Birds and Corn to him, confessing him to be Lord and Authour of all those good things which they enjoyed. What the Original of this Mano Capac might be, as far as I can guess by the nature and temper of this People, he must have been some Indian, of a more elevated Understanding and Prudence than ordinary, and one who had instructed them in the way of living, and carrying a fubtile manner of deportment towards them had the way of living, and carrying a lubtile manner of deportment towards them had perfuaded them that he proceeded from the Sun, and was come from Heaven; and that his Father had fent him to infruct and bettow benefits upon them. And to gain a greater belief, and credit amongst them, he habited himself in a different fashion to them, lugging his Ears to such a length, as is incredible to any but those, who have seen them, as I have done. Nor is it strange, that this ignorant and brittish People should be induced to believe his Genealogy to have been deand brittilh People Hould be induced to believe his Genealogy to have been derived from the Sun, fince we have the examples in Hiftory of a more refined People, who taught the Doctrine of Demons, believing Men of Wit, and Art, and Magnanimity, to have been the Sons of fapiter, and other Gods; and having received good and benefits from them, and observing their Actions to correspond with their Words, have readily after their death bestowed a place on them in Heaven, and without much difficulty have been persuaded ever after to adore them for Deities, giving them a share of Worship with their Gods.

CHAP. I.

Of the Idolatry of the Second Age, and the Original of it.

HAT which we call the second Age, and the Idolatry, which was used in it at that time, received its first beginning from the bica, Manco Capuc, who was the first that raised the Monarchy of the Incas, who were the Kings of Peru, and who in a direct Line reigned for the space of sour hundred Years, though Fa-Line reigned for the space of sour hundred Years, though Father Blas Valera will have it, that their Government continued between five and fix hundred. We have already declared the actions of Manco Capue, how, and in what manner he reduced the Indians to live in a political way of Society, teaching them to sow and plant, to build houses, and provide all things conducing to Humane Life: and how Mana Oello, his Wife, instructed the Indian Women in the art of spinning and weaving, and all other ways of good Huster: We have declared also that it was this Manco Capue who taught them to adore the Sun, by representing to them the many benefits that he had conserved on them, saying that this Pacha Chamac (which signifies as much as the suffainer of all things) had in vain exalted them above the Stars, whom he had made their all things) had in vain exalted them above the Stars, whom he had made their Servants, if they did not advance his Worship above all other Creatures, and had ill conferred his benefits on them, in case they should stoop to the mean Idolatry of low and base things, such as Toads and Frogs and Lizards, forfaking the service of that true Deity, whose Glory and Brightness struck awe and reverence into all Creatures.

The Indians, convinced by these arguments, and more by the sensible benefits received, acknowledged the Sun for their God, without affuming a Father, or a Brother into fociety with him. Their Kings they ever flyled to be children of Brother into fociety with him. Their Kings they ever ftyled to be children of the Sun, and defeended from Heaven, and adored them with as much Veneration as the ancient Gentiles, fuch as the Greeks and Romans, did their Jupiter, Mars, Venu, &c. Thus the Idolatrous Worship of the Sun, and of the Incas, as they believed, descended from him, prevailed; and even to this day they never name their Kings (the Incas) but with wonderfull reverence and adoration; to that if they be asked, why they worship those for Gods whom they know to be but Men, they will presently reply; that it is true, they are now undeceived, and can consider them no otherwise in reality than as Men; yet having received so much good and benefit from them, they cannot efferen them less than of Difo much good and benefit from them, they cannot efteem them less than of Divine Race; and did others appear in these days equal or comparable to them, they would readily perform the same Honours and Adorations towards them.

Book II.

This was the fole and principal Idolatry which the Incas taught their Subjects; and though they believed the Moon to be Wife and Sifter to the Sun, yet they and thought they beneved the Moon to be vivile and officer to the only, yet they did not worship her for a Goddess, nor offer Sacrifices, or build Temples to her as they did to the only howsever they esteemed her with great Reverence for the Universal Mother, but proceeded no farther, nor gave her other Attributes

Howfoever their Superflitions were many, giving heed to Fables, and Dreams, and inspection into the Entrails of Beats. Thunder, and Lightenings, and Thunder-bolts they judged to be Servants of the Sun, as we shall understand hereafter, when we have occasion to name that Chamber which was built in that Temple at Cozco, which was dedicated to the Sun; but they never held them for Gods, as fome of the spanish Writers would have it, but rather fear and dread the House or Place where a Thunder-bolt chances to fall; for they have stopt up the door of that Chamber with Stones and dirt, that so none might ever enter in there again: and in that place or field where a Thunder-bolt happens to fall, they fay that their Father the Sun hath marked our that place as unfortunate, and accurfed to common use, and for that Reason they cover it with heaps of Stones; that none may tread or trample on it; the which I have seen and observed in the that none may tread or trample on it; the which is all observed in the Palace of Huaphtapac at Corto, in that quarter which was alligned to Antonio Altamirano, when that City was divided amongh the Conquerors; for in the time of Huaphtapac, a Thunder-both had pierced through a part of that Palace, the which was affigued to my lelf when the Spaniards had rebuilt it; three years after which another Thunder-bolt fell in the same place, and burnt it wholly, the which accident confirmed the Indians in their opinion, that places in such manner strucken with Thunder, were accursed; and therefore the Spaniards were in an Errour when they rebuilt those places, for they ought to have remained void and neglected. And whereas the Historians say, that they esteemed Thunder and Lightning for Gods, it is a mistake, for they did indeed account those places for sacred, saying that their Gods had by Thunder, and Thunder-bolts, and Lightning marked out those places for their Worship, and therefore not being to be prophaned by common use, they built their most samples thereupon. To these three they gave the common Name of Thapa, and for the similitude hereunto they called all Fire-arms by the same word. And as to those Names which they give to things, as they have in other things; for no such vords are compounded in the general language of Peru, nor have they any such signification as the Spaniards sanite, or would impose upon them. another Thunder-bolt fell in the fame place, and burnt it wholly, the which acciwould impose upon them.

CHAP. II.

By what means the Incas came to the knowledge of the True God.

BEsides the Sun, whom they worshipped for the visible God, to whom they offered Sacrifice, and kept Festivals, (as we shall hereafter declare,) the omered Sacrince, and kept Petrivais, (as we man nereated acciarce) the Incas, who were Kings, and the Amatina, who were Philofophers, proceeded by the mere light of Nature, to the knowledge of the True Almighty God our Lord, Maker of Heaven and Earth, as we shall hereafter prove by their own words and testimonies, which some of them gave of the Divine Majetity, which they called by the Name of Pachacamae, and is a word compounded of Pacha, which is the Libited and Carac which is the Soul, and is as much as he that animates the Universe, and Camae, which is the Soul; and is as much as he that animates the World. Pedro de Cieca, in his 62. Chapter, fays, that they called the Devil by this Name; but I, who am an Indian born, and therefore better acquainted with the Language than he, know that they never took this name into their Mouths, but feldom, and when they did, it was with great Veneration, bowing their Heads and Bodies, cafting up their Eyes to Heaven, and then down to the Earth, lifting their hands open as high as their Shoulders, and kiffing the Air, which were the common manifestations of Reverence and Adorations, which were in use amongst the Incas and his People; these, and such like demonstratiwere in the amongst the meas and his People; there, and then like demonstrations of Honour they used when they were forced to pronounce the word Pachacamac; but the Name of the Sun they took in their mouths more frequently, as they did also of their meas, and with less ceremony, and of their Caraca, who were their Lords, with a more indifferent respect: And being asked, who this Pachacamae was, they answered, that it was he who gave Life to the Universe, fuftained and nourished all things; but because they did not see him, they could not know him; and for that reason they erected not Temples to him, nor offered Sacrifice, howfoever they worthipped in their Hearts, and esteemed him for the unknown God.

Royal Commentaries.

Augustin de Carate, in his second Book and fifth Chapter, reports, that Father Vicente de Valverde telling the King Australya, that it was Christ our Lord who created the World, he answered, that he knew nothing of that, but he was sure that there was no other Nourisher but the Sun, whom they esteemed to be a God, and the Earth their Mother; and that Pachacamac had created all things, &c. whence it is evident, that the Indians held our invisible God to be the Creatour

This Truth which the Indians had by the light of Nature discovered, the Devil himstelf, though the Father of Lyes, had much against his Will confessed and confirmed; for when he faw that our Holy Gospel was preached, and that many Indians were baptized; he told some of his Familiars in that Vale, which is now called the Valley of Pachacamae, (so named from that famous Temple which is there dedicated to the Unknown God,) that the God which the Sp.miards preached and he were the same, as Pedro do Cieca, and Geronimo Roman in their Writings of the West-Indies report: Howsoever they are mistaken where they fay that the Indians gave the name of Pachacamae to the Devil, for whom they have another Word, which is Cupay, which when they utter, they spit, with other figns of Deteftation. Notwithstanding this Enemy so far infinuated himfelf amongst these Insidels, that he caused himself to be worshipped by them by entering into all those things, which they called sacred, or Holy; for he spake to them in their Oracles, their Temples, and the Corners of their Houses, calling himself by the Name of Pachacamae, and by this subtilty the Indians worshipped every thing through which the Devil spoke, believing it to be a Deity; but had they believed that it was the Cupas, or Devil, whom they heard, they would certainly have burnt the things through which he spoke, as they now by God's Mercy do, who hath grationfly revealed and made himself known to them:

CHAP. III.

Of the Cross which the Incas preserved in a Consecrated place.

In the City of Coxco the Incos had a certain Cross of white Marble, which they called a Crystalline Jaspar; but from what time it had been kept there, is not certain. In the year 1560 I left it in the Vestry of the Cathedral Church of that City; I remember it was hanged upon a Nail with a List of black Velvet; which when it was in the power of the Indians, it was hanged by a Chain of Gold or Silver, but afterwards changed by those who removed it. This Cross was fquare, being as broad as it was long, and about three fingers wide. It formerly remained in one of those Royal Apartments, which they call Huaca, which signifies a Consecrated place; and though the Indians did not adore it, yet they held it in great veneration, either for the Beauty of it, or some other reason, which they knew not to affign: and so was observed amongst them, untill the Marques Don Francisco Picarro entred into the Valley of Tampiz, when by reason of some accidents which befell Pedro de Candia, they conceived a greater esteem and veneration for it, as we shall declare in its due place.

The Spaniards, after they had taken the Imperial City, they erected a Church in it to the Almighty God, and hanged this Croß in the Veftry (as we have faid) of that Church, without other ornament or ceremony, whenas they ought to have placed a Relique of that nature upon the High Altar, adorning it with Gold and pretious Stones which abounded in that Countrey: by which respect to a thing which the Indians esteemed Sacred, and by affimilating the Ordinances of our Holy Religion, as near as was possible, with those which the Law of Nature had taught to this People, preaching and recommending the Works of Mercy in such style of their own Genifer and allow; the lessons of Christianity would thereby have become more easie and familiar, and Hellons of Christianity would thereby have become more easie and familiar, and not feemed so far estranged from the Principles of their own Gentissim.

And because we have here mentioned the Cross, on which it is usual for us to sive in our Courts of Judicatory; we shall take this occasion to say, that neither the breas themselves, nor yet any of the Nations under their Dominions did ever know the meaning of an Oath, for Swearing was not a custome, nor in use amongst them. For though the Names of Pachacamae and the Sun were taken sometimes into their mouths, yet it was always with reverence and adoration: For when they examined Witnesses in the most important cases what soer, the Judge, instead of an Oath, did onely ask the Witnesses, If he promised to speak the Trush to the Inca? And then his Answer was, That he did premise: Then proceeded the Judge, See that then declare the Trush without any disguise of fallshood, not conceasing any thing that passed, or that which thou spowess. This was all the formality they used in giving testimony; the which they so religiously observed, that with struple and tenderness they uttered Truth in its nakedness and simplicity: And in case any person did give a salle testimony in matter of importance, his crime was punishable with Death; not onely in consideration of the damage he had done to the injured person, but of his falshood to the bras, who had made it one of the Royal Commands. That he should not by and it was a common and known principle, that what a person declared to the Judge, he witnessed to the bras himself, who being reverenced by them as a God, they believed it impossible to conceal my thing from his crutiny and knowledge.

After the Spaniards had conquered this Empire, there happened a remarkable cate of this kind upon an enquiry about Murther in the Province of Quechnas. The Chief Juftice of Cocco fent an Officer to take the teltimony of a certain Cocco (which is as much as a Lord over many Subjects 3) and in performance hereof the Officer reached to him the top of his Staff, on which was a Crofs, faying, Thou swearest to God and to this Cross, to speak the Truth: To which the Indian replied. That he was not as yet Baptized, and therefore ought not to swear after the manner of the Christians: Then, said the Officer, thou mayst swear by thy own Gods, by the Sun, and Moon, and the Incas: No, faid the Curaca, we never five ar by thefe, for it is not lawfull, we onely take their Names in our mouths with Advation, and in a Religious Worship: It is sufficient, that since you come to doe Justice in the Name of your King. that I promise to speak the Truth with as much sincerity, as if he were personally present, whom you represent, and no other manner of Oath do our Incas require from us: And for your farther satisfaction. I wish that the Earth may swallow me up alive, as I flund, in case I speak not the Truth. The Officer hereupon urged no farther, but accepted his tefilmony in this form, examining him by certain Interrogatories which were most pertinent in reference to the Murther; which when he had done, he would have proceeded no farther: but the Indian could not fatisfie his own conscience with the Answers he had made to the demands, without enlarging himself by a particular Narrative of the whole Story; For 10 feak the Truth (faid he) in some things, and to be filent in others, was the same as if he had lied in all. After which the Officer returned to Cozco, where this Dialogue between him and the Curaca gave subject of much discourse.

CHAP. IV.

Of the things sacrificed to the Sun; and that the Priests, Rites, Ceremonies and Laws were all taught and delivered by the sirst Inca.

THE things offered to the Sun were of divers forts: the chief and principal Sacrifice was that of Lambs 3 but befides, they offered all forts of cattel, as Sheep and barren Ewes, tame Conies, all forts of Birds which were catable, the fat of Beafts, Pulfe, all forts of Grane, the Herb Cuca, even cloths of the belt and fineft forts; all which they burnt in the place of Incenfe, rendring thanks and acknowledgments to the Sun, for having furtained and nourified all those things for the use and support of Mankind. They used also Drink-offerings, which were made of Water and Mayz, which is their fort of Wheat; and at the end of their usual meals, when drink was brought; (for they did never use to drink between their eatings) at their first draught they dipped the tip of their finger in the middle of the cup, and looking up to Heaven with great reverence, with a fillip they fyinted off the drop of water which wetted their singer, which was by vay of acknowledgment for it to the Sun, rendring him thanks for the water they drank; and giving two or three empty killes to the Air, which (as we have said) was a sign of Adoration amongst the Indians; they then drank up their liquour without farther ceremony.

This last Ceremony I have observed the Indians, in my time, who were not baptized to use, for there were many old men not then baptized; and for necessity, and want of a better, I have often my self performed that sunction. In this manner we may see that the Incus in their forms of Sacrifice differed very little from those of the first Age, onely they abstained from the Offerings of humane shesh and bloud; which Inhumanity they not onely detested, but made Laws against it: And whereas some Historians charge them with this unnatural and prodigious Religion, for their errour was caused by not making a due distinction between the first Age, and the times of the Incus.

I my felf can atteff; that I have heard my Father, and others of his time, in their discourses about the Customs and Government of Mexico and Pern to commend and praise the Incas of Peru for disallowing the Sacrifices of humane blond : and on the contrary, to blame and abhor those of Mexico for suffering and making lawfull fuch Diabolical Worthips, and Sacrifices, both within and without their City as the History of the Conquest of that Countrey doth truly aver; which being wrote by the Pen of the General who made the Conquests, was not certainly authentick and true, and did deferve to have been owned by him, that fo they might have carried as great authority with them, as the Commentaries did of Julius Cefur, for having his Name affixed to them.

At the entrance into their Temples, or at the time of their being there, the Chief amongst them clapped his hands to his eye-brows, pulling some of the hairs from thence, which he blew towards the Idol in token of reverence: And this fort of Adoration they never used towards their Inc. but onely to Idols, or Trees. or other things into which the Devil entred and spoke to them; the same was practifed by their Priefts and Sorcerers, before they entred into corners and fecret places to discourse with the Devil, imagining that by such submission and resign nation of their Persons, they obliged their Familiar to hear and answer them. And of this Idolatry I can give testimony, because I have seen it with my own

All the Priefts of the Sun, in the City of Cozco, were of the Bloud-Royal though for the inferiour Officers of it, such others were affigued, as had gained the privilege of being called Incas. Their High Prieft was either to be Brother or Uncle to their King, or some other of nearest Bloud; their Priests used no Vestments different from others. In other Provinces, those which were Natives, or related to the Principal men, were made Priefts, though the Chief Prieft amongst them was an bica, that matters might bear forme conformity with the Imperial City: which rule was also observed in all Offices relating to War and Peace, that for the Natives might have their flare in the Government, and not feem to be flighted or neglected. They had also some Houses for Virgins, which professed a perpetual Virginity, where they ever remained Recluses: of which, and of the King's Concubines, we shall have occasion hereafter to treat more at large.

All these Laws in Government, and Rites in Religion, they pretend for the greater authority of them to have received from their full Inca, Manco Capac; and that where Matters were imperfect, it was left to his Successours to establish and complete: For as they affirm that thefe Laws, both in Religion and Government, were derived from the Sun, and inspired by him into his Children the Incast, so it is hard to affirm, to whom in particular such and such Laws were to be attributed.

CHAP. V.

The Division of the Empire into four Parts, and of the Regiflers kept by the Decurions, and what their Office was.

THE Licas divided their Empire into four Parts, which they called Tavan-tinfing, and fignifies the four Quarters of the Heavens, viz. East, West, North and South. The City of Core they effected the Point and Centre of all, and in the Indian Language is as much as the Navel of the Earth, for the Countrey of Peru being long and narrow, in fathion of a Man's body, and that City in the middle, it may aprly be termed the Navel of that Empire. To the Eastward they called the Countrey Antifigu, from the Province Anti, which extends all along that great Mountain, which runs through the fnowy defert Eaftward. To the Westward they called the Countrey Cantifuor, from that small Province which is called Canti; to the Northward lies the Province Chincha, and to the Southward the Countrey Coll.i, which extends it felf to the Zur. In these four Provinces are comprehended many great Countries, and amongst the rest the Kingdom of Chile, which contains about 600 Leagues in length towards the Zin. and is within the Province of Colla; and the Kingdom of Quita, which is within the Divilion of Colla, runs 400 Leagues to the Northward: So that to name those Quarters, is as much as to say, East and West, &c. according to which, the principal ways leading to the City were fo called.

The Incar laid one method and rule in their Government, as the best means to prevent all mischiefs and disorders; which was this, That of all the people in every place, whether more or lefs, a Register should be kept, and a Division made of ten and ten; over which one of the ten, whom they called the Decurion, was made Superiour over the other nine; then every five Divisions of this nature had a Decurion over them, to whom was committed the charge and care of fifty; then over the two Divisions of fifty a Superiour Decurion was conftituted to supervise a hundred; so five Divisions of a hundred had their Captain which commanded five hundred; and laftly, ten Divitions had their General over a thousand; for no Decurion had a greater number to govern or account for; the charge of one thousand being esteemed a sufficient care for any that by his Under-Officers would undertake to account for his people, and rule them

The Decurions of ten had a double duty incumbent on them, one was with diligence and care to fuccour, and fuftain those which were under their Divifion; giving an account to his Superiour Officer, in case any of them should be in want or necessity of any thing; as of Corn to fow or eat, or Wool to cloath them, or Materials to re-build their houses, destroyed by fire, or any other accident, or should fall into any extremity whatsoever. His other duty was to be Cenfor Marum, or Monitor of their actions, taking notice, and giving information of the faults and irregularities of those under him, which he was to report to his Superiour Officer; who, according to the nature of the Misdemeanour, had the power of punishment; howsoever, the lower Officers had power to chastise the leffer defaults; that fo for every petty Misdemeanour, they needed not to have recourse to the Superiour, or General of them all; whereby delays in Law-fuits were avoided, and long processes, which tire and consume the people, were speedily ended; and litigious Caufes and vexatious Actions determined without Appeals from one Judge to another; and in case of publick differences between two Provinces, they were always decided by the definitive sentence of one Justice, which the Irea constituted by a special Commission.

What Orficer foever, either of higher or lower degree, that was negligent or remifs in his duty incurred a penalty agreeable to the nature of his default. If he administred not the affistence required, or neglected to Indict an Offender, though it were but the omiffion of one day without a lawfull excuse; he was not onely liable to antiver for his own default, but to receive the punishment due to the crime of the Offendour. And in regard every one of these Decurions had a Superiour over him, who eyed and watched his actions, they were all diligent in their duties, and impartial in their juffice; no vagabonds or idle perfons durft appear, or trespaffes were committed; for the Accufation was readily brought in, and the punifiment was rigorous, which in many finall cafes was even capital; not so much for the fin it felf, as for the aggravation thereof, being committed against the Word and Command of the Inca, whom they respected as a God; and though the Plaintiff or the injured person were willing to let fall his Suit, and remit the penalty to the Offendour; yet the course of the Law will still proceed, imposing a punishment agreeable to the quality of the crime, either death, or ftripes, or banishment, or the like.

In Families Brieft severity was observed to keep their Children within the rules of modefty and decent behaviour: for there were Laws even against the ill manners of Children; for whose miscarriages the Decurion, as well as the Father, was responsible: So that the Children of the Indians, who are naturally of a genthe and complying temper, are educated in great awe, and made modeft by the correction and example of their Parents.

In times of War the Generals and Captains affumed the fame power over their Souldiery, and took the fame care of them, as the Decurions did in the time of the other Subjects.

Peace, whose Offices (belides the matters before mentioned) obliged them to take

take an account of the Births and Burials of all those that were born, or died that year, under their jurisdiction, and of those who went to the War. Those people whom they conquered, though subdued by force of Arms, vet they did never plunder or take away their goods. This word Decurion, which is composed from the Latin Decem, which is tenand cura care a that is, a care over ten; answers directly to the Indian word Chunca camayu, chunca fignifying ten, and camayu care; and by information of these the Incas came to a knowledge of the number of their Subjects in every Province, that fo according thereunto they might proportion the Taxes and Impositions for publick Works, such as the building of Bridges, making and repairing Highways, erecting Forts and Royal Palaces, with what number of Souldiers they ought to ferve the Inca in his Wars. By these computations also the Inca was better enabled to fend Provisions into those Provinces, which by reason of the fterility of the year occasioned by Flouds, or unseasonable weather, were become wanting of Corn, or Cottons, or Wool; all which were administred, and sent with such readiness and expedition, that as Blas Valera often says, the Incus took fuch care of their Subjects, providing for them in all their necessities, that they might rather be fivled Fathers of their Countrey, and Guardians of their Pupils. than Kings over Subjects; and to express this care in one word, the Indians gave them the title of Lovers of the Poor.

And lest the Superiour Governours should be remis, or negligent, in the execution of their Offices; there was a Monitor or Remembrancer appointed, called Tueny-ricot, which is as much as a Supervisor or Informer; and his duty it was to put the Officers in mind of the matters relating to their Government; fo that in case any of these should be found remis in his charge, or guilty of any crime. case any of these mound be sound terms in its charge, or guilty of any trime, his punishment was always proportioned to his quality, rather than his fault; it being an opinion amongst them, that the least evil was not to be tolerated in a Minister of Justice, who was chosen by the Sun and the lnes to eradicate Evils, and therefore was obliged to be more upright and observant of the Laws, than

CHAP. VI.

Of certain Laws Ordained by the Incas, and of the Opinion. That the Incas, and those of the Royal Bloud, can doe no wrong, or offend contrary to Law.

PEcuniary Mulcts, or Confileation of Goods, were never imposed by the Incas in way of punishment for any offence, they esteeming nothing satisfactory to Law but that which required the extirpation of the Evils, rather than the Life of the Offendour; for that all other remedies give but onely encouragement and liberty to transgress. If a Curaca, or Lord, rebelled, which was always punished with most severity by the Inca; and that thereby he forseited his life; the Estate notwithstanding descended to his Son, or to his Heir, but with due admonition, that by fuch example he should beware of the Treason and Rebellion of his Father; fo likewife if any Cacique, or Officer was deprived of his place, or his Seigniory for faults committed, the next Heir fucceeded in it, whether he were a Son or a Brother: the same rule also was observed amongst the Souldiery, whose Commanders were Natives of the Countrey, and their Generals, or chief Commanders, were Princes of the Bloud, under whom the Captains and Superiour Officers efteemed it for a particular honour and favour to ferve. No Judge had power to moderate the Sentence of Law by any Rule of Equity, but rather to exact the feverity of it, for being ordained by the Wifedom of the Incas, and the concurrence of Wife men, it ought neither to be controlled, or rendred more equitable by the fense and practice of particular Judges, who are capable of being corrupted, or overcome by favour or affection to a party.

And though it may feem very barbarous and unreasonable that every offence should be punished with Death, and that there should be no difference between the crimes of a higher, and the faults of a leffer nature; yet confidering the benefit which the Publick received thereby, and that the Evils, rather than the Perfons, were taken away; such a constitution ought not to be esteemed unjust or fons, were taken away; fuch a conflitution ought not to be efteemed unjust or irrational: For in regard that men naturally love life, and fear and abhor death, they studiously fled from the appearance of any thing which might bring them within the danger of it; to that in all this great Empire, which reaches 1300 Leagues in length, consisting of divers Naticus and Languages, we scarce have heard in the space of a whole year, so much as of the punishment of a single person; and to this obedience and submission to Law, the opinion of the Sanstity of it did much avail; and the belief, that it was delivered by the Sun, who was their God, and by revelation inspired into the minds of the Incas his children; fo encreased the veneration and honour they had for it, that none could be effeemed a breaker of the Law, but who also therewith was guilty of facrilege or violation of the holy and divine Sanction. Hence it was, that many finding a remorfe of conscience within themselves, in sense of some fecret faults they had committed, have often, without accufation, prefented themselves before the Tribunals of Justice, confessing publickly their offences; by reafon of which, diseases, deaths and distresses had befallen their People and Nation; and therefore defired that their lives might be offered to their God, as an expiation, and an attonement for their fin. This fort of confession was the ground of the mistake of certain Spanish Historians, who report that Auricular confession was practifed amongst the Indians; whereas I am certain, that amongst those of Pern, (for I treat of no other) it was never accultomary to make other Confessions, than fuch as were publick. No Appeals (as we have faid) were allowable in any case whatsoever, for every people having its proper Judge, no Process was to continue longer than five days before it was finally determined: onely in obscure and difficult cases the matter was brought before the Superiour Governour, who refided in the capital City, rather than before the common Judge of the Province. The Inferiour Judges rendred every month an account to their Superiours of all the Law fuits which were brought before them, and of the Sentences they gave in the determination thereof; to the end, that they might fee and judge whether true Sentence were given, and the Laws rightly administred. This information from one to another came at length to the Inca; and in regard they were not as yet arrived to the knowledge of Letters, they gave these Informations to the Incas and his supreme Council by way of Knots of divers colours tied in a silken twift, the colours being as fo many cyphers, denoting the crimes they had puni-thed, and the bigness of them, and manner of making them up fignified that Law which was executed (as we shall hereafter more particularly declare) and in this manner by way of Knots, they kept all their accounts to exactly, and furnmed them up with fuch readiness, that to the great admiration of the Spaniards, their best Arithmeticians could not exceed them.

It is an opinion, and held for a certain truth amongst them, that there never was brea of the Royal Bloud that was punished, or that any of them did ever commit a crime, which incurred the penalty of the Law: For that the principles they received from their Parents, the example of their Ancestours, and the common belief of the World, that they were the Progeny of the Sun, born to instruct others, to doe good, and to refrain the people from Vice, were considerations that made fuch impressions in them, that they were rather the ornament than the scandal of Government, disdaining to stoop to such base and mean actions, as were transgressions of their Law: The truth is, they wanted the temptations which others had to offend; for neither the defire of women, or richnels, or revenge could be motives to them: For in case any one of them entertained a paffion for the Beauty of a Woman, it was but to fend for her; and the could not be denied, nay rather her Parents would receive the proposal with humble acknowledgments, that the Inc.t would vouchfafe to cast his eye on his handmaid that was his Slave. The like may be faid as to the delire of Wealth, they had to necessities but what were readily satisfied; for being Children of the Sun, all the Wealth and Riches of their Countrey was effeemed their inheritance, and their occasions were satisfied by the Mandates sent to the Justices, and the Governous occations were fatisfied by the Mandates lent to the Juffices, and the Governours of Provinces for a fupply. Nor were they liable to the unworthy paffion of Revenge, for none could provoke them to anger by injuries, who fought all ways and means to pleafe and oblige them, for being adored as Gods, it was efterned blatiphemy and facilege to difgrace them by Words, or injure them in their Estates; and therefore it may be said, that never was Indian punished for disterpect, or a malitious action against the Person of an Inca. Hence it is that the Spanish Historians have reported, that an Inca was not capable of being punished for any Offence whatever; which is a miltake, and is as much as to fay, that the Incas were Libertines. that they might be arbitrary, and by Law act against it; or that there were one Law for them, and another for their People: whenas an bea was rather exposed to the greater feverities, than any other; for he forfeited his Privileges, was degraded of the Honours due to the Royal Bloud, and esteemed for Auch, which is as much as a Taytor and a Tyrant. Thus when the Spaniards commended and applauded the just and generous actions of the Incas, the Indians would make anfiver, that it was not firange, in regard they were beas; and if they disapproved at any time their proceedings, as in the case of Atahualpa, who by Treason and Rebellion dispossessed the Arafear, his elder Brother, and true Heir to the Monarchy. (as we shall relate in its due place,) their Reply was, that no loca could be guilty of such Enormities, and if he were, he was no true born loca, but some Baltard or Impostour of that Family.

of imposition of that rainly and the four Divisions, the Inca constituted his different Councils of War, of Justice, and of his Treasiny; every one of which maintained their fulbordinate Officers, one under the other, even to the Decurions of Ten, all which in their respective places rendred an account to their imposaliate Officers, till the Report came to the supreme Council. The chief Governoor of every Division had the Title of a Vice-King, and were always locas of the true Bloud, and Men approved for Prudence and good Conduct, both in the time of War and Peace. And so much shall suffice to have spoken concerning their Laws and Customs: We shall now proceed to the History of their Lives and Actions, relating those matters which are most famous and observable.

CHAP. VII.

Of the Life and Reign of Sinchi Roca, second King of the Incas.

Shehi Roca fucceeded his Father, Manco Capuc; this name Roca is pronounced with fome afpiration at the top of the Mouth, and as Blus Valera fays fignifies a prudent and experienced Prince; Sinchi fignifies valiant; for though he had no Wars with any, yet because he was active in wrefling, running, vaulting, throwing the stone and lance, and excelled all others of that age in those Exercises, he was surnamed the Valiant and Magnanimous.

This Prince having performed those Obsequies which were due to the solemnity of his Father's Interment, took upon himself the Crown of his Kingdom, which was no other than the coloured Wreath, bound about his Temples, determining in the first place to inlarge the Borders of his Dominions, he aftembled the principal Curacus and Counsellours which his Father had affigned him, and in a grave and serious Oration, amongst other things, he told them, that in performance of the Will of his Father, (which he declared to him at the time he was about to return to Heaven) he resolved to go in Person, and summon the neighbouring Nations, to come in, and be converted to the knowledge and adoration of the Sun; and in regard they had the fame Title of Ineas, as well as their King, he conceived that the fame Obligation lay upon them, to ferve the Sun, who was the common Parent of them all, and therefore required them to join with him in the fame work and defign; that fo they might reduce those People from their brutih and bestial course of living to a Life more regular and rational; for that they seeing the improvements which the instructions of his Father; the Inea, had made in his own Subjects, might be more easily allured to forsake their old barbarous Customs, and embrace those which are more beneficial and refined.

Royal Commentaries.

Hereinto the Ciriacia gave this ready and chearfull Answer, that they were not onely willing to obey his Commands in this particular, but even to enter into the fire for his fake; and to ending their Difcourfe, they prefixed a day to begin their Journey: and accordingly the loca departed with a great Retinue of his Subjects, taking his Journey by the way of Cellafiya, which lies to the Southward from the City Cozco; and as they travelled, they perfuaded the Indians with fair words to follow their Example, and to become Subjects to the Inca, and Devotaries to the Sun, uniting with them in Religion towards their God, and Allegiance to their Prince. Those Indians which are of the Nations called Puching and Canchi, and are the next borderers, being a People very fimple and credulous, (as indeed all the Indians are.) feeing the effects which the Inva had operated on his own Subjects, which was the best argument to convince them, they immediately submitted to his Government; and thus by degrees, during the whole course of this Inca's Reign, without violence or force of arms, in a gentle and peaceable manner he reduced all the People, as far as Chancara, which is about twenty Leagues in length, with the Inhabitants of the parts adjacent to his Subjection, over all which he prevailed to far, as to plow and cultivate their Lands, to lead a moral Life according to the Rules of the light of nature, and that forfaking their Idols, and evil cultoms which they practifed, they flould worship the Sun, and observe mose Laws and Precepts which by Revelation his Father, Manco Capac, had delivered to them: all which the Indians readily accepted and embraced, being highly fatisfied with that benefit and improvement which the Dominion and Rule of Sinchi Roca had brought unto them, who after the example of his Father, studied all ways and means to endear that People to himfelf.

Some Authours report that this King proceeded much beyond the Countrey of Chimeara, and extended his Dominions over the Nations of Cancalla, Runnehaeli, Affilla, Afancatu, Huancani, and others; all which he gained with fuch gentle treatment, that he needed not Wars, or other Arms, than perfuafions to invite them; ufing these new plantations, as good Gardiners doe their Orchards, pruning and digging about their Trees, in hopes of plenty and abundance of Sinchi Rora having thus lived in peace and quietness for the space of many years; and, as some will have it, for about thirty, finding himself at length decaying and aged, he declared that now after the labours and cares he had taken to reduce men to the knowledge of his bather the Sun, he was now going to take his rest and repose with him. His lawfull Son, by his legitimate Wise and Sister, Manna Cora, or as others will have it, Mima Octlo, called Lloque Tupanqui, he lest to succeed him, as Heir to all his Dominions: Besides this Prince he had other Sons by his Wise, and more Children by his Kinswomen, who were his Concubines, all which we may call legitimate. Moreover he had many Bastard Children by Women of other Families, all which was allowable according to the rule, and saying, that it was fit and requisite that the Generation and Family of the Sun should be many and numerous.

CHAP. VIII.

Of the Third King Lloque Yupanqui, and the signification of his Name.

Loque Yupanqui was the third King of Peru, called Lloque, because he was lesthanded, and Tupanqui serves to denote his Vertues and generous Actions. The word Tupanqui fignifies as much as an account, or reckoning, as we fay a Man of Account, which is a Cypher, or Hieroglyphick, in that language, for a fun of Vertues, as Clemency, Piety, Gentlenets, &c. all which were qualities inherent in that Perfon, and is as comprehensive as the word Capac, which contains the Riches of Fortune, and the Wealth of Vertues, inherent in the mind, tains the Riches of Fortune, and the vegation vertices, infection in the finding, which Apellations, or rather Titles, they gave to none of their chiefest Lords, but to the King onely; it being esteemed a kind of Sacrilege to attribute such facred Titles to any other: for as the Romans gave the name of Augustus to their Emperours, in a particular distinction to all others; so it would have been a distinction of the control minution to their Maiefly to have made this peculiar Name common to their Subjects.

Lloque Yupanqui having taken a survey of his Dominions, resolved to extend his Jurisdiction farther than the Possessions of his Fathers, and being now the Lord of an Empire which had been established and radicated for the space of seventy years, he thought it a more expedite way by force of Arms to reduce that People. than by the flow infinuations which arguments and perfuafions made upon them. To this end having raifed an Army of about fix or feven thousand men, under the To this end having range an Anny of about its or leven thouland men, under the conduct of his two Uncles, and of his other Kindred, whom he made Captains, and Commanders over them, he took his march towards the Countrey of Occo-figur, leaving that of Limsfigur, which his Father had already conquered, (the feveral ways to which divide in the Province of Chancara) he paffed through the division of Collasuru, which contains the great Lake of Thicaca.

The Inca having passed the frontiers of his own Dominions, entered the Countrey called Cama; and immediately dispatched Messengers to the natural Inhabitants thereof, requiring them to leave their bestial Sacrifices and superstitious manners, and with all readiness to submit unto the Obedience and Service of him who was descended from the Offspring of the Sun: The People of Cama desired time to inform themselves of all the particulars which the Inca commanded them, as what were his Laws, and what were the Gods which he enjoined them to worflip; in all which when they had been well inftructed, they readily confessed that their Religion and Laws were better, and more rational than their own, and therefore with a general confent they yielded and fubmitted to them, and fo went forth to receive their King with Joy, and acknowledge themselves his obedient Subjects. The Inca leaving Persons with them to instruct them in his Idolatry, and to teach them the way of manuring and cultivating their Land, he proceeded forward to that Nation which is called Appiri: but these being a sturdy and stubborn fort of People, were not to be wrought upon by perfuations, and promifes, or by the example of others, but obstinately perfused in a resolution to dye in or by the example of others; but obltinately perfitted in a refolution to dye in the defence of their Liberties; which was a new difficulty and opposition that the lineas had never as yet encountred. Thus both fides preparing for War, they came to an ingagement, which lasted long, there being many killed both on one fide and the other; and being at length as it were a drawn Battel, and the Victory doubtfull, both Armies retreated into fast places, which they had fortisted after their own manner, fallying out every day to Skirmishes and single Combats. The People of the linea avoided fighting what they were able, destring rather to overcome them with reasons and persuasions, than by sorce of Arms; but the Apviri interpreting this backwardness of the linea to be an effect of Cowardise, became interpreting this backwardness of the Inca to be an effect of Cowardile, became more obstinate, and encouraged to press harder upon him, so as almost to enter his Royal Tents; but their force was repelled with force, and were always repulfed with lofs and difadvantage. The Inca confidering well the shame and dishonour it would be to him to be foiled by this People; for that others by their Example might take courage to rebell and refult him; he dispatched immediate Orders for new recruits to be sent him; but these he designed rather for terrour and oftentation, than necessity, and in the mean time he straitned the Enemy so. that there being a great fearcity of all Provisions amongst them, they were comthat there being a great feating of an in-rooman's amongst cattle, stey her pelled at length to make their way by force of Arms; the Battel was very hor and bloudy, many being killed and wounder on both fides, till at length the doctor viri being worsted, never durst shew their Faces any more in Battel. The Lieux not being willing to take this advantage to deltroy them utterly endeavoured rather by Famine to reduce them to his Obedience. During which Siege the recruits which the Inca had fent for, arrived in his Camp, the Report of which fo difinated the Enemy, that they immediately furrendred and fubmitted to the Mercy of the Inca, who first having severely reproved them with bitter termes, for having resisted the Offspring of the Sun, he pardoned their Contumacy and Rebellion; and leaving Officers and Instructours to teach them in the ways of Religion and humane Living, and to require from them that riches which they had forfeited to the Sun and the Inca, he proceeded against that People which they call Pucara. In this Countrey he built a Fortress, for better defence of his Frontiers and conservation of his Conquests; and the rather, because the situation of the place being by nature strong, was by Art and Industry rendred impregnable, and ferved to reduce the People of Pucara, which were by no other means to be subdued, but by a War; which having done, and furnished his Fortress with a strong Garrison, he returned with great Joy and Triumph unto Cozco.

CHAP. IX.

The Conquest of Hatun Colla, and the Fables which those of Colla report concerning their Original.

Any Years had not passed before Lloque Tupanqui returned again to the frontiers of his Conquests, that he might make a farther progress in reducing the Indians, and enlarging his Dominions. The Report which the Inc.u had spread from their beginning, of being sent from the Sun to instruct and reduce Mankind from a beltial way of living to Rules of Morality and Political Society, had made preparation in all places for reception of their Doctrine, and became most plausible and prevalent in the minds of those People, who knew not how to discourse that application of the team which they had convenied under the finetions. discover that ambition of the Incas, which they had concealed under the specious principle of the Sun's Commands: with this pretence the Inca sent to raise eight or nine thousand men well armed; and having set Officers over them, and chosen Counsellours for himself, he passed the Countrey of Collassim, and at length arrived at his Fortress called Pucara, where afterwards that great overthrow was given to Francisco Hernandes. Given; which is since called the Battel of Pucara; from those he form which is since called the Battel of Pucara; from thence he fent Ambatfadours to Pancar colla, and Haum colla, (which are Countries of a large extent, containing divers Nations) requiring them to yield ready Submiffion and Obedience to him; and that being admonified by the example of the Apaviri, they should fear to oppose the Progeny of the Sun, left the like punishments of Famine and Slaughter should be the rewards of their Rebellion. The People of Colla gave ear to this admonition, and affembling their Chiefs or most principal Men amongst them in Hatun Colla, which is Colla the great; they generally concluded, that all those Plagues and Mitchiefs which had befallen the Ayaviri, and those of Procura, was sent from Heaven, as a judgment for having resisted the Children of the Sun; and therefore with unanimous consent they declared themselves Vassals of the Inca, that they would adore the Sun, and observe and keep all those Laws and Ordinances which he should impose upon them; and with this intention they went out to meet the Inca, and received him with Acclanations, and with new Songs, and Musick, which they had framed and composed for this occasion.

The Inca received their Curaeas with many kind and obliging Expressions; and to evidence the efteem he had of them, he bestowed on every one of them garments which belonged to his own Person, with other Presents, very acceptable; and in process of time afterwards these two People, and their Posterity, were ever highly favoured by the Incas, especially those of Haum Colla, both for the readiness with which they embraced the Worthip of the Sun, and for their docible and gentle Nature, which encouraged the Incas to build magnificent Temples in their Countrey, and found Monasteries for Virgins, which were matters of high admiration amongst the Indians.

The Collas confift of many and divers Nations, and report that their first Parents iffued from the great Lake Titicaca, which they efteemed to be their Mother: and before the times of the Ineas, amongst other Gods, they offered Sacrifices to this Lake upon the Banks of it. Some of them report that their Parent proceeded from a great Fountain, others that their Ancestours issued from Caves, and the hollow of Rocks, and accordingly at certain feafons they offered their Sacrifices to them 3 others that they originally iflued from a certain River, and therefore held that the Fish of it were facred, and that it was a fin to eat them. In this manner some adored Fifth of it were facred, and that it was a fin to eat them. In this manner rome adored one Deity, and fome another, howfoever because that People abounded much in flocks of Sheep, they had one God common to them all, which was a white Ram, saying, that there was a great sheep in the higher World, for so they call Heaven, which had a particular care of them, giving them a greater increase and number of Sheep, than to any other of the neighbouring People of Peru; and for that reason they offered up Lambs, and the fat of Mutton to this Sheep-faced Deity. But this God, and all others, the Inca took from them, allowing them no other but the Sun, whom he encharged and commanded them without any other Rival to adore and worthin; befides which he altered that infamous Custome of Disloluteness and Incontinence amongst single Women, to whom it was lawfull, and a laudible quality to be common Whores before their Marriage, though afterwards they were obliged to be true and faithfull to one Husband. But as to those Fables which relate the Original of these People, the Incas took no pains or care to consute them; for as they were obliged to believe the descendence of the Incas from the Sun; so the Incas in like manner would not feem to disapprove the Tables and Reports they made of their own Original.

Having laid these foundations of Government and Religion the Inca returned again to Gozeo, giving a stop for the present to his Conquests and Proceeding; for it seemed to be the most reasonable Policy to give time and space for these new Subjects to taste the sweetness and lenity of the Inca, and by their own experience to make report of it, and publish it to the neighbouring Nations, that so they might be more easily induced to embrace the like advantage: rather than overpowering all by cruel and hasty conquests, their Government should appear tyrannical, and partaking of an ambitious and covetous Spirit.

The great Province of Chucuytu surrenders on terms and conditions of Peace, and after the example thereof many other Provinces submit.

THE Inca was received at Cozco with all the demonstrations of joy and triumph imaginable; where having resided for the space of some years, which he employed towards the advancement of the common good and benefit of his people; he re-assumed his intentions of visiting again the Confines of his Dominions, that so he might afford his people the contentument of seeing his Person, and rectifying the corruption and negligence of his Ministers by his own personal appearance. With this occasion he ratised an Army of ten thousand Men, and with them marched to Hatim Colla, and the Confines of Chicapin, which is so famous a Province, and so abounding with people, that when the Spaniards divided that Countrey; they presented that parcel of ground to the Emperour. So soon as the Inca was entred into Chicapin, he sent Messengers to the Inhabitants, that leaving their ancient customs, they should receive the Laws and Commandments of the Sun, and should worship and adore him for their God: And they, in due compliance hereunto, answered, That they were ready and willing with all affection and cordiality to receive his Injunctions; for that he being descended from the Sun, they were well assumed of his gentlenes and vertues, and therefore with all joy they received him for their Sovereign, under whose shadow and protection they promised to themselves all happines and security.

The Inca, according to accustomed goodness, received them gratiously, pre-

The Inca, according to accustomed goodness, received them gratiously, prefenting them with such gifts as were in esteem amongst those Indians: And sinding the success of these messages to answer his expectations, he was encouraged to send the like Summons to all the Neighbouring Nations, as far as that place, where the Lake Titicaca empties it self; all which, after the example of Hatun Colla and Chuchyiu submitted themselves; the most principal of them were Hillavi, Chulii, Pumata and Cipita; all which surrended on the same terms, and with the same formalities that the others did; so that there is no need to make repetition of the questions formerly demanded, nor the answers thereunto.

Having in this peaceable manner fubjected thefe people, he disbanded his Årmy, giving them leave to return unto their respective homes; onely he retained fo many Souldiers as served for a guard to his Person, and as many as became the dignity and honour of his State; together with such as were sit to teach and instruct them in the Religion and Laws they were to observe; and that he might yield more vigour and encouragement to this work, he was pleased to attend and affist herein with his own presence; which being accounted a particular demonstration of his savour to those principal Provinces, proved afterwards of great use and benefit, as we shall hereafter make appear in the sequel of this History. And what did farther oblige the Curacas and others to the Inca, was his personal residence amongst them for the whole Winter-season, during which time his employment was to settle and establish himself in the affection and good will of his people; having now by his own experience learned, that the best expedient to invite and allure strangers to his subjection was Love and Beneficence to his own people; For by these means the Indians did every-where extoll the Excellencies of their Prince, and proclaim him to be a true child and off-spring of the Sun. And now whilst the Inca resided in Coltas, and that the Spring was returned, he again raised an Army of ten thousand Men, over which he constituted four Colonels, and appointed his Brother to be their General, (whose name is not certainly known) to all five of which, he gave special order not to use violence, or break peace with the people, unless in case of absolute necessity; desiring rather, according to former examples, to reduce them by gentle and moderate terms, than by war and feverity, shewing themselves rather compassionate Parents, than Martial Captains. Accordingly this General and Officers proceeded in their design Westward, as far as that Province which is called Harin Pacassa, and with prosperous fuccess reduced all those they met for the space of 20 Leagues, as far as to the foot of the Mountain Cordillera, and the fnowy defart. In reducing these Indians, there was little or no difficulty, because they were a people which lived at large. without Political Society or Government, the weaker giving way to the pride and power of him that was ftrongeft; and being by nature simple and credulous, fo foon as the fame was foread of the Miracles which were performed by this Child of the Sun, they all flocked in to be received for Vaffals to this great and wonderfull Monarch: Howfoever, three years were spent in the reducing of these wonderfull Monarch: Howloever, three years were pent in the reducing of thele people, for they were of so dull and stupid a genius, that, like beasts, they were not capable to comprehend or learn those easie rudiments and principles which were instilled into them. Having completed this conquest, Officers were placed for their better government, with Instructors to teach them, and such Commanders and Souldiers as might serve to protect and defend them; and so the General and four Captains returned to render an account to the Inca of their Acts and ral and four Captains returned to render an account to the Inca of their Acts and Negotiations, who all that time was employed in vifiting feveral Countries of his Dominions, where he encouraged their industry, improved them in their Arts, and in cultivating Lands; raising publick Edifices, and making Aqueducts, Bridges and High-ways for the better communication of one Nation with another. After which he returned with his Captains, whom he gratiously received unto his Imperial Court, with intention to fix a term and limit to his proceedings, for having enlarged his Dominions 40 Leagues to the Northward, and more than 20 towards the East, he judged this addition a sufficient encrease for his

His reception into Cozco was with wonderfull joy, for his liberality and gentle rus reception into Cozzo was with wonderfun joy, for his incelarity and gentle nature was generally obliging; the remainder of his life he paffed in quietness and repose, performing actions of Justice and Beneficence towards his Subjects; during which time, he sent Magna Capac his eldest Son and Heir twice to visit his Dominions, accompanied with Wise and Aged men, that so he might know and be known to his people, and might have fome trial and practice in affairs before he came to handle the Government. And now the mea finding himself weak, and near his end, he called his eldest Son, with his other Brethren, and in manner of his last Will and Testament, he earnestly recommended to them the obfervation of those Laws and Ordinances which their Ancestours had prescribed a that they should take care of their Subjects, and in every thing behave themselves that they should take care of their Subjects, and in every thing behave themselves like those that are worthy of so pure and bright a Family, as that of the Sun: And lastly, he encharged the Incas, who were Captains, and the Curacas, who were Lords of the people, that they should be mindfull of the Poor, and obedient to their Prince; and especially that they should live in peace and unity, for that now he was to leave them, being called by his Father the Sun to ascend unto him, that he might rest and desist from his former labours and travels. Having ended these sayings, Lloque Tupanqui leaving many Sons and Daughters of his Concubines, though but one who was his true Heir and Successour, and two Daughters by Mama Cova his lawfull Wife, died. The Death of this Inca was greatly lamented through his whole Dominions, for his gentle temper had gained him the affection of all, and his Vertues procured him the efteem of a God. and rank affection of all, and his Vertues procured him the efteem of a God, and rank with the other Children of the Sun, whom they Adored for Deities. And now for diversion of the Reader, we shall defist a while from profecuting the Wars and Conquests, which were almost all atchieved after the like manner with the former, and shall relate fomething of the Customs they practifed, and the Sciences they attained.

CHAP. XI.

Of the Learning and Sciences to which the Incas attained: and first of their Astrology.

HE improvement which the Incas had made either in Aftrology or Philofophy, was as yet for want of Letters very imperfect, how/foever there were fome certain men amongst them of good wit and understanding, which they called Amantas; who were subtile in their Argumentations, and laid down certain Phenomena of natural things; but in regard they were unacquainted with Letters, they could leave none of those conceptions they had formed unto posterity, unless some few principles discovered by the Light of Nature, which they denoted by Glyphicks, or fome uncouth and rude figures; yet in Moral Philosophy they attained to a greater degree, for their Laws, Cuftoms and Practices were their daily leffons, and the doctrine of good manners being the work of the Magistrate, an easie and constant improvement was made therein.

Of Natural Philosophy indeed they had studied little; they knew not how to fearch into the fecrets of nature, or lay down the first principles of it; they knew not what the qualities of the Elements were, or could fay that the Earth was cold and dry, and the fire hot and dry; they onely observed the effects of things, that fire would warm and burn them: Howfoever, they learned fomething of Medicines, and of the Vertues of certain Herbs and Plants which experience and neceffity had taught them.

In Aftrology they had proceeded yet farther, for the apparent objects of the Sun, and Moon, and Stars yielded them more fensible matter for speculation: they had observed the various motions of the Planet Venus, the increase, full and decrease of the Moon; and when it was upon the change and conjunction with the Sun, they called it the Death of the Moon. The Sun especially afforded them the most profound matter of speculation; they observed that by his motion the seasons of the year were distinguished, the hours of the day counted, and the days and nights measured; in all which they attained not to a farther fearch or confideration than what was visible, and materially presented it self before their eyes: they admired the effects, but laboured not to penetrate into the cause, or know the reason of the various changes of the Moon, or motions of the Planets. They called the Sun Tai, the Moon Quilla, the bright Star of Venus, Chasea, which fignifies radiant; other Stars also of greater Magnitude they observed, but did not diffinguish them by their particular names, but onely under that general denomination of Costur, which lignifies a Star. And yet for all this fortill flupidity, the Incas had observed that the Sun accomplished his course in the space of a year; which they called Hunta, though the Commonalty divided it onely by its feafons, and reckoned their year to end, or be finished with their Harvest. The terms of Summer and Winter Solftices, they denoted by the large characters of eight Towers, which they had erected to the East, and as many to the West of the City Cozco; being ranked sour and sour in several Positions, those two in the midthe being higher than the other two at each end, and were built much in the form of the Watch-towers in Spain: When the Sun came to rife exactly oppofite to four of these Towers, which were to the East of the City, and to set just againft those in the West, it was then the Summer Solftice; and in like manner, when it came to rise, and set just with the other four Towers on each side of the City, it was then the Winter Solftice. Pedro de Cicca and Acofa, make mention of these Towers, which served for their Almanacks, and were the best cyphers they had to distinguish their times and seasons, for they had not attained as yet to other measures by Days and Months, though they kept an account by Moons, as we shall hereafter declare; by which and by their Solftices they divided one year from another: these Solstitial Towers I lest remaining in the year 1560, and may still be seen, unless the Wars and Alterations have demolished those dura-

They had likewise observed the Equinoctials; for in the Month of March, when they reaped their Mayz, or Indian Wheat, they celebrated their Harvest with joy and seasting, which at Cosco they kept in the Walk of Colcan, otherwise called the Garden of the Sun. At the Equinoctial of September, they observed one of their four principal Feasts, which were dedicated to the Sun, which they called Citua Raymir; and then to denote the precise day of the Equinoctial, they had erected Pillars of the finest Marble, in the open Area, or place before the Temple of the Sun; which when the Sun came near the Line, the Pricits daily watched and attended to observe what shadow the Pillars cast; and to make it the more exact, they fixed on them a Gnomon, like the Pin of a Dial; so that so sone as the Sun at its rising came to dart a direct shadow by it, and that at its height or mid-day the Pillar made no shade, but was enlightned on all sides; they then concluded that the Sun was entred the Equinoctial Line, at which time they adorned these Pillars with Garlands and odoriferous Herbs, and with the Saddle they had dedicated to the Sun; saying, That on that day he appeared in this most glittering Throne and Majesty, and therefore made their Offerings of Gold and pretious Stones to him, with all the solemnities of ossentation and joy, which are usual at such sessions. Thus the Inean, who were their Kings; and the Amazumi; who were their Philosophers; having observed, that when the Sun came to the Equinoctial, these Pillars made little shadow at moon-day, and that those in the City of Luins; and those of the same degree to the Sea-coast made none at all, because the Sun is then perpendicularly over them; they concluded that the Position of those Countries was more agreeable and pleasing to the Sun, than those on which in an obsique manner onely he darted the brightness of his rays; for which reason the Pillars of Luins were had in so great veneration and esteem amongs them, that they worshipped and adored them; and therefore Sebastia

The Months (as we have faid) they counted by Moons, and therefore called the Months Quillus; the Weeks they called the Quarters of the Moon, having no names for the Days. They took great notice of the Ecliptes both of the Sun and of the Moon, but knew them onely by their Effects, and not by their Caufes; wherefore they were greatly affrighted when they observed the Sun to hide his face from them, believing that for their fins he obscured his countenance, and was angry, framing the like Prognostications of Famine, Pestilence and Wars, as our Astrologers predict from the influences of Eclipses.

When they observed the Moon begin to grow dark in her Eclipse, they said, she was sick; and when she was totally obscured, that she was dead; and then they seared, left she should fall from Heaven, and overwhelm, and kill them, and that the World should be entirely dissolved. With these apprehensions, so soon as the Moon entred into Eclipse, they sounded their Trumpets and Cornets, beat their Kettles, Symbals, and all the Instruments which could make notice and sound; they tied their Dogs in Strings, and beat them till they cried and howled; saying, That with their Voices they called upon the Moon; who having received certain Services from them, was very inclinable to hearken to their call; and that all these varieties of Sounds together served to rowse and awaken her, being fallen into a drowziness and flumber, which her sickness had caused; and then they made their Children cry and call Mana Quilla, or Morher Moon, Do not dye, left we all perith.

Concerning the Spots in the Moon, they conceived another Fable more ridiculous than the former, and may be compared with that, which the more refined Ancients framed of Diama, and that the Moon was a Huntrefs, though this feems more bettial and abfurd; for they feigned that a certain Eox feeing the Moon fo beautifull, fell enamoured of her; and that his Love gave him wings, with which he afcended Heaven; and being ready to embrace the Moon, the clofed and clung fo clofe to the Fox, that ever fince that time the Spots have appeared in the brightness of her Body. Of all which particulars, concerning the Moon, I my felf have been an eye-witness; The Day they called Punchan, the Night Tina, the Break of day, or the Dawning, Pacari, befides other proper words to denote bloom. Midnight, and other Hours.

Lightning. Thunder and Thunder-bolts (as we have faid) they gave onely one denomination of Thapa; and that though they did not acknowledge them for Gods, yet they honoured them as Servants of the Sun; as they also did the Rainbow, and because they observed that the beautifull variety of its Colours was an effect of the Sun-beams reflecting on a Cloud, they placed it in their Banners, and made it the Arms of their Incar. That which we call the Milky-way, they fantied to be an Ewe giving suck to a Lamb; and have often shewed me, pointing to it, Seeft thou not there the Head of the Sheap? and there the Head and Legs of the Lamb? But my imagination was never so strong as to sanste a greature there of that sigure.

The force of their Attrology did never reach to far as to make Predictions from the Sun, or Moon, or Cornets, or Conjunctions of Stars, unlefs it were of fornething of great and notorious importance, fuch as the Death of their Kings, or the Defunction of Kingdoms; but rather deduced their Prognoffwarions from their Dreams, or the entrails of the Beafts, which they offered in Sacrifice: But the fuperlition they had of their Dreams was so idle and vain, that we shall omit to mention them; the like they imagined of the Star Venus, which because it appears at the beginning of the night, and again rifes with the morning, they fanfeed, that being so bright and beautiful beyond the other Stars, the Sun was pleafed to give it a double course, making it in the Evening to follow him, and in the Morning to precede, and be the mellenger to advise his approach.

When they saw the Sun set within the Sea, (as they may every night observe to the Westward from the Coast of Porn) they fantied that the Waters were parted by the force of his sire and heat; and that being a good swimmer, he plunged himself into the Waves, and dived quite through the Sea to appear next morning in the East. And so much shall suffice to have spoken of their Astrology; let us now proceed, and see what knowledge they had attained in Physician and Medicines, which they administred to their sick in their several diseases.

Of their Physick and Medicines, and how they applied them.

They had gained so much knowledge in Physick, as to know, that Bleeding and Purging were two necessary evacuations: the Bloud they drew from the Legs, Armes or Forehead; and because they were not acquainted with the Anatomy of the Veins, they opened that which was nearest to the pain: Their Lancet was made of a sharp-pointed Flint, set at the end of a small Cane; which being laid on the Vein, with a gentle fillip cuts it with less pain than our ordinary Lancets do: And as they are ignorant how the Veins branch themselves through the whole body, so likewise are they unacquainted with the particular humours, such as Flegm, Choler and Melancholy, and consequently have not the judgment to apply the most specifick Medicines to purge them: They most commonly purged, when they sound a Plethory of humours, rather than when the disease had prevailed upon them: the Ingredient which they used in their Purges, was a fort of white root; in sassion of a small Turnip; of which, they say, there/is Male and Female; of both which they mix an equal proportion to the quantity of a bout two ounces, which they beat to a Powder, and take it in water or their ordinary drink, without other Herbs or Drugs; and then the Patient sets himself in the Sun, that his heat and blessing may contribute to its operation. In an hours hours time it begins to work with fuch fqueamifiness in the Stomach, and such giddiness in the Head, that they feel the same indisposition, as those who labour of Sea-fickness, and purges them both upwards and downwards with fuch violence, that it brings away worms, and all kind of indigefted matter, notwithstanding which, having finished its operation, it leaves the body strong and without decay of Spirits, and with a sharp and hungry appetite: All which I can boldly attest, having my self proved it, and taken it twice for a pain in my Sto-

These Cures by purging and bleeding were commonly performed by old Women, or by fome certain Botanifts, who in the times of the lucia were famous for the knowledge they professed in the virtue of Herbs; and these by Tradition transferred the fecrets of their learning to their Sons, who did not profess to be Physicians common to all, but to apply their Art onely for medicining their Kings, and Curacus, and such as were lineally descended from them; but the ordinary and Curacat, and tuch as were lineally descended from them; but the ordinary People cured one the other, by such Medicines as were of common Report. When sucking Infants were sick of any disease, especially if it were a Fever, or Calenture, they washed them every morning in Urine, and then wrapped them up, giving them some of their own Water to drink. At the Birth of their Children, when the Midwise cut the string of the Navel, they left it at least a singer in length, which when it fell off from the Child of it self, they conserved it carefully and are not recommend in dissipation. fully, and on any occasion of indisposition, of which a whiteness in the Mouth of the Child was their usual symptome, they gave it to suck of this string, which commonly proved an affured remedy.

What Reasons they had for these Secrets of Nature I know not, nor did I ever ask: I am fure they made no conjectures by the throbs of the Pulfe, much lefs by Urine, having no other Symptoms of a Calenture, than what appeared by the exceffive heat and burnings of the Body. Their Purges and bleedings were more commonly used when the Patient was but a little indisposed, and was able to walk, but not after he had yielded to the Disease, for then they committed him waik, but not after he had yeliced to the Ineact, for then they committed him onely to the strength of Nature, and a regular Diet, they never arrived to the knowledge of Clysters, or to Unquents or Plasters; the cold and shaking fit of a Quartan they called Chucchu, the hot fit Rupar, which is burning, the which Indispositions they greatly seared by reason of the uneasiness they selt both by cold

Of their Medicinal Herbs, and Phylical Plants.

They have a certain Tree which they call Mulli, and the Spaniards Molle, which tweats forth a kind of rasomy juice, which hath a most sovereign quality for the cure of green Wounds, the herb or shrub, called Chillea, being heated in an earthen pan, hath done wonderfull effects on those who have been troubled with a pain in the joints and bones, taken by cold; they have a certain root, like with a pain in the joints and bones, taken by cold; they have a certain root, like the root or Fibres of Grafs, but fomething groffer, and fuller of knots, the name of it I do not well remember, which they make use of to ftrengthen the Teeth, and fortify the Gums; and in the preparing of it they roaft it in the hot embers, and when it is very hot they apply it to the Gums on each fide of the mouth, keeping it untill it is cold, which is of great torment to the Patient, for it fealls the mouth exceedingly. This Remedy they apply in the Evening, and next morning doe the like, so that their Gums and Mouth look like roafted fielh, and for the or altered day are not able to them. for two or three days are not able to chew, or receive other nourithment than by a fpoon, afterwards the white flesh of the Gums, which hath been cauterized in this manner, begins to fall off, and a new and well coloured fort of Gum,

They had also the knowledge of another Herb, of an excellent quality for the Eyes, called Manaccu, it hath but one stalk, and that is covered with a single Leaf, and no more, and is like that which they call in Spain Abbats Ears, and grows in winter upon * the roofs of houses, the Indians eat it * Perhaps it raw, having a pleasant reliss, when he is bruised they spire some of the jusce into the may be a for

I my felf have laid it on the Eye of a Youth, which was fo swelled and inflamed, that it was flarted out of his Head; the first night I applied it the Eve returned again to its place, and the fecond time it was perfectly cured; and the Youth hath fince told me, that he fees better with that Eye than the other; and a Spaniard confidently affured me, that he knew one, who being absolutely blinded by a film or skin which covered his Eyes, had by the mere application of this herb for two nights onely, recovered his fight. Those who had received this benefit by it, did afterwards kis the herb with great affection, rendring thanks to Almighty God, that he was pleased to bestow such a sovereign and blessed virtue on this herb, for the good and use of Mankind. The Indians, who were my Relations, used divers other herbs, but the names and qualities of them I cannot

The Indian Kings did never attain to the knowledge of compounded, but onely of simple Medicines, and seeing that in so necessary a study, as that which conduces to the confervation of health, they made to little a progress; how can it be expected in matters less important and usefull, such as Natural Philosophy and Aftrology, they should make any considerable improvement? much less can we suppose them skilfull in Divinity, who being wholly guided by sensible objects. were never able to raise their Intellects to invisible and immaterial Beings, more than what their Incas had taught them, and included in that word of Pachacumac, which fignifies the Maker of this Universe. Since which time the Spaniards have improved their Physical Science to a higher degree, having discovered the fecret virtues of many herbs growing in that hot Climate, of which the Indians were ignorant; and particularly that the Mayz, which is Indian Wheat, and of a substantial nutriment, hath moreover a peculiar quality against the Collick, and is an excellent Remedy for the Stone, either in the Kidneys or the Bladder, and clears all obstructions of Urine; the knowledge hereof the Spaniards collected from the constitution and temperament of the body of the Indians; for having obferved, that they were never subject to these distempers, they concluded that the drink which they commonly used, made of Mays, was the cause; whereof the Spaniards making now divers Preparations, have with good success experienced most admirable effects of it; and the Indians have also of themselves made many Plasters and Balfams of it, which they applied for Aches and other Pains.

Of the Geometry, Geography, Arithmetick and Musick known to the Indians.

They had attained to much Geometry as served them for to measure our their Lands, and make out limits and bounds to their feveral partitions: but this was not done in an artificial manner, but by their lines, and finall stones. which they used in all their Accounts.

As to their Geography, they knew how to decypher in colours the Model of every Nation, with the diffinct Provinces, and how they were bounded. I have Gen an exact Map of Cozco, with the parts adjacent, and the four principal ways to it, perfectly described in a fort of Mortar, compounded with small stones and fraw, which delineated all the places, both great and finall, with the broad Streets, and narrow Lanes, and Houses which were ancient and decayed, and with the three ftreams running through it, all which were described with great curiofity.

Moreover in this Draught the Hills and Valleys, the turnings and windings of the Rivers were made to appear so plain, that the best Cosmographer in the World could not have exceeded it. The use of this Model was to inform the Visitors, which they called Damian, of the extent and division of the Countries. when loever they went by the King's Commission to survey the Province, and number the people within the precincts of Cozco, and other places; this Model which I mention, was made in Manna, which the Spaniards call now Mobina, and is distant about five Leagues from the City of Cozco towards the Zurz, the which I had opportunity to observe, being then present with the Visitors, who went to number the Indians that inhabited the Division of Garcitasso de Vega, My Lord and Master.

In Arithmetick they knew much, and were skilled in a peculiar manner and nature in that Science; for by certain knots of divers colours they summed up all the accounts of Tribute, and Contributions, belonging to the revenue of the Inca; and thereby knew how to account, and discount, to subtract, and to multiply; but to proportion the respective Taxes on every Nation by way of division, they performed it in another manner by granes of Mare, or Pebbles, which served in the place of Counters. And because it was necessary that Accounts should be kept of all charges relating to War and Peace, that the People, and the Flocks and Herds of Cattle should be numbred, that the payment of Tributes, and the like, should be registred and noted, there were certain Persons appointed for that work. who made it their study and business to be ready and skilfull in Accounts; and because perhaps one Person was appointed to keep the reckonings of three or sour diffinet things, as Accountant General, which feems difficult to be performed by the way of their threads and knots, we shall discourse it hereafter more at large, in what manner they diffinguished their Accounts of divers businesses.

Of their Musick.

In Musick they arrived to a certain Harmony, in which the Indians of Colla did more particularly excell, having been the Inventors of a certain Pipe made of Canes glued together, every one of which having a different Note of higher and lower, in the manner of Organs, made a pleafing Mulick by the diffonancy of founds, the Treble, Tenor and Baffe, exactly corresponding and answering each to other; with these Pipes they often plaid in consort, and made tolerable Musick, though they wanted the Quavers, Semiquavers, Aires, and many Voices which perfect the Hatmony amongst us. They had also other Pipes, which were Flutes with four or five stops, like the Pipes of Shepherds; with these they played not in confort, but fingly, and tuned them to Sonnets, which they composed in meetre, the Subject of which was love, and the Passions which arise from the Layours or Displeasures of a Mistress. These Musicians were Indians trained up in that art for divertifement of the Incas, and the Curacas, who were his Nobles, which, as ruftical and barbarous as it was, it was not common, but acquired with great Industry and Study.

Every Song was fet to its proper Tune; for two Songs of different Subjects could not correspond with the same Aire, by reason that the Musick which the Gallant made on his Flute, was defigned to express the satisfaction or discontent of his Mind, which were not fo intelligible perhaps by the words as by the melancholy or chearfulness of the Tune which he plaid. A certain Spaniard one night late encountered an Indian Woman in the Streets of Cozco, and would have brought her back to his Lodgings; but she cryed out, For God's sake, Sir, let me go, for that Pipe which you hear in yonder Tower calls me with great Passion, and I cannot rufule the summons, for Love constrains me to go, that I may be his wife and he my Hus-

The Songs which they composed of their Wars, and grand Atchievements. were never fet to the Aires of their Flute, being too grave and ferious to be intermixed with the pleasures and softnesses of Love; for those were onely sung at their principal Festivals when they commemorated their Victories and Triumphs. When I came from Peru which was in the Year 1560, there were then five Indiams refiding at Cozo, who were great Mafters on the Flure, and could play readily by book any Tune that was laid before them; they belonged to one fluor Robigues, who lived at a Village called Labor, not far from the City: and now at this time, being the Year 1602 'tis reported, That the Indians are so well improved in Musick, that it was a common thing for a Man to found divers kinds of Instruments, but Vocal Musick was not so usual in my time, perhaps because they did not much practife their Voices, though the Mongrils, or fuch as came of a mixture of Spanish and Indian bloud, had the faculty to fing with a tunable and a fweet Voice.

CHAP. XV.

The Poetry of the Inca's Amautas, who were Philosophers: and of the Haravec, who were Poets.

THe Amautas, who were Men of the best ingenuity amongst them, invented Comedies and Tragedies, which on their folemn Festivals they represented before their King, and the Lords of his Court. The Actors were not Men of the common fort, but Curacas, or some of the young Nobility, and Officers of the Souldiery, because every one acted his own proper part; the plot or argument of their Tragedies was to reprefent their military Exploits, and the Triumphs, Victories and Heroick Actions of their renowned. Men; and the fubject or defign of their Comedies was to demonstrate the manner of good Husbandry in cultivating and manuring their Fields, and to flew the management of domeftick Affairs, with other familiar matters. So foon as the Comedy was ended, the Actors took their places according to their degrees and qualities. These Plays were not made up with interludes of obscene and dishonest farles, but such as were of ferious entertainment, composed of grave and acute sentences, fitted to the place and auditory, by whom the Actors were commonly rewarded with Jewels and other Prefents, according to their merit. Their

Their poetical Verses were composed in long and short Meetre, fitted to amorons Subjects, and the Tunes to which they were fet; their Kings, and the Exploits and great Actions performed in their respective Reigns, were also matter for their Poetry, which they recorded in verse, and served in the place of History; their Sonnets were not long, but short and compendious, so as they might more eafily be committed to Memory; they used not rhimes, but loose verse, like our Heroick Poems. I remember four Verses of an amorous Song, which for curiofity take, and to they their flort but compendious fense, I shall repeat here; being thereby best accommodated to the Aire of their Flute: the Tune also I would gladly fet down, but that the impertinence thereof may easily excuse me. The Sonner in four verfes is this:

> Caylla Llapi To the Sona T mill fleen In English Chaupituta thus, At midniabt T shall come. Samulac.

Many other forts of Verses the Incas, who were Poets, composed, who had the Name of Haravec, which properly fignifies an Inventour. Blas Valera in his Writings mentions certain Verfes, which he calls Spondels, confliting of four fyllables, the Indian words he hath translated into Latin, the Subject of them is philosophical, and treats of those second causes which God hath placed in the Air, such as Thunder, and Lightning, Rain and Snow, all which are described in verse, and are agreeable to the sancy of their Fables, one of which is this: That the Maker of all things hath placed in Heaven a Virgin, the Daughter of a King, holding a Bucket of Water in her hand, for restellment of the Earth, when occasion requires; and that sometimes her Brother knocking upon this Bucket, causes Thunder and Lightning to proceed from It; these noises, they say, are effects of the violent nature of Man, but Hail, and Rain, and Snow, falling with less noise and impetuosity, are more agreeable to the gentle nature of a Woman. They fay, that an Inca, who was a Poet and an Astrologer composed many Verses in praise of the Vertues and Excellencies of this Virgin Lady, which God had bestowed upon her for the good and benefit of his Creatures. This Fable and Verfes Blas Valera reports to have found expressed in the knots and accounts of their ancient Annals, represented in the threads of divers Colours, and preserved by those to whom the care of the historical Knots and Accounts were committed; and he so much wondred at the ingenuity of the Amanaa, that he thought those Verses worthy to be committed to Memory and Paper. I remember in my Infancy to have heard this Fable, with many others, recounted by my Parents, but being then but a Child, I was not very inquisitive to understand the fignification. Blas Valera hath translated this Song out of the Indian Language into Latin, and which runs in this manner:

With such trifles as these I have enriched my poor History; for whatsoever I have collected from Blu Valera, are all pearls and pretious curiofities, and fuch ornaments as my Countrey dorn not deferve; which now, as they report, in these days improves in Poetry; for that the Mongrils, or those of Spanish and Indian bloud have taken a good strain in Verse, whose subject is Divine or Moral, God bloud have taken a good strain in Verse, whose subject is Divine or Moral, God give them his grace that they may serve him in all things.

In this imperfect and gross manner had the Indians of Peru the knowledge of Sciences, which is not to be attributed to their want of natural parts and abilities of mind; for had they been instructed in letters, their capacities are such as might have improved every little beginning: And as the first Philosophers and Astrologers delivered the principles of their Sciences to their posterity, who erected on those foundations the more lofty buildings of reason; so these people were endued with the like capacities, sufficient to advance such learning as descended from their Parents, especially we find that they were well disposed to the learning of that Morality which contained the Customs and Laws of their Countrey; and which did not onely extend to those rules relating to justice and decent comport-ment of one Subject to another, but as it had reference to that obedience which Subjects and Vaffals owe to their Sovereign, and those Ministers which act under their command; for these being a people who were inclined to live according to those Laws which the light of nature dictated, and rather to doe no evil, than know well, were more easily made capable of that Science which was directed by material and exteriour objects, than of that which was converfant about more abstruse and immaterial notions. Pedro de Cieca in the 38th Chapter of his Book. fpeaking of the Incat and their Government, fays, That they acted fo well, and that their Government was fo good and political, as might be compared to the Wifedom of the best frame and Model of Common-wealths in this World. And Father Maestro Acosta, in the first Chapter of his 6th Book, makes a discourse in favour of the Inc.a, and the people of Mexico, in these words;

"Having in the preceding discourse laid down the Particulars of that Religion which the Indians profess; I design in the following Treatise to declare their " Customs and Political Government, for two ends: First, that I may undeceive " the World of that false opinion which they have framed concerning this people, as being to brutish, and of to little understanding, as deferve not the name of rational creatures: From which erroneous conception, many grievous calamities have been imposed on them without pity or compassion; and being esteemed no other than beasts, all that respect which is due to humane nature. or the person of Mankind hath been lost towards them. But this false notion, which none but the vain-glorious and confident of themselves ( who are the common fools of the World) have entertained, hath been fufficiently confuted by more folid and confidering men, who have made it their bufiness to travel and converse amongst them, and to discover the secrets of their Customs and Government. To remove which prejudicial centure from them, the most expedite means will be to declare the Justice and Customs which were in use amongft them, at that time, when they lived by their own Laws; with which, though there was a great mixture of Barbarifm, and many things without four dation; yet their Government contained many excellent things, and worthy of admiration, and fuch as may be compared with the belt Model of our Common-wealths, and may afford us fufficient evidence of the genius of that people, and of that natural readiness of mind capable to be improved to greater and higher matters. Nor ought it to seem strange, if some erroneous fancies have intermixed with their Customs; for even Plato and Lycurgus, and other excellent Legislatours have been guilty of some follies, and interwoven superstitions, and vain rites, with their more fubfiantial Laws. And indeed in those wise Common-wealths of Rome and Athens, many ridiculous Customs have been in-H 2 "troduced 3

Pacha

"troduced; which to confidering men would appear as idle as any of those practices which have been in use amongst the Mexican or the Peruvian Commonwealths. But we who entred by the Sword, and afforded not time to these missers through the Mountains, and drew them as brutish creatures to bear the burthens of our slavish service, could not entertain any great opinion of their Wisedom: Howsoever, some observing men, who have been so curious, as to penetrate into the secrets of their ancient Government, and into the methods of their proceedings, have found that the Order and Rules they sollowed, were worthy of admiration. Thus sar are the words of softph Acosta, who also adds, that they had certain compendious Systems of Morality, digested into Verse way of Poetry; in which also many of their Laws, and the great Actions of their Kings were rehearsed, and kept in a kind of tradition for better instruction of their posterity; which savouring rather of Truth, than Romance, the Spaniards esteem them to be true and particular passages of their History: But many other things afford them matter of laughter, being ill-composed Fables, superstitious and vain, and such also as are contrary to common honesty.

CHAP. XVI.

Of those few Instruments which the Indians attained to, and made use of in all their Works and Handicrast-Trades.

H Aving already declared how far they were proceeded in their Moral and Natural Philosophy, and in their Poetry; it follows now that we should declare something of their Mechanicks, and how much they failed in the Art of making those Instruments, which are necessary for shaping and framing those Utensils which are required for convenient living and well-being. And first to begin with their Silversmiths; of which, though there were great numbers, and constantly laboured at their Trade, yet they were not so skillul as to make an Anvil of Iron, or any other Metal; caused, perhaps, for want of knowledge in what manner to dig their Iron, and separate it from its Ore; of which they had several Mines, and called it Quillay; and therefore instead thereof they made use of a certain hard Stone, of a yellowish colour; which being planed, and made fmooth, was rare, and of great value amongst them: They knew not the invention of putting a handle of Wood to their Hammers, but worked with certain Instruments they had made of Copper, mixed with a fort of fine Brass. Neither did they know how to make Files or Graving tools, or Bellows for Melting down Metals; but instead thereof used Pipes made of Copper, of about a Yard long, the end of which was narrow, that the Breath might pass more forcibly by means of the contraction: And as the Fire was to be more or less, so accordingly they used eight, ten or twelve of these Pipes at once, as the quantity of Metal did require: And still they continue this way, though our Invention of Bellows is much more easie, and forcible to raise the Fire. Nor had they the use of Tongs to take their heated Metal out of the Fire, but rather drew it thence by a piece of Wood, or some Bar of Copper; with which they cast it into a heap of wet Earth, which they kept purposely by them to cool their Metal, untill such time as they could take it into their hands: Notwithstanding this want of divers Infroments, they made many things with great curiofity, especially in Boaring Metals, as we shall hereafter discourse more at large. And notwithstanding their simplicity, experience had taught them, that the Steam and Essluviums from

Metals, is dangerous and prejudicial to Man's health; and for that reason, they founded all their Metals in the open Air, and not under Coverts. But above all. their Carpenters feemed to be worst provided with Tools; for though ours use many Instruments made of Iron, those of Peru had no other than a Hatcher, and a Pick-axe made of Copper; they neither had Saw, nor Augre, nor Planer, nor any other Tool for the Carpenter's work, fo that they could not make Arches or Portals for doors, onely they hewed and cut their Timber, and whitened is, and then it was prepared for their Building: And for making their Hatchets and Pickaxes, and some few Rakes, they made use of the Silversiniths, for as yet they had not attained to the Art of Working in Iron. Nor did they know how to make Nails, or use them, but tied all their Timber with Cords of Hemp. Nor were their Hewers of Stone more artificial, for in cutting and shaping their Stones. they had no other Tool, than one made with some sharp Flints and Pebbles, which they called Hibuana, with which they rather wore out the Stone by continual rubbing, than cutting. For lifting or carrying up their Stones, they had no Engines. but did all by the strength and force of their Armes; and notwithstanding all this defect, they raifed such mighty and stately Edifices, as is incredible, which appears by the Writings of the Spanish Historians, and by the Ruines of them. which still remain. They knew not how to make Scissars, nor Needles of Metal, but in place thereof they used a certain long Thorn, which grows in those parts; for which reason they sowed very little, but rather patched or cobled, as we shall hereafter declare. With this fort of Thorns they made also their Combs for the head, which they fixed within a Cane, which served for the back of the Comb, and the Thorns on each fide for the Teeth. The Looking-glaffes which the Ladies of Quality used, were made of Burnished Copper; but the Men never used any, for that being esteemed a part of effeminacy, was also a disgrace. if not ignominy, to them. In this manner they passed, as well as they could, in providing those matters which were onely necessary for humane life; and though these people were endued with no great capacity of invention, yet, when the Spaniards taught them, they learned with great facility, and imitated fo well the patterns given them, that in time they excelled their Masters in their Artificial workmanship and contrivances. This ingenuity and aptness to attain Sciences. was evidenced by a genius they had in Personating and Acting Comedies, which the Jesuits and some Friars, and other Religious had composed for them. I remember the argument of one to have been the Mystery of Man's redemption, and reprefented by the Indians with gracefull and proper action; nor were they altogether ftrangers to this divertilement, because in the times of the Incas they usually represented their own Stories in Dialogues, and therefore more eafily improved in that Art to which they were formerly inclined by a natural aptitude. It is observable how well they Acted a Comedy, made by a Jesuit, in praise of the Blessed Virgin Mary, which he wrote in the Tongue Asmara, which is different from the Language of Peru: the Argument was on those words in the 3d Chapter of Genesis, where it is faid, I will put Enmity between thee and the Woman, and that the shall break thy Head, &c. This was Acted by Children and Young men in the Countrey, called Sulli. And at Potow they rehearfed a Dialogue, which contained all the Particulars of our Faith, at which about 12000 Indians were present. At Cozco another Dialogue was recited of the Child Jesus, at which were all the Nobles and People of the City affembled. 'Another was recited in the City, which is called the City of the Kings, where the Lord Chancellour and all the Nobility were prefent, together with an innumerable company of Indians: the Argument of which was, the Most Holy Sacrament, composed in Spanish, and the General Tongue of Peru; which was repeated by the Indian Youth in Dialogues, and pronounced with such grace and emphatical expression, with such air and handsome gestures, intermixed with Songs fet to pleasant Tunes, that the Spaniards were much contented, and pleafed to behold them; and fome flied tears for joy, to fee the ingenuity and good inclination of those poor Indians, that ever after they conceived a better opinion of them, confidering them not to be blockish, rude and filthy, but docible, gentle and capable of improvement.

When these Indian Youths defire to commit any thing to memory, which is given them in writing, they go to those Spaniards who are acquainted with letters, defiring them to reade the first lines to them four or five times over, untill they have learned them by heart; and to fix them better in their memories, they repeat every word often to themselves, and mark it with Pebbles, or little Granes of divers colours, of about the bigness of Pease, called by them Chuy, which serve of divers colours, of about the bignets of reate, called by them Chuy; which ferve for helps to their Memories; and fuch indultry and care they use, till at length they have perfectly overcome the difficulty, and learned their part or lesson. Those Spaniards to whom the Young Indians have recourse for their Learning, how great soever they are, do not yet disclaim to teach and inform them, giving them all the encouragement they are able. So that these Indians, though naturally deligible of investigations have yet an artified as indicates and their which their parts. rally dull of invention, have yet an aptitude to imitate any thing which is pro-

John Guellas, a Scholar, who was a Native of Medina, and Canon of the Cathedral of Cozco, who taught the Grammar to the Children which were of Spathedral of Cozco, thedral of Coxco, who taught the Grammar to the Children which were of spa-nift and Indian Parents, and to others of best quality in that City, can give us the most clear testimony thereof: For he was moved to perform this charitable Of-fice at the intreaty and instance of the Scholars, whose Masters and Tutours, in exchange for better preferments, had forsaken their Charge; for though every exchange for better preterments, had fornaken their Change; for though every Scholar gave ten pieces of Eight a Month for his Learning, yet it was but little, in respect of their small number, which perhaps were not above 17 or 18 in the whole Town. I knew one amongst them who was an Inca, called Philip, and was Pupil to a rich and honourable Priest, named Father Peter Sanchez, who obwas Pupil to a rich and honourable Priett, named Father Pater Sanchez, who observing the ingenuity of this Youth, took pains to instruct him in his Studies, in which he profited so well, that he became as good a Grammarian as any that was of the Spanish and Indian Bloud. The change of many Masters was a great obstruction to their Learning; for every one of them having a different way of Teaching, they began not from the rules and principles formerly taught them, but made them to begin from their own methods, and forget what they had before but made them to begin from their own fletcheds, and longet what they had before learned, which was a great prejudice to their proceedings; untill this good Canon undertook to inftruct them in the Latin Grammar, which he continued for the space of two years, amidst the Tumults and Wars raised between D. Sepastian the space of two years, amidst the Tumults and Wars raised between D. Sebastian de Castilla, and Francisco Hernandes Giron; which were the cause of much bloud, fire and destruction; and were of that continuance, that scarce was one fire extinguished, before another slame broke forth. At this time this Canon Guellas observing the great docility of his Scholars, and their inclinations to be improved in all Sciences; and the want of able and industrious Masters to cultivate the minds of this people; would cry out, and say, Oh, Children! what pity it is that I do not see a dozen of you Students in the University of Salamanca! And indeed this good Canon had reason so to say, because his attendance at the Choire took him off from the employment of Teaching his Scholars with such sedulity, as to make them perfect in the Latin Tongue: Howsoever, the little improvements they made were good evidences of their natural wit and understanding, which now in these days (praised be God) is much advanced by that abundance of Learning, and light of Sciences, which the Jesuits have introduced amongst them. And so much shall suffice to have discoursed on this subject, it being now time to return to the History of the Succession of the Incas, and of their Contime to return to the History of the Succession of the Incas, and of their Conquests and great Actions.

Mayta Capac, the fourth Inca, gains Tiahuanacu, and what fort of Buildings were found there.

HE Inca, Marta Capac, having performed the Ceremonies due to the Objequies of his dead Father, refolved to vifit the remote parts of his Dominions; and though he had already in the time of his Father travelled those Countries, yet being then in his Minority, and under the Tuition of his Parents and Counselof his Vertues, nor yet to be observed by his people, as he was now, being an absolute Prince. Wherefore after the example of his Ancestours he honoured and satisfied the several Provinces of his Kingdom with the lustre of his Presence, giving fuch testimonies of liberality, courage and generous disposition to his Curacm, and all other his Subjects, that they remained with great admiration of his Royal Vertues and Abilities of mind.

Having accomplished this Visitation, he re-assumed the design of enlarging his Dominions after the example of his Ancestours covering his ambition and covetousness under the specious pretence of reclaiming the Nations from their barbarity and vain superstitions, to a more civilized life, and to the true and religious worthip and adoration of the Sun: Accordingly he raifed an Army, and in the Spring following he began his march with twelve thougand Men under the Command of four Generals and their Inferiour Officers, taking his way as far as that place, where the Lake Titicaca empties it felf; which being the Countrey of Col-Mo, plain and even, and the people fimple, and yet docible, it was the more inviting, and more cafily fubdued.

Being come to this ftream which runs from the Lake, he made floats, on which he Ferried his Army to the other fide, and then fent his usual Summons to the next Inhabitants, requiring them to fubmit to his Government and Religion. These Indians having heard the report of those Miracles which the Incas had performed, without much difficulty submitted to his Commands; and amongst the rest, the people of Tiahnanacu were reduced to obedience; of whose great and incredible Editices, it is requifite, that we thould declare fomething in this place. Amongst the mighty Works and Buildings of that Countrey, there is a certain Hill, or heap of Earth thrown up by hand; which is so high, that it is a subject of great admiration; and left with time it should settle, or fink lower, it is founded on great Stones cemented together: And to what end this was clone, no man can coniecture, Unless it were like the Pyramids in Egypt, to remain for a Trophy of the Greatness of that Monarch who erected it. On one side of this mighty hears are the Statues of two Giants cut in Stone, with long Robes to the ground. and Wreaths or Binders about their heads; which being much impaired by time. thews the Antiquity of them. There is also a strange Wall to be seen, raised with Stones of an extraordinary bigness; and what is most wonderfull to consider, is, how, or in what manner they were brought thither by force of Men, who had not yet attained to the knowledge of Engines fit for fuch a work, and from had not yet attained to the knowledge of engines ht for luch a work, and from what place they were brought, there being no Rocks or Quarries but fuch as are at a far diffance from thence. There appear also many great and lofty Edifices; and what is more ftrange, there are in divers places great Portals of Stone, and many of them whole and perfect, made of one fingle and entire Stone; which being raifed on Pedeftals, are found by those who have measured them to be 30 foot in length, and 15 in breadth, which Pedeftals, as well as the Arches of the Portals, were all of one fingle Stone: And then we may confider how great those Stones were before they were thaped, and what tools of Iron were requisite for fuch a labour. The Natives report that these Buildings, and others of the like nature not mentioned here, were raifed before the times of the Incas, and that the Model of the Fortress at Cozco was taken from them, as we shall hereafter more particularly defcribe: Who they were that erected them, they do not know, onely they have heard fay by tradition from their Ancestours, that those prodigious Works were the effects of one nights labour; which feem, in reality, to have been the beginnings onely, and foundations for fome mighty Structure. Thus much Pedro de Ciega in his Remarks concerning Peru, and its feveral Provinces relates; to which I shall farther add, what a certain Priest called Diego de Alcobaça, who was my School-fellow; and whom I may call my Brother, because we were both born in the fame house, and his Father educated me as my Tutour and Master: This perfon, I fay, amongst the many relations of things which both he and others sent In 1 day, amonght the many relations of things which both he and others lent me, concerning my own Countrey; coming to speak of the Buildings of Trahmanacu, hath these words: "In Trahmanacu, which is a Province of Collas, amonghe many other Antiquities worthy of immortal memory, there is one particularly famous, adjoining to the Lake, which is called by the Spaniards Chaerytu, though its true name be Chaquivitus; this is a Pile of Monthrous Buildings, to which is an open Court of 15 Yards square every way, the Buildings is two Stories high; and on one side of this great Yard or Square is a large Hall of 45 soot is the state of the sta ingh; and on one intee of this great Yard or Square is a large Hall of 45 foot in length, and 22 in breadth; the Covering appears to be Thatch, like those on the Temple of the Sun, in the City of Cozco: All this Court, or Yard, which we mention, with its Walls, Floor, Hall, Roof, Portals and Jams of the doors, and back-gate to this Building, is all of one entire Stone, hewed out of a Rock; the Walls of the Court, and of the Hall, are three quarters of a Yard thick, and such also is the Covering or Roof; which though it may seem to be Thershed with Straw is yet of Stone. For the Indian beauty medical is the contraction of the Indian beauty medical is the contraction. to be Thatched with Straw, is yet of Stone; for the Indians have worked it fo artificially, and with those natural lines, that the Stones appear like Straw laid artificially, and with those natural lines, that the Stones appear like Straw laid in the most curious manner of Thatch: the Waters of the Lake beat against the side of these Walls; and both this, and all the other Edifices here about, were all, as the Natives report, dedicated to the Maker of the Universe. Moreover, besides these Works, there are divers other figures of Men and Women cut in Stone, so naturally, that they seem to be living: Some of them are drinking with Cups in their hands, some are sitting, some standing, some are walking in the stream which glides by the Walls; other Statues there are of Women carrying Children in their armes, and in the folds of their gaments; others with them on their backs, and in a thousand other manners and postures. The Indi-"any of these days report, that for the great Sins of that people, in having stoned a Stranger, who passed through their Province, God in his judgment had converted those Men and Women into Stone. These are the words of Diego de Alcobaça, who hath been Vicar-General of many Provinces in that Kingdom, and Preacher of the Indians; for being a Native of Cozco, and of Spanifh and Indian Bloud, and confequently acquainted with the Indian Language, was most able to inform and instruct that people; and in all probability, he was the most likely Man to deliver the most true and authentick Relation of those Countries.

CHAP. II.

Hatunpacassa reduced, and the Cac-vayiri conquered.

DUT returning now to Mayta Capac, we find him bufied in reducing the Pro-But I returning now to have the left hand of that thream by vince of Hatmpacaffa, which is a Countrey to the left hand of that thream by which the Lake empties it felf; and in performance of this work, he used no other means or force, than Doctrine and Instruction, teaching them the way to cultivate and manure their Lands, and the art to live in humane and political fociety; which method, as some report, the Incas onely used in the first beginnings of their Monarchy, which, fo foon as it was grown up and fortified, they turned to open violence and compulfion. But whether this subjection were effected by one way or the other, it matters not much here, nor how many days journey one way of the other, it matters not flucture free, nor now many days journey every King proceeded; for fuch repetitions would be both tedious and impertinent; and therefore we shall onely recount in short what every Inca gained, and what additions he made to his Empire. This Inca therefore proceeding in his Conquests, came at length to that People which is called Cacepaviri, who were the Inhabitants of a great number of Villages, spread all over that Country without nabitants of a great number of vinages, spread an over that Countrey without order or rule; over every one of which some petty Lord presided. These having received the Allarm, that the luca was coming to conquer and subdue them, slocked all together to a little hill, which had been raised by labour in that plain, being about a quarter of a League high, and picked at the top like a Sugar loaf. This Hill, whose beauty was the more remarkable, for being the onely lofty and In the Hill, whole beauty was the more remarkable, for being the onely lofty and eminent fituation in those Plains, was esteemed facred by the Indians, and the place appointed whereon to adore their Gods, and offer Sacrifice: Hereunto they sled for fuccour; and hoping that their God would make this place their Sanctuary, to desend them from their Enemies, they built upon it a dry Wall of Stone, and laid a turf of Earth over it; the Men laboured in the stone-work, and for better dispatch the Women cut and brought the turfs; and to this Fortress, which they had furnished with great stone of Provisions. had furnished with great store of Provisions, Men, Women and Children, in great numbers reforted.

The Inca, according to his custome, fent them his Summons to furrender, particularly affuring them, that he came not to take away their Lives, or their Estates, but to confer upon them all those benefits, which the Sun, his Father, had combut to conter upon them all those benefits, which the Sun, his Father, had commanded him to perform towards the Indians; and therefore that they fhould be cautious how they wanted of paying due respect towards his Children, who were, by the help and affistence of the Sun, (who was the God which they adored,) strong and invincible in battel: This, or such like, Message the Inca tent often to these Indians, but they persisted obstinate in their results; saying, that they lived well already, and had no need of his Instructions to teach them to live better; and as to his Father, the Sun, they did not much value him, for that they lad Gods of their own, one of which was that fortified Hill, which favoured them, and would preserve them, and that the thous might be pleased to depart in them, and would preferve them, and that the Lucas might be pleased to depart in then, and wound preferve mem, and that the mem ingin be pleated to depair in Peace, and teach others, who were willing to receive their Influctions, for that they had no need of their Doctrine. The mea, who had no great mind to overcome them by fight, but rather to win them with fair words, or at worst to compell them by Famine, divided his Army into four parts, and therewith befieged the Hill.

These People of Colla continued many days in this Resolution not to surrender, expecting when the Enemy would affault their Fortress; which when they found, that the Inca declined, they attributed this backwardness to weakness, or cowardife; with which being encouraged, they made divers Sallies from their Fort; in all which, though the Souldiers of the Inca, according to the command of their Prince, did rather defend themselves, than seek to offend them, yet these People, like brute Beafts, without order, or wit, throwing themselves on the weapons of their Enemy, perished in great numbers; the which gave occasion to that report which was common amongst the People of Collao, and afterwards was spread over all the Dominions of the Incas, That the Indians sallying out one day to fight, all the Stones they threw, and the Arrows they shor, returned upon themselves, so that many of Colla were Rilled and wounded by their own Weapons, which retorted against their own Breasts; the which sabulous report we shall relate more at large hereaster. With this great destruction and mortality the Collaons being affitighted, especially their Caracas, and fearing that greater evils would be the effect of their obstinacy, resolved to submit; and accordingly disposing their People in several Squadrons, or Bands, they marched orderly to crave Mercy. In the first place went the Children, next sollowed the Mothers, then the old Men, and then the Satuldiery, with their Cautains and Commanders, and last of all the Cabtrit place went the Children, next followed the Mothers, then the old Men, and then the Souldiery, with their Captains and Commanders, and last of all the Captains with their Captains with their Captains with their Captains with their hards bound, and halters about their necks, as a sign that they had deserved death, for having resisted the Children and Family of the Sun; and to make their huttiliation the more formal, according to the custome of Pern, they walked descaled, or bare-soot, for greater reverence to that Majesty or Deity which they went to adore.

CHAP. III.

The Collaons upon Surrender are received to Pardon, the Fable is explained.

THE feveral foundrons prefenting themselves before the Inca, with all humility proffrated themselves to the ground before him, and with loud accla-

THE feveral fquadrons prefenting themselves before the Inca, with all humility prostrated themselves to the ground before him, and with loud acclarations saluted him by the stile of the Son of Phabius, which ceremony being performed by the Commonalty, the Curacus followed next, who having made their humble reverence after the salhion of their Countrey, they begged his Majesty's Pardon for the citines and offences they had committed against him; but in case it were his pleasure that they should be put to death, at least that he would be pleased to forgive the multitudes of those poor Souldlers, who being seduced by their ill example, had been persuaded to raise Arms against his Majesty's and that he would be pleased also to extend his Mercy farther to the Women, and to the old Men and Children, who having no part in the guilt of the Rebellion, were objects of his Compassion, but as for them, they were at his seet, ready to receive the Sentence he should pass upon them in farisfaction for all the others.

The Inca when he received them, was sitting in his Chair, encompassed with his Men of War, and having heard the Speech of the Curacus, commanded that they should be loosed from their bonds, and the halters taken from their necks, telling them, that he did not onely give them their Lives, but their Liberties also, and with gentle words assured them, That he came neither to deprive them of their Lives, nor of their Estates, but to doe them good, by teaching them to live according to the rules of Reason, and the Law of Nature, and that leaving their Idols, they should hencesonward adore the Sun for their onely God, by whose gratious command he had received them to pardon, and in testimony here of he did again confirm to them their Houses, Lands and Vassas, without other intent than onely to bestow savours and blessings on them, which should be proved by a long tract of experience to them and their posterity; and fo much, he said, the Sun had required him to communicate unto them, and therefore now they mi felves, and obey him, for that would be for the common good and benefit of them all: And for the better affurance of their Pardon, and evidence of the Inca's gratious Favour, he ordered that the Curacus, in behalf of all their People, thould accept the terms of Peace on their left knee; and be permitted the honour to touch his Person, that for ever after they might be acknowledged for his nour to touch his retion, that for ever and they might be action/redger for his Subjects, the which privilege was effected as a most condescending favour, be-Subjects; the which privilege was electriced as a most condending havour, because none under the degree of the Royal Bloud, or any other, without his own licence, could be admitted thereunto under a less penalty than that which is due for the offence of Sacrilege. In this manner the Inca giving testimony of his gratious and gentle mind, cleared the Curacas from all fuspicions of fear, who humtious and genue minus, cleared the curracia from an impetions of lear, who minu-bling themfelves to the Earth before him, promifed to be his faithfull Vafflist, for that having demonstrated fuch an unexemplary act of Mercy towards those that had deferved death; he did thereby give undeniable proofs of his descent from the Sun.

And now to explain the Fable in the preceding Chapter, it is faid, that the Captains of the Inea observing the boldness which the Collams every day used by their obstinate refiltence, gave orders to their Souldiers to treat them with all rigour, and subdue them with Fire and Sword, for that their bold attempts against the Inea were no longer tolerable. The Collegen making their utilal Sallies in a fierce and enraged manner, cast themselves without desence or order on the Weafierce and enraged manner, cast themselves without desence or order on the Weapons of their Eiremies, who receiving their attempt with more Martial discipline, killed the greatest part of them, and in regard the Souldiers of the Inea had untill now rather dallied than sought in earnest with them, being desirous to save their Lives, and reduce them without bloud; did at length use their best endeavours to subdue them by violence, which took such effect upon them, and with such ruine and slaughter, that the Collisons believed the Report which the Ineas made of this bargel, That their destruction was not performed by their Arms, but by the power of the Sun, who, in punishment for their obstinacy and rebellion, caused their own Weapons to be turned upon themselves; to the belief of which the graduates and supple toldient being easily personal to were further thereby adone. their own vycapons to be tained upon themselves, to the belief of which the credulous and fimple Indian being ealily perfunded, were farther thereby admonified by the Inc.u., and the Amantus, their Philotophers, how dangerous it was to fight againft the Sun, who was their God, and difobey the Inc.u., who were his Children.

CHAP. IV.

How three Provinces were reduced, and others conquered, what Colonies were planted, and the punishment of those who used Poison.

This Fable, with the great fame and applicate which the Piety and Clemency of the King had gained, was divulged through all the neighbouring Countries of Hatunpacaffa, where these things were acted, and caused so much love and admiration amongst those People, that they voluntarily submitted to the Inca, Majta Capac, whom they acknowledged to be a true Child of the Sun, and therefore came to adore and serve him; amongst which three Provinces especially were worthy of note, namely, Canquicura, Mallama and Huarina, (where afterwards that Battel was sought between Gonçalo Picarro and Diego Centeno,) being all of them ountries large in extent, rich in Cattle, and powerfull with the numbers of warlise People. These being received into grace and favour, the Inca veryiffed of warlike People. These being received into grace and favour, the lnea repassed the River towards Cosco; and from Hatun Colla sent an Army, under Command of his four Generals, towards the Western parts, ordering them, that having passed the desolate Countrey of Hatunpuna, (the borders of which Lloque Tup.tuqui had once stocked with Cattle), they should proceed towards the People on the other fide, who inhabit the Coast of the Sea of Zur, and should try all fair means to reduce them, and though they should find some so obstinate and pertinacious, as not to be prevailed with by any terms of friendly accommodation: nacious, as not to be prevailed with by any terms of friendly accommodation; yet notwithstanding that they should not presently break into open Hostility with them, being assured, that what opposition soever the barbarous people made, it would be more disadvantageous, and of loss to themselves, than their voluntary submission could prove of benefit to the Inea. With these Instructions, and great supplies of Provisions, which they daily gathered in their march, they passed the showy Mountain with the more difficulty, because they found no path to guide them, travelling for the space of at least thirty Leagues, through an unpeopled, and a most desolate Country; at length they came to the Province Cnechuna, which was well inhabited, though they lived not in Towns or Villages, but scattered over the Country, where every one was most placeful to raise him. peopled, and a most desolate Countrey; at length they came to the Province Cuchuna, which was well inhabited, though they lived not in Towns or Villages, but scattered over the Countrey, where every one was most pleased to raise his Cottage. The Natives being allarmed with the approach of this Army, built a Fortress, and retired into it with their Wives and Children; the place was so weak, that it might easily have been forced; but the Income in obedience to their King, encompassed it with their Army, and offered them conditions of Peace and Friendship; all which they refused, and for the space of above fifty days persisted in their obstinate Resolution; during which time the Incom had frequent opportunities to have destroyed them; but the orders of their King, and their former Customs and Principles of Mercy and Gentleness forbad them to make use of the advantages which offered. Howsoever at length Famine, the usual destroyer of the besieged, began to rage amongst them, having not had time to make their provisions for a Siege, which they could not imagine would have endured so long; but being much distressed by Hunger, which the Men and Women more easily suffered than their Children, were forced at length to permit the younger fort to adventure abroad, and gather the herbs of the stell for their sufference; many of them fled to the Enemy, which the Parents more willingly suffered, than to see them die with hunger before their faces. The Incom scizing those that were sent abroad, gave them to eat, with some Provisions to carry with them to their Parents, and with the same occasion offered the usual and accustomary terms of Peace and Friendship. The Indiana observing this kind treatment, and being without all expectation of Succour, resolved to commit themselves to the Mercy of their Enemies, concluding, that if they were so patiently and Pleasure: With these hopes they left their Fortress, and furnended all to the Command of the Incom; nor were they deceived in their expectations, for all kind and friendly rece perience, Garments, and other Prefents, were given to the most principal Commanders of them, in the name of the Inca; and the common fort being feasted, at leaft their present hunger satisfied, they were all dismissed, and sent to their own homes with entire contentment and affured fecurity.

The Generals after this diffeeded Intelligence to the Inea of all that had paffed, desiring that People might be sent them for planting two Colonies in that Countrey; for in regard the soil was rich and fruitfull, it was capable to maintain a considerable number of People; and that it would be requisite also to establish a Garison in those parts, both for security of the late Conquests, as also for prevention of such mischiest as may arise for the siture. The Inea accordingly sent them Women with their Children, sufficient for two Colonies, one of which they planted at the soot of the Mountain, where the Fortress was built, which they called Cuchum, after the name of the Mountain, and the other Mopuchus, which People are distant five Leagues one from the other, and the Provinces conserve still their denomination, being within the Jurisdiction of Collison. Whilst these Commanders were buffed in regulating these People, and giving orders for heir instruction in Religion and Laws, they came to understand that these Indians were notoriously skilled in the arts of posioning, which was not so deadly as to kill presently, but with time reduced the body to a languishing and macerated condition; fuch as were of fo strong a Constitution, as to resist the Poison and live; were yet rendred loathsome by botches and boils, which broke from their Bodies, and became overspread with a white Leprosie, nor did it onely affect their Bodies, but their Minds also, making them sools, or stupid, or else mad and raving; which were all pleasant effects to the revengesual adversaries, though non-thing could be more grievous and heavy to their Parents and Relations. The Captains being informed of this evil which was amongst this People, gave advice thereof unto the mea, who thereupon immediately commanded, that whosoever should be found guilty of that Crime, should be burnt alive, that no reliques or memory should remain of them. This Law of the Inca was so joysfully received by the Natives, that they themselves gave information against the Criminals, and readily with their own hands executed the Sentence, burning not onely the Offenders, but whatsoever moveables also were found in their Houses, which they demolished, and laid level with the ground: With them also they burnt their Flocks and Herds, rooted up the Trees which they had planted, and destroyed every thing that they possessed by the Natives, that they never after dust more attempt this wickedness, during the time of the Incas; though so son as the Spaniard came amongst them, they revived this evil again, which till then was out of use, and forgotten. The Captains having in this manner settled their Plantations, and reformed this abuse by the rigorous punishment of the Delinquents, they returned to Cozco, to render a more large account to the Incas of their Negotiations, who gratiously received them, and gratified their good Services with due Rewards.

CHAP. V.

The Inca gains three Provinces, and conquers after a bloudy Battel.

A Free some years Maria Capae resolved to make another sally abroad for the Conquest of new Provinces, for the Coverousness and Ambition of the Inca increased with his Dominions and Success. Wherefore having raised his Army, and supplied them with sufficient Provisions, they marched towards Pneara of Dinasping, which were the most remote, or last, People which his Grand-Father (or as some will have it) his Father had reduced. From Pneara he bended his course Eastward, to that Province which they call Lluricass where the Natives surrendred themselves without resistence, being much contented to receive the Inca for their Lord and Master. Then he proceeded to the Province called Sancavan, which submitted with the like readiness and facility; for the Fame of the Inca being now spread over all Countries, and the great Honours atchieved by the Father and Grand-Father of this Prince being the common discourse, so moved the Nations in all adjacent parts, that with unanimous consent they ran to embrace those conditions of Vasslage which the Inca should impose upon them. These two Provinces are about sifty Leagues in length, and about twenty at one place, and thirty another in breadth, and are both populous, and abounding with Cattle. The Inca having given orders for instructing the Natives in the doctrine of his Idolatrous Religion, and regulated the civil Assairs, passed forwards to the Province of Pacassairs.

down before him with fuch Obedience and Veneration, as was agreeable to one whose birth and descent was from the Sun.

This Province is part of that which we have already mentioned to have been reduced by Lloque Yupanqui, so that now by the Father and Son this Countrey, reduced by Lloque Tupanqui, to that now by the Father and Son this Countrey, which contained many People, was entirely fubjected. Hence entering upon the Royal Way of Tonafforu, they marched towards that People, which to this day is called by the name of Huayebu, where they received intelligence, that a great number of People were affembled in a Body to oppose him in his paffage, the which report rather haltened than retarded the march of the Inca in purfection of the Inca in purfe fuite of his Enemies, whom he first encountred at Huychu, where they appeared fuite of his Enemies, whom he hitt encountred at Higher, where they appeared in defence of a pafs on that River, so called, and were about thirteen or fourteen thousand in number, all of them Indians, bearing arms, and though they were of divers Nations, yet they called themselves by the common appellation of Cola. The Inc., according to his usual Method, sent frequent Messages to of Colla. The Inca, according to his utual Method, fent frequent Medlages to the Enemy, offering them terms of Peace and Friendhip, which were all rejected by them, and interpreted to be effects of fear; and thence took fuch reouragements, that they daily became more inflexible, and at length fo daring, and impudent, as to attack the very Royal Quarters of the Inca; notwithfanding which, the Inca perfifted with fuch patience in his forbearance, that his Soulding which, the Incar perfifted with fuch patience in his forbearance, that his Soulding which the Incar perfit of the Incar to Incare began to murmur, and fay, That it was no longer tolerable to permit those Barbarians to infult over the Majesty of him who was descended from the Sun, nor could their infolence bedonger supported, without losing that Reputation which they had formerly acquired.

Howfoever the Jaca endeavoured to moderate the displeasure of his People, by

they had formerly acquired.

Howfoever the Inca endeavoured to moderate the displeasure of his People, by telling them, that it had been the custome of his Ancestours, and the Command of his Father the Sun, whose design was to doe good unto the Indians, to save their Lives, and advance their wellsare, and not break immediately into War and Bloud, but rather to expect with patience, and see whether they would come to any sight or knowledge of that good which was designed for them. With such fair words as these the Inca for some days restrained the sury of his Captains from engaging with the Enemy, untill one day being importuned by his Souldiers, and moved by the infolence of his Enemies, who pressed had upon him, he gave order to put his Army in Array, and provide for a Battel.

The Incas, who greatly desired to sight, readily entred the Field, and the Enemy, who had often provoked them to an Engagement, as willingly joined, so that the Fight began, and was maintained on both sides with great heat and courage, one part (as they imagined) contending for their Liberty, resolving to submit to none, though he were of the Race and Offspring of the Sun, and the other, not supporting such insolent obstinacy towards their King, were animated to contend unto the utmost in desence of his Honour and Dignity. The Collust notwithstanding sought with great Courage and Resolution, but yet with so little Art or Discipline, that like desperate Men, they threw themselves on the Weapons of their Enemies, which occasioned great flaughter amongst them. The Battel continued the whole day, in which the Incas behaved himself like a great Captain, some time ordering and encouraging his Squadrons, and again ventual himself like a great Captain, some time ordering and encouraging his Squadrons, and again ventual himself like a great Captain, some time ordering and encouraging his Squadrons, and again ventual himself like a great captain, some time ordering and encouraging his Squadrons, and again ventual himself like a great captain. Captain, fome time ordering and encouraging his Squadrons, and again venturing his Person in the midst of his Enemies, and in both Offices deserved the merit of a good Souldier.

Royal Commentaries.

The Anaychines yield themselves, and are Gratiously receined to Pardon.

OF the Collagon (which is the common Name of these people) were killed F the Collabors (which is the common Name of thele people) were killed according to their own account, fix thousand in this Battel; the which slaughter was chiefly occasioned by their own unskilfulness; and want of art to defend themselves; when, on the other side, by reason of their Discipline in War, there perished not above five hundred: Howsever, the Battel was sought with such courage, that it ended not untill the darkness of the night separated both parties, and caused them to retire to their respective quarters: The day following the Collabors viewing the heaps of their dead, and seeling the sinart of their wounds now cold, began to droop, and lofe all their former hopes and courage, not knowing what course or resolution to take; for to overcome, and fight their way through Ing what confie or refolution to take; for to overcome, and fight their way through their Enemies, was impossible, and to escape by slight was equally as difficult, being encompassed on all sides by their Enemies; and to surrender and yield to Mercy seemed dangerous, for having already refused those advantageous Conditions which the lines had profered; and having provoked him to anger by their obstinate resistence, they seared, lest they had put themselves beyond all hopes or expectations of pardon. Howstoever, in this perplexed condition, they embraced the counsel of the most aged and wisest amongst them, which was to yield and invoke the Clemency of the Prince; for having heard the report of that Mercy which this lines, after the example of his Ancestours, had used towards all, as well towards Rebels, as to the obedient, they conceived some hopes, that they also might brow the effects of his natural compassion. Wherefore to soon as it was thight prove the effects of his natural compaffion. Wherefore to foon as it was day, they attired themselves in the most penitent and humble manner that they were able; the attires of their heads were put off, their feet bare, and no other garment on their bodies, than their Shirts; their Captains and Leaders appeared with their hands bound, and in this humble pofture they proceeded with filence to the Gates, where the Inca was quartered; and there kneeling down before him. they faid, That they came not to ask his pardon, for that they well knew, that their offence and rebellion had put them befides all hopes of obtaining it; onely they were before him to prefer themselves to the Swords of his Souldiers, that their Bloud might expiate their Rebellion, and serve for caution and example to other Nations, how they resisted or disbeyed him whose Father was the Sun.

In answer whereunto the Inva commanded one of his Captains to tell them in his Name, that his Father the Sun had not fent him on the Earth to kill or deftroy the Indians, but on the contrary had commanded him to fuccour, comfort and doe them good; and that teaching them to reform their bettial manner of life, he should instruct them in the true Religion and Worship of the Sun, who was their God: To which end, and to no other purpose (for he the Sun, who was then God: To which end, and to no other purpole (for he frood in no need of their fervice) he travelled from Countrey to Countrey, that he might publish these Laws and Ordinances of rational Government amongst them, which he had received from his Father the Sun: And as the pious Off-spring of such a Father, he received them to pardon, though their Rebellion deserved punishment, of which his intercellion on their behalf with his Father the Sun, had procured a release; conditionally, that for the surure they should reform their Manners, and obey the Sun, under whole Laws and Protection they might expect all blessing of two services of the surgiciar order most. all bleffings of prosperity and repose. With this answer he commanded that they should be cloathed, and care taken of the wounded, and all of them feasted and refreshed with provisions; and with such entertainment dismissing them to their own homes, they acknowledged that Rebellion was the cause of all their mischief, and that Submission and Obedience was by the Clemency of the Inca their onely remedy.

BOOK III.

How many other People were reduced; and in what manner the Inca made a Bridge of Ofiers.

THE News of this bloudy battel was foon spread over all the Neighbouring Countries, and every-where interpreted as a just judgment tent from the Sun on the Indians, who had refused his beneficial conditions, and disobeyed the Inca; on the mann, who had returned his beneficial conditions, and another the man, on which apprehension many of those people, who had taken up Arms, and formed their Camp with intent to oppose the mea, did now lay aside their thoughts of War, resolving to submit and depend on the Clemency of the Mea, who accor-Way, relolving to lubmit and depend on the Clemency of the Meas, Who accordingly received them with grace and favour, prefenting them with Vefts, and other gifts, with which the Indians remained greatly fatisfied, and in every place published the Incas to be the true and undoubted off-fpring of the Sun,

The people which were thus reduced, were the Inhabitants from Huspehn to Callamara, which is thirty Leagues to the Southward. Hence the Inca proceeded from Callamara, twenty four Leagues farther, by the high-way of Charcas to Caracollo, Summoning all the Natives to his fervice both on one hand, and the other as far as to the Lake of Paria; thence taking a compass to the Eastward as far as Antis, he came at length to that Vally, which to this day is called Chiquiam, which in the common tongue is as much as to lay, the principal or chief Lance; in which division he planted several Colonies, because he had observed, that those nn which divinion he planted reveral Colonies, becaute he had observed, that those Valleys being fruitfull and warm, were a better Soil for producing Mayz (or Indian Wheat) than any of those Provinces within the Precincts of Colla. From the Vale of Caracatu he continued his March Eastward, to the skirts of the great Snowy Mountain of Ania, which is above thirty Leagues distant from the Royal way of Umasuyu.

In these Marches, and in the employment he had of settling Colonies, and conflituting Laws and Government in his new Conquests, the Inca spent three years, and then returned again to Cozco, where he was received with expressions of joy and acclamation. And having there reposed two or three years more, he comand accumation. And having inter-tended two or time years most promanded, that preparations should be made against the next Spring, both of Men and Provisions, for a new Conquest; for his active mind not suffering him to sit idle, moved him to enterprize something in the Countrey of Consistent, which is to the West of Cozeo, containing many great and large Countries under it: And because they were to pass the River called Apurimae, he commanded a Bridge to be made for transporting his Army; for framing of which, because it was a thing as yet new and unknown, he consulted with the most ingenious Indians in the contrivance; and because it was the first Bridge of Osiers that was ever made in Pern, I shall describe the manner how it was made; not agreeing with the Writers of Pern, who tell us Stories of Bridges made of Feathers, but omit to declare the manner and fashion of them.

In making this Bridge they twifted, or weaved, great quantities of Ofiers together, which are not of the fame fort which we have in Spain, but of a more fine and pliable Sprig: Of three Ofiers they made one Twift for the length, and another for the breadth which the Bridge was to be; to thefe Twifts of three Ofiers, they added another of nine, and weaved three of thefe together, fo that it came to be twenty feven Ofiers in thickness; and fo they went on Weaving in this manner, till it came to be as thick as a Man's body, and of this fort they made for the specific projects.

Having thus prepared their Bridge, some Indians either swam or serried themselves over on a Float to the other side, carrying with them the end of a small Cord, which was faltned to a Baffe-rope, made of Ruthes, called by the Indians Chahuar; this Rope or Gord was tied to the end of one of the twined or matted pieces, and by the force of many hands they drew it over to the other fide of the River, as are also the other four; all which they strained very hard, by help of the Rocks on the other fide; and where they found not the convenience of Rocks. there they drove in Stakes, or cut into Quarries of Stone, as strong and stable as there diev drove in Stakes, or cut into Quarries of Stone, as throng and thable as the Rock it felf. The Bridge of Aparimac, which is now in the King's High-way of Cozco, is fixed on one fide to a living Rock, and on the other fide to a Pillar hewed out of a Quarry. These thores or supports of the Bridge are made with great holes and trunnels, through which the Ropes pass; and for strengthing them the better, they are fortified with Walls on each fide; through this hollowness of the Rock five or fix Beams are crossed from one Wall to the other, and placed one above the other, like the steps of a Ladder; on each of these ther, and placed one above the other, met the treps of a Ladder; on each of there Beams they give a turn of the Rope belonging to the feveral pieces, which are Matted with Ofiers, and strain them as hard as by a Capstone, so that the Bridge may not fink with its own weight: Howsover, this Bridge is not so tight, but that it finks in the middle, whereby those who pass it descend at first, and afterwards mount again, untill they come to the end, so that it remains in the fashion of a Bow; nor is it so firm, but that it shakes as often as the Wind blows harder than ordinary.

Royal Commentaries.

Three of these thick matted pieces were laid one on the other for the sloor and foundation of the Bridge, and the other two ferved for the Rails or Walls on each fide: the floor they covered with thin Boards, which they laid croßways, fo that the length of the Board took the whole breadth of the Bridge, being about two Yards: the Boards ferved to strengthen the matted pieces, and ing about two Yards: thele Boards ferved to ftrengthen the matted pieces, and keep them from being fuddenly worn out; and also they were crossed with Rims or Ledges of Wood, which served to keep the seet of the Beats, which passed from slipping: the Rails or Walls of the Bridge were greatly fortisted with thin Boards, close tied to the matted pieces, which served to strengthen it in that manner, that both Man and Beats might pass securely over it. This Bridge of Apurimac, which is the most considerable of any, is about two hundred paces in length. For my own part, I cannot say that I ever measured it, but that discoursing thereof with some in Spain, they affured me that the length was rather more than less, and that several Spaniards had passed in horse-back, and some of them running, which thems perhaps more rashues than jurience, and less with the running, which flews perhaps more raffiness than prudence, and less wit than fear. This great Machine, which is begun onely with a Twift of three Oliers, tear. This great Machine, which is begun onely with a Twift of three Oliers, is at length brought to a mighty and flupendious work, and is more curious and wonderfull than I have been able to describe; the usefulness of it hath proved so great, that it hath been untill these days kept in repair at the publick charge, and not suffered to fall to decay like other greater Machines which the Spaniards sound in that Countrey. In the times of the Incus those Bridges were yearly repaired by the Neighbouring Provinces, which were appointed to provide the Materials, and pay the Workmen according to a Tax laid on them respectively, and proportioned to their nearness and ability; which also is in use to this day.

CHAP. VIII.

The Renown and Fame of this Bridge is the cause that many Nations Submit themselves.

THE Inca being informed that the Bridge was finished, commanded his Ar-my to meet at their rendezvous; which confishing of twelve thousand able Souldiers, under the Command of experienced Officers, he marched towards the Bridge, which he found well guarded against any attempt the Enemy could make to burn it: But instead thereof, the Indians of Peru, who to the very time that the Spaniards invaded them, were fo fimple as to admire any new invention, did K now fland aftonished at the fight of this wonderfull Fabrick, and needed no other testimony and evidence to prove the Inca's descent from the Sun, than than prodigious and mysterious work, which (as they thought) nothing less than a Divine Power and Wifedom could prefent before their eyes. Such apprehending the state of the Spaniards, when they saw them sighting on sierce creatures, fuch as their Horses appeared to them, and to kill their Enemies at a distance of nucn as their fromes appeared to them, and to kin their enemies at a diltance of two or three hundred paces with Fire-arms, which they called Thunder and Lightning; and with the fame ignorant Spirit of admiration are they fill affected, as often as they behold any new invention not known to them before; as Mills to grind Corn, Oxen to Plow, and Bridges of Stone crecked in Rivers with Arches, which they fanfie to be placed and poised in the Air; and with altonishment of these and other things, they break out, and say, worthy are the Spaniards to be Masters of the Indians. And in the time of Masta Capac, the Indians being yet more simple than in these days, might well be strook with such admiration at the fight of this Bridge, that many Neighbouring Provinces needed no other argument than this to perfuade them to receive the Inca; one of which people was gument than this to perfuade them to receive the Inca; one of which people was called Champivillea, fituated in the Division of Contiguy, containing about twenty Leagues in length, and ten in breadth; all which received him as a person of high degree and merit, both for the greatness of his Birth, being descended from the Sun, and for the stupendious work which he had framed, and which none but a Divine Wisedom could contrive and accomplish, onely a fort of people alled Pillili made some weak resistence; for having encompassed a small sortess at the dread of the approach of the Enemy, they all crouded into it; but the Inca begitting them round, and sending his usual Summons, and gratious roundings. of Peace; in the space of twelve or thirteen days they all surrendred, and were of Peace; in the space of twelve or thirteen days they all surrendred, and were received to grace and pardon; and having settled this Province in a peaceable condition, he crossed the desolate part of Consispus, containing about fixteen Leagues, where he came to a Moor or Marish ground, of about three Leagues broad, which hindred the passage of his Army. Here the Inea commanded a Cawse-way to be made of great and small Stones, which they filled up with Earth, and covered with Turf: And for better expedition and encouragement of the transfer of the tran his people, the Inca himfelf worked, helping to raile and lay the greatest Stones; which to animated the Souldiers to labour, that in a few days they finished the Cawfe way, which was fix Yards broad, and two Yards thick; and i hich the Indians, even to these times, have in so great veneration; both because part of it was the proper handy-work of the luca, as also for the convenience and benefit was the proper handy-work of the bica, as allo for the convenience and benefit of it, whereby the way is made florter, when formerly with much labour and travel they were forced to take a large compass to avoid the Moorish Countrey: And for this reason they keep it still in good repair, so that scarce a Stone decays, or finks from it, but another is put into its place by the care and industry of the Surveyors, who are appointed, thereunto by the bordering people, who having severally their distinct divisions and parcels allotted to them, do endeavour strains the distinct of the convenience of the convenience and source. to out-vy each the other in confervation of that common benefit and convenience: the like rule is observed for maintenance of all other publick Works, fuch as Bridges and Royal Palaces, Fortresses, and the like. In making the Cawseway, the Turf they laid upon it was of great use; for it did not onely make the way fmooth, foft and easie, but also the Roots of the Grass extending themselves within the Stones, did greatly bind, and keep all close together.

CHAP. IX.

The Inca gains many other great Provinces, and dies in Peace.

THE Causeway being in this manner finished, the Inca, Maria Capac, vassed over it to the Province called Allca, and here he encountred the Indians of that Countrey in a warlike pofture, who being encouraged by the advantage of the pass, which they designed to defend, being such as was asperous, craggy, and horrid to behold, and even such as was difficult to Passengers to travell over, how much more must it be, when guarded and defended by armed Men; and yet such was the prudence and good conduct of the Inca, and his Military Art and Prowes, was the pluchee and good conduct of the ma, and his Military Art and Prowers, that though People were killed both on one fide and the other, that ftill he gained ground and advantage on the Enemy, which they with great admiration observing, did unanimously conclude, that the Inca was of the true Offspring of the Sun, and therefore was invincible, and on this vain belief with common confent refolved to submit, and accordingly received him as their Lord and King, promifing him all Loyalty and Obedience.

The Inca passing in a triumphant manner through this People, called Allca, pro-The heap patting in a trium hant manner through this People, called Alla, proceeded farther to other greater Provinces, whole Names are Taurifina, Cotahuaci, Punnatampu, Parihmuna Cocha, which fignifies the Lake of * Pinguins; for in the part Bird in that Countrey which remains unpeopled, there is a great Lake, which the haliant Bird in that in their Language call Cocha, or the Sea, as they do all great Waters; and Purihuanis that fort of Bird, which abounding in that Province, gives the denomination to it, and is a Countrey rich, fertile and pleafant, and where great quantities of Cold aries, the Country by correction will be provided by the Country. Gold arise, the Spaniards, by contraction, call it Parina cocha. Pumatampu signifies a Den of Lions, Puma is a Lion, and Tampu a Den, because it is a Countrey where many Lions are found.

BOOK III.

From Parihuina Cocha the Inca marched forward, and croffed the defolate Countrey of Coropuna, where is to be seen a most lofty and beautiful Pyramid of Snow, which the Indians most properly call Hunca, which amongst many other apt significations hath this of wonderfull; and indeed it seemed so great to the simplicity of the ancient Indians, that they adored and worshipped it for its Beauty and Eminence. Thence the Inca proceeded to the Province called Arani, which runs along as far as to the Vale of Arequepa, which, as Blas Valera affirms, fignifies a founding Trumpet.

All these Provinces and Nations Mayta Capac added to his Empire, with much ease to himself, and gentleness towards those he subdued; for they having generally heard of the difficulties the Inca had overcome, and the passages he forced generally neared of the difficulties the mea had overcome, and the panages he forced through inacceffible places, could not imagine, that fuch Actions as these were possible to be performed by any other than one of Divine Extraction, and descended from the Sun, by which opinion they chearfully submitted, and became proud of their subjection: In every of which Provinces he continued so long as was required, for the settlement of Affairs, and peace of the Government; and finding the state of the continued so the settlement of the that the Vale of Arequepa, was defolate, and without inhabitants, notwithstanding that it was a most fruitfull situation, and an Air pure, and serene, he therefore resolved to cause the Inhabitants of other parts less agreeable, which he had conquered to came the innabrants or other parts lets agreeable, which he had conquered to transplant themselves to this more commodious and happy soil; and such effect had his persuasions on the people, allured by the pleasures of that Climate, and the commodiousness of the Habitation, that not onely some Colonies of the conquered Countries, but also several of the natural Subjects of the Incatant pleasant Valley, which became the Original of sour or five distinct Nations, one of which is called Chimate and another Security and Development and Source of the Property of the Incatant Valley, which became the Original of Sour or five distinct Nations, one of which is called Chimate and another Security and Development Source of the Property of th of which is called Chimpa, and another Sucabusas. And having supplied all places with Governours, and necessary Officers, the Inca returned to Cosco, having in this fecond expedition spent three years time; during which, and the former invasion, he made an addition to his Empire, in the Division of Contigura onely, of almost ninety Leagues in length, and ten or twelve in breadth one way, and fifteen another way; all which tract of Land was contiguous, or adjoining to the other parts subjected to his power. The Inca returning home, was received at Cocco, with all the Festivity, Joy and Triumph imaginable, and mer with Songs and Musick, chanting out the praises of his mighty and heroick Actions. The Inca having rewarded his Souldiers with Presents agreeable to their merit, disbanded having rewarded his Souldiers with Pretents agreeable to their merit, disbanded his Army, it feeming sufficient for the present time the atchievements already made; and that now it was seasonable to give rest and repose from military actions, and attend to the Execution of the Laws, and to the Government of his Kingdom, a great part of which he considered to be the care of making provisions for Widows and Orphans, and other poor and disabled People; in which good works he passed all the remainder of his days; his Reign having continued for thirty Years, as is faid, but the truth is, there is so little credit to be given to Rethirty Years, as is faid, but the truth is, there is to little credit to be given to Reports of this nature, where are no Registers, or Letters, that we know not what to believe in the Case; onely this is certain, that he dyed full of Honour, and Trophies, having acquired a great name, both in War and Peace; and being much beloved and honoured. His Death was lamented with fincer grief by all, which, according to the Custome of the heast, continued for the space of a full Year. His Eldest Son, Capac Tupanqui, born of his Wise Manna Cuca, he less this Universal Heir of all, besides whom also he less other Sons, and Daughters as well, such as were legitimate, as fuch as were termed illegitimate.

Capac Yupangui, the fifth Monarch, reduces many Provinces in the Division of Contisuvu.

THE Inca, Capac Tupanqui, (the interpretation of whole Name we have already declared amongst the proper Names of his Ancestors) after the death of his Father, bound his Head with the coloured Wreath, in token of his entrance into the possession of his patrimonial Inheritance, and having performed the Obflequies of his Father's Interment, he immediately took a Journey through all parts of his Dominions, making enquiry into the Behaviour and Lives of his Officers, and in what manner Juffice was administred amongst them. In this Progress he and in what manner Justice was administred amongst them. In this Progreß he passed two years, and then returned to Coeco, where he commanded that Souldiers should be levied, and Provisions made for the following Year, intending to extend his Conquests into those parts of Contisur, which lie Eastward from Coeco, where he was informed, that there were many and great Provinces, and abounding with People. For the more easie passes to those parts he ordered another bridge to be made over the great River of Apurimac, at that place which is called Huacachaca, below Accha, which was accordingly performed with all diligence, surpassing the former bridge in length and breadth, because the River was wider in those

In this manner the Inca departed from Cozco, attended with twenty thousand Men of War, and being come to the bridge, which was about eight Leagues Men ot War, and being come to the bridge, which was about eight Leagues from the City, through a rough and afperous way, three Leagues of which are a freep descent to the River, though in height it may not be perpendicular above half a League, and the ascent on the other side may likewise contain about three Leagues sarther. Having passed and this difficult way, they entred into the pleasant Country of Tanaharaa, which at that time contained thirty Nations, what those People were then, and how numerous, we have no certain account, onely we are affired, that the Inhabitants on that side, called Piii, so soon as they heard of the approach of the Inea, came forth to meet him, both Men and as they heard of the approach of the Inea, came forth to meet him, both Men and Women, old and young, and with Songs and Mulick, Acclamations, and all things that might tellifie their Joy, they received him for their King, vowing all Obedience and Vassalage to his Person. The Inea on the other side received them with a gratious Eye, bestowing on them such Vests, or Garments, as were in the mode and sashion of his Court: Of this kind treatment the Pits sent advice to their Neighbours, being of the same Nation with them of Tandhuara, signing them to understand that the Inea had taken up his aboad amongst them, and that they had received him for their Lord and Master, according to which example of the Pitis, the Curacas of divers Nations came likewife in and submitted them-

The Inca received them all with his accustomed goodness, and as an evidence of his greater favour, he was defirous to shew himself to his People, and visit their Countrey, which contained about twenty Leagues in length, and about fifteen in breadth. From this Province of Yanahuara, he passed into another, called Armara, between which two there is a foace of ground wholly defolate and an appeared of about fifteen Leagues over. On the other fide of this defart, a great number of People were gathered into a body within a certain inclosed ground called Mucanfa, to ftop the paffage of the luca, and entrance into their Countrey, which contains thirty Leagues in length, and fifteen in breadth, and is rich in Mines of Gold, Silver and Lead, and abounds in Cattle and People, and conflitted of at least eighty Nations, before they were reduced to the Obedience of the Inca.

At the Foot of this Inclosure the Inca commanded his Army to encamp, fo as to cut the Enemy off from all supplies, who being barbarous, and ignorant of War, had dispeopled all the Countrey, and gathered them into one body, not considering that by this means they were cooped up on all sides, and hemmed in, as it were in a Cage. The lnea continued feveral days in this manner, with an unwillingness to attack them, inviting them to submission with all fair terms and unwillingnels to attack them, inviting them to submission with all fair terms and proposals of Peace, and offering no other violence to them than to hinder them from provisions and sustenance; that so what Reason and Argument could not effect, Famine and Hunger might enforce. In this resolute condition the Indians remained for the space of a whole month, untill being constrained by the necessities of Famine, they sent Messensers to the Inca, giving him to understand, that they were ready to receive him for their King, and adore him, as the true Offspring of the Sun, conditionally, that he, on the Faith and Word of his Divine Progeny, promise, that so soon as they shall have yielded themselves to him, he will conquer and subject under his Imperial Command the neighbouring Province of Umassers, which being a numerous and walke People living upon Region and proposed themselves. of Umasuyu, which being a numerous and warlike People living upon Rapine and Spoil, did make frequent incursions to the very doors of their Houses, eating up spoil, did make requent incurions to the very doors of their Houles, eating up their provisions and paffures, and committing many other mischiefs and outrages; for which injuries they had often made War upon them, which ended in bloud and confusion on the one side and the other; and when at length Peace was made, and terms of accommodation agreed on, they suddenly broke out again into new violences, not considering the Faith and Promises they had given: Wherestone is pleased to avenge them of these Enemies, and restrain their incursions on them for the summer they would wised and adequated him for their program of their states. the future, they would yield, and acknowledge him for their Prince and Lord.

To this Proposal the Inca made answer by one of his Captains, That the design of his coming into those parts had no other aim than to relieve the oppreffed, and reclaim the barbarous Nations from that bestial manner of living, whereto they were accultomed, and that he might inftruct them in the Laws of Reason and Morality, which he had received from his Father the Sun; but as to the avenging them of their Enemies for the injulice and injuries they had done them, it was the Office and Duty of the Inca to perform; howfoever it became not them to impose conditions on the Inca, who was their Lord and Sovereign, and was to give rather than receive terms, and therefore that they should refer all their grie-vances to his Wifedom, who inheriting the justice of the Sun, his Father, was inclinable of himself to redress their Oppressions, and reduce their Enemies to terms of Reason and Justice.

With this Answer the Ambassadours returned; and the day following all the Indians that were retired within the inclosure to the number of above twelve thouand fighting men, with their Wives and Children to about thirty thousand souls, came forth, and in feveral Divisions presented themselves on their knees before the Inca, professed themselves to be his Slaves and Vassals, and in testimony thereof offered unto him Gold, and Silver, and Lead, and whatsoever else was the product of their Countrey. The Inca receiving them with his accustomed Goodness, ordered that meat should be given them to satisfie their present hunger; and likewise provisions for their journey, that so they might all return to their respective Habitations lest they should faint by the way, and want due refreshment and care in their Travel.

CHAP. XI.

The Conquest of those of Aymara: The Curacas are received to Pardon: Marks are set up for boundaries on the Consines.

THese People being sent home to their respective dwellings, the Inca proceeded to another rate of the first sent the first sent to their respective dwellings, the Inca proceeded to another rate of the first sent to their respective dwellings, the Inca proceeded to another rate of the first sent to their respective dwellings, the Inca proceeded to the first sent to their respective dwellings. ded to another part of the same Province of Aymara, called Huaquirea, which even to this day contains two thousand Families; from thence he dispatchwhich even to this day contains two thousand Families; from thence he dispatched Messengers to summon the Caciques, or Lords of Umasym to appear before him; for that being descended from the Sun, he claimed it as his Prerogative, to hear and decide the differences between them and their Neighbours of Amara, about the pasturage, and places where they seed their Cattle: and that residing now in Huaquirca he expected their coming thither, so that he might impose Laws and Rules of Reason on them, whereby to measure their actions, that they might not like brute Beasts destroy one the other, for causes of so similar import or moment, as that of pasturage, since it was evident that the Countrey was large, and the grounds abounding with Grass, sufficient to feed the Flocks both of one and the other People. The Curracus, or Chiefs of Umasym, being assembled together to consult of this common concernment, gave this general answer, That they had no business with the Inca, so as to oblige them to repair to his place of Residence, but if he had any occasions for them, that he should seek them within their own Territories, where they were ready to attend and receive him with Arms in their but if he had any occasions for them, that he should seek them within their own Territories, where they were ready to attend and receive him with Arms in their hands, whether the Sun were his Father, or not, they did neither know nor care, and if he were, yet the Sun was no God of theirs, for they had natural Gods of their own, whose Protection and goodness they had so well proved, as not to change them for any other: That the Inca might below his Laws and Ordinance on his own Subjects, for that they would accept of none which restrained them from a liberty of taking that, to which their Arms and Power gave them a right and title; and by the same Arms they would defend themselves and their Countrey against any who should dare to disturb them in their Peace and enjoyment. This, they said, was all the answer that they would give, and that in case the This, they faid, was all the answer that they would give, and that in case the Inca required any other, he should appear in the field, and decide the controverse Inca required any other, he should appear in the field, and decide the controversie like a valiant Souldier. The Inca, Capac Tupanyan, entering into consultation with his principal Officers, upon this answer of those of Tupasyan, agreed and concluded, that the success of this War depended on dispatch, and therefore that they should without delay make an attempt upon them, the suddenness of which would fo distract and confound them, that the surprise and the treal hurt, would affright them into submission; for that it being a Law and Maxime of the first Inca, Massoc Gupac, and from him derived to all his Royal Posterity to spare the bloud of the Indians, and gain them by all arts and contrivance of Gentleness and Invitation; and that War and Force were to be the last remedies: In consideration of which, Capac Tupanyani thought fit to make use of this Strategeme, commanding eight thousand select Men of his Army to march day and and night into the Province of Umafigu, so that by the speedines of their march they might surprise the Enemy, who did not expect the motion of so great a body in less than the space of a whole month; but seeing them already in the midst of their Countrey with a slying Army, and the groß Body on their march towards them, and considering that it was impossible for them to assemble so soon together, as to make a head sufficient to result; began to repent of their pertinacious answer.

Royal Commentaries.

them, and confidering that it was impossible for them to assemble to soon together, as to make a head sufficient to resist, began to repent of their pertinacious answer; and now laying asset the thoughts of War, the Curacas with speed and haste assembled together from all parts, resolving that the onely expedient in that exigency was to ask pardon, and mercy for their late offence; so that one after the other, as they chanced to come in, prostrated themselves before the suca, acknowledging him for a true Child of the Sun, and as such they sover and vowed unto him all Faithfulness and Obedience.

The bica, contrary to the expectation of the Curacas, who expected nothing less than death, or punishment, received them with a grations Clemency; telling them by one of his Captains, that when he considered their Barbarity, and that they were wholly ignorant of all kind of Morality, he did not admire at their refusal to accept his Religion, and the lenity of his government, being affured that when they shall have once learned and proved those things which conduce to humane Life, they will bless the hour in which they were persuaded to forstake chose their Idols, which were formed in the similitude of Beasts, and vile Creatures, and capable of nothing but contempt; wherefore now he commanded them, that in every thing they should resign themselves with implicite Faith, and entire Obedience to the Religion, Laws and Government which the bica and his Ministers should impose upon them, for such was the pleasure of the Sun his Father.

dence to the Religion, Laws and Government which the Inea and his Ministers should impose upon them, for such was the pleasure of the Sun his Father.

The Corraeas with most prosound humility answered. That they did promise and vow to acknowledge no other God than the Sun, nor no other King than the Inea, whose Laws and Ordinances being sounded on Reason and Justice, were the best Rules whereby to make his Subjects happy. The Inea, in favour and honour to these his new Subjects, settled his Court for a while in the Province of Chirirqui, which is the chief and capital Seat of this People; at which place informing himself of the situation and position of their pasturages; and of the Causes and Original of the differences arising between these People and their Neighbours, did after mature consideration determine where the confines of each Countrey should be limitted; and in testimony thereof caused heaps of Stones to be thrown up at such places, where he thought fit, to remain for Boundaries and Marks to distinguish the Lands of one People from the other; the which Land-marks are to this day conserved, and continued in great Veneration, because they were the first of that Nature, which had been raised in Peru by order of the Inea.

The Curaeas of both Provinces being entirely fatisfied with this Sentence and Determination of the Ineas, with profound humility kilfed his Hands, and returned to their respective abodes, whilft the Inea in the mean time visited at his leis fure the chief places of both these Provinces, that so he might settle his Government, and establish his Laws amongst them, after which not judging it fit to proceed farther in his Conquests, though his Prosperity and Success was greatly inviting, he returned back again to Cozeo, where he entred in this triumphant manner into his Imperial City. First the Curaeas and Nobles of the two late reduced Provinces, who came out of curiosity to see the Imperial Seat, carried the Ineas on their Shoulders in a Chair of Gold, in token of their servitude and subjection, the Souldiers marched before in their military order, their Captains, and Chiefs followed immediately after the Chair; every Squadron keeping its due order, according to its degree of precedency, the which was allotted them according to their Seniority, the new Conquests giving place to the more ancient subjects: and thus the triumph being ranked in this order, the whole City concurred to the solemnity, going forth according to their usual manner, to meet and receive their Ineas with Mussick, and Songs, and all Festivity.

The Inca fends to Conquer the Quechuas, who with great willingnels lubmit themselves.

THE Inca having for four years attended onely to the administration of his Government, and the benefit of his Subjects, thought it not fit to spend more time in quietness and ease, lest his Souldiers living in peace and repose, should grow refty and luxurious, and forgetfull of their Military Discipline; wherefore he commanded, that the Souldiery should be in a readiness, and Provisions made for War against the following year.

And now the time of entring into the Field being come, he appointed his Brother Augus Titu for his Captain-General and four other Incas of his nearest relations, who were well practifed in the affairs both of War and Peace, to be Maior-Generals, every one of which had an equal share of 5000 Men committed to his charge, and all five of them in joint commission commanded the Army: The nis charge, and an inve or them in joint communion commanded the Array: The defign was to carry on that Conqueft which they had already begun in the Division of Contifurn; and for a good beginning and omen to their future proceedings, the Inca was pleafed in perfon to accompany them as far as to the Bridge of Huacachaca; where having recommended to them the example of his Ancestours as the control of the College of Children and the control of the College of Children and the control of the College the pattern for them to follow, he returned again to his City of Cozco.

The General, with his other Commanders, entred into the Province called Cotapampa, where they were met by the Lord thereof, accompanied with one of his Kinfinen, who likewife commanded another Countrey called Cotanera, and both of them Natives of Queebna. The Cariques having intelligence that the Incahad fent an Army into their Countrey, affembled together, and unanimously refolved to receive him, as their King and Lord, with all readiness; for having many days expected and defired his coming, they all upon news of his approach went forth with Songs and Dances to meet the Inca, Anqui Titu, making great demonstrations of joy and contentment, one of them in behalf of all the rest, expressing himself in this manner: Inca Apu, (which signifies General) thou art welcome, because thou art here to give the a new Being, and a new Title of being Servants and Subjects to that great Prince, who derives his Pedigree from the Sun: And because that thou art his Brother, we honour and adore thee; giving thee to understand, that hadst thou not come in a short space to have reduced us to this Service of the Inca, we were all resolved to 90 the next year unto COZCO, there to have owned and acknowledged our selves for Servants of your King, befeeching him to receive us under his mighty defence and protection; for the fame of those great atchievements and miraculous actions performed by this Off spring of the Sun both in War and Peace, have affected su with fuch wonder and love towards him, that every day scems a year, untill we enjoy the bonour and privilege of being his Subjects: And indeed hereby we promise our selves the happiness of being delivered from the Tyrannies and Cruelties with which our Neighbours of Chanca and Hancohualla have for many years from the times of our Ancestours and Foresathers most grievously vexed and oppressed is; and fo if thou wilt receive us under thy protection, our defires will be fulfilled, and our happinels confummated, and may thy Father the Sun evermore defend and preferve thee. Having faid these things, they made their Obeisance to the Inca and his Generals, delivering a great quantity of Gold to be fent as a prefent to the lnea their Sovereign. This Province of Compampa, after the War of Gonçalo Piçarro, was the portion allotted to Don Pedro Luss de Cubrert, a Native of Seville, and the Province Gonera, and another called Humanipalipa, of which we thall have occasion hereafter to speak, was the possession of my Master Garciasso de la Fega, and was the fectord Dividend which was made in Peru; and of the first we shall speak in its due place. In answer hercunto the General Aqui Tiu, and his Captains, replied in the name of the Inca; that both their defires and affectionate expressions towards them were very acceptable, and to obliging, that they promifed to recount every fyllable of them to the Majesty of their Inca, who, no doubt, but would remain so sensible of their good will, that he would not omit to make surable returns in the same, if not in a higher degree, than he had towards others. autable returns in the table, it has a major tagger, that he are work should have the honoir to reach the Ears of the hoas, and therefore every day gave new testimonies of their affection, by their readiness to execute what Commands soever the Captains imposed upon them. And having left in this place such instructions as were convenient for the orderly government thereof; they proceeded to another Province called Huamampallpa, which yielded it felf without any contradiction or opposition whatfoever. Thence the Incas passed a River which divides the two Provinces by two or three streams, which afterwards a little lower falling in together, make that famous River of Amancas.

that tamous kiver of Amancay.

One of those streams passes thorough Chiquiinea, where the Battel was sought between Francisco Hernandez Giron, and the Mareschal Don Alonso de Alvarado; and some years bestere, on the very same place, a Battel was sought between Don Diego de Almagro, and the said Mareschal; in both which Don Alonso de Alvarado was overthrown, as we shall recount in its due place, if God gives us life to arrive so far in this History. Thus the Incas continued their progress in reducing the Countries both on one fide and the other of this River Amancas; which though they be many in number, yet they are all contained under the common appellation of Quechna, which abounds with Gold and Cattel.

CHAP. XIII.

Many Plains and Vallies by the Sea-coast are reduced, and the Sin of Sodomy punished.

Such Orders being given and eftablished as were requisite for the better government and administration of affairs in the conquered places, they proceeded into the desolate Countrey of Huallaripa, which is a defart much famed for the great quantities of Gold extracted thence, and where much more remains to be ftill digged; and having croffed one fide of the defart for about 35 Leagues, they descended into those Plains which run along by the Sea-coast: All this Countrey by the Sea-coast, the Indians call Tunca, which is as much as to say, the Hot Countrey, under which name are comprehended all the Vallies which border on the Sea; and the Spaniards call the Low grounds Vallies, which are watered by the ftreams that fall from the Mountains; for in that Countrey, that part is onely habitable which lyes towards the Sea; all the reft being dry, is nothing but dead and barren Sands, where grows neither Graß, nor Herb, nor any thing for the fustenance of Mankind.

On that fide, by which the Incas passed into those Plains, lyes the Vale of Hacari, which is wide, rich and well peopled, and which in times past contained 20000 Indians; all which with much willingness submitted to the obedience and fervice of the Inca. This Vale of Hacari led them into other Vales called Vuinna, Camana, Caravilli, Pitta, Quellea, and others, which run for the space of 70 Leagues North and South along the Coast of the Sea of Zur: All which Vales here named, are each above 20 Leagues long from the defart to the Sea, and all watered by streams on one fide and the other; some of which are so full and plentifull, that after they have supplied the Lands with sufficient moilture, the remainder empties it felf into the Sea 3 and others perhaps having refreshed the Lands for two or three Leagues from their Source or Fountain-head, are afterwards absorpt, or drank up by the drines of the Earth. The General Aqui Tiu, and his Captains, having reduced all these Vallies to obedience without fighting one stroke L. rendred rendred an account to the Inca of their success; and particularly, that having made enquiry into the fecret customs of those Natives, and into their Rites and Ceremonies, as also what Gods they worshipped: They observed and found, that their monies, as also what Goos they wornipped: They observed and sound, that their chief Deity was the Fish which they killed and eat; and also, that there were Sodomites amongst them; but howsoever, that this wickedness was not general or common to all the Vallies, but to some few; nor was it openly practifed, but in secret, being that which nature and the light of humane reason did abhor. They farther likewise acquainted the mea, that being arrived to the utmost bounds which are terminated by the Sea, there remained on that fide no other Land to fubdue. The Inca was much pleafed with the Relation of these Conquests, and much more, that it had coft no bloud; wherefore he fent to Command his Souldiers, that having left and established such Orders as were necessary for the government and security of those Countries, they should return to Corco; but first, that they should make strict inquisition concerning those who were esteemed guilty of that unnatural sin of Sodomy, and not onely burn those alive in a publick place, who were evidently convicted of that crime, but even those who were but so much as suspected thereof; that they should also burn and destroy their Houses, their Trees and Inheritance, leaving them a sad spectacle to their neighbours and acquaintance. And farther, the Inca commanded that they should proclaim and publish this his Edict against Sodomy for the suture to be, That whosoever should be found guilty of this abomination, that not onely he should be destroyed in particular, but likewise his Relations, his Neighbours, and all the Inhabitants of the parts round should be purished with the same destruction, ruine and desolation.

All which being performed exactly according to the pleasure and direction of that it had cost no bloud; wherefore he sent to Command his Souldiers, that ha-round should be punished with the tame destruction, ruine and desolation. All which being performed exactly according to the pleasure and direction of the beat, this new Law was with great admiration and association as the Natives put into execution on the Ossendours; for being a crime so shamefull and detestable to the beat, and his proper Subjects, the mention and name thereof was not without some abhorrence taken into their mouths; so that if any bodian, who was a Native of Cocco, should at any time in passion revile his neighbour with that word and opprobrious term, he was presently looked upon as one defiled, and for many days polluted, untill his mouth were cleansed from a word so filthy and detestable.

The General and his Officers having in this manner executed all the Com-The General and his Officers naving in this manner executed all the Commands of the Inca, they returned to Cozco, where they were received in great triumph, and rewarded with honours and favours agreeable to their merit. But many years had not paffed after these Conquests, before the Inca, Capac Tipanqui, resolved to begin a new Expedition in person for enlargement of his Dominions on the side of Collasging; (for as yet in his late Marches he had not passed the Divisions of Comission) to these in order beginning to compare the triumphy they visions of Contifusu) so that in order hereunto, he commanded that twenty thouvilions of Contiferal) to that in order hereunto, he commanded that twenty thou-fand felect men should be put in a readiness against the following year. And that in the mean time nothing should be omitted, which might contribute to the due administration of his Government, he appointed his Brother Agai Titu to re-main Deputy in his place, and that the four Major-Generals which had accompa-nied him in the last Wars should be his Counsellours. Into their places he chose four other Generals, and both they and all the Captains and Officers of the Army were not of less degree or quality than that of an Inca, for though the Forces which came from diverse Provinces were conducted by their own Chief or Comwhich came from divers Provinces were conducted by their own Chief or Comwhich came from divers provinces were conducted by their own Chief or Commander, yet afterwards, when they came to be united with the Imperial Army, an Inca was given to prefide over them, so that the Chief became, as it were, his Lieutenant; by which means the whole Army had Incas for their Officers, and yet none seemed to be displaced or acquitted of his charge. By which method and policy in convenient thing was professed in their in Palvane. policy in government, things were preferved in their just balance; for unless it were in matters of Law and Justice, which admitted of no dispensation, it was a Maxim amongst the Incas never to disoblige their Curacus, but in every thing to render their Yoke so casse and gentle, that the Indians might be fond of it; and that the love of the people might be the basis and soundation of their Government. Moreover, the Inc.t thought fit to take his Son, who was his Heir, to accompany him; for though he were young, yet his years were capable of education and practice in the War.

CHAP. XIV.

Two Curacas, of great Power and Authority, refer their differences to the Arbitrement of the Inca, and become his Subjects.

THE appointed time for this expedition being come, Capae Tupanqui departed from Cozco, and marched as far as the Lake of Paria, which was the ultimate bound or limit of his Fathers Conquest; and in the way, as he marched he gathered the recruits which divers Provinces had made ready for him, not omitting to visit the Nations, as he passed, that so he might savour and honour them with his presence; the which they esteemed so high an obligation, that in divers Countries they have noted the places with a particular remark, where the Inca-pitched his Camp, or where they fent, him provisions, or refreshed himself: the which places to this day the Indians conserve in great Veneration, as if the ground had been hallowed by his facred feet.

So foon as the Inca arrived at the Lake of Paria, all the neighbouring People fubmitted themselves to his Service and Jurisdiction; some of which inclined to Obedience out of an esteem they had of his gentle and wife Government, and others out of fear, and dread of the power, which they were not able to refilt. In these Marches Messengers arrived at the Court, from two great Captains in the Division of Collasuyu, who made War one on the other. These two powerfull Curacas were descended from two great Generals, who in times past, before the Empire of the Incas, being Souldiers of Courage and Bravery, raised separate Armies, and began each to set up for himself, and lay soundation for Authority and Power: But as Rule and Empire can bear no Equal, or Competitor, these two great Men turned their Arms one against the other, and continued a War during the whole course of their Lives: the which created such animosities between their People, that their Children inherited the like anger, and took up the same occa-sion of Quarrel, which was never decided untill the Inca, Capac Tupanqui determined their differences.

For these People observing the constant miseries of War, in which they were engaged, destroying one the other without advantage; for that their courage, and skill in war being equal, neither submitted to the other, or reaped other benefit than desolation, and the fatal consequences of War; they therefore agreed with mutual confent, and with concurrence of their Captains and Relations, to remit all their differences and quarrels to the sole Arbitrement and determination of the Inca, Capus Tupunqui, relolving to stand to whatsoever he should sentence in determination of Right, and accommodation of the Quarrels, and for moderating the heats and sury between them. These terms being resolved, they both desired and courted the acquaintance of the Inca, whose Fame and Reputation for Justice and Equity, derived from his ancient Progenitors, and the great Actions which he had performed, with the affiftence and help of his Father, the Sun, were published and made known to all those Nations. One of these great Lords was called Cari, and the other Chipana, both which were the Names of their Fathers, and which each of them conferved from Father to Son, fucceffively for many Generations, in remembrance of their Ancestours, and for a motive to imitate and follow their Bravery and Valour. Pedrode Gieça in his History touches this passage briefly, and calls one of these Curacas Cari, and the other Capana. These Persons having understood that the Inca proceeded in his Conquests, in all parts adjacent, dispatched their Messengers, to render him a particular account of all the Wars. Differences and Disputes which were between them, beseeching him that he would be pleafed to permit them licence to appear in his prefence, that they might kils his hands, and give him a more large relation of the grounds and causes of their Quarrels and Differences; being defirous to remit all their pretentions to the fole determination, and arbitrement of his Majefty, for in regard that he was descended from the Sun, they were affured of his Juftice and Rectitude, and that his Sentences were infallible; and therefore protefted that they would adhere unto and reft fatisfied with whatfoever he should declare to be his Judgment and ultimate Decision in their Controversic.

The Inea having heard the Meflage, gave answer, That the Capracas might be pleased to come at such time as would best suit with their convenience, and that then he would use his best endeavours to bring them to a right understanding of each other; of which he did not entertain the least doubt, in regard that he, resolving to consult the Wisedom of his Father the Sun in their case, and apply his Ordinances and Laws to the present difference, the Judgment he should pronounce would be infallible, and uncapable of any Errour or Mistake.

This gratious Answer was very satisfactory to the Ciracai, so that they both met before the Inca at the time appointed, and both at the same time cast themfelves on their knees, and kiffed his Hand, that neither might feem to have a preference before the other. Can, whose Lands bordered nearest on the frontiers of the him, was the first that had the privilege to speak in the name of them both, rendring a large account of the differences which were between them, and of the Original from whence they did arife; he declared, That their Quarrel was enflamed by Envy and Emulation, whenfoever one observed the other to gain and advance in honoury and to be more prosperous than himself; sometimes Covetousness was the motive, when both designed on each others Territories; but most commonly the Boundaries and Limits of their respective Jurisdictions was the occasion of their Wars: For determination of which they presented themfelves before his Majerty, handly imploring his facred Sentence and Arbitrement to determine those Wars; of which they were weary, and which had for many years wasted their Countries, to the great Misery and Desolation of each others People and Subjects. The time heard and received their Request with his accu-fromary gentletics and through and ordered that for the present two of his Cap-tains, who were Inclus, and ancient Counsellours, should severally take one of the Curation into his chaffed and tuition, to teach and infruct him in the Laws of Nature, which were the Rules the Incas observed in the Government of their People, that so they might live in peace and unity, and giving unto every one his due and right, both in Estate and Honour. And as to the differences which arose about the Bounds and Extent of their respective Jurisdictions, he told them that he would send two been, who were of his Kindred, to take informations that he would fend two being, who were of his Kindred, to take informations from the Canaca of the Provinces, concerning the Caufe and Original of their long continued War and Quarrel. The which being performed, and the breat maturely advised in every particular, the debated the matters with his Council, and their advised in every particular, the debated the matters with his Council, and their advised in every particular, the told them in few words, That his Bather the San had revealed unto him, that the onely way and means to reconside their difference Parties, was to conferve Peace and Concord in the World, and that Third War produces nothing but Destruction, a proof and evidence whose of they had by their own, which had wasted each others force, they should now its singlified advised to bace; left they both become a prey to some other, who blied wing their advised to bace; left they both become a prey to some other, who blied wing their despetite and consumed conditions may take his opportunities to invade them in their weakness, and destroy them both: And as to the Limits of their respective Territories, he appointed that heaps of Stones, or Mounts of their respective Territories, he appointed that heaps of Stones, or Mounts should be east up; for Landmarks and Boundaries of their Frontiers, which being passed and invaded in a hostile manner, should be accounted a breach and violation of the Peace on the side of the first Aggressor. Lastly, he rold them, Thig tills was the Sentence and final Determination of his Father the Sun, for procuring Peace, and ending all strife and variance between them; and that since they had by mutual constituted him the Umpire and Arbitrator of their Differences; the protected that he constituted him the Umpire and Arbitrator of their lost the shade of the constituted him the Umpire and Arbitrator of their lost the shade of the constituted him the Umpire and Arbitrator of their last the same of the sun the same of the sun the same of their sun the same of the sun that the same late the fame.

The Curacas replied, That they would fincerely obey his Majesty, and that out of a respect they bore to his Service, they promised to be his true Friends and faithfull Allies.

Afterward these Caciques, Cari and Chipana, being in private together, entred into Discourse concerning the Laws of the Inca, the Government of his Hou and Court, and the rare administration of Justice through his whole Kingdom, where no Injury or Offence passed without punishment; but more particularly they observed the gentle compulsion and soft violence he used in his War, as also the sweetness of his temper, and impartial Behaviour towards them both; all which being rare and admirable evidences of his Excellencies and Vertues, they both resolved, after some short conference together, to yield themselves and Subjects to the Service and Devotion of the Inca. And hereunto they were more calily inclined, because they perceived that the Inca began to approach near to them, and to have his Confines contiguous with their Frontiers, and therefore considered that it was good to make a Vertue of Necessity, and seem to doe that out of Choice and siee Will, rather than by being compelled to what is irressible, loose all the merit of a voluntary Submission. With this Resolution presenting themselves before the Inca, they implored His Majessy's Protection, vowing unto him all Homage and Obedience, destring also that he would be pleased to send Instructors to them, who might direct them and their Subjects in the Laws of his Father the Sun, and inform them of all particulars which may be requisite for his service.

In answer whereunto the Inca told them, That he accepted their good Intentions, and would watch all occasions to requite them; then he commanded that such Vests should be given to the Caciques, as he himself wore, and to tleir Kindred and Attendance, Garments of a courser Thread, for which they made many acknowledgments of Duty and Obligation. In this manner the Inca reduced those several People and Provinces to his Empire, which within the Division of Collassou were subjected to the Dominion of those Caciques. Moreover he added to these new Conquests the Countries of Poco, And, Minru, Macoba, Caracara, and all those other Provinces which run as far Eastward as the great Mountain of Ansis, together with all that waste and defart Countrey which reaches to the borders of that Province which is called Tippee ri, and now by the Spaniards Tapacari, containing in breadth thirty Leagues, and by reason of the coldness of it is much unpeopled; howsoever it is fruisfull in pattures, and abounds with all fort of Cattel and wild Beasts, and is full of Fountains; and particularly there is one Spring of Water, issuing from Mines of Sulphur, so hot, that none can suffer his hand in it for a moments space; and yet what is still more observable, there are other Springs, not far from thence, of cold and pleasant Waters, both which meeting afterwards together, make that River, which is called Cochamana.

Having traversed this desure Countrey, which abounds, (as we have said) with Fountains and a stures, there appears a Mountain, which descends for seven Leagues, and least to the plain of the Province Tapacri, where my Master Garcitossoft to the Vega, had his first proportion allotted to him in the Lands of Pern: It is a Countrey very fruitfull and populous, stored with all sorts of Cattel, for the space of twenty Leagues in length, and about twelve in breadth: About eight Leagues farther, is that most pleasant Province of Cachapanpa, which is a Valley of thirty Leagues long, and four broad, all which is made fruitfull by a plentifull River, that waters the whole Countrey: These two pleasant Provinces, with divers others, were the inheritance of Cari and Chipana; (as before related) and were now added to the Dominion and Empire of the Ineas, extending seventy Leagues in length.

In these parts, because they were pleasant and sertile, the Spaniards in the Year 1775. Settled a Colony, which they called St. Peter of Cardema, so named by the chief and first Planter thereof, who was a Gentleman, and a Native of Burgos, called Captain Lewis Oforio.

The Matters of these two Caciques being in this manner ordered and disposed, the Inca commanded two of his principal Officers to make a survey of their Countries, and to take with them such Persons as were proper and able to govern those new Subjects, and instruct and teach them in the Laws they were now to obferve. And thus the Inca having finished this work, which he esteemed sufficient for that year, and more than was expected, he returned to Corco, accompanied with the two Caciques, who were curious to see the splendor of the Indian Court, where they were kindly received, and treated with Banquets and, Sports; and because it was pleasing to the Inca, the whole City endeavoured to honour and cares them with all the demonstrations imaginable of Civility and Respect. After some days thus passed, he gave them liberty to return into their own Dominions, being greatly satisfied with the entertainment they had received, and at their departure he gave them to understand, that he intended speedily to viiit their Countries again, that so he might reduce those Indians which inhabited the parts beyond them, and that therefore they should make such provisions as were necessary for the support and maintenance of his Army and Attendance.

CHAP. XV.

Of the Bridge made with Straw, Rushes and Flags; and how Chayanta was reduced at that place where the Lake empties it self.

THE Inca, Capac Tapanapai, was so much pleased with the convenience and success of the last Bridge, which (as we said) was built at Huacachaca, over the River of Amirimac, that he ordered another of the like fort to be made at that place where the Lake Titicaca empties it self, that so it might be in a readines against the time that he intended to return to complete his Conquests in the Division of Collaspan; and because those Countries were plain, and commodious for the march of an Army, the Incas were unquiet untill they could make a complete and entire Conquest of all that, Division. The Bridge of Huacachaca, as also all the others which are in Peru, are made of Osier, onely that which passes the water called by the Spaniards, The Condain, because it is the vent by which the Lake empties it self, is made of Flags and Rushes, and such like materials. This passes were the water, as that at Seville, which is made upon Boats, and is not arched, as that we have formerly mentioned. There is a fort of Rushes which grow over all Peru, that are of a fine and pliant fort, convert at and easie to weave with, the Indians call them Tehm, which they use in thatching their Houses. That fort which grows in Collao is excellent seeding for the Cattel, and of which they make their Baskets and Hampers, like little Chests with covers, (called by them Pataca) and hereof also they make Cords and Ropes; the best fort of these Rushes grows in the River which falls from the Lake Titicaca, whereof there is great abundance, as also of Flags and Bultushes, and a fort called Enea. The Indians cut great quantities hereof, at the proper seasons of the year, of which they make provisions, to be dried and prepared for service of the Bridge, as occasions shall require. With these Rushes they twisted four great Ropes, as big as a Man's Leg, two of which they cast over the River, and saftened them on each side. This water on the top or superficies of it, seems still and quiet, but towards the bottom runs with a strong current, as some say that the floar of the Bridge, which Bridge was about thirteen or fourteen Foot broad and about a Yard thick, and about an hundred and fifty Paces in length; fo that we may imagine what a vaft quantity of Rushes is required for a work of this premre. It is moreover observable, that this Bridge requires reparations every fix Months, or rather, to be made new, for the whole composition of it being nothing but Straw and Ruthes, which are fading and decaying materials, must be often renewed, especially the Ropes or Cables, which are the main traves of the work, must be maintained, and kept in good repair. This Bridge, as likewise all other publick conveniences, were in the times of the lucus kept up, and maintained at the charge and labour of the neighbouring Countries; so that many Hands making light work, and the materials provided from year to year, the good order observed, made it a matter without much trouble or difficulty. The end of these main Cables, which were the Foundation of this fort of Bridge, were fixed in the ground, and not feifed, or made fast to Rocks of Stone, as some others were; and the Indians fay, that this is the better invention, for that this Bridge may be removed, and carried either higher or lower on the River, as occafion requires.

The Bridge being thus made and completed, the Inca, with his eldeft Son and Helr, departed from Cozco, travelling by thort journies, until they arrived at the remotest parts of those Provinces which belonged to Cari and Chipana, being those Countries which we formerly mentioned by the names of Tapaeri and Cochapampa, where the Caciques attended in a readiness with their Souldiers to receive the Inca. From Cochapampa they proceeded forward to Chayanta, and in their way thither they from Cochapana they proceeded forward to Chapana, and in then way thither they paffed a most desolate and barren Countrey, where is not one Foot of good Ground, but onely Stones and Rocks; and which produces nothing but Bushes bearing Thoms, as long as a Man's finger, and which the Indiana file for Needles to sow the poor Drapery they wear; and which fort of Thom grows common in all parts of Peru: Having paffed this defart, which contains about twenty Leagues in length, and about as much in breadth, they entred into Charanta; where the Inca commanded the Prince his Son to fend the Summons which were uttal, and accustomary to the Inhabitants of that Province.

At the receipts of these Summons the Indians were divided into different opinions; some were for present Submission and Obedience to this celestial Race which was defeended from the Sun, being affured all those Laws which were given and imposed by such an infallible Light, could not be other than just, gentle, and such as tended rather to the Liberty and Security of the Subjects, than to the Interest as tended rather to the Liberty and security of the Suojects, than to the infector and Advantage of the Governour. Howfoever others that were of a different fentiment, and more flubborn in their humour, argued, That they had no need of a King, or new Laws, fince that those which they had already were good and profitable, and fuch as their Ancestours had lived under with great happiness and fecurity; that they had Gods already of their own, whom they worthipped and ferved, and knew no necessity that there was of a new Religion, or Colloms; and what was most grievous, that they must submit to the pleasure of a Prince, who preached Religion and Sanctity to them, and made them promites of Privilege and Liberty, whenas perhaps to morrow, to foon as he had gained them under his power, he would then impose such Laws as were flavith and agreeable to his own Luft and Pleasure; and therefore they concluded, that it was better not to trust to such a hazard, but rather to live in their own freedom, or else die in the defence of it.

In this Suspence matters remained for some days, both parties infisting on the truth of their opinions, untill at length the fear of compultion from the luca, and the hopes of receiving good and wholsome Laws from him, extorted an answer which was dubious, and favouring fomething of both opinions; for they declared that they were willing to receive the Inc. for their King and Lord, but as to his Laws, they were enjoyed not to their not knowing whether they conduced to their Benefit or Damage; untill which time, that they were informed of the fublifance and form of them, they defined a ceffacion of Arms, and of all violence, and that the Inca, with his Army, might enter into their Countrey upon parole, that in cafe his Laws proved not to their contentment, that then he would quit his flation, and leave them to their contentment, that then he would quit his flation, and leave them to their contentment. flation, and leave them to their own freedom and liberty; but if they appeared as good as he avouched and affirmed them to be, that then immediately they

of the true race and progeny of the Sun.

Though this people was in no capacity of giving conditions to the Inca, yet he was pleased to accept such as they offered, being resolved to adhere to the old Maximof his Anceftous, which was rather to conquer with love and affection, than by force; and therefore he affured them on his word, that in cafe they did not think to adore his Father the Sun, nor yet to accept his Laws, he would then leave them to their own choice and freedom: The which promife he made on an undoubted confidence, that fo foon as those Mysteries and excellent Statutes were revealed to them, they could not but accept and embrace them; and that they would onely be troubled, that such admirable beauty of reason arrived so late to their hearing and knowledge.

Upon this affurance and promife the Inca entred into Chayanta, where he was received with much awe and veneration, but not with that mirth and rejoycing as they used in other parts at this Solemnity: For as yet these poor people stood wavering between hope and fear, untill the Reverend Counfellours deputed by the Inca, with the Prince his Son and Heir, took fome pains for feveral days to declare, and expound to them the Laws relating to their Idolatrous Religion, and to their Secular Government: the which they inculcated fo frequently, and with fuch patience and plainness, untill at length they became capable of that Doctrine which they taught. The Indians flood gaping all this while with wonderfull attention, admiring that such Laws should be made for their honour and advantage; and then burst out into Acclamations, saying, That worthy were they to be accounted Gods, and esteemed for Lords of the Universe, who were able to frame and deliver such Laws and Statutes to Mankind; the which they promised to receive and obey; and that renouncing all their former Idols, rites and vain cultoms, they vowed and fwore to embrace the Religion of the Inca; and in token thereof they proftrated themselves before the Prince, who represented the Person of his Father the Sun, and the Inca, Capac Tupanqui.

Having thus yielded themselves in a solemn manner, they fell to Dancing after the fashion of their Countrey, shewing some new Dances which they had purposely made for the entertainment of the lucas; and all people habited themselves polely made for the entertainment of the mean; and an people habited themselves in their best cloathes, with Tinsel and Ribbons, singing Ballads made in honour and praise of the Sun, and the mean, and of their good Laws and Government; and in fine, they made all the demonstrations of love and affection imaginable.

CHAP. XVI.

Of the many Inventions which the Indians made to pass Rivers, and to take Fish.

HAving already mentioned the two feveral forts of Bridges, which the Incar made for paffing Rivers; one of which was composed of Osiers, and the other of Rushes and Canes. We shall now proceed to declare some other Incarding the control of the Co orner or runnes and Canes. We man now proceed to dectate forme office in ventions which the Indians projected for the fame purpose; for in regard the labour and charge of making Bridges was so great, that they were onely made for convenience of the great Roads and the King's High-ways; and that the Countrey being in other places large and wide, wanted that convenience whereby the people might maintain communication one with the other; wherefore Necessity, which is the Moche of Lorganism, tambit them before the mother of the property that the Moche of Lorganism. which is the Mother of Ingenuity, taught them feveral contrivances according to the disposition and nature of the Rivers, as also how to sivin on the Seas with such floats, as served their present occasions; for they had not as yet attained to the Invention of Boats, or fuch Canoes, as they use in Florida, or the Isles of Barlovento, and other places of the Main Land, which are a fort of Troughs hewed out of Timber, and are all of one piece: but the Wood in Pern is not fit for this use, being sappy, and heavy as Iron, and therefore not boyant, as the nature of such floats require: Wherefore they made choice of another fort; of a more of fuch floats require: Wherefore they made choice of another fort; of a more light and fpungy Timber, which grows in the Provinces of Quim, from whence, by order of the Inca, many Trees were felled, and brought down to the banks of the Rivers. Hereof they made all their Boats greater or leffer, fome of them were of five, others of feven pieces of Wood, which ferved for the bottom, tied one to the other, that in the middle being the biggeft: The first Boards on the fide were fomething thorter than those of the Keel; the fecond above were shorter, and the third shorter than those below; that so that being pinched in above, and not all of the same breadth, the Vessel would find less resistence in its motion through the Water; and the Stern and the Head of the Boat were both of the same fashion: To both the ends of these Boats they fashed a Cord, so that Desserve being dessrupt the Gord on one side, and Paffengers being defirous to Ferry over, they drew the Cord on one fide; and being to return, they drew that which was fastned to the other. I remember that I passed a River in one of these Ferries; which because it had been made in a time when the Incas reigned, the people accounted it a Relique, and had it in great esteem and veneration.

Book III.

Besides these Ferries, they have other lesser Boats more manageble, made of Canes and Reeds closely woven, and shaped upwards sharp, like the Prow of a Boat, that they may with less resistence cut the Water: the Mid-ships are made broad, and wide, and capacious to receive the Loading: One of thefe Boats is governed by a fingle Indian, who places himself at the Stern, and lying on his breaft with his hands and feet on each fide in the water instead of Oars, he Sculls and Steers along with the current to the place he deligns: If the current be very rapid, they row along the bank of the River to take the advantage of a hundred paces upwards, making account that the fwiftness of the stream will carry them 200 paces downwards before they can reach the other fide: When a Paffenger Ferries over, they order him to lye flat on his face, ftretched at length in the Boat, with his face towards the Ferry-man, and to hold himself fast by the Cords, and by no means to rife or flir, or fo much as open his eyes. I once croffed a very fwift current in one of these Boats, which is something hazardous; (though on smooth and still waters there is no danger) I then remember that the Ferry-man conjured me with all the Loves in the World, that I would neither lift up my head, nor open my eyes: I being then but a Boy, was so affrighted, that I thought either the Earth would fink, or the Heavens sall: Howsoever, I could not for my life but lift up my head, and open at leaft one of my eyes to fee if there were any enchantment, or forme dicovery of a New World in the matter; and being in the middle, I lifted up my head a little, and feeing the water round, me-thoughts we had fallen from Heaven above; and I became fo giddy, that my brains turned, and fwam fafter than the Boat, which was carried with a very rapid and violent fream; so that I presently that my eyes again, and confessed that the Boat-man had much reason for the caution he gave me.

They have likewise another fort of Ploat made of large Gourds, joined and saltned strongly together, about the bigness of a Yard and a half square: Hereunto they fit a Rope in saltnion of a Poitral to a Horse's Saddle, wherein the transfer of the saltnion of the saltnio dian Boat-man puts his head; with which swimming away, he Tows the Boat after him with her Lading, untill he paffes to the other fide of the River, or Arme of the Sea; and if the Lading be heavy, so that the Boat draws much water, he is then affifted by an Indian or two more, who push at the Stern, and drive the

But in those great Rivers, where the current is very forcible and rapid, so that they are not pallable in these Boats of Gourds or Rulhes; and where also the banks of the River are so rocky, that there is no place to Land either on one shore or the other: there they make use of their great Cables made of Canes, called Chahuar, which they throw over from the higher parts of the craggy places, fatening them to great Trees or firm Rocks: Within this great Cable they put a Cafe, or Basket made of Ofiers, capable to receive three or four perfons; to each end whereof they fix an Ear, or handle of Wood, through which they pass the Cords for drawing it from one fide to the other; and in regard the Cable is very large, it hath a mighty fiving and fall in the middle; and therefore they lore the Ropes of the Basket very early, and by degrees, untill it comes to the middle. which is the lowest part of the Cable; and thence by main force they draw it upwhich is the lowest part of the Cable 3 and thence by main force they draw it up-wards. There are certain Indians who live near that place, and are appointed by the Countrey for that work, and are very affiliant and helpfull to Paffengers with-out any consideration of interest, or payment whatsoever. Some Passengers who have used that kind of Ferry, putting their legs and seet in the basket, have without other help than their armes and hands onely forced themselves upwards upon the Cable. I remember, when I was a Boy, that I passed this way three or sour times; but being very young, the Indians carried me on their backs; in the fame manner they transport their Cattel on the other fide; but this is done with much more trouble: For but few of them can pass at a time, and those of the leffer fort, such as Sheep, Goats and Kids, which they tye fast within the basket; and fort, fuch as Sheep, Goats and Kids, which they tye falt within the basket; and as for Mules, Horfes, Affes or Cows, they are of too great a burthen for this fort of Ferry, but are driven about to the great Bridges, or to shallower places, where the River is fordable. This kind of passage the Indians call Uruga, and is onely made use of by the Countrey people, that have occasion to pais from one side to the other; but in the great Roads the convenience is better.

Book III.

The Indians all along the Coast of Pern, Fish in their little Boats made of Rushes, and adventure four or five Leagues out at Sea in them, and farther if occasion require; for that Sea is called the Pacifick, being calm for the most part, and are ships to had uneather; but when they carry things of great purples.

cafion require; for that Sea is called the Pacifick, being calm for the moft part, and not fubject to bad weather; but when they carry things of great burthen, they ufe Floats made of Timber. The Fisher-men, when they go to Sea, kneed down in their Boats, and fit on their legs, and fo row with a Paddle made of a large Cane, cleft towards the end; for in that Countrey they have great Canes, which are as big as a Man's thigh; of which we shall treat more largely hereafter. This Cane they hold with both hands, one being placed at the top, and the other in the middle; and the end being made broad in the shape of an Oar, they Row their Boat forward; the Boat being very light, feels every stroke of the Oar, and turns, then they change the hand to the other fide, and so shift it over again, which moves the Boat with an incredible fulfices.

which moves the Boat with an incredible fwiftness.

Which moves the Boat with an increasing invitation. Then for their Fishery, when they go to take great Fish, they use a Fisigi in the same manner as they strike Whales with in  $B_1G_2$ . To this Fisigi, which is a sharp Spear at the end of a Staff, they fasten a line of about 20,30 or 40 sathom in length, the end of which they tye to the head of the Boat; the Fish being strook, the Indian years his Line, and gives him Rope as fast as he can; and when he hath given it all out, he then plays with the Fish untill it is quite tired; and so mastering it, they take it, and some of them are of an incredible bigness. They fifth also with Nets and Hooks; but they make no great matter of their Fithing in that manner; for their Nets being small and manageable by one Man, can never inclose any number; and their Hooks being ill made, not knowing the use of Steel or Iron, they take very sew with that Art; for though they have Mines of both Metals, yet they know not how to separate and purific the Ore: Their Boats of Rushes are not able to bear Sail, because they have no Keel, nor hold in the water, and perhaps make better way with a Paddle, than with a Sail; though on their Floats made of Wood, they fet up a Sail, which serves them before the Wind.

These are the Arts which the Indians have invented for making short Voyages on the Seas, and for paffing fwift and rapid currents; the which have received little improvement, for they were in use when I was there, and believe they have fill continued in the same manner without alteration; for they being a poor fort of miserable people, of mean dejected spirits, follow the old road, nor aspiring to greater matters, than a supply of their necessities. In the History of Florida, the sixth Book, treating there of their Canoer, we have touched upon their contrivances to Pass and Navigate on Rivers, which have a swift and rapid current; fo that now we shall not enlarge farther thereupon, but rather proceed to the other Conquests of the Inca, Capac Tupanqui,

CHAP. XVII.

Of the Conquest of five large Provinces, besides others of less consideration.

THE Inca having secured the Countrey of Chayanta with a sufficient force and supplied it with Officers requisite for administration both of their religious and civil Government. He proceeded forward to other adjacent Provinces, amongst which Charca was of great Renown, comprehending many different Nations and Languages under its Dominion; all which were in the Division of Collasuyu: The chief or principal Countries of which were Tutura, Sipispo, Chaqui; to the Eastward of which, and towards the Mountain Antis, are other Provinces called Chamuru, where grows great plenty of the Herb which they call Cuea, though it be not fo good as that which grows about Cozea. There is also another Province named Sacaca, with divers more, which for brevity fake we omit; to all which the Inca fent his Summons in his accustomary form and manner.

These several Nations, who had already been informed of all the particulars which had passed in Chayanta, returned their answers much after the same manner; the fubfiance of all which was, That it was their great honour to have the knowledge of fo holy a Religion, as that which enjoined them to adore the Sun, and to serve the Inca, who was descended from him; and that they had the privilege to be offered fuch good and wholfome Laws for their Government: And therefore defiring his Majefty to receive them under his potent Protection, they refigned up their lives and fortunes to his disposal; and in regard, that having received new Laws and Superstitious Rites, differing from those of their adjacent Neighbours, they frood in great danger of having their Apoftacy revenged by them; they therefore defired, that those people also might be reduced, and obliged to embrace the same Laws, Religion and Worship with them.

The Inca returned them answer, That they should not need to trouble themfelves for those matters, but that they should rather with entire confidence remit all their care unto him, who knew the times and ways best for their protection, being affured that their fubjection to him was their beft fecurity, and that noe had ever fuffered for receiving his Laws and Vaffalage, but rather lived with joy and comfort under those infallible Oracles which the Sun had gratiously dispensed to them. With these assurances this people, without other Queries or Demurs, yielded themselves; on which particulars we shall not farther enlarge, in regard nothing of moment offers on that subject. In this Conquest the Inca spent two, and some say three years; and having left Guards sufficient in the Countrey to curb and prevent all Incursions of the Neighbourhood, he returned to Cozco, visiting in his way all those Nations which had formerly submitted themselves; he commanded the Prince his Son to take another way, that to he might please his Subjects in other parts, who effected themselves highly benoured with the prefence of their Kings and Princes.

The Entry which the Inca made to his Court was very Magnificent and Royal, being attended by his own Captains, and with the Curacus of the late subjected Provinces, who out of honour to the Inca, and curiofity to fee the Imperial Court, riornices, who out or nonour to the mea<sub>3</sub> and currently to ree the imperial Court, made up fome part of his Equipage; and the people with Demonstrations of Joy and Triumph were not wanting to welcome the return of their mea. Some few days after the Prince Rocca likewise came, whose Arrival the people also celebrated with Dances and Songs in praise of his Noble and Victorious Actions. Then the mea having gratified his Commanders for their pains and faithfulness in the late Expedition, he gave them leave to return to their own Houses, there to enjoy reposts and roll after their long and todous journies, and residual gray as his enjoy repose and rest after their long and tedious journies; and residing now at his own Court, he attended to the government and administration of those matters which respected the happiness and advantage of his Subjects; for his Territories were now become very large, extending from Gozco along the Coast of that Sea which is called Zm, above one hundred and eighty Leagues as far as Turna and which is called Zm, above one hundred and eighty Leagues as far as Tupra and Chaqui; then to the Westward from the City, the Dominion reached seventy Leagues one way, and eighty another: and to the Eastward it ran to the River Paucar tampu, being thirteen Leagues full East from the City; and to the Southeast forty Leagues; so that the Empire being grown thus large and wide, the Incathought sit for some time to fix boundaries to his Conquests, that so he might attend to the conservation of what he had already gained, and to the benefit and fecurity of his Subjects: And now living for some years in peace and plenty, he had leisure to enrich and adorn the Temple of the Sun, and of those selected Virgins which the Inca, Marco Capac, had endowed: he also built many other Edifices, both within and without the City, and in divers Provinces, where they were most to advantage. He made likewise Aqueduct, and opened Springs for watering the grounds; he built divers Bridges to pass Rivers and Streams, to the great convenience of publick Roads; he opened divers new ways for commodious travel, and for better communication of one Province with another. In short, he omitted nothing which might conduce to the publick benefit, to the advantage omitted nothing which might conduce to the publick benefit, to the advantage of his Subjects, and to the greater Glory and Grandeur of his own Majefty.

CHAP. XVIII.

The Prince Inca Rocca reduces many and great Provinces both within the Land, and along the Sea-coaft.

IN these, and such like Affairs, the Inca employed himself, for the space of six or seven years; and then it was judged fit to reassume again the thoughts of Or feven years; and then it was judged fit to reaffume again the thoughts of War, for the fatther enlargement of Empire; to which end orders were given for raifing an Army of twenty thousand men, under the conduct of four Major Generals, and of the Prince Rocca, who was to command in Chief: The Defign was to march towards Chinchassin, which lies Northward from Cozco; on which side their Dominions did not reach sarther than Rimae tampu, which was not above seven Leagues, and was the utmost Bounds in those Quarters to which the first Inca, Manto Capac, had proceeded; since which time the other Incas did not esteem it worthy the troubles of a Conquest, being a Countrey desolate, rocky and without Inhabitants.

The Prince leaving Cozco came to the River Apprince, which he possed on

The Prince leaving Cozco, came to the River Apprimac, which he paffed on great floats, prepared for that purpose; and because the Countrey was desolate. he proceeded as far as Curahuaci, and Amuneay being about eight or ten Leagues from the City, and without any opposition reduced all those poor Indian, wherefocuer he paffed. From the Province Amanca, he took to the left hand along the great road, which leads from Cozco to Rimae, and leaving the Defart which is called Cochacaffa, being about twenty two Leagues over, he entred into the Province called Sma, which is very populous, and rich, both in Gold and Cattel, and where the Inca was received with ready fubmiffion. Thence he proceeded to the next Province, called Apucara, where also he was received without opposition; for in regard these Countries were always at enmity together, they were not able to unite in a common League, nor yet refilt in a fingle condition.

From Appeara he marched forward to the Province Rucana, which is divided into two parts, the leffer and the greater: The People hereof are both beautifull in their Bodies, and ingenious in their Minds, by advantage of which they more eafily apprehended the felicity they should obtain under the Government of the Inca, and therefore with joy and applause received his Commands. Thence he descended to the Sea Coast, which the Spaniards call the Launes, and passed the suff Valley, which in those parts bath the name of Nanasea, which fignifies dolefull, or difinal; what might be the occasion of this Epithet, is not certain but tall, or dinnar; what might be the occation of this Epither, is not certain, but it is believed that it might be from some great punishment, or calamity which had happened there; the spaniards call it Lundea, where also the Inea was received without opposition, and obeyed without conditions; the like submission was yielded by the inhabitants of all the Vallies from Nanasea to Arequeps, which lies yielded by the Inhabitants of all the Vallies from Namafea to Arequepa, which lies by the Sea-coaft for the space of above eighty Leagues in length, and fourteen or fitteen in breadth: the chief Valleys are Hacari and Camuta, containing twenty thousand Inhabitants; there are other Vallies of less consideration, which are Atica, Venuma, Atiquipa and Quellea, all which yielded ready Obedience, both because they neither had force to resist, being a poor naked People, and because every Valley had its particular Lord, and some of them two or three, amongst whom were perpetual Quarrels and Diffentions.

Royal Commentaries.

And fince we are now treating of those places, it will not feem an improper Digreffion, though perhaps out of its due order, if we should recount a remarkable passage, which happened in the Valley of Hacari, some time after that the Spaniards were Masters of it. The occasion was this: Two Curacus, who had or Bounds of their Jurisdictions, which increased fo high, that they often endeavoured to decide the Difference in Battel; to prevent which, the Spanift Governours fent a Commissioner to them, with power to determine, and put a final nours tent a Communioner to tnem, with power to determine, and put a mai end to their Disputes by a friendly and amicable Compositive: The Judge, or Umpire, having heard both sides, allotted unto each such Boundaries as he thought did of right belong unto them, respectively obliging them to maintain Peace and Friendship together; which though they promised to doe, one of them who thought himlest injured and aggrieved by this Division, concealed his passion and intention to Revenge under the specious appearance of Friendship: for the Day being come, when the Solemnities of the Peace were to pass, they both ate and drank together; the Banquet being ended, the offended Curaca arole, and taking two Cups in his hand, filled with Liquour, as if he intended to drink a Health to the confirmation of their Friendship, (as the custome amongst the Indians is) he offered one of the Cups, which was prepared with posson, to his Enemy, reserving the other, which was whostome, for himself; but the other Curaca observing some change in the Countenance of him who made him the offer, and a Diffatisfaction in the terms he received, refused the Cup which he reached to him, defiring rather to have the other which he referved for himfelf. The Curaca, not to feem cowardly, or to offer that which he refused himself, was easily persuaded to change his hands, and with that reached to his Enemy the wholsome Cup, and without difficulty drank up the Poison himself; of which dying in a few hours after, he gave a sufficient evidence, that the Draught was not more deadly than the Poison of his own Rage and Malice, with which he fwelled and burft.

CHAP. XIX.

How Colonies were transplanted from parts on the Sea Coast to the Inland Countries.

Rom Namasca the Inea translated some Indians, who were Ineas of that Nation, to plant themselves on the River Aparimac, because that the Climate of that Region, from Cozco to Rimac, being very hot, agreed best with the Temperament or Constitution of the People of Namasca, whose Countrey was in the same degree of hear with that of Aparimac, whenas on the contrary, the People which were transslated from the Desart, which is a more cool and moderate Climate, were subject to Diseases and Calentures, and not able to support the intolerable heats; for which reason the Ineas in the establishment of their Colonies, had always a respect to the Constitution of the People, that so they might not pass from one Extreme to another, but that their new Habitation might correspond in some degree with the Air of their native Soil. This regard the Inea having always to his Colonies, the People which he planted on the Banks of the River Aparimac, were extracted from the hotter Climates; but there was no need of great numbers for this occasion, because that most of the Land on both sides of that River is rocky and barren; onely there are some pieces of good ground, which the Ineas was desirous to have manured in the manner of Gardens, and places of Pleasure; because that soil which borders on the River, produces most excellent and rare Fruit.

Matters being fettled in this posture, and every thing established in due order, relating to the Government of the new acquired Provinces, the Prince Rocca returned to Cocco, where he was kindly received by his Father, and the whole Court, and being then to disband his forces, he dismissed the Commanders with fignal marks of his Favour and Efteem.

And now the Inca, Capue Tupanqui, finding himself to decay with Years, and to enter into a Region of Life, which required ease and repose, he resolved to put a sulf thop to the enlargement of his Conquests, and onely spend the remainder of his Days in the Administration of Justice, and performing matters tending to the Benefit and Advantage of his People. In this easiness several years passed, during which time the Inca performed the part of a kind and indulgent Prince, and the People of loving and loyal Subjects, who with all readiness and affection applied themselves to the service of the Inca, particularly in building the Temple of the Sun, and erecting other Edifices, wherein they shewed great willingness and diligence, because they were works recommended to them by the Inca, moreover they of their own accord, within the Division of every Province, built other Houses for the Convenience and Divertisement of the Inca.

In this Prosperity and Ease the Inea, Capac Trapangui, died, with the Character of a valiant and able Prince, and worthy of the Title Capac, which caused him to be much lamented in the Court, and in all parts of his Kingdom, with deep Resentments; he was afterwards embalmed, and interred in the Sepulche of his Tathers. He lest for his Heir and Successor his Eldest Son, which he had by Copa Mama Curi-ylpa, his Wife and Sister; he lest also many other Sons and Daughters, as well natural as legitimate, the precise number of which we cannot determine, though some say, that they were above Eighty, which is not much, for some of these Ineas have arrived to a hundred, some two hundred, nay some are considertly reported to have had three hundred Sons and Daugh-

CHAP. XX.

The Description of the Temple of the Sun, and of its great Riches.

The principal Idol in esteem both with the Inca and his Subjects, was the Imperial City of Cosco it self, which the Indians adored as a sacred Relique, both because it was founded by the first Inca, Monto Capac, and because it was the Repository of innumerable Trophies acquired by Victory, and was the Seat and Throne of the Inca, who were esteemed for Gods. This superstition appeared in every little instance; for in case two Indians of equal quality did but meet on the way, one coming from Cosco, and the other travelling thither; he that came from thence, gave always the first falutation, and the upper hand to him who was going thither; and if he, who had been at this City, was ever after esteemed by his Neighbours as a Pilgrim or a Holy Man, how much more was he to be reverenced, who was a Citizen, or Native of the place: And in pursuance of this humour and opinion, whatsoever was said to come from Cosco, though it were but Lentils or Seeds, and did not surpass others of like kind in its Excellency, yet it had always the pre-eminence, and was thought an impiety to think or judge otherwise. To keep up this sancy and belief in the people, the Inca laboured to adorn and enoble the City with many Sumptuous Edifices and Royal Palaces, many of which they built for their own use, as we shall hereaster declare, when we come to describe the publick Buildings, amongst which there is none comparable to the Temple of the Sun, which was enriched with incredible Wealth; to which every Inca particularly added something, and improved and perfected that which his Predecessor and left descrient. The Riches of that Temple were so immense, that I should not adventure to describe them, did I not find them mentioned in all the Spanish Histories of Perus, but neither what they have wrote, nor I delivered, are able to reach the vastness of that real Wealth. The Building of this Temple is esteemed the Work of the King Topangai, the Great Grandsather of Hueyna Capac; not that he was the Founder of it, having received its beginning fro

Now to describe this Temple; it is to be noted, that that place which was the Chamber of the Sun, is now the Church of the Divine St. Dominick; but because I have not the exact measures of the length and breadth of it, I omit to mention it at guess; onely that how large soever it be, it is all made of Freeze-stone well polithed.

The High Altar (which for our better understanding we call by that Name, though the Indians knew not how to crect an Altar) is placed at the East-side; the Roof was slat, made of lofty Timber; but the Covering was thatched with Straw, because their Art arrived not to make other. All the sour Walls of the Temple were Wainscoated from the top to the bottom, with Panes and Frames of Wood all over guilded: In the upper place, where we seat the High Altar, was the Figure of the Sun drawn upon a Plate of Gold, much broader and thicker than the Boards which covered the Walls; this Figure represented the Face of the Sun in a round shape, with all his Rays and Emissions of Fire, and Light proceeding from him much in the same manner as our Painters draw him: The Figure was so great and large, that it took up all the Quarter of the Temple, from one Wall to another: Besides this Representation of the Sun, the Indians creected no other Idols in their Temples, because they did not acknowledge, nor adore any other Gods, though some Writers maintain a different opinion. When the Spaniards first entred the City of Cozco, this Figure of the Sun fell to the lot of *A Game at there alive when I came thence for Spains; he was fo great a Gamefter at *Primero, and all other Games, that though the Image was very great, yet he made a fhift to lose it in one Nights play; whence that Proverb came, as Anofra fays, Play for the Sun before the Day breaks. Sometime after which, the Common Council of the City taking notice, how much this Son or Member of theirs was given to play, and how much he loft, thought fit, as the best expedient to wean him from that Vice, to chuse him Alcalde, or Chief Justice in Ordinary, for the space of a year: In execution of which employment he applied himself with fo much diligence and care in the difcharge of his truft, that being a Gentleman of excellent parts, he took not a Card in hand for the whole year following; the City observing this his active diligence, continued him in Office for a year longer, and afterwards kept him constantly employed in one publick charge or other; so that this Macio Serra disusing his course of Gaming, came at length or other; to that this man serve through the court of starting cannot at length to abhor it, calling to mind the many dangers, troubles and inconveniences to which it had betrayed him; which ferves as a pregnant example to demonstrate to us, how much idlened contributes to Vice, and employment unto Ver-Itrate to us, how much idlenets contributes to Vice, and employment unto Vertue. But to return to our Hilfory, we fay, that a Calculate may in fome measure be made of the Riches of that City, when an Image of Gold of that proportion and value fell to the lot and share of one single person. On each side of this Image the Bodies of the dead Incas were placed, embalmed with such rare Art (we know not how) that they seemed still living: their postures were stirlly often when they were alive, their Eager were strongly of the weeks they were alive. fitting on Chairs of Gold, erected on those very Frames of Gold on which they usually state when they were alive: their Faces were turned towards the people; onely Huann Capac, as if he had merited a supereminence over all the others, was placed with his Face towards the Figure of the Sun, as if he had been the most beloved, and greatest Favourite of all his Race; and indeed his Vertues and Royal Endowments, which appeared in him from his Insancy, were such, as procured for him a degree above the rest, and a place amongst the Gods which they adored. These Bodies, with what Treasure they were able, the Indians concealed in such secret Vaults, that none of them came to appear untill this year of 1559, when the Licenciado Polo made a discovery of sive of them, three where of were Kings, and the other two were Queens.

Book III.

The principal Gate opened to the North, as it is at prefent; befides which there were feveral other finall Doors for better convenience of the Temple; all which were leveral other infall Doors for better convenience of the Temple; all which were lined on the infide with Plates of Gold, as also the Jambs or Posts of the Doors. On the top of the Temple without, on the highest Wall, was a large Circle of Gold in form of a Crown, of above a Yard in breadth, which encompassed the whole Temple.

CHAP. XXI.

Of the Cloiflers of the Temple, and of the feveral Chambers of the Moon and Stars, Thunder and Lightning. and of the Rain-bow.

FRom the Temple there is a paffage into the Cloifters, which are encompaffed with four Walls, one of which is the Wall of the Temple: the rop of this Cloifter is spread with a Cieling of Gold, of about a Yard in breadth, and was the Ornament and Crown aloft; but the Spaniards afterwards despoiled the Roof of the Gold, and in place and memory thereof laid a Cieling of white Plaster: the which, when I departed thence, was still white and fresh, and the Walls found and flanding as formerly. The Provoft, or Mafter of this Cloiffer. had five large Chambers square allowed him for his Lodgings, not contiguous. or joyning one to the other, but separate and apart, being covered in form of a Pyramid, and which made the other three Walls of the Cloifter.

One of these square Chambers was dedicated to the Moon, whom they styled the Wife of the Sun, and therefore was nearest to the principal Chapel of the Temple, all the sides within, as also the Doors were Plated with Silver, for the better correspondence and resemblance with the colour of the Moon, whose Image was also erected in Silver, with the face of a Woman, and placed in the fame manner as that of the Sun- Into this Chamber they did usually enter to make their visits to the Moon, and recommend themselves to her favour; for that the being the Sifter and Wife of the Sun, was confequently the Mother of that he being the Shert and Whe of the Sour, was confequency the Monaquilla, which fignifies as much as Mother-Moon, to whom they offered Sacrifices as they did to the Sun. On each fide of this Image they placed the Bodies of the dead Queens, according to their Order and Seniority. Onely Mama Oello, who was the Mother of Humana Capac, had the chief place, being feated neareft, and with her face just opposite to the Moon; in regard, that having been the Mother of a Son so excellent and famous, did seem to have merited the primary place of

The Chamber next hereunto was dedicated to Venus the Evening-Star, and the other feven Stars, and to all the other Stars in general. The Star Venus they called Chasca, which is as much as to say, long and curled Locks; they named this Star the Page of the Sun, because it always attended on him, going sometimes before, and sometimes after him; for the seven Stars they entertained a particular respect, because of the strangeness of their position, and their equal proportion: These Stars they fansied to be the Attendants and Hand-maids to the Moon; and for that reason they lodged them in the Lobby, or Chamber next to her, that to they might be near, and the place more commodious for their fervice; for they were of opinion, that the Stars were Attendants belonging to the Court of the Moon, and not of the Sun, because they appeared in the Night onely, and vanished so soon as the Morning dawned, and the Sun arose.

This Chamber had its Walls and Doors all plated with Silver like that of the Moon; the Roof was painted like a Starry Sky, full of Stars of the greater and lesser Magnitude.

The next Chamber hereunto was dedicated to the Lightning, Thunder and Thunder-bolt, which three they comprehended under one common Name of Thapa, and the distinction of them was denoted by the Adjunct Verb: As for example; when they fay, Did you see the Tlapa? then they mean Lightning; or did you hear the Tllapa? then it is Thunder; or did you see where the Tllapa fell, or the damage it did? then they understand the Thunder-bolt.

All which they did not efteem for Gods, but regarded them as Servants of the Sun, as the Ancients did, who fanfied the Thunderbolt to be the Arms of Pubiters and for that reason they allotted them Lodgings in the Temple of the Sun. the which were adorned all over with Gold: howfoever they formed no Statue or Representation of them, because they knew not how to decypher any Similitude or Hieroglyphick to express them: This triple fignification of Thaps the Spatude or mierogrypnick to express them: I has cripic against action of Thiopa the Spanifb Historians have not understood, for if they had, they might have made a proper use of it, in making our word Trinity more intelligible to the capacity of the Indians, than by some other less fignificant terms which they have used and framed, but have not reached the Imagination or Genius of that People. Thus much I write, and as I have often faid, fo I still aver the same to be true, because I have fucked it in with my milk, and have heard it from my Ancestours; and as to other matters concerning the Thunder, we refer the Reader to what we have also ready declared.

The fourth Chamber they dedicated to the Rain-bow, because they apprehended it to be a Ray, or Emission from the Sun, and for that reason the Incus placed ded it to be a Ray, or Emission from the Sun, and for that reason the Incar placed it in their Arms, or Scutcheors, as a badge of their Family and Alliance; this Chamber was also surinished with Gold, and on the Walls a Rainbow was painted very haturally, with all its colours, which reached from one side to the other; the Indians call it Cuychn, and have it in such Veneration, that when they see it in the Air, they shut their Mouths, and clap their Hands before it; because they have an opinion, that if the Rainbow should discover their Teeth, his Instuences would spoil them, and cause them to rot; the which was one amongst their vulgar Errours, which they held without any reason, or foundation for its perfectly the surface of the s

There was moreover a fifth and last Chamber appropriated to the High-Priest, and other inferiour Priests under him, who attended on the service of the Temple, who were all Incas, descended from the Royal Bloud: This Chamber was not ordained for a room to fleep or eat in, but for a place of audience, or confultation, in what manner to regulate the Sacrifices, and all other matters appetraining to the Services of the Temple; the which Chamber, as all the others, was furnished and adorned with Gold from the top to the bottom.

CHAP. XXII.

Of the Name of the High Priest, and of other parts of this House.

THE Spaniards call the High Priest Vilaoma, by corruption of the true word Villac Umu, which is compounded of Villa, which fignifies as much as to speak or utter, and Umn, which is to divine or foretell; as if we should say, a Soothsayer, or one skilfull in Divination; not that he is to declare his own sentiments, but fuch as by his frequent intercourse and communication with the Sun, and by virtue and privilege of his Priesthood, he shall have received from him, namely, all those Fables which the Devils have uttered through the Organs of their Idols, or by secret voices, sounding in their Sanctuaries, or by the Interpretation of Dreams, or fuch kind of superstitious Rites, have all been esteemed oraculous and mysterious sayings, conveyed to them by the Administrations of the High Prieft.

Of those five Chambers which we have already mentioned, there were three onely that I faw remaining in their ancient state of Walls and Roof; and these alfo were despoiled of their Plates of Gold and Silver; but the other two, which were the apartments of the Moon and Stars were demolifhed, and laid level with the ground. In the outfide of these Walls, which bordered on the Cloisters, were four Niches, or Tabernacles made of free Stone, as the Walls themselves were; and these Niches had cases of Stone cut, and placed within the hollow of the Tabernacle, the which were lined with Plates of Gold, not onely on the top and fides, but on the bottom also; and the corners of these stone-cases, or frames, were all inlaid with pretious Stones, fuch as Efineralds and Turquoifes, because that Countrey neither yields Diamonds, nor Rubies: On great festival Days the Inca did usually sit in one of these Tabernacles, sometimes in one, and fometimes in another, as was appointed for the Festival.

In two of these Tabernacles, in the same Wall which looked to the Eastward, I remember that I observed many little holes in the Cases, or Frames which were emboffed within the Stone, and those which were in the corners reached from one fide to the other; those holes which were in the middle of the Tabernacle, onely marked or pitted the Wall: Enquiring of the Religious which belonged to that House, what these holes meant, they told me, that in the times of Indian Gentilism those were the places in which the pretious Stones were fet: these Tabernacles, and all the Doors, which were twelve in number, that opened to the Cloifter, were all plated with Leaves of Gold, excepting onely the Chambers of the Moon, together with those of the Stars, which, as we have faid, in refemblance of what they represented, were overlaid with Silver

Befides these five principal Chambers (which we have already mentioned to be appertaining to the Temple of the Sun) there were other Rooms of leffer note, which belonged to the Priefts, and the Servants under them, who were made Incas by privilege, because that no other Indian, how great soever he were, though a Curaca, or Lord, had not the liberty to enter within that House, much less was it granted to Women, though Daughters, or Wives of the King himself: The Priests attended to the service of the Temple by Weeks, which they reckoned by Quarters of the Moon; during which time they abstained from the company of their Wives, not departing from the confines of the Temple, eight ther by day or night.

Those Indians which performed the Drudgery of inferiour Services of the Temple, fuch as Porters, Sweepers, Cooks, Butlers, and the like, were the very fame that were Menial Servants and Officers in the Palace of the locus; for thele two Houses of the Father and Son were served with like attendance, excepting onely that in the Temple of the Father no Woman had admission, and in the Palace of the Son no Sacrifices were offered; all other matter had an equality of Grandeur and Majesty.

CHAP. XXIII.

Of the Places where they offered Sacrifice, and where they put off their Shoes before they entred into the Temple. as also of the Fountains which belonged to it.

THE places where they burned their Sacrifices were appointed according to THE places where they burned their Sacrifices were appointed according to the folemnities of them; for fome were offered in one open square, and some in others; for there were many hallowed places belonging to the Temple, in which the Incan ordered the celebration of the Sacrifices, according as their pleasure and devotion directed. That general Sacrifice which was made at the great Festival of the Sun, called Raymi, was offered in the open Market-place of the City; other Feasts of lesser note were celebrated in an open Court before the Temple, where all the People and Nations of divers Provinces, belonging to the Dominion of the Empire, assembled together to keep the Holy-day with Dances and Songs, and other Recteations; but they could not pass beyond that place into the body of the Temple, nor remain there with Shoes on their Feet, because the ground was ballowed, being within the confines, and sanctified limits of the the ground was hallowed, being within the confines, and fanctified limits of the Temple; the which we observe here, to denote how far those boundaries ex-

There were three principal Streets, which ran Northward from the Marker-There were three principal Streets, which ran Northward from the Market-place to the Temple; one of which passed by the brook side, and another, which in my time they called the Prison-street, because the Spaniards made their Prison in it, (which, as I am informed, it since changed;) a third led from a corner of the Market-place to the Temple. There is another Street to the Eastward of these three, which leads also to the same place, and which is now called the Street of St. Auslin; through all which four Streets there was a way to the Temple. Street of Sr. Aufin; through all which four Streets there was a way to the Temple; but the principal Street, and most direct way thither, was that which we call the Street of the Prifon, though the Indian called it the Street of the Sun, because that that being in the middle, and in the streightest line of all the rest; was the common passage by which they went, and carried all their Offerings and Sacrifices to the Temple. There was also another Street which ran East and West, and crossed the other four mentioned Streets, which was the place determined for them, where to leave their Shoes; and shough they intended not to go so far as the Temple, yet that ground being within the Verge of it, no person could pass it, unless descaled, and with bare seet paid his reverence to the hallowed Earth, from which place are above two hundred paces to the Gate of the Temple.

But to return now to the Ornaments of the Temple; there were five Fountains of Water, which ran from divers places through Pipes of Gold; the Cifterns were fome of Stone, and others of Gold and Silver, in which they washed their Sacrifices, as the Solemnity of the Festival appointed. In my time, there was but one of those Fountains remaining, which served the Garden of a Convent with Water; the others were lost, either for want of drawing, or opening, or cleaning, and this is very probable, because to my knowledge, that which belonged to the Convent was also lost for fix or seven months, for want of which Water; the whole Garden was dryed up, and withered, to the great lamentation of the Convent, and the whole (ity, nor could any Indian understand how that Water came to fail, or to what place it took its course.

At length they came to find, that on the West-side of the Convent the Water took its course under ground, and sell into the Brook, which passes through the City; which in the times of the Inc. w had its banks kept up with stones, and the bottom well paved, that the Earth might not fall in; the which work was continued through the whole City, and for a quarter of a League without; the which now, by the carelessness and floth of the Spaniards, is broken, and the pavement displaced, for though the Spring commonly yields not water very plentifully, yet at some times it rises on a sudden, and makes such an incredible inundation, that the force of the current hath disordered the Chanel, and the hor-

In the Year 1558, there happened a great eruption of Water from this Fountain, which broke the main Pipe, and the Chanel, fo that the fury of the Torrent took another courfe, and left the garden dry, and now by that abundance of rubbish and sullage which comes from the City, the chanel is filled up, and not fo much as any mark, or fignal thereof remains.

The Friars, though at length they used all the diligence imaginable, yet they could nor find the ancient Chanel, and to trace it from the Fountain head by way of the Pipes, it was an immense work, for they were to dig through Houses. and deep conveyances under ground, to come at it, for the Head of the Spring was high: Nor could any Indian be found that could give any direction herein, which discouraged them in their work, and in the recovery of the others which anciently belonged to the Temple.

Hence we may observe, the ignorance and inadvertisement of those Indians, and how little the benefit of Tradition availed amongst them; for though it be onely forty two Years at this day fince those Waters for fook their course; ver neither the loss of so necessary a provision as Water, which was the refine the neither the loss of some of their Lives, nor of that stream which supplied the Temple of the Sun, their God, could by Nature, or Religion, conferve in them the memory of so remarkable a particular. The truth is, that it is probable that the Undertakers, or Master-working, of those Water-works, did communicate, or make known to the Priests onely the secret conveyances of those Waters, esteeming every thing which belonged to the Honour and Service of the Temple to be so sacred, that it was belonged to the Honour and Service of the Temple to be so facred, that it was not to be revealed to common ears, and for this reason, perhaps, the knowledge of these waters might dye, and end with the order of Priests. Had any thing remained which was to have been enquired into, as matters of Tribute, or of things relating to the Regalities, or Services, which are secular and profane; there is no doubt but the Memory of the People or Tradition would have given us light therein, as we plainly see in the History of these Countries, which were conserved by appointed, and approved Notaries, though in these days they begin to fail, and wear out of memory, being swallowed up by the modern Histories of this Name Entries. #### CHAP. XXIV.

Of the Garden of Gold, and of other Riches belonging to the Temple, and of many other things in that Empire, after the Fallion of them.

O return now to this Fountain, I fay, that at the end of fix or feven months after it was loft, it happened, that fome Indian. Boys playing about the Stream, discovered an eruption of Water from the broken Pipe; of which they acquainting one the other, at length it came to the knowledge of the Spaniards, who judging it to be the water of the Convent, that had been loft, and diverted from its former course, gave information thereof unto the Friars, who joyfully received the good news, and immediately laboured to bring it again into direct conveyance, and conduct it to their Garden; the truth is, the Pipes lying very deep, were buried with Earth, fo that it cost much labour and pains to reduce it to its right chanel; and yet they were not fo curious or industrious as to trace the Fountain to the Spring Head.

That Garden which now fupplies the Convent with Herbs and Plants, was the Garden which in the times of the Incas belonged to their Palace, called the Garden of Gold and Silver, because that in it were Herbs and Flowers of all forts, lower Plants, and thrubs, and taller Trees, made all of Gold and Silver, together with all forts of wild Beafts, and tame, which were accounted rare and unufual; there were alfo firange Infects, and creeping things, as Snakes, Serpents, Lizards, Camelions, Butter-flies and Snails; also all forts of firange Birds and every thing difposed and in its proper place with great care, and imitated with much cutiosity, like the nature and original of that it represented.

There was allo a Mayeall, which bears the Indian Wheat, of an extraordinary bigness, the feed whereof they call Quinua, likewise Plants which produce lessers, and Trees bearing their several forts of Fruit, all made of Gold and Silver, and excellently well representing them in their natural Shapes. In the Palace also they had heaps or piles of Billets, and Faggots, made of Gold and Silver, rarely well counterfeited. And for the greater adornment and Majefly of the Temple of their God the Sun, they had caft vaft Figures in the forms of Men, and Women, and Children, which they laid up in Magazines, or large Chambers, called Pirva; and every year at the principal fealts the People presented great quantities of Gold and Silver, which were all employed in the adornment of the Temple; and those Gold-smiths whose Art and Labour was dedicated to the Sun, attended to no other work than daily to make new Inventions of rare workmanship out of those Metalls. In short, they made all forts of Vessels, or Utensils, belonging to the Temple, of Gold and Silver, such as Pots, and Pans, and Pails, and Fire-shovels, and Tongs, and every thing else of use and service, even their very Spades, and Rakes of the Garden were made of the like Metall, that with very good reason they might call the Temple, and all the House of the Sun, the Coricancha, or the Ingot of Gold.

In imitation of this Temple at Cozco, they made the Temples which were in the other Provinces of that Kingdom, of many of which, as also of the select Virgins Pedro de Cieça de Leon makes mention in his Observations of that Country; but omits to defcribe either the number of them, or the places, in which they were, but onely fuch as occurred to him in his travels through the great roads leaving those unmentioned, which remained on both hands out of the way; perhaps to avoid a tedious prolixity he might pass them by, in regard that by the model of one, the others may be described.

In the adornment of which Temples the Curacai contended, according to that abundance which their Countries produced of Gold and Silver, and herein they abundance with that for they might both honour their God, and flatter their Prince; by which means all the other Temples were plated with Gold and silver, and might fland in fome competition and terms of comparison with that of

Royal Commentaries.

The nearest Kindred or Relations to the Curacus were made the Priests of those Temples which were in the Provinces, though the Chief Price, or Superintendence over them was an Inca of the Bloud Royal, because it was necessary that he should direct the manner and order of their Sacrifices, after the use and custome of Coscos for in regard they were now to abhor and reject their Sacrifices of Men, and Women, and Children, and were forbidden to eat Man's Flesh, and many other bases their and contact, and were fortuned to can want stein, and many other our-barous Rices of abomination and fuperfittion; it was necessary for them to have the superious guidance of an Ino., lest they should forget the true way, and relapfe back again into their former cultomes. This Superintendency which the Iron exercised was very acceptable to the Indians, for as they effected much of their management both of civil and martial Affairs, fo likewife they believed that they had most need of their direction in religious Worship, from whom all the knowledge thereof was descended to them. And thus much shall suffice to have touched concerning the riches of that Temple; other matters of which may be properly related in their due places.

CHAP. XXV.

Of the famous Temple of Titicaca, and of the Fables and Allegories alluding to it.

A Mongst the many famous Temples, which were dedicated to the Sun in Peru, and which in Ornament and Riches might compare with that of Cozeo; that in the Isle of Titicaca was of chief Fame and Renown. The word Titicaca fignifies the Forest of Lead, being compounded of Titi, which is lead, and Caca, which is a Forest, the Lake in which this Island is situated, hath taken the same name, being about two Musquet shot from the main Land, and is about five or fix thousand paces in compass, where the bear reported, that the Sun their Father first placed his two Children, the Man and Woman, whom he sent into the World to convert Mankind from the Errour of their ways, and to teach and instruct them the Rules of right Reason and Religion. To this Fable they add many others of ancient date, saying, that the Rays of the Sun, after the general Floud, were first seen in that Island, and in that Lake, before they appeared in any other place; and that this Lake is feventy or eighty fathom deep in some places, and about eighty Leagues in compass, the reason they give for not being navigable, or why Boats cannot go upon it, I can fay little unto, onely Blu Valera writes, that there is such quantities of the Magnet, or Load-stone in all parts of it, that hinder the Navigation, or use of the Compass.

By help of this Fable, and his own Ingenuity, the first Inca, Manco Capac, took the advantage to persuade the Indians, that he and his Wife were the Children of the Sun, and that they were placed in it by their Father, that from thence they might proceed into the World, to teach and instruct it in the way of true Religion, as we have at large related in the beginning of this Hiltory. The Incar, Who were Amaucus, or Philosophers, and wife in the politicks, made use of both these Fables, and related them by way of Prophecy: saying, that when the Sun darted his first Rays of Light into that Island, he then gave a fign and promise, that from that place the first Doctrines of Light should iffue; the which promise Book III.

was afterwards accomplished by those Kings, who proceeded thence, and taught was atterwards accompanied by those Kings, who proceeded thence, and taught the World how to cast away the turpitude of their manners, and live by another Law and Rule of Reason. By advantage of these, and other such Inventions, it was not difficult for the Incas to persuade the other Indians of their descent from the Sun, and to confirm their belief by those many benefits and advantages which the Sun, and to confirm their belief by thole many benefits and advantages which their Doctrine and Religion brought with them. On the affurance of thefe two Fables the Inc.u., and all his Subjects did really efteen this Island to be a facred and a holy piece of Ground; and with that opinion they erected a rich Temple on it, all plated with Gold, and dedicated to the Sun; where generally all the Provinces fubjected to the Inca, did yearly offer Gold, and Silver, and pretious Stones, in a thankfull acknowledgment of those two Blessings he had given them in that place; and that Temple being of greater Devotion, had the lame attended of the supplementage in that place; and that Temple being of greater Devotion, had the lame attendence, and Officers belonging to it, as that of Cozco. And fo immense was the quantity of Gold and Silver, which was amassed in that Island, besides that which was cast and framed into Utensils, for the service of the Temple, that the Report which the Indians make of it is incredible, and more to be admired, than believed. Blas Valera speaking of the Riches of this Temple, and of the quantities of Gold and Silver which abounded, after all Vessels and Ornaments were supplied foich the beautiful and the second by the second by the second of the second or the second plied, faith, that he was informed by those Indians who are called Mitmac, and are a Colony who inhabit in Copa-Gavano, that there was fuch a superfluity of Gold and Silver, after all was finished, as might have been sufficient to have raifed and completed another Temple, without other materials whatfoever; and that fo from as those Indians had news of the Invasion of the Spaniards, and were informed that their Errant and Bufiness was to despoil them of their Riches, they demolished their Temple, and threw all the materials, and the immense Wealth of it, into that great Lake.

There is another Story which paffes, not unlike this, That in the Valley of Orcos, which is about fix Leagues from Oocos, towards the Sea of Zur, there is a little Lake of less than half a League round, but very deep, and encompassed with high Woods; It is reported, that when the Indians understood of the Arrival of the Spaniards, they threw a great quantity of the Treasure belonging to Coxco into it, and amongst the rest, that Chain of Gold which Hunyna Capuc caused to be made, of which we shall speak in its due place; upon affurance and belief hereof twelve or thirteen Spaniards, who fojourned at Cozco, not Inhabitants, but Merchants, and Adventurers, entred into an agreement together, on terms of equal benefit and lofs, to possess themselves of that Treasure by draining the Lake for it; in order whereunto they founded the depth, and found twenty three or twenty four fathom water, besides the mudd, which was also deep; then they resolved to open a fluce, or bay, at the lowest ground, or level of the Lake, that so a wide chanel being made for the water to pass into the River of Tucay, the Lake might be fewed or emptied by the great vent it would find by fuch an evacuation; in other parts they could not open it farther, because of the Rocks, and disadvantage of the ground, nor did they lay their Trench open to the top, (which perhaps might have been better,) but to fave charges made a Mine, and cut their Drain under ground. This work was begun in the Year 1557, with great hopes and expectations of Treasure; and being entred about fifty paces within the Earth, they unhappily croffed upon a Vein of hard Rock, at which pecking a long time, they found that they struck more fire out of it, than they drew water; in which having spent much money, time and labour, they at length gave over the work as desperate, and desisted from their Enterprise. I remember that I entred two or three times within the vault, whillt they were working, and have heard it often reported, that the Indians threw infinite Treasure into Lakes, Caves and Mountains, beyond all hopes or possibility of recovery.

Those Kings who were Incas, besides the Riches they bestowed, and encouragement they gave for the adornment of this Temple, they endeavoured much to improve the very Land of this Isle, that so they might render it fertile, and fit to bear Fruit; and that in gratitude to this place, on which their Ancestours deicending from Heaven, had fet their first footsteps, they might enoble it with all forts of good Husbandry and Agriculture: to this end they levelled and cleared it of Rocks and Stones, then they made Walks, and covered them over with good Earth, and Manure brought from far, and made the ground capable to produce Maye, or Indian-Wheat, which by reason of the coldness of the Climate, is not

broduced in that Countrey; this grane, with other feeds they fowed in the Gardens, which they had made, and which yielded good increase, together with a small quantity of Flax, the which Fruits the King sent as facred Presents to the Temple of the Sun, and the felect Virgins at Cozco, with orders to differ them all over the Convents and Temples of his Dominions, of which they fent some grane of this Year to this place, and next Year to the other, which were in high effeem, as Reliques or facred Donatives; and hereof they fowed fome in the Gardens belonging to the Temples of the Sun, and of those Houses which were of publick use within the Provinces; and divided and reparted them amongst the People; some Granes of this Corn they cast into the Granaries of the Sun, and of the King, and into the publick Magazines of Corn, believing that fome divine virtue was contained in it, and that it would bless and increase the Corn with which it was mixed, and conserve it from corruption, and render all more wholfome for humane sustenance; and that Indian who was so happy as to be able to get but one grane of this Maye, to throw into his Heap, was possessed with a certain belief, that he should never want Bread in the whole course of his Life; so superstitions were they in all matters relating to their Religion, and their Incar

Of the Convent of those Virgins who were dedicated to the Sun.

MONGST the many things worthy of Observation, which those Heathen Kings followed in their vain Religion and Gentilisin; the Profession which some of their Women made of perpetual Chaftity, and the Retirements which were built for them in several Provinces are not here to be omitted; and for better understanding who those Women were, to whom they dedicated themfelves, and wherein they were employed, we shall declare very distinctly, because it is a matter which the Spanish Historians touch but slightly, and as the Proverb goes, as the Cat doth a Coal of fire: and particularly we shall here treat of the House at Coxo, because that that was the model or pattern of all the rest.

In that City is a certain Lane, which they call **Lellahaei*, which is as much as the Houfe of the feparated Virgins: This Lane paffed through the two Streets, which lead from the Market-place to the Convent of St. **Dominick*, which was anciently the Temple of the Sun; one of these Streets paffed directly from a Corner of the Market-place, bending on the less thand towards the great Church to the Northward. When, in the Year 1570, that I departed from that City, this then was the chief Street for the Merchants; and the other Street which passes from the middle of the Market-place, where in my time the Prison was, led directly on the right hand to the said Convent of St. **Dominick*: The Front of this House was just opposite to the Market-place, and opened between those two Streets before mentioned; the backside of it bordered on another Street, which crosses Before mentioned; the backside of it bordered on another Street, which crosses Before was a separate pile of Buildings, with the great **Dreat*, or Court-yard, before the Temple. Whence we plainly perceive the mistake of those Writers, who report, that those Virgins had their Lodgings within the Temple of the Sun; and that they were Priestesses, and Affishants to the Priests in their Offertories and Sacrifices. For in regard it was the design and intention of the **Dreat* of separate these Virgins from the conversation, and society of Men; and that as Women were not permitted to enter within the Temple of the Sun, so neither were men allowed admission into the retirements of these Virgins; it cannot be rationally believed that these Virgins could have any other than a diffinct House, distant and disjoined from any other; and for this reason they called them the select, because they were felected apart and chosen with respect to their lineage and beauty; and that for affurance, that they were Virgins at the time of fuch admission into the Monaftery, they were received into that Order at eight years of age, or under

And because these Virgins who belonged to the Monastery at Cosco were dedicated, and as it were effoured to the Sun, It was effectived necessary that they should be of his Lineage and Bloud, that is, Daughters of the meas, or of his Uncles, and fuch who were descended by Father and Mother of the same Lineage and not Bastardized by mixture of humane bloud with divine race, but pure and unflooted; for fince their opinion was, that they were espoused unto the Sun, and that he was to have Children by them, 'twas reason that they should be without foot or blemish, and their bloud pure and undefiled.

These Monks, or Nuns, were commonly about 1500 in Number, governed by grave Matrohs, adultited to the same probession, who had lived and grown old under the fame rules and observance of their Vow: To these were properly committed the care and government of the younger fort, and from this Office they took the Name of Mamacuna, or Mother of the Maids, the word Mama fig. nifying a Mother; and Cuna in composition, care or watchfulness. With this Title their Offices were very agreeable, for some were Abbesses, others Mistresses to instruct the Novitiates, not onely in their Religious Worships, but likewise in Spinning, Weaving, Sowing, and the like employments; forme allowere Porters belonging to the Gates, others took care of the Huswifery, and Management. of the domestick affairs, and to make a provision of Necessaries, with which they were sufficiently supplied out of the Estate of the Sun; for they being his Wives could not be denied a maintenance out of his Revenue.

Of the Rules and Statutes, and Employment of these Selest Virgins.

THey were Reclufes, and for ever thut up, during the whole term of their lives, and obliged to perpetual Virginity; they had no Locutory, or place allowed them at which they might fee or converse with Man or Woman; nor had they other society than one with another; for they held, that the Wives of the Sun were to have no communication with other, than with himself; and this their Seclution was fo ftrict and rigorous, that though the mea might perfonally have claimed this privilege, yet because no other should dare or adventure on this attempt by his example, he also denied himself this liberty; onely the Com. or Queen, with her Daughters, had the freedom to enter in, and vifit this Monaftery; and by them the hea prefented his Salutes, demanding of their health, and what their occasions and necessities required. I once saw this House standing alone, without any other Building before it; for onely that, and the Temple of the Sun, which made up two Streets, and four other great Courts, which had the Sun, which made up two Streets, and four other great Courts, which had been the Palaces of their Kings, remained entire; having been spared by the Indians, out of respect to their God the Sun, and the Indian their Kings, when in a general Insurrection against the Spaniards they set fire, and consumed all the rest of the City. Amongst other rarities of this Building, there was a narrow Gallery, in which two onely could go a-breast, that ran through the whole House; and this was the passage to several Chambers and Apartments on each hand, where the Offices of the House were kept, and where the Women worked: At every one of these Doors was a Portress; and in the farthest Chamber, at the end of the Gallery, was the Apartment for the Wives of the Sun, where none entred the Gallery, was the Apartment for the Wives of the Sun, where none entred besides themselves. This House had its common Gate, which we call the Great

Gate: at which none entred befides the Queen, and fuch as intended to profess the Order.

At the entrance of this Gallery there was a Gate for the common use and service of the House, at which there were twenty Porters always attending to bring in, or carry away whatfoever was needfull; but none of them could pass farther than the fecond Gate upon pain of Death, though they received Commands from within fo to doe; nor could any that was within give fuch Command, or Licence, but on the fame penalty.

BOOK IV.

There were 500 Maidens appointed to attend the Service of these Virgins, who were Daughters of those who had the privilege to be called Ireas; not such as were defeended from the true Line, and pure Bloud of the Royal Incas, for those were effected and separated as Wives, or Spoules of the Sun 5 but such as the First Inca had made Incas by title and privilege, as before related; to which the Fift men had made men by the and privilege, as before related; to which frangers, or those who were afterwards reduced, could not attain. These Maidens had also their Manacana, or Matrons of the same Lineage appointed to them, being such, as having passed their years, and grown old in that House, had part of the care and management thereof committed to them. When the Spaniards had overcome this City of Cocco, and that they divided the publick Buildings amongst themselves for places to dwell and inhabit; one half of this Convent, which belonged to the Offices, fell to the lot of Pedro del Barco, whom in the fequel of this History we shall have occasion to mention; and the other half was the share of the Licenciado de la Gama, who resided there when I was very young; and afterwards it belonged to Diego Ortiz de Guzman, a Gentleman born at Sevil, whom I knew, and left at Cozco, when I departed thence for

Spain,

The principal employment of these Wives of the Sun was to Spin and Weave all the garments which the Inca and the Cora his lawfull Wife wore on their own Persons; they made also all the fine Linen which was offered to the Sun in Sacrifice; and what the Inca wore about his head, which was called Llanu, which was about the breadth of the middle finger, but very thick, and fo long as to take four or five turns about the head, with a coloured List reaching from one temple to the other.

Their Cloathing was a shirt which reached to their knees, called Uncu; the Spaniards called it Cufma, which was not the common name of it, but onely that which a particular Province gave to it: They wore also a square Mantle of about two Foot deep, which served for a Cloak, called Tacolla. Moreover, these Nuns made Purses for the Inca of about a quarter of a Yard square, which they carried under their Arme, hanged by a fine Twift curiously embroidered, of about two fingers broad, and was in fathion of a Ribbon on the left Shoulder, reaching crofs to the right fide: These Purses they called Chuspa, and served them to put their Cuca into, which was an Herb that Indians now commonly eat, but was then fo rare, that none had the privilege to eat of it but the Inca onely, and his Kindred; unless fome Curacas, to whom the King out of a particular favour and affection fent perhaps some Baskets of it every year.

They also made certain Twists of two colours, which were Straw-colour and Carnation, which they called Paycha: these Twists were very fine, of about a Yard long; but were not defigned for service of the Inca, but for others of the Royal Bloud, which they wore on their Heads, binding their Foreheads from one temple to the other.

CHAP. III.

Of the respect they shewed to the Works which these Select Virgins made, and what Law there was against those who attempted on their Chastitv.

LL these Curiosities were the handy-work of these Virgins, made in great quantity for their Spouse the Sun; but because he was not capable to receive or wear those Ornaments on his own Person, they were sent unto the Inca as his lawfull and undoubted Son and Heir, that so he might use them in the stead and place of his Father; the which were esteemed by him as Sacred, and with great reverence and devotion respected by the Subjects of his whole Empire. And if the Greeks and ancient Romans did in the times of their Gentilism adore Juno, Venus and Pallus for Goddefles, it ought not to feem firange if these poor and simple people, who were under the highest circumstances of invincible ignorance imaginable, should with a superstitious zeal, and devout affection, adore and worship whatsoever their Religion taught them to be Divine and Sacred; for they apprehending that these Virgins were Com, or Queens and real Wives of the Sun, could not but shew respect and reverence to whatsoever proceeded from their hands and labour; for which reason, the Incas themselves could not bestow their Works on any that was not an Inca of the true Bloud; for that were a prophanation of fuch holy things, and a direct facrilege to employ divine productions to common and humane fervices. And though, as we have formerly faid. the King gave Vestments to Corracas, and other Governours, as Signals of his grace and favour; yet those were of another fort, as we shall hereaster make ap-

Moreover, the employment and office of these Virgins was to make the Bread. called Cancu, which at the great Festivals of the Sun, named Raymi and Citua. were offered to him in Sacrifice: they also made the Liquour which the Inca and his Kindred drank on the Holy-days of those Festivals called Aca. All the Vessels which were used in this House, such as Kettles, Pots, Jars, and the like, were all made of Gold and Silver, it being reasonable that the Wives of the Sun should live in an equipage agreeable to the quality of fuch a Husband; so that their Garden also was adorned with Trees and Fruit all made of Gold and Silver, with Plants, and Flowers, and Herbs, and Birds, and other Animals, all rarely counterfeited after the manner of those in the Garden of the Sun.

These were the chief employments of those Nuns which lived in the City of Cocco, the other part of their Life and Actions was agreeable to the profession they made of perpetual Virginity, and of Recluses from the rest of the World. they made of perpetual virginity, and of Reculuss from the reft of the World. That Nun who violated her Chaffity, was buried alive, and her Lover hanged. But in regard that (as they faid) a fimple death onely feemed too mean a punishment for 60 exorbitant an offence, which imported no lefs than the violation of a Wife dedicated to the Sun their God, and Father of their Kings; they ordained, that with the Delinquent his Wife and Children, Servants and Kindred, with his very Neighbours and Herds of Cattel, should without any remorfe, competition or lamentations of any her put to death, that all his Eighb and Examples. passion or lamentations of any be put to death; that all his Fields and Farms should be laid defolate, and covered with heaps of stones, that so no Cattel might ever feed more thereon, or ever be more trod with humane feet, which had produced or maintained a wretch fo vile and impious as this accurfed transgreffour.

This was the Law, but it was never put into execution, because none ever did transgress against it: For as the Indians of Peru (as we have said before) were great observers of their Law, and especially devoted to that part which respected their Religion, and the awe and reverence due to their Princes, fo they were very fevere in execution of those punishments which the Law prescribed, adheBOOK IV. ring to the very rigour of the letter without more remorfe or compaffion, than ring to the very figure of the letter without milest tensor or companion, than if they had deftroyed a fwarm of Wafips, or drowned a litter of Whelps; for the lineas defigning their Laws for the Rules of Humane life, would never further than the contraction of the contraction of the life. them to be frostrated or eluded by the boldness of any that attempted to break

CHAP. IV.

That there were many other Houses of these Select Virgins. The leverity of the Law before-mentioned, is proved by Example.

LL that we have faid before had relation to the House of those Virgins at Cozco, who were dedicated to the Sun: But besides this, there were several other Houses for Women of the same profession in divers of the principal Provinces, which the Inca out of his bounty and favour commanded to be built and endowed; but into these, Maids of all conditions and qualities had admission. as well those whose bloud was tainted with common mixture, as those who were of the pure and limpid streams of Royal Bloud. The Daughters also of Curacas, as a mark of favour, were fometimes admitted here; fome Maids also of exact beauty, and rare features, though of the common race, were fometimes also received in, the which both their Fathers and themselves esteemed for an extraordinary favour; but then they were not admitted under the notion of Wives, or Concubines, to the Sun, but of the Inca onely. Howfoever, they referved themfelves with the fame retirement and care as those of the Sun; and were attended with young Maidens for their Servants, and maintained at the charge of the Inca: Their employment also was the same with those at Cozco, being to Spin and Weave, and make Gaments for the Inca, which they performed in great abundance, and in the same manner as we have related of the others: But howsoever, those Vestments were not esteemed so facred, as to be onely appropriated so the Person of the Inca, but were such as the Inca bestowed on his great Lords and Captains, and other Subjects, whenfoever he was pleafed to honour them with fome fignal note, or mark of his favour.

These also had their Mamacunas, or Matrons to oversee them, as those had which lived at Cozco, and were governed by the fame rules; excepting that those who lived at Cocco were all of the true Royal Bloud, and obliged to a perpetual Cloifter and Virginity; but these were Maids of all forts and conditions, provided that they were beautifull, being not defigned for Wives of the Sun, but Concubines to the Inca.

The fame rigour of Law was practifed against those who debauched and defiled the Women of the Inca, as against those who became Adulterers with the Virgins espoused to the Sun; for the crime being the same, required the same punilliment; but as there was never any fuch offence committed, so there was neyer any fuch feverity executed; but to confirm that there was fuch a Law, we have the authority of Augustin de Carate, who in the seventh Chapter of his second Book, discoursing of the causes of the violent Death of Atahualpa, hath these very words, which I have copied out Verbatim, being very much to our purpose. And as (suith he) all the Allegations which were made hereupon were all pronounced by the Tongue of the same Filipillo, he interpreted nothing but what made to his own purpose. What might be the cause which moved him hereunto, can never be certainly determined; though it must be one of these two things, either that this Indian entertained private Amours with one of the Wives of Atabaliba, and expected by his death to enjoy her with more security; which being come to the knowledge of Atabaliba, he complained there of to the Governour, sating, That he was more sensible of that majortune, than he was of of to the Governour, sating. That he was more sengues of that misjorune, than he was of his imprisonment; and that no misery, though accompanied vish Death, could touch him so meanly as this; for that a common indicat of baselectrastion, should esteem him at of mean a rate, as to make him the subject of so high an assertion, in despish of that Law of their Country, which assigned no less a punishment for it, than that such offendour should be burnt alive, with his wives, Fathers, Children, Brothers, and all the rest of his Kindred, nay the very Flocks and Herds of such an Adulterer were to be destroyed, his Lands laid has the very loves and steer a y face in addicated from the very Roots, his Houses demoli-foed, with many other inflittions of the like nature. Thus far are the words of Angustin de Carate, which serve to confirm what I have wrote concerning this matter, and indeed I was pleased to have my words avouched by the testimony of this Spanish Cavalier: For though other Hiftorians mention this Law, yet they onely fay, that it was with the Death of the Offendour, omitting that of his Wife, and Father, and Relations, and all the other Solemnities of this punishment; whereby we may understand how grievous that offence was esteemed; and how deeply that poor Ima Arabnapa relented it, when in the Agony of his Heart, he said, That he selt it more than his Imprisonment; and all other inselicities, though attended ded with Death it felf.

Those Women who had the honour to be extracted from these Houses for Concubines to the King, were made uncapable of ever returning thither again. but remained in the Court as Ladies and Attendants on the Queen, until fuch time as they were diffinified, and licence given them to return into their own Countries; where for ever afterwards they were provided with Houses and Revenue agreeable to their Quality; and to the Dignity and Honour they had acquired by having been Miltreffes to the Inca. Thole who could not attain to this Honour, were obliged to remain in their Cloifter until they were ancient, and then had liberty either to continue till the time of their Death, or to return to their own Countrey, where they were treated with fuch respect as was due to the profession they had made.

CHAP. V.

Of the Quality and Ornament of these Select Virgins, and that they were not to be given unto any person whatsoever in Marriage.

THose Virgins which were dedicated or designed for the present King, had the Title after his Death of Mothers to the Successor, with the Addition also of Mannacuna, which was a Name properly belonging to their Office, which obliged them to teach and overfee the young Novices, who were admitted for Concubines of the New Inca, and treated by them as their Children and Daughtersin-law. Every one of these Convents had its Governour or Superiour, who was an Inca, and whose business it was to provide all Necessaries for the use of these Wives of the Inca; for though in reality they were but Concubines, yet in refrect and courtefie they gave them the Honourable title of Wives. In every one of these Houses belonging to these Maidens, separated for the use of the Inca; all their Utensils and Services of the House were made of Gold and Silver, as those were which belonged to the Wives of the Sun, and to the famous Temple, and (as we sliall hereafter declare) to the Royal Palaces; for indeed all the Gold and Silver, and pretious Stones which were found and amaffed in that great Empire, were, for the most part, employed to no other use, than to the Service and Adornment of the Temples of the Sun, which were very numerous, and of the Cloifters of those Virgins, which were equally considerable, and to embellish the Royal Palaces with agreeable pomp and magnificence; the quantity confumed in the Services of Curacus, and great Men was little, and that chiefly in their Cups. or drinking Vessels, which was also limited and moderated according to such a de-gree of Weight and Number as the luca was pleased to allow them; there was also some small matter licensed for their Garments and Cloathing, when the grand Festivals were celebrated.

It is a great errour and mistake of those who report, that any of these separated Virgins might lawfully be given for Wives to the great Commanders and Caprains by any favour or dispensation of the luca; for being once dedicated and confectated for Wives of the luca, and admitted to that profession, they were ever after rendred uncapable of to low a condescention as to own any other Husband; for that were to prophane that Sacred Character whereby they were deband; for that were to propriate that sacred Character whereby they were de-dicated to the Inca, and an injury to the Woman, who thereby would be forced to renounce all the grandeur and privileges the enjoyed, under the Reverend Title of one Married to the Inca, that the might receive the lefs honourable condition of a private perfon. And fince it was a fundamental Law amongst them, That on a private perion. And infect was a limitation to be offered to their Kings, who, as we have faid, were honoured and adored by them under the Notion of Gods.

CHAP. VI.

What Women those were whom the Inca presented and bestowed in Marriage.

THE truth is, there were fome Women, of whom the Inca made Preferrs to fuch Curacas and Captains, who by their Services had merited rewards from him; but then these were but the Daughters of other Curacas, which the Inca took from them to bestow in Marriage upon those who had deserved well from him, which feemed a favour to them both; unto the one that the bica would youchfale to receive and prefer his Daughter; and to the other, that he was plea-fed to bestow her on him with his own hand, being for that reason esteemed pre-tious; for not so much the gift, as the Donor being regarded, rendred the least prefent from the Ine's hand equal to the highest treasure, as if it had something of Divinity conferred with it. Sometimes, though but seldom, the Inew preferred their natural Daughters of the Royal Bloud to the Curacas, and Governours of Provinces for Wives, as fignals of his favour, and as engagements to them to continue in their Loyalty; of which fort the Inca having many to bestow abroad, had no necessify to have recourse to those for a supply, who were entred in the Sacred and Royal Foundations; for that would have been a diminution to their exalted Degree, a violation to their Religion, and an impiety to mix divine race with prophane Bloud.

Of other Women, who conserved their Virginity, and of Widows.

Besides these Virgins, who lived Recluses in Cloisters, under the Vow of perpetual Chastity, there were many other Women of Royal Bloud, who lived in retirement, and vowed to conserve their Virginity, though with liberty to go abroad, and visit their nearest Relations, and assist the sick, and Women in their Travels, and to be present at the Ceremony of shaving, when they gave a Name to their first-born. These Women were held in great Esteem and Veneration, for their Chastity, and purity of their Lives; giving them by way of Excellency, or of some Vertue Divine, the Title of sector, which signifies something of supereminent Sanctity; and this their Chastity was not pretended, or seigned, but true and real; for if any falsity or hypocrisic were discovered in it, they burnt them alive, or threw them to the Lions to be devoured. I remember that I knew one of these that was very ancient, and had never been married, which they called Occlo; sometimes she visited my Mother, and, as I have heard, she was her Aunt by the Grandstather; I can say, I am a witness of the great respect they bore towards her, and especially my Mother, who for her Relation, Years and Vertue, behaved her self towards her with all imaginable Reverence and Veneration.

Nor must we here omit the Modelty and Vertue of Widows in general, who for the first Year of their Widowhood kept themselves retired, and free from all conversation, there being very sew of those, who had not Children, that married again, much less those who were provided with them, did ever return to a second Marriage, but lived with Continence and Chastity; for which reason the Laws were favourable towards them, commanding Labourers to plow and cultivate their Lands before those of the Caracas, with many other privileges, which the favour of the Boca indulged to them. The truth is, it was a disparagement for a Man, who was not a Widower himself, to marry with a Widow, for as they said, he lost I know not what quality and repute by such a condescention. And this is what is most observable in reference to Virgins, and Widows, and modest Women.

CHAP. VIII.

Of their Marriages in general, and how their Houses were governed.

IT will now be proper in this place for us to treat of their Marriages, and how they were joined together in the Kingdoms and Provinces subjected to the Inca: In order hereunto it is to be noted, that every year, or every two years, the King commanded his Officers to take an account of such young Men and Maidens of his Lineage, as were marriageable, within the City of Cocce, that so they might be matched together; the Maidens were to be of eighteen to twenty years of age, and the young Men from twenty to twenty four, and upwards; under which age they were not esteemed to be of years of consent, for that it was necessary they should be of a ripe age and judgment to govern their Families, which could not be done by Children in their minority. At the Ceremonies of Matrimony the Inc. frood between the two Perfons, and cafting his Eyes upon them both, he called the Man by his Name, and then the Woman, and taking their hands into his, joined them together, which being the bond of Matrimony, the Function was performed, and being by the Inca configned to their Parents, they went home to the House of the Bridegroom's Father, where the Wedding was kept for four or fix days with great rejoycing: This was the manner and form of their legal Marriages, which for the great Favour and Honour the Inca had performed in this Function, were called in their Language, the Inca had performed in this Function, were matched those of his own Lineage, then the next day following the Officers for this Employment joined the Neighbourhood of the City, with respect to that Division, which we have mentioned at the beginning of this History, of the Upper and the Lower Cozeo.

The Houles which were appointed for the Habitation of the new married Couples, who were Incan, (concerning whom we treat at prefent) were prepared by the Indians of those Provinces, whose charge it was, according to such provincing as was made in that case. All the Furniture and Utensils of the Houses were provided at the charge of the Parents; every one of their Kindred giving them something towards House-keeping, which was all the Ceremony or Sacrifice performed at that Solemnity; and though many Spanish Historians report diversorher barbarous Customs in use at Marriages, it is for want of a diffinct knowledge of the Rites of one Province from another; for in those Provinces indeed which were remote from Cozco, and where the Seigniority and Rule of the Incus had not as yet arrived, there may have been many abfurd and impious Ceremonies in use, which fince have been corrected, and abolished by the more wise and refined Government of the Incas.

But as to the true Politicks of the Inc.u, they observed no other Form of Marriage than this before recited, according to which the Curacus in their Provinces, and the Governours in their respective Divisions conformed their discipline, and as Fathers and Lords of their Countrey, practifed it in the same manner as slid the Inca. And though the Inca, who was Governour, was present at the Marriages which the Curaca solemnized; yet it was not to interpole, or diminish the Authority of the Curaca solemnized; yet it was not to interpole, or diminish the Authority of the Curaca had performed by virtue of the power he exercised over his own Vassals. When the Commonalty, or ordinary fort married, the Community of the People were obliged to build, and provide them Houses, and the Parents to sumish them. It was not lawfull for any to marry out of his own Province, or People; but, as the Tribes of Israel, they were obliged to match within their own Lineage and Nation; and excepting onely Sisters, they joined promiscuously together, like Sheep of the same flock; so that the People of a Province were not allied onely by Nation, but by Kindred and Bloud. By which it appears, that it was not lawfull for any to change his Countrey or Habitation, or pass the limits of his Division, or Decurion, but to keep limites close to his People and Families; for in regard the Assemblies within the Community were obliged to build the Houses of the new married, it was their own duty to conserve them in Repair, and not to wander without the Barrier, and Confines of their Parentage.

CHAP. IX.

That the Prince, who was Heir apparent, was to marry his own Sifter, and the reasons which they gave for it.

Having now declared the manner in general, and the way how the common Indians married; we shall in the next place proceed to treat of the Marriage of the Prince, who was Heir apparent. In explanation of which it is to be noted, of the Prince, who was rien apparent. In explanation of which it is to be noted, that it was the most ancient Custome, and fundamental Law of those Kings, that the Prince, who was Heir, should marry with her that was his own Sister by Father and Mother, and she onely was capable of being his Legitimate Wife, whom they called Cost, which is as much as Queen, or Empress, and the Eldest Son of these two was allowed for the true and lawfull Heir of the Kingdom.

Theo two was anowed for the due and rawful refer of the Milgoom.

The Original of this Law and Cuftome was derived from the first Inca, Mamo Capue, and his Wife, Mamo Octo Huaco, who feigning themselves to be the Children and descended from the Sun, and to be Brother and Sister, it was therefore concluded by all the Indians, (who perfectly believed this Story) that by the example of these two, the same Rule was to be observed in the succession of all future Ages; and this they confirmed by another Example of the Sun and Moon them-Ages; and this riey commined by another example of the sun and Moon themfelves, who being Brother and Sifter, were joined in Marriage; and therefore this ferved for an undeniable Authority and Argument to prove the Legality of fuch a Marriage, by an inflance fo convincing, as that of these Deities: Yet for want of such assume the Prince might then marry with the nearest of Kindred, fuch as his Coufin-German, or Aunt, who, for want of Heirs male, were capable of inheriting the Crown, according to the Cuffome in Spain.

For want of Heirs male by the first Sister, the Prince might marry with the fecond, or third, and fo on, untill he met with one that produced fuch iffue: and fecond, or third, and so on, until he met with one that produced such iffue: and this Rite was punctually observed, and maintained to be legal, from the example of the Sun and Moon, and of the first bear and his Sister, and from that Rule which enjoined them to keep the Streams of Royal Bloud pure and unmixed, lest they should incur the impiety of mixing Divine Bloud with Humane Race. And because the right of this Inheritance came as well by the Mother as the Eather, the same could not be conserved, unless they both concurred to make an Heir with an undoubted Title. Hercunto they added farther, that the Majesty of the Queen could not be communicated to any other, unto whom it did not appertain by Nature; for that her Conjunction and Union with the King could not render her capable of fuch a Character, which was to be worshipped and adored in the place of a Deity, for that were to commit Idolatry, by giving Divine Worthip to a Humane Creature.

Befides the lawfull Queen those Kings might have many Concubines, both of their own Kindred, to the fourth Degree, and also of Strangers; but the Children by them were observed with different degrees of respect; the Sons by the Kinswomen were effected legitimate, having no mixture of common Bloud, which quality was ever effeemed with high Veneration, when those by Strangers were accounted Baffards; and though they had fome respect shewn them above that of common degree, yet it was not with fuch exteriour and interiour Devotion, as to those of purer Bloud, who were accounted Gods, when these were onely honoured as Men. So that the King had three forts of Children, one by his Sifter and Wife, who were legitimate, and capable of the Succeffion; another fort was by his Kintwomen of the fame Bloud; and a third by Strangers, who were reputed Natural and Baffard-Sons.

CHA

Of the different manners of inheriting Estates.

 $\mathbf{F}^{\mathrm{OR}}$  want of Issue male by the legitimate Wise, the Law then was, that the Eldest of the true bloud should succeed, as it happened in the case of  $\mathit{Manco}$ Inca a Hunfear, as we shall hereafter make appear in its due place, for in no wise it would be permitted that a Bastard should inherit; and for want of lawfull Sons of the bloud, the Inheritance fell to the next of Kindred, provided he were truly descended by Father and Mother.

By reason of this Law Atabualpa destroyed the whole Race of the true and Royal Bloud, both Men and Women, (as we shall relate in its due place;) for he being a Baftard, and therefore uncapable to inherit, made way to his ufurned Kingdom by the death of the lawfull Heirs, left one of them remaining alive. should recover it again from his Power. All those of the Bloud married together, to the fourth Degree, that so the Generation of them might multiply to great numbers; onely the eldeft Sifter was referved for the King, it not being lawfull for any to take her befides himfelf. The eldeft Son always inherited the Kingdom for a feries of twelve Kings, who fucceeded without interruption, untill the State niards invaded them.

Howfoever amongst the Curacas, or Lords over Vassals, a different Rule and Custome was observed; for in some Provinces the Eldest Son succeeded, in others the most beloved, and esteemed for his Vertue, and Astability was the qualification required, of which the People being Judges, the Government feemed rather Elective than Hereditary. This Law was a curb to the Sons of the Curacus, restraining them from Tyranny, and an obligation to be vertuous; for in regard the Dilpofal of the Inheritance depended on the pleafure of the People; the Sons contended in kindness towards their Subjects, and every one laboured to render himself, by his Valour and Gentleness, the most beloved and acceptable to the People.

In some Provinces the Sons inherited according to their Birth, as when the Father dyed, the Eldest Son succeeded, then the second, then the third, and so forward; and when all the Brothers were extinct, the Inheritance fell to the Eldest Son of the Eldeft Brother, and to fucceffively; fo that hence appears the miftake of a certain Spanish Historian, who says, that it was the common Custome of all Peru, that the Brothers of the King should gradually succeed one after the other; and that all of them being dead, then the Kingdom afcended again to the Eldeft Son of the eldest Brother; which Errour proceeded from a misunderstanding of the true difference between the manner of inheriting by Incas, and Curneas. For though the Incas did reduce and Subdue many Provinces to their Power, yet they did not alter their Customes, and ancient Laws, unless they interfered with their Religion, and their own fupreme and absolute Jurisdiction; but rather they confirmed many of those Customs which were good and laudable; particularly that whereby the most deserving Son was chosen to the Government, it seeming a four and incitement to Vertue, to have Power and Grandeur fet up for the Prize and Reward of their Merit: the which appeared to reatonable, that a certain Inca King defired once to have introduced this Custome into his own Family, and in despight of their own severe Law of Primogeniture, have made his Sons depend There is a People about fourty Leagues to the Eaftward of Cozco, which I have been amongft, of the Nation of Quechas, fome call them Sutement, where a particular inflates between the Eaftward of Cozco, which I have been amongft, of the Nation of Quechas, fome call them Sutement, where a particular inflates between the Cozco of the Nation of C ticular inftance happened, relating to the different manner of inheriting in that Countrey. The Curaca of that People, called Don Garçia, finding himself at the point of death, called for his four Sons, who were Men grown, with the Nobles of his Province, and admonished them by way of his last Words and Testament, that they should observe and keep that Law of Jesus Christ which they had lately received, and for ever praise and thank God for sending them so inestimable a benefit and honour, and ferve the Spaniards for having been the means and inftruments of such Divine Revelations, and that they should serve and obey their Master with singular Association, to whose lot and fortune it should fall to be their Lord and Governour; lastly, he told them, that since it was the Custome of their Countrey to elect the most vertuous unto their Government, he charged them to Countrey to elect the moit vertuous unto their Government, he charged them to make choice of that Person amongst his Sons, whom they esteemed the most deferving, and that in case none of them appeared worthy of their paternal Succession and Honour, that then, passing them by, they should chuse such a Person from amongst themselves, whom they reputed of greatest Honour and Worthing ness: for that fince nothing was so dear to him as the common Good, and Benefit of his People, he defined not the promotion of his Children farther than as it tended to that end and defign: All which a Prieft, who had been his Confeffour, reported as a remarkable Testament and Passage in those barbarous parts.

CHAP. XI.

Of their Ceremonies when they weaned, and shaved, and gave Names to their Children.

THE Incas, when they weaned their Eldest Sons, they made great Feasts and rejoycing, which they did not observe for their Daughters, or second or third Sons, at least not with that solemnity; for the order of Primogeniture of Males was in high Esteem with the Incu, and by their Example with all their Subjects.

They weaned them at two years of age, and upwards, and then clipt off the Hair of their Heads, and with that gave them their Names: At which ceremony the Kindred affembled, and he that was to impose the Name, shore off the first lock of the Infant's Hair. Their Sciffers were made of a Flint, for as yet the Indians were not arrived to a better Invention; after the God-father had fnipped his lock, the rest of the Kindred did the like, one after the other, according to their Age and Quality; and when the Infant was quite shorn, then the Name was given, with the Prefents which they brought; for some gave him Garments, and clothing, others bestowed Cattle, others Arms of divers Fashions, others Cups of Gold and Silver to drink in: the which was performed onely towards the Princes of the Royal Bloud; for that the Commonalty were not permitted this Honour, unless by particular Privilege or Dispensation.

After this Ceremony was ended, then came in their drink, for a dry Feast was accounted dull, and with Singing, and Dancing, they paffed the whole Day, until Night parted them, which Jollity being the next day renewed, continued for three or four days, according to the quality of the Parents; the like Ceremony was observed, when the locks of the young Prince, and Heir apparent, were clipt, at which the High Priest of the Sun assisted, and was the first to cut his Hair; moreover at this folemnity the Curacus of the whole Kingdom, either in Person, or by their Deputies appeared, and were affilting at this Festival, which continued for the space of at least twenty days, offering their Presents of Gold, and Silver, and pretious flones, and what elfe was curious and rare, in their refrective Provinces.

In refemblance hereof (because it is natural for People to imitate their Prince) the Curacas, and generally all the Nations of Peru followed this Example, in some proportion agreeable to their Quality and Ability; and this was accounted one of their most jolly and merry meetings.

Roval Commentaries.

That they educated their Children without any tenderness.

S well the Incas, as the Commonalty, both rich and poor, bred up their A Children with the least of tenderness and delicacy that was possible: for fo foon as an Infant was born, they washed it in cold water, before they swathed it in is Mantles; and then every morning they bathed it in cold water, and formetimes exposed it to the dew of the night; perhaps the Mother would sometimes out of tenderness spirit the water out of her mouth on the Child, and so wash it; but generally they had an opinion, that cold and exercise did corroborate and strengthen the Body and Limbs: their Armes they kept swathed, and bound down for three months, upon supposition, that to loose them sooner, would weaken them; they kept them always in their Cradles, which was a pitifull kind of a frame, fet on four legs, one of which was shorter than the rest, for convenience of rocking; the Bed was made of a fort of course knitting, which was something more foft than the bare boards, and with a ftring of this knitting they bound up the Child on one fide, and the other, to keep it from falling out.

When they gave them fuck they never took them into their Lap or Armes, for if they had used them in that manner, they believed that they would never leave crying, and would always expect to be in Armes, and not lie quiet in their Gradles; and therefore the Mother would lean over the Child, and reach it the Breaft, which they did three times a day, that is, at morning, noon and night, and unless it were at those times, they never gave it suck; for they said, that not accustoming it to set hours, would cause it to expect suckling the whole day, and be never quiet, but when the Breast was at the Mouth; which causes frequent be never quiet, but when the Breatt was at the Mouth; which causes frequent vomits and pewkings, and made them, when they were grown Men, to be gluttons, and drunkards; for we fee, faid they, in other Creatures, that they adminifer their Dugs and Nipples to their Young at certain hours and featons. The Mother always nurfed her own Child, for though the were a Lady of the highest degree, the would never fuffer her Infant to be nourifhed with the milk of another, unleis in the case of sickness, or some other infirmity; and during the time of their nursing, they abstained from the Bed of their Husbands, as that which would curdle their milk, and make the Child a Changeling. Such as were thus transferred to stranger Nurse, were called Anglea, which is a participle of the preterpersect tense, and is as much as to say, one denied, or renounced, or changed by its Parents; and by way of Metaphor the younger fort would reproach one the other with that word, intimating that his Miftrefs shew'd more favour to his Rival than to himfelf; to utter that word to a married man were a high affront, being one of those five words that are scandalous, and will bear an Action. I knew once a Palla, or Lady of the Bloud Royal, who was forced to give her Daughter to be fuckled by another; the faithless Nurse proving with Child, her Foster-child fell into a Confumption and Convultions, and became nothing but Skin and Bones; the Mother finding her Daughter in this manner made Amlea, at the end of eight months after, when the had almost dried up her milk, the reftored her Infant to her own natural Breaths, which fetched down her milk again, and applying an Unguent of Herbs to the Shoulders, the Infant recovered, which was before given over, as in a desperate condition; such is the virtue of the Mother's Milk, that there is nothing more medicinal, and nothing more reftorative than that natural fuftenance.

If the Mother had a fufficient flock of Milk, the Child never received any other nourifhment than that, untill the time it was weaned; for they were of opinion, that all other forts of food created nothing but crudities and indigeftions. When it was time to take it out of the Cradle, they made a little pit for it in the floor, which reached to the Breaft, in which they put it, with some old clouts to make it fost, to which the Child being inured, did not trouble the Mother's Armes, and having some sew play-things thrown before it, it pleased and contented it self without the least disturbance; and so unwilling were they to accultome it to the Lap, that though it were a Child of the greatest Curaca of the Kingdom, it was not treated otherwise; and that when it was grown so big as to crawl about, they would use it to suck upon its knees at one Breast, and then teach it to creep about to the other, but would never take it into the Armes. The Woman in Child-bed was treated yet more hardily than was the Child; for so so sa she had brought forth, she went to the next stream, or to some cold water in the House, where she washed her self and her Infant, and afterwards applied her self to her domestick Affairs, without any concernment whatsoever: They had no use of Midwives, or others, at their Labours, and if any did affist, the was rather a Witch, or Enchantres, than a Midwise. And this was all the custome and manner in Pern, which was equally practified by the Rich and Poor, Nobility and Commonalty, both at the Birth of their Children, and breeding them up afterwards.

CHAP. XIII.

Of the Huswifery of the married Women.

THE married Women always employed themselves at home in spinning and weaving Wool in the cold Countries, and of Cottons in the hot, every one spinning and making Cloaths for themselves, their Husbands, and Children; sowing was the least of their work, either for Men or Women, for their thread was bad, and their needles worse; notwithstanding whatsoever they wove, whether Wool, or Cotton, all was spun, and twined into threads. All their Cloth was made of four threads, and not woven wider or longer, than just as much as was sufficient to make a Mantle, Shirt, or Wastcoat; their Vestments were not cut out, or shaped, but all of a piece, after the manner that they came from the Loom; for before they began to weave them, they designed the proportion of length and breadth, which they intended to give them; so that they had need neither of Taylors, Hosses, nor Shomakers, for they had no need of those things which we make necessaries, and their Women took care of their Houses and Clothing, onely the Men were to provide the Hose, or Stockings, and Arms; and though the meas of the Royal Bloud, and such as were Curacus, and rich Men, had Servants to perform all these works for them; yet sometimes for divertisement, and in complyance with the Prosession which their Law enjoyned them, they sometimes did not disclain to work themselves, and make a pair of Breeches, or Stockins, or an Arrow, or some other fort of Arms; but as to the Labours of the sield both Men and Women, did jointly concur in their affistence one of the other.

In some Provinces far distant from Cozco, where the Lands were ill manured, there the Women laboured in the Field, and the Men remained at home to spin and weave; but my Discourse is here of those Countries onely to which the Power and Jurisdiction of the Ineas did extend, for other parts were so barbarous, and void of all humanity, that it were not worth our time or labour to give an account of their Customs or Manuers. The Instan Women were so addicted to spinning, and so unwilling to lose time from their Labour and Work, that as they walked from the Villages to the City, and so in their return home, and also in their Visits, and Conversation together, they still made use of their Spindle and Reel; for this was the constant employment of the common People, but the Pallats, or Ladies, who were of the Royal Bloud, whensever they made their Visits, they made their Serving-Maids carry their Spindles and work with them, and during their Vifits, not to loofe time, or be idle, they fipun and worked as they difcourfed; their Spindles were made of Canes, as we in Spain have them of Iron, they were crooked, but not hollow at the point, as ours are: with their thread they made a kind of Filleting, which they wound in upon their Spindles, twifting it with the fingers of their left hand; their Diftaff they carried in their left hand, and not at their girdle; being about a quarter of a yard long, and held between two of their Fingers, and then with both hands they formed the fineneß of their thread, and cleared it of foulness, but did not wet it at their mouths, because in my time they spun nothing there besides Wool and Cottons; nor do they make any great riddance of their work, because their Instruments and Tools are bad, as we have already declared.

CHAP. XIV.

How the Women made their Visits; how they worked; and that common Whores were permitted amongst them.

When any Woman, that was not a Pulla, though she were the Wise of a Curaca, who is a Lord that hath command over his Subjects, came to make a Visit to a Pulla, who was a Lady of the Bloud Royal; so soon as the first Salutations and Complements were ended, she presently asked whether she had any Work for her, or Service to command her; for she carrying not her Work with her, did seem to intimate, that the pretended not to so much familiarity as to come onely for Converse, but as an inferiour, to demand wherein she might be efterned usefull in her service. The Pulla, to make a courteous return to this humble proffer, would usually give her some of the same work which she, or one of her Daughters was then working; for to have put any thing else into her hand, which her Maids were doing, would have equalled her Visitant with them, which in this manner was a Complement, and a courteous preferring her to some degree of equality with her self and her Daughters. Such was the courtese and obliging carriage of one to the other; for it was the design and fashion in that state, for the Superiours to carry themselves with an affable and winning behaviour towards their inferiours, and for them with all Modesty and Observance to honour and respect their superiour Magistrates and Rulers; which was the common practice of all, even from the suca, who was King, to the meanest Peasant, or Shepherd, whom they called Ltammichec.

The Spanish Women, which came afterwards to live at Cozco, imitated this cuftome, after the manner of the Indian Women, carrying always their Work with them, whenfoever they came to make their Vifits; and this fathion was in use amongst them to their great commendation, untill such time as Francisco Hernandee began his Civil War, which as it introduced nothing but Tyranny and Curelty, so it abolithed this laudable custome, and discountenanced all vertuous and innocent practices. I forgot to mention the great care they had in mending their Clothes, in case they were broken by any accident, as torn by a Nail, or burnt with a coal of fire, for then they prefently derned it up again with their needle made of a Thorn, and with thread of the same colour; and bringing it again to the Loom, they so neatly wove in the Thread, that it could not be seen where the rent was made; and in this matter they thought they had more wit than the Spanjards, and would laugh at the patches they laid on their Clothes: The truth is, the Web which the Indians wove, was different to the fabrick of Cloth which the Spaniards made, and would not bear the fame fort of mending. It is also obfervable, that the Fire-hearths which the Indians used to dress their meat in, were a kind of Ovens, made of clay, bigger or less, according to the Wealth or Estate people,

of the Master: the Fire vented it self at the mouth of these Ovens, and on the top was a place for two or three Dishes, in which they set them to stew; and was so very a great convenience for their Cookery, both in dressing their Meat well, and saving their Wood; that it seemed the most ingenious of all their contrivances; and therefore it was strange, that the Spaniards, when they came in amongst them, should despite and destroy this invention.

To avoid greater evils, the Incas thought fit to permit common Whores to live amongle them; but then they were not to remain in the Gity, but in little Huts without in the Fields, feparate from all fociety that fo by their convertation they might not have opportunity to corrupt other Women: the Name they gave them was Pampayruna, which fignifies both their profession and place of residence; Pampa is a Countrey or open place; and Runa properly is a Person, either Man or Woman; so that these two words in composition, are as much as one who lives alone in the Field; and as we say, a Hedge-whore; and that as the Fields are open, so is her Body, and embraces to receive any one who hath an appetite to come to her. The Men treated these Women with all sort of contempt and scorn; and the Women were not so much as to name them, under penalty of incurring the same title and censure; and of having their Heads publickly shorn, of being stigmatized for infamous, and divorc'd from their Husbands: they never called them by other name, than that of Pampayruma, which is as much as Common Harlot.

CHAP. XV.

The Inca Roca, the fixth King, subdues many Nations, and, amongst others, the People of Chancas and Hancohuallo.

THE Father being dead, his Son Inca Roca (whose Name, as Blas Vatera says, fignifies prudent and considerate) took upon him the Government, binding his Head with the coloured Wreath; and having accomplished the Solemnies of his Father's Funeral, he made a progress into all parts of his Dominions, to visit, and settle, and order what was there amiss; in which Journey he passed the three first years of his Reign: And then determining to proceed farther in his Conquests, he ordered sufficient force to be levied, and therewith passed on the side of Chinchassyu, which lyes Northerly from Cozco. He commanded also that a Bridge should be made over the River Apprimace, which is in the great Road from the City of Cozco to the King's Town; for that he being now King, it seemed too low and mean for him to transport his Army over the River on Floats, as he had done when he was Prince; being more Great and Royal to erect the fix'd convenience of a Bridge, which for better uniting a correspondence with the Provinces lately conquered, was now become almost necessary.

The Bridge being finished, he departed from Cozco with an Army of twenty thousand Men, under the Command of four Major-Generals, ordering his Men to March three a-breaft over this Bridge; which being a new device, and not before practifed, was Recorded to the Honour of his Memory. Thence he proceeded to the Vale of Amancay, or the Cowslip Vally, because of the great quantities of them which grow in those parts; this Flower is in the fathion of a Bell, and in that Countrey are of a greenish colour, smooth, without Leaves; and for their similitude with the Cowslip, the Spaniards gave them that name. From Amancay he took to the right hand, towards the Mountain Cordibers, which overtops the snowy desart, and between that and the great Road he met some few people, whom he reduced under his Dominion, the which were called Tucnara and Quinnualla; then he came to Cochacalla, where he made some stay and aboadand from thence he proceeded to Curampa, and, without difficulty, subdued that people, because they were sew in number; from Curampa he came to the Province called Antahus/la, which is inhabited on both fides of the way for the fince of fixteen or feventeen Leagues, by a people both rich and warlike: This Nation is called Chanca, boafting themselves to be descended from one Lean, whom they efteemed and adored for a God; and at their great Festivals, both before and after they were subdued by the Incas, they carried twenty four Pictures in Procession, painted after the manner of Hercules, with a Lion's skin, and a Man's head: I remember I faw these Pictures once brought forth on Corpus Christis clay. or the Feaft of the Holy Sacrament. Under this denomination of Chanca many other Nations were comprehended, as Hanco hualla, Utunfulla, Uramarca, Villea and others; all of which make their boafts of being descended from different Origin nals; some from this Fountain, others from that Lake; every Nation esteeming that for their God, and thereunto offering Sacrifice, from whence they owned and derived their Pedigree; the Ancestours of these people were said to be come from far, and to have conquered many Provinces in their paffage untill they arrived at the Countrey of Antahuaylla; the which they subdued by force of Arms. and expelled the ancient Inhabitants of it; and afterwards gaining much Land from the Quechuas, they drove them up, and straitned them in their Ouarters. made them pay a Tribute, which they exacted with the highest Tyranny, besides many other famous Archievements, of which their posterity did greatly glory.

Of all which the Inca Roca being well informed, he thought them worthy of his Conquest; so that so soon as he arrived on the Confines of Antabuaysta, he difpatched his usual Summons to the Chancas, requiring them to submit to the Offfigring of the Sun, or otherwise prepare themselves for battel. These people as sembling together to consider of these Summons, were divided into two several Parties and Opinions.' Some maintained that they ought not to refuse to receive the Inca for their Lord, who was descended from the Sun; others who boasted of their Lineage from Leon, were of a contrary perfuation; for being Allied to Leon, and Mafters of many Countries and People, judged it a disparagement to be subjected to any other, or to be cheated with a fabulous pretence of the Sun and his Funily; and that it was more agreeable to the Banners which they carried. and the ancient Honours which they had acquired by the Conquest of so many Nations, rather to fubdue others, than tamely to fubmit to an unknown Mafter: and forgetting all their ancient bravery, poorly and bafely to yield themselves at the first Summons without so much as an appearance in the Field, or displaying their Banners would argue the highest piece of degeneracy and cowardise of mind

In this ambiguity of mind and irrefolution, fometimes inclining to a furrender, and then again to adventure a battel, the Chancas perfifted many days; of which the Inca having intelligence, determined to enter their Countrey, and affright them with the advance of his Army; for that perhaps to a people of their disposition, who availed themselves much upon their ancient Prowess and Victories; indulgence and gentleness would be argued as a point of fear and cowardise, and that therefore to attempt them briskly was the onely way to strike a terrour in them, and aftonish them with the fear of a cruel War, and a fevere Punishment as an effect thereof; in pursuance of this resolution, he ordered his Major-Generals to invade the Countrey of Amahuaya; and immediately upon their entry to fend their Summons to the Chancas, telling them plainly, that they must either receive the Inca for their Lord, or else must prepare to offer their lives a facrifice to his Sword; for that their contumacy and rebellion was fuch as was not longet tolerable, and that their delays and impertinencies had already wearied his patience. The Chancas observing this resolution of the Inca, and that the Quechnas, and other Nations, whom in former times they had injured and provoked, judged it convenient to temporize, and with a seigned submission to accept the conditions of Surrender, being moved thereunto out of fear of his force, and of that revenge which their Enemies might by this opportunity take upon them, rather than out of any affection or efteem they had to his Laws and Ordinances, as will be proved hereafter in the process of this History.

The Inca leaving his Officers to receive their fubmiffion, proceeded forward in his Conquests to another Province called Vramarca, which also is surnamed Chanca, and is a small Countrey, but very populous, and inhabited by such a hardy and war-like Nation; that had their Numbers been equal to their Courage, they had been capable to have made a front and confiderable refiftance; for that the people on this fide were not fo easie, and simple, and fond of the Incas, and their Government, as were those of Continue and Collasque; howsoever, to be short, those of Uramarca submitted, but with much reluctancy, and against their inclinations. Thence the Inca marched forwards to the people called Hancohuallo and Villea, named by the Spaniards Vileas, who with the fame unwillingness vielded to the power of the Inca; for that these people, being all Chancas, were Lords themselves of divers Provinces, which by force of Arms they had subdued. and did daily enlarge their Dominions; with which their ambition and covetousness increasing, they could not, without difficulty, forego their Usurpations and Tyranny over others, to yield themselves to the same conditions; the which refractary humour of theirs the Inca Roca observing, reproved in them with severe reprehension; and though they received his Admonitions with Mortification and Anger, yet they durft not openly own and discover their dislike. In both these Provinces their cultome was to Sacrifice Children to their Gods at their principal Feafts; of which the Inca being informed, he made a discourse to them of the inhumanity and unreasonableness of such a custome, and that for the suture they should Adore the Sun for their God, and receive the Statutes and Ordinances which he had given them; declaring to them by his own mouth, that he would exact the life of every Child at their hands, whom they should in that manner attempt to destroy; and that in punishment for the offence, he would destroy and root out their whole Nation, and give their Countrey to be inhabited by a better fort of people, of more bowels and compassion, who should love and cherish their own bloud, as nature required them. Nothing could come more dolefull and fad, than this news to the Ears of these people, who were persuaded by the Devils, whom they worshipped for their Gods, that this Sacrifice of tender Infants was most acceptable of any to the Infernal Powers.

From Villea he took the way on the left hand, and marched Westward, towards the Sea-coast, and entred one of those two Provinces, which are both stvled by the name of Sulla, though for diffinction fake one of them is called Viumfulla: these two Provinces comprehend under them many Nations of different Names, some of them being full of people, others having but few. And in the Histories of these matters, to avoid tedious discourses, they report, that the Number of them might be of about forty thousand Families; in the subduing of which, the Inca is faid to have spent much time, and some report three years: which were chiefly taken up in the perfuafions and gentle Arts which the Inca used for reducing of that people, being more desirous to conquer them by kindness, than the severity of Arms. For those Indians confiding much in their own Numbers, and Art of War, did often incline to a breach, and a defence of themfelves; but that the moderation of the Inca, and his prudent conduct of affairs was fuch, that with time he reduced them to his fervice, and a willingness to receive his Laws, and fuch Governours and Ministers as he was pleafed to conftlture over them; and then afterwards with this fuccess and victory he returned to Cozco. In these two Provinces of Sulla and Usumfulla, there were about thirty two years past, some very rich Mines discovered of Silver, and Quick-filver; the latter of which is very ufefull in Melting the Silver Ore.

Of the Prince Yahuarhuacac, and the Interpretation of his Name.

THE King Inca Roca having passed some Years in the quiet possession and government of his Kingdoms, thought it fit to employ his Son and Heir, named Tahnarhacac, in the entire Conquest of Antisym, which lyes to the East of Cocco, and not far from the City; for on that side no great advance had been made since the time of the first Inca, Manco Capac, who had not proceeded farther than the River Paucartamy.

But before we proceed farther in the Relation of this Story, it would be requifire to explain the fignification of this long name of Yahuar-buacae, and the reason which they had to give it to the Prince. It is a Tale amongst the Indians, that when he was a Child of three or four years old, his Tears were bloud, perhaps it was because he had some disease in his Eyes, and that the bloud, when he cried. might fall from thence with his tears: But it is a general belief amongst them, that To foon as he came crying into the World, his Tears were bloud: It might likewife perhaps be, that he brought formething of the Matritial bloud with him on which perhaps be, that he brought fornering of the Matthat bloud with him on his Eyes, which the superstitious Indians were ready to interpret for Tears; but be the cause what it will, they would not be persuaded out of this belief; and on this supposition founded many of their Witcheries and Prognostications, foretelling the anger and displeasure of his Father the Sun against him, and that therefore he would be unfortunate and accurred. The derivation therefore of his Name, is evident from Tabuar, to weep, and Hustac. This manner of Weeping must have been when he was a Child, and not at Man's estate; for then he was neither overcome nor taken Prifoner, as fome will have it; for none of the beat was ever fo unfortunate, until the time of the wretched Hudfear, whom the Travtor Anabualpa his Baffard-brother took Prifoner, as we shall relate in its due place, if God Almighty gives us life and power to arrive so far in this our History. Nor was he ftoln away when he was an Infant, as fome Writers will have it; for it is not probable, that when Indians conceived generally fuch awe and veneration for their Incas and the Royal Bloud, that any perfon thould be found to profligate. and daring as to fleal the Prince and Heir to the Empire; nor is it probable, that the Tutors and Servants (hould be fo remifs in their care and charge; for fuch was the Lutors and Servants should be to remits in their care and charge; for fuch was the reverence that the Indians bore towards their Incas, that the very imagination of such an attempt would have terrified them to that degree, that they would have believed the very thought would have procured the vengeance of Heaven, and caused the Earth to have opened and swallowed both them and their whole Families: For, as we have formerly said, they Worshipped the Sun for their God, and for his sake the Incas, whom they accounted Children descended from him the said the formal shade the said the formal state of the said the him, were adored with the fame divine Honours.

These Tears of bloud which the Indians interpreted to be ominous, and to be fore-runners of some dismal fate, put me in mind of another superstitious fancy of theirs, which they gathered from the motion and twinkling of the eyes; for it was a common opinion both of the Incas and his Subjects, that the Eyes did Prognosticate by their motion and twinkling either good or bad fortune; for it was accounted good luck when the upper eye-lid of the lest eye twinkled, for they said, that it forestaw matters of contentment and satisfaction; but much more when the right eye-lid sparkled and twinkled, that was a most excellent sign of all happiness and prosperity, peace and plenty imaginable: And to the contrary, when the lower Curtain of the right eye trembled, it betokened weeping and tears for some sad and unfortunate accident; but if the lower part of the left eye moved, it foretold nothing but woe and forrow, and fuch miferies as would produce nothing but grief, and abundance of tears: And fuch confidence and belief did they put in these symptoms, that in case the lower eye-lashes did but so much as tremble, they immediately put themselves into most violent passions of sear and weeping; and in apprehension of what they seared, they made themselves more miserable, than if all the missortunes of the World had already sallen upon them: And then for the onely remedy of the ensuring evils, they entertained another superstition more ridiculous than the former: they would take the point of a Straw, and wetting it with Spittle, they would stick it beneath their eye; and would then say, comforting themselves, that that blessed Straw which crossed their under eye-lid would stanch the tears which were to show from their eyes, and prevent the Evils which the tremblings did Prognosticate: The like conjectures almost they made from a buzzing, or singing in their Ears, which I sorbear to enlarge upon, because it was not so remarkable and certain as that of the Eyes; and both one and the other I can testifie, because I have seen and heard their Lamentations on those occasions.

The King Inca Roca (as we have faid) refolving to fend his Son to conquer Antifium, ordered an Army of fifteen thousand Souldiers to be raised, under the Command of three Major-Generals, whom he joined with him for Companions and Counsellours. The Prince being well instructed in all matters, proceeded with good success as far as the River Paucartampu, and thence marched forwards to Challapampa, where he reduced those sew poor Indians which he found in those Quarters; thence he passed to Pilleupata, where he planted four Colonies with a fort of wandring and vagabond people. From Pilleupata he travelled to Hawssea and Tima, where the first Subjects of Chacras de Cuca submitted to the Dominion of the Incas, and where great quantities of that Herb called Cuca grows: the Inheritance of Havisca was afterwards given to my Lord and Father Garçilasso de Vega, and he was pleased to bestow that Estate upon me for my life, but I renounced, and less it upon my going into Spain. The passage into these Vallies where the Cuca grows, is over that high Mountain called Canac-busy, descending five Leagues almost perpendicular, which makes a Man's head giddy to look down; how much more laboursome must it be to ascend and descend those ways turning and winding in form of a Serpent?

Of the Idols which the Indians of Antis worshipped, and of the Conquest made over the Charcas.

In those Provinces of Antis they commonly worshipped Tygers for their Gods, and great Serpents, much thicker than a Man's Thigh, and twenty five, or thirty foot in length, though some others might be lefs, called Amarus, they are a certain fort of a fluggish Serpent, which are not venomous, and, as they say, were charmed by a skilfull Sorceres, that they should doe no harm, having before been dangerous, and very positionous. The Tiger they adored for his nimbleness and bravery, saying that Serpents and Tygers were the true and natural Inhabitants and Lords of that Countrey, and therefore did justly require reverence and respect from Men, who were but Strangers and Aliens in it. They worshipped also the Plant Cuca, or Coca, as the Spaniards call it. Thus far the Prince Tahuar-Hautase having enlarged his Dominions, being almost thirty Leagues in length, and in a Countrey ill Inhabited, he found himself stopped in his farther progress, by the Mountains, moorish Grounds and Bogs, which interrupted him in his passage, and which confine and give bounds to that Province, properly named Ami, whence all that side takes the Denomination of Antisms.

which confine and give bounds to that Province, properly named Anti, whence all that fide takes the Denomination of Antifigui.

The Prince having finished this Conquest, returned to Cozco, where his Father for that present, thought fit to repose, and lay asside all farther designs of new Enterprises; for on the side of Antiforu, which is to the Eastward, there remained nothing more to conquer; and to the Westward, which they called Cantiforu, there was nothing more to be reduced, for they were come as far as to the Pacifick Sea, or the Sea of Zuo; so that the Empire, from East to West, extended at least an hundred Leagues cross along by the way of Cozco, and then from North to South it reached two hundred Leagues: All which tract of Land the Incan laboured to manure, and cultivate, and adorn with Royal Palaces, Gardens, Baths, and places of Pleasure for divertisement of the Incan, and for better convenience of the Countrey, they erecked in all the great Roads Magazines and Gramatics, wherein to lodge their Ammunition, Arms, Corn, Provisions, and Clothing for the common Souldiery.

Some Years being passed in this manner with peace and quiet, when the King Inca Roca resolved to add another famous Atchievement to the glory of his Reign, that so in person he might put an end to the entire Conquest of those great Provinces, which were called Characa, the beginning of which was commenced in the time of his Father, in the Division of Collasgon: And in order hereunto he commanded thirty thousand Men to be levied, which was an Army greater than any that his Ancestours had yet brought into the field; to command this Army fix Major Generals were appointed, besides other inferiour Officers; and the Prince Tabnar-Huacae was, with sour other tocas for his Counsellors, ordained to remain at home for government of the Kingdom. The Inca took his Journey from Cocco by way of the great Road towards Collasson, and in his march all the forces came in to make up his Army: And being come to the Consines of those Provinces of Choncari, Puema, and Astronymyn, which bordered on his Kingdom; he fent his summons to them, acquainting them, that he was come to reduce those Nations, and require them to live under those Laws which his Father the Sun had ordained; and that leaving their Idols made of Stone and Wood, they should worthip him onely for their God; and that forfalking their corrupt Customs, and Manners, they should learn and follow the light of Nature, and the Instructions of his Witdom, which would direct them in ways more agrecable to humane Life. The Natives of these Countries received the message with great anger, and the young and hot Captains betook themselves to their Arms, and answered with sury and tage, That it was a hard case for them, that they must be forced to renounce their own natural Gods, and adore a stranger, and a God unknown to them;

that they must reject their own Laws and Customs, and receive new ones from the Inca, who in recompense thereof would impose Tributes and Taxes, and serve himself of their labour and services, as of Slaves and Vassals; which being conditions not to be endured by a People so free as they, they resolved to defend themselves, and dye in the Defence of their Gods, their Countrey and their Liberty.

CHAP. XVIII.

Of the Argument and Debate which the Old Men held on this matter, and in what manner they received the Inca.

Notwithstanding this huff of the young Souldiers, the more ancient and confiderate among them. fiderate amongst them, were of opinion, that they should not so soon break forth into a War, but first of all consider, that for several years they have had a neighbourhood and converse with the Subjects of the Inca; and that they could never hear otherwise from them, but that their Laws were good, and the Yoke of their Government gentle and easie: that he treated his People rather like his Children, than his Subjects; that the Lands which they required, were not those which the Indians had in their possession, but such as lay waste, and unmanured by them; and that he required no other Tribute than the Fruit and Benefit which those Lands, cultivated at his own cost and charge, should produce, and not exact any thing at the labour and cost of the Indians, to whom he rather gave than diminished from their Estates; and in proof and evidence hereof, without other argument, they defired them to enquire, and confider feriously without passion, how much the Subjects of the Inc.s were improved in their Estates, and how quiet, civil and profperous they were become, fince their fubmiffion to his Government; how all their Difcords, Animofities, and Civil Diffentions, which in former times had miferably torn and diftracted them, were now appeared; how Estates were more secure, and more protested from Thieves, their Wives, and Daughters from Rapes and Adulteries; and in fine, how quiet and well established was the publick Welfare, where none durft offer injury, nor none could receive it without redrefs.

That they should farther consider, that many neighbouring Provinces, being well fatisfied and allured by the gentleness and happiness of this servitude, did voluntarily, and of their own accords, offer themselves, and beg the Protection of the Inca and his Laws. And since these things were thus apparent, it were better to submit readily and without constraint, than desending themselves for the prefent from that which they know they must in a short time yield unto, provoke the Inea to that degree of Anger and Displeasure, as might divert him from those good Intentions and Favours which he defigned towards them; and that therefore it were more fafe and fecure, both for their Lives and Estates, their Wives and Children, to make a Vertue of Necessity, and submit with a voluntary surrender: and that as to their Gods, which the Inca imposed upon them, reason it self inflructed, and taught them, that the Sun more vifibly deferved to be adored and worthipped, than any of those dumb and insensible Idols, which they had made and formed with their own hands. With these Arguments, and others of the like nature, the ancient and fage Persons to far prevailed, that took off the mettle and heat of the young Men, fo that they all unanimously went to receive the Inca; the young Men marched with Arms in their hands, and the old with their Prefents of fuch Fruits as their Countrey yielded, faying, That the Fruits of their Land were in token of that Livery and Seizin which they were to give unto the Lea thereof: the young men professed that their Arms were to serve the Luca in his Wars, and to be employed by him for the acquifition of new Provinces. The loca grationfly accepted this their Submiffion with his accustomary Goodness commanding, that in testimony thereof, the Old Men should be vested with the better fort of Garments, in token of greater respect; and that the common People (hould be clothed with the more common Apparel; and that he might not feem wholly to flight or contemn the offer which the Captains and Souldiers made him of their Arms, he received five hundred of them into his Service, not by choice, but by lot, left the preferring of one before the other, should feem but a kind of a neglect, or discontent, on such as were refused; and to farisfie the rest, he advised them to return to their homes, lest they should otherwise leave their own Countrey naked and undefended; with the Veltments which the Inca gave them, and his Behaviour towards them, both the young and old were fo well pleafed and fatisfied, that with loud Acclamations they cryed Out. How like art thou to a Child of the Sun! how worthy art thou of the Title of a King! how well doth the Name of being a Friend to the Poor besit thee! for no sooner had we submitted to be the Subjects, before thou didst load us with thy Favours and Benefits, May the Blessings of thy Father the Sun light upon thee, and all the Nations of the four quarters of the World obey and fall down before thee; for thou art truly the Capa Inca, who deserves Riches, and absolute Power, and universal Dominion. With these, or the like expresfions of Honour, the Inca Roca being faluted by his new Vaffals, and having provided and established Ministers and Officers to instruct and govern them, he marchand chaomined riminess and offices and the bordering Provinces, called Mifgui, Sacatea, Machaea, Caratara, and others, as far as Chuquifaea, which is now called the City of Plate: all which and others, as far as Chuquifaca, Which is now Catled the City of Plate: all Which were comprehended under the common denomination of Charcas, though they were of different Nations and Languages, and were all as eafily reduced, as those before mentioned. In this expedition he enlarged his Empire North and South, a hundred Leagues, and as many more East and West; and having as accustomary left Officers and Ministers to teach and instruct them in matters of Religion, and to govern them by Laws, and gather his Revenue, he returned to Cocco, where he disbanded his Army, and rewarded the Commanders according to their Deserts.

Having atchieved these great matters, he seemed now to desire repose, and attend onely to Peace, and the quiet Administration of his Government, in which he spent the remaining years of his Life, we cannot say how many; but at length he came to dye, having not in the least degenerated from the Vertue of his Ancestours; but rather imitated and equalled them in the highest strain of their glorious and martial Actions, and in Good-will and Beneficence towards his People. He founded some Schools where the Amauras taught those Sciences which they had attained; near whereunto he built himself a House, as we shall declare in its due place, instituted Laws, and uttered grave Sentences: And because Blas Valera hath made particular mention of some of them, we shall repeat them from him, being very remarkable, and worthy to be noted. He was universally bewailed by all his Subjects, and embalmed according to the custome of those Kings. He less takens-buseace, his Son and Heir by his lawfull Wife and Sifter Mama Micay, to succeed him in the Government of his Dominions: besides whom he left others, both legitimate and baftard Children.

Of some Laws which the King, Inca Roca, made: of the Schools which he founded in Cozco; and of some of his wife Apophtheems, or Sayings.

B. Las Valera, who was very curious, and had taken great pains in his Enquiries touching these been, saith, "That this King reigned almost fifty Years, and made many Laws, amongst which these following are the most observable. That the Children of the common People ought not to be educated in the Liberal Arts and Sciences, for that were to make them proud, conceited and ungovernable; but that the Nobility were those onely to whom such Literature did appertain, to render them more honourable, and capable of Offices in the Common-wealth. That Thieves, Murtherers, and Adulterers, and Incendiaries should be hanged without Mercy. That Sons should obey and serve their Fathers, until they came to the age of twenty five Years, and that after wards they should be employed in matters tending to the good of the Common the good of the good of the Common the good of the good of the good of the Common the good of the go wards they should be employed in matters tending to the good of the Common-wealth. It is reported that he was the first who founded Schools in Cozco, "mon-wealth. It is reported that he was the frift who founded Schools in Cocco, where the Amanas were the Masters, and taught such Sciences as were fit to improve the minds of Incas, who were Princes, and of the chief Nobility, not that they did instruct them by way of Letters, for as yet they had not attained to that knowledge, but onely in a practical manner, and by daily Discourses: "their other Lectures were of Religion, and of those Reasons and Wisedom on which their Laws were established, and of the Number and true Exposition of them; for by these means they attained to the Art of Government and military Discipline; they distinguished the times and seasons of the Year, and by reading in their "Knots, they learned History, and the Actions of past and took Rules and Meastures for the management of their domestick affairs." These Amanas, who were Philosophers, and in high esteem amongst them, "taught something also of Poetry, Musick, Philosophy and Astrology, of all which they attained to some knowledge, though superficial, and in a low and mean degree. All these particulars were instituted in manner of a Law by this Inca Roca, and afterwards, for their better encouragement, he savoured and enlarged them with fair Endowments; and hereanto Pachacacc, to whom he was great "Ulacle, added many other Laws and Precepts. The Sayings of this King Inca "Roca were these: That considering the immense Vastness, Beauty and Splendour of the Heavens, he would often say, That if the Heaven be so glorious, which is the Throne and Scat of the Pachacamac, (who is the great God) how much more powerfull, glittering and resplendent must his Person and Majesty be, who was the Maker and Creatour of them all. Other sayings of his were these: If I were to adore any of these terrestial things, it should certainly be a wise and discrect Man, whose Excellenting the superful at things, it should certainly be a wise and discrect Man, whose Excellenting the manual content and the cardinal discrect Man, whose Excellenting the manual content where the Amaneas were the Masters, and taught such Sciences as were fit to of these terrestial things, it should certainly be a wife and discreet Man, whose Excellencies surpass all earthly Creatures. When an Infant is born, he grows up, and then he " dies. He that yesterday had a beginning, to day arrives at his end. #### XXCHAP.

Of the Inca. Yahuar-huacac, who was the leventh King; of his Fears and Conquelts, and the Differace of the Prince his Eldeft Son.

THE King, Inca Roca, being dead, his Son Yahuar-huacac succeeded him in the Inheritance of his Kingdom, and governed with Justice. Piety and Gentleness, cherishing his Subjects with as much indulgence and tenderness as was possible. His chief design was to keep and preserve what his Father and Anceftours had left him, not feeking quarrels with any, or encroachments on others right; left contemning the ill omen of his Name, and the misfortunes which the skilfull Mafters in Divination did daily prefage, he fhould tempt his fortune, and provoke his Father the Sun to adhict him with all those evils which they prognoficated. With this fear and apprehenfion he lived for many years, defiring nothing more than peace and quietness, both at home and abroad; but not to remain altogether idle, he vilited all parts of his Dominions three or four times, and improved and adorned them with flately Buildings, feafted, and generally careffed all his Subjects in a higher degree, and with greater demonstrations of love and tenderness, than any of his Ancestours, which were effects of the great dangers he apprehended from the Prophecies concerning him; and in this caution and dread upon his Spirits, he continued for the space of nine or ten years: until a length confidering that this cautious timidity would argue Cowardife and lowness of Spirit, of which none of his Ancellours were ever before taxed, he refolved to fend an Army of ewenty thousand Men to the Southwest of Coze, along the Coast of Arequepa, where a point of Land runs out far into the Sea, which his Pre ceffours had overfeen, or neglected, because it was ill inhabited: His brother, called Inca Marta, he made Commander in Chief of his Forces, and for that reation was ever afterwards called Apu Mayra, or General Mayra, to whom he added four other Incas, to be Major-Generals under him: But as to himself, he would not adventure to go in Perfon; for the thoughts of the ill Omen did still so haunt and opprefs his Spirits, that he could never refolve to truft the fuccefs of any martial adventure to the fortune of his own Perfon, and where the define of Glory fourted him forward to any great Attempt, there always the dread of the finither Omen retracted and drew him back. This apprehension moving him to commit the charge of his Army to his Brother, and Officers, they proceeded so successfully in it, that in a short time they reduced all that tract of Land from Arequepa to Tacama, which they call Collafuyu, to his Empire, being at this time the utmost Limit and Confine by the Sea-coast of that Countrey which they call Peru, the which Land being long, and narrow, and ill peopled, cost more time to march it over than to conquer it.

This Enterprise being thus happily completed, they returned again to Cozco. where they rendred an account to the Inca, Tahuar-huacac, of their fuccess; with which taking heart, and recovering new courage, he began to aspire to the Honour and Fame of reducing those great Provinces, yet unconquered in the Divifion of Collassyn, called Caranea, Vlaca, Lispi, Chica, Ampara, the which, as they were large, and great, so they were populous, and defended by a warlike Nation; and for this reason the ancient mean forbore to molest or irritate them, lest being as yet uncivilized, and unacquainted with the gentle and easie Government of the Incas, they should fly to their Arms, and oblige the Incas against their Maximes, and natural Disposition, to subject them with Slaughter and Destruction; and therefore rather chose to tame and mollifie them by degrees, and prevail by the clear Evidences of their Neighbours Happinels, to perfuade them into a good opinion of the gentlenels of that Yoke which the Inca imposed on his Subjects.

With the cares and fears of this Conquest the Inca, Yahuar-huacac was greatly With the cares and fears of this Conquest the Inca, Tahuar-huacae was greatly turmoiled, being as it were crucified between his hopes and fears, sometimes he promised himself good success, and that the same Fortune would simile upon him, that did on his Brother Apa Myata; then again the dread of the satal Omen possessed himself with the same and the fatal Omen possessed himself with the same appeared least Difficulty or Hazard Whilst he was thus tossessed with these Passions and anguish of mind, he was diverted from his foreign Designs by domestick Troubles, caused by the untoward Disposition of his Eldest Son, and Heir of his Dominions, who from his Childhead against suppositions of the same supposition of the same suppositions. Dipolition of this Electr soft, and tree of his Schmidters, by his harfit treatment of those Boys of his own age, who conversed and played with him; and though the Inca his Father used all the means imaginable to reclaim him by due and severe correction, and that he hoped that Years and Instruction would prevail upon him. yet in the end all proved vain, and without effect, the ferocity of his Mind, and the impetuofity of his ill Nature prevailing over all the means, and endedvours to reduce him; for neither the Examples of his Ancestours, nor the gentle Admonitions, nor fevere Reproofs of his Father, had any influence upon him; fo that his desperate incorrigibleness became now the greatest fear and affliction of

For fo far was the Spirit of ill Nature engrafted in the Heart of this Prince. that all the Treacle of wholesome Advice he converted into Poison; the which his Father having observed and duely considered, he resolved wholly to discountenance and remove him from his Favour, and if that would not operate, then absolutely to disinherit him, and constitute another of his lawfull Sons in his place. who was of a Spirit more agreeable to that five Temper and generous Galanty of his Anceftours. This Refolution he took in imitation of that Cuftome practifed in some of his Provinces, where the most favoured and most worthy was elected to the Government; the which on this occasion the Inca was defirous to introduce, against all the Precedents and Examples of former Incas. With this intention the Inca commanded the Prince, being now of nineteen or twenty Years of age, to avoid the Court, allotting him a place of Residence about a League from the City, and where were fair and verdant Pastures Eastward from the City, which they called Chita, and where I my self remember often to have been, and where his Employment was to seed the Cattle of the Sun, in company with those Shepherds who were deligned for that Service. The Prince not being able to relift the Pleasure of his Father, submitted to the Banifthment and the Disfavour of the Inca, which laid as a punifthment on him for the Bravery and Gallantry of his Martial Spirit. In flort, he fubinitted and really applied himself with the other Shepherds to keep and feed the Cattel of the Sun for the space of three years, and more, where we will leave him until the time comes which shall bring him on the Stage, and to speak well of him, if that which we are to mention of him may be called good.

Royal Commentaries.

Of the Intelligence which an Apparition gave to the Prince. enjoining him to communicate it to his Father.

THE Inca Tabnar-bracae having in this manner Banished his Eldest Son, whose Name we cannot assign, because the obscurity of his condition was whole Name we cannot amply, became the obscure of instronaum was fuch, as made no imprefion in the minds of Men, so as without the help of Lecters to conserve it in remembrance: He seemed now to lay adde all the thoughts of War, and Conquests of new Provinces, and to make the Government of his of War, and Conquests of new Provinces, and to make the Government of his Dominions, and the Conservation of the common peace and quietness to be his onely employment: As to his Son, he thought it not convenient, nor secure to remove him far from his fight, that so he might more easily apply those remedies to reclaim him, as best suited with his condition; nor did he judge it fit to imprison, and dissinherit, and chuse some other in his place, for that seemed an expedient too violent, and without Example, and was a new and unpractified case to depose the true Heir, and degrade the Divinity of the Incas of its Right and Honour; besides, it appeared doubtfull how far the people would affent to this impiety, and low ill they would take this harth usage of the Prince and Heir to the Envise.

the Empire.

In this wavering and unquiet condition, which deprived the Inca of all contentment and repose, he passed three years without any observable occurrence; during which time, he twice Commissionated four of his Kinsinen to visit his Doring which time, he twice Commissionated sour of his Kinssinen to visit his Dominions, giving to every one their respective charges, and dispatches into distinct parts of his Dominions, in order to perform such publick Works as might conduce to the honour of the brea, and the common benefit of his Subjects; such as the making of Aqueducts, raising Magazines for laying up Provisions, Royal Houses, Fountains and Bridges, Causeys, and such other Works of publick use: But for his own part, he never had the courage to depart from his Court, but one-ly there to attend and celebrate the Festivals of the Sun, and such like, and administer Justice to his Subjects. At the end of this long time, one day about Noon the Prince entred into the Palace of his Father, without any Companion or Attendance, like a Person foriorn, and in dissavour of his brea, and sent him word, that he was there to speak with him, having a Message of high importance to deliver: The brea made a quick Answer in his sudden passion, that he should without Demur or Reply retire again to the place of his Constinentent, on penalty of being proceeded against according to that severe punishment which the Law institutes on those who break the Royal Command. The Prince made answer, that he was not come thither in contempt of his Commands, but in obedience to that he was not come thither in contempt of his Commands, but in obedience to the Message and Injunction of another Inca as great as himself, who sent him to impart unto him matters of high and considerable importance; which is he were pleased to hear, he desired to be admitted and to have Audience; if not, he had complied with the Commands of him that sent him, and should return again to render an account of his fuccefs.

The Bica hearing him mention another, as Great a Lord as himfelf, ordered him to be admitted, for he wondered at the impertinence of the Meffage, and the boldness of any who should dare to employ his banished and disgraced Son with Advices of any nature whatfoever. The Prince being introduced, and ftanding before his Father, faid in this manner: I am come, Sir, to make known unto you, that fitting this day, about Noon, under one of those great Rocks, which are in the Fields of Chita. where, by our Order, I was employed to feed the Flocks of our Father the Sun; I know not whether I was afleep, or well awake, there appeared before me a Man in a firange Habir, and of a Figure different from us: His Beard was above a span in length, his Garments long and loofe, reaching down to his Feet, and about his Neck he carried a fort of living creature, which I know not what to call it, because I never saw the like before: He called to me, and said, Cousin, I am a Child of the Sun, and Brother to the Inca, Manco Capac. and to Cova Mama, Occlo Huaco his Wife and Sifter, who were the first of your Family, and by them I am Allied in Bloud to your Father, and all of you, being called Inca Viracocha; and am fent by our Father the Sun to order you, that you immediately carry this Advice to my Brother the Inca, acquainting him, that the greatest part of the Provinces of Chinchasuyu, as well those who are under his Dominion, as those which are not, are in rebellion, and are united in confederacy to asfault him, and with a strong and numerous Arms to cast him from his Throne, and destroy the Imperial City of Cozco; wherefore I order you immediately to give this intelligence to my Brother the Inca, adviling him from me. that he provide against this emergency, and take such vigorous resolutions to prevent it. as the importance of this matter doth require. And as to thine own particular, let me tell thee that in what misfortune soever thou art, thou lose not thy courage or spirit, for I shall ever that in what mispersine joever thou art, thou soje no thy contage of pirit, for I platt ever be at hand, and ready to fuccour thee as my own flesh and bloud; and therefore I strictly ad-monish thee not to attempt any thing, how great soever it be, immortby thy Family and ancient Bloud, and the Greatness of thy Empire; for I will ever be as finant, and nor to succour thee in thy greatest and ultimate exigencies. Having taid these words, the me. Viracocha vanished, and I saw him no more; and then returning to my self. I delayed no time to come and appear before your Majesty to communicate unto you the particulars of these Matters.

CHAP. XXII.

Of the Consultation which the Incas held upon the Advice which the Apparition gave.

THE Dica, Tabuar-buacae, out of the great displeasure and prejudice which he had taken to his Son, would not give any belief or credence to his Relation, but rather termed him a Fool, and impertinent, and that swelled with the vanity of Revelations from his Father the Sun, he was come to impose his Enthusians for divine Truths; and therefore ordered him immediately to return to Chira, and to confine himself within those bounds on penalty of his highest displeasure; in compliance to which severe admonition, the Prince returned again to his retirement, and the keeping of his Flocks. Howsoever the Dicar, who were Counfellours, and had the King's Ear, and of a nature very superficious and credulous, especially of Dreams, took this advertisement in another sashin, than the King apprehended it, telling him, that such an Apparition as this was not to be slighted, especially since it prefented it self in the form of Viracocha, who was Brother to the Dica, and of Alliance to the Sun, in whose name and behalf he brought this Message. Nor was it credible that the Prince should be so much an Impostour, as to date to entitle the Sun to such an apparent forgery, or delude the Inca his Father with a Lye; and therefore that it were best to examine the matter more strictly; and by Sacrificing to the Sun, make judgment of the good or bad Omicus, and not neglect any care or diligence whatsoever in a matter of 15 high importance; for to leave the matter neglected and slighted, were to contenin the advice which the Sun had sent, and his Messager.

Notwithflanding all which, the Inca had conceived that prejudice againft his Son, that he could upon no terms admit the counfel which his Kindred gave him, but rather termed the Vifion he declared, to be the effect of a wild and for ious brain, imagining by lyes and forgeries to bring his extravagant humour again into repute; which was fuch an aggravation of his former folly, that he deferved on this very fcore to be deprived of the inheritance, and declared for ever uncapable of the Succeffion; and that in the place of him, some other of a more flexible and gentle temper, worthy the title of being allied to the Sun, should be ordained and proclaimed the true Heir in the place and stead of a revengefull, merciles and tyrannical Prince, and of one of a far different temper to that sweet and pleasant humour of his Ancestours, which had been the most forcible Arms to win and overcome all the Nations they governed. Moreover, that in Wisedom they ought to provide against all Rebellions, but not on the score or belief of the vain words of a wild fellow; who ought to be punished, and have his Head cut off for daring to break the limits affigned for his Banishment; and profaning the Sacred Name of the Sun with a pretence so false and enthusiastick as this: And therefore he charged them not to mention this matter farther, nor so much as to name the Prince, for that he had already determined in what manner to deal with him.

The Ineas upon this Command of the King were filent, and urged the matter no farther; howfoever, they could not forbear to revolve the thing in their minds, as portending fome fad and difinal difafters: For the Indians were naturally addicted to Signs and Prognoftications; and especially if the King, or the Prince, or the High Prieft, who were esteemed Gods and Oracles, had any Dream, they were never at ease untill the Diviners, or Magicians, made the Interpretation; in which they esteemed themselves so expert, that they not onely pretended to interpret the Dream, but also to declare what the Ineas themselves had related short, or missaken in it.

CHAP. XXIII.

The Rebellion of the Chancas, and of their Ancient exploits in War.

Three Months after this Dream of the Prince Viracocha, (for so afterwards his Friends named him from the Vision he had seen) a confused and uncertain rumour came of an Insurrection in the Provinces of Chincasion, and that all the people were in Arms, which is from Insurable, about forty Leagues Northward from Corco, through all the Countries to the farthest extent of the new Conquests. This News had as yet no certain authour or ground, being but whispered as in cases of like nature; and though it agreed with the Dream of the Prince Viracocha, and seemed an Accomplishment of the words of his Vision, yet the King gave no heed or credit to it, believing it to be a Canterbury tale; or Stories of the way, broached to revive the Dream of the Prince, which seemed almost forgot, and out of memory: Some sew days after the report became hotter than before, and common in every Man's mouth, though still uncertain, and without any particulars; for the Enemies had obstructed all the ways and passages in that manner, that no intelligence should be carried, and that the knowledge of their Rebellion might be first made known by appearance of their force before Cocco, Howsoever, at length certain and particular information was brought, that the Nations called Chanca, Oramarca, Villea, Otusulla, Hancobusulla, and other Neighbouring Nations, were all in Arms; and having killed all the Governours and officers of the Inca, were now Marching with an Army of forty thousand meagainst the City.

These Nations (as we have said) being all reduced by the power of the King Inca Roca, rather out of sear, than love, had ever fince suppressed their rancour and malice to the Incas, with intention to own and testifie the same, when occasion presented; which now seemed sairly to offer it self in the time of this Inca, Tahwar-Imacae, who being a Prince not addicted to War, but rather intimidated by the appresentation.

BOOK IV.

prehension and fear he conceived from his finister Omen; and being also moved with compassion of the hard usage, and unnatural treatment which the Inca shewed towards the Prince his Son, they judged it warrant and reason sufficient to revenge his cause in detestation of the base cowardise and tyranny of this mean-spirited, and yet cruel, Inca: Wherefore with what expedition and fecrecy they could, they incited their Neighbours to rebell, who being already well difbofed in the matter, they eafily took fire, and putting themselves in Arms, and with a body of thirty thousand Men marched directly against the Imperial City of Coze,
The principal Authous and Contrivers of this War, besides other Lords, were three principal Curacas of three great Provinces, all comprehended under the common name of Chanca: The first of these Lords was called Hancohualla, a Young Man of twenty fix years of Age, the fecond was Timan Huaraca, and the third Aftu Huaraca; the two last of which were Uncles and Brothers to Hancobually. The Ancestours of these three petty Kings, before the times of the Incar, waged a perpetual War with their Neighbouring Nations, especially with the people called Quechua, under which denomination five other great Provinces were contained: For which reason, and for the Tyranny and Oppression which they fuffered from them, the Quechnas were greatly pleased to accept and receive the Protection of the Incas. And fo on the contrary, these petty Kings greatly refented the curb and power the Incas imposed upon them, by restraining them in their Progress and Conquests, rendring them in the place of absolute and sovereign Princes, Tributaries and Vaffals, which they stomached and suppressed untill this feafon, in which they esteemed it convenient to vent their hatred. And in regard that the life of all defigns is speedy execution, and that now they were to surprize the Inca, unprovided of Men, and power of Resistence, they did not doubt, but by one fingle Victory to render themselves Masters again, not onely of their ancient Enemies, but of all the Empire of the Incas.

With these probable hopes and expectations of successes, they invited all their Neighbours, as well those that were Subjects to the Inca, as those that were not. to partake with them in the defign and reward of the enterprize; the which appeared fair and promifing in this prefent conjuncture. To these Summons the Indians eatily yielded, expecting great advantages, and depending on the great renown and fame in War, which the Ancient bravery of the Chancas had acquired: And having constituted Hanco-huallu their Captain-General, and the two Brothers Major Generals, with other Curacas for Colonels and Officers, they marched directly with resolution to Summon and make demand of the City of Cozco.

CHAP. XXIV.

The Inca abandons the City, and the Prince succours it.

SO from as the Inca Yahuar-huacae understood the certainty of this News, and of the approach of the Enemy, he was affrighted and terrified within himfelf; for it feemed a furprize to him to understand of a rebellion, for as yet no fuch thing had ever happened in the Provinces, during the lenity of that Government which the Incas had exercised from the time of Manco Capuc to those very days; under the fecurity of which, and out of the hatred he conceived to his Son, to whom he could not allow the honour of divine revelation, he neither would give credit to the dream, nor hearken to the advice or counfel of his kindred; but having blinded his understanding with passion and prejudice, he found himself enshared in inextricable difficulties, having neither time to levy a force sufficient ro encounter his Enemies, nor a Garrifon in readiness to defend the City, untill other relief or succour could be administred. Wherefore in these doubts he refolved to give way to the Torrent of his Enemies rage, and retire towards Collafuyu, where he promifed to himself security of life, and defence from the Loyalty and Valour of that people. With this intention and design he departed from Coxto with a retinue of such Incas as were able to follow him, and came to the Coxco with a retinue of the beas as were able to follow him, and came to the Straits of Magna, about five Leagues Northward from the City, towards the Sea of Zur, and there posted himself on the top Mountain, from whence he could furvey the Enemies Camp, and descry what they acted in the way as they passed. The King having thus abandoned Coxco, the City was exposed to open violence, none daring to propose, much less act in the desence of it; every one endeavouring to shift for himself, and save his life in the best manner he was able. Of these Fugitives, some repaired to the Prince Viracocha, informing him of the Rebellion of Chincasuyu, and of the flight of his Father; and that there was no possibility in so short time and warning to withstand or make head against the Enemy.

The Prince deeply refenting this fad news of the flight of his Father, and the nakedness of the City, commanded those who brought him the advice, and those few Shepherds that were with him, that they should immediately repair to the City, and order those that they should find there, and as many as they should meet in the ways, that they should with such Arms as they had, and with as much speed as they could possibly, repair to the mea their Lord and Master, giving them likewise to understand, that it was his intention so to doe, and that this was his Order and Special Command to them. Having issued out this advice. the Prince Viracocha proceeded in Quest of his Father, and without visiting the City, he took a fhort cut; and losing no time, overtook him in the Strairs of Muyna, from whence he was not as yet departed; and being covered over with fweat and duft, holding a Lance in his hand, which he had cafually taken up on the way, he prefented himself before the King, and with a grave and melancholy countenance, he thus addressed his Speech to him.

How is it, Inca, that upon a report (whether true or false, is uncertain) of some sew of your Subjects risen in Rebellion, you should abandon your City and Court, and sig before an Enemy, not as yet feen, nor appearing? How can you yield and refign the Temple of the Sun your Father into the power of your Enemies, to be polluted by their prophane and unhallowed feet : giving them thereby liberty to return to their ancient Abominations, and there offer again their detestable Sacrifices of Men, Women and Children, with other unhumane and unnatural actions, from which your Ancestours had reformed them? What account shall we be able to render of the charge committed to us for guard and defence of those Virgins dedicated to the Sun, if we abandon and leave them to the brutality and lufts of our Enemies? And what benefit shall we get by saving our lives, with the loss of our honour and admission of fall the evils and mischiefs imaginable? For my part, I shall never assent unto it, but rather appear fingly before the face of my Enemies, and lofe my life in opposing their entrance into Cozco, rather than live to fee the defolation of that City, and those abominable practices committed in that Sacred and Imperial Court, which the Sun and his Children had founded: Wherefore let fuch as have courage follow me, and I shall shew them how to exchange an infamous and loathfome Life for a noble and honourable Death.

Having faid thus much with deep fense and heat of spirit, he took his way towards the City, without losing so much time as to eat or drink. The Incas of the Bloud, who untill now had accompanied the King, and with them his own Brothers, Coufins and nearest Relations, to the number of above 4000 Men, returned and followed the Prince, so that onely some few old and impotent Men remained with the King: As many as they met in the way they marched, and those also who were scattered abroad in the Countrey, they called and summoned unto them; giving them to understand, that the Prince Viracocha was returned to the City with intention to defend that and the Temple of his Father the Sun, with the last drop of his bloud. With this news, which was soon spread over all places, the Indians were so encouraged, (the presence of the Prince giving countenance to the resolution) that they all unanimously returned to the City, intending there to dye with great alacrity and chearfulness with their Prince, who evidenced fo much resolution and courage in their defence.

In this manner, and with these thoughts, he entred the City, and from thence immediately taking the direct road towards Chincasury, which was the Pass by which the Enemy marched; he commanded his Army, without any delay, to follow him, intending there to place himself between the Enemy and the City; not that he expected thereby to give a stop to their proceedings, for that it could never be hoped that their inconsiderable number could make head against such Multitudes; but that as valiant and desperate Men, they might dye fighting against their Enemies, rather than behold the Barbarians victorious in the Temple and City of their Father the Sun, which was a matter that made the most sensitive most sensiti

And because we must here set a period to the Reign of Tahnar-huacae, (whole Life we now write) and as hereaster will appear, we shall now put a full stop to the current of this History, that so we may distinguish the Actions of this King from those of his Son Viracocha: And for variety sake, and to please the Reader, we shall intermix other matters which are curious and divertising, and then afterwards return to the Atchievements and Exploits of the Prince Viracocha, which were famous and of great Renown.

CHAP. I.

How they enlarged and divided the Lands amongst the People.

O foon as the Inca had conquered any Kingdom or Province, and that he had fettled and established his Government and Religion amongst the Inhabitants, he ordered that those Lands which were capable of improvement (that is, fuch as would bear Mayz) should be dressed and manured; and in order hereunto they drained all wet Moors and Fens. for in that Art they were excellent, as is apparent by their Works which remain unto this day: And also they were very ingenious in making Aqueducts for carrying Water into dry and fcorched Lands, fuch as the greatest part of that Countrey is, which is fituated under the Torrid Zone, being commonly barren for want of Water to refresh and make it fruitfull; and for that reason, wherefoever they intended to fow their Maye or Indian Wheat, they always made contrivances and inventions to bring their Water for them, nor less carefull were they to water their Pastures, which they drowned in case the Autumn proved dry, that so they might have Grass sufficient to feed the numerous Flocks they maintained. These Aqueducts, though they were ruined after the Spaniards came in. yet several Reliques and Monuments of them remain unto this day.

After they had made a provision of Water, the next thing was to dress, and cultivate, and clear their Fields of Bushes and Trees, and that they might with most advantage receive the Water, they made them in a Quadrangular form; those Lands which were good on the fide of Hills, they levelled them by certain Allies, or Walks, which they made, as is to be seen in Cozco, and all over Peru unto this day; to make these Allies, they raised three Walls of Freezed Stone, one before, and one of each fide, somewhat inclining inwards, (as are all the Walls they make) so that they may more securely bear and keep up the weight of the Earth, which is pressed and rammed down by them, until it be raised to the height of the Wall: Then, next to this Walls, they made another something shorter and lefs, kept up in the same manner with its Wall; until at length they came to take in the whole Hill, levelling it by degrees in fashion of a Ladder, one Ally above the other, until they came to take in all the Hill, and inclose the ground which was capable of improvement, and of receiving Water; where the ground was flony, they gathered up the Stones, and covered the barren Soil with fresh Earth to make their Levels, that so no part of the ground might be lost: The first Allies were the largest, and as spatious as the situation of the place could the fift Affics were the right, and as partons as the industrial of the plate tollid bear, fome being of that length and breadth as were capable to receive a hundred, fome two hundred, or three hundred Bushells of Seed. The second row of Allies tome two hundred, or three hundred burnels of seed. The feeopd row of Allies were made narrower and shorter, and so went lessening, until at last at the bottom and lowermost Ally, they were contracted to so narrow a Compass, as was not capable to produce more than two or three small measures of Mage. In some parts they husbanded their matter, that they brought the Chanels of water from lifteen or twenty Leagues diffance, though it were only to improve a flip of a few Acres of Land, which was efteemed good Corn-ground.

Having in this manner (as we have faid) improved, and enlarged their Lands, the next thing was to make a just Division of them in all Countries; for performance next thing was to make a just Division of them in all Countries; for performance of which they divided the grounds into three parts, one was allotted to the Sun, a fecond to the King, and a third to the Inhabitants: This Rule was observed with great exactness, and in favour of the People, that so the Natives might not want ground for tillage; for in that case, when the Countrey abounded with numbers of People, they abated of the proportion allotted to the Sun, and to the Luca, for the sake and benefit of the Subjects; so that in effect, neither did the King in his own, or in right of the Sun, appropriate to himself any Lands, but such as lay untilled, unposses, were inclosed, and laid in Allies, being so manured and improved by special Command. Besides these Lands, which by passes, of their convenient function for receiving water, produced Mars, they reason of their convenient struction for receiving water, produced Maye, they made a Division of other Land, also that were in a dry soil, without any convenience of water, and yet because they were capable to produce some sorts of grane, and pulle, fuch as they called Papa, and Oca, and Annus, which were very beneficial; the Sun and the King had their fhares allowed thereof. This foil, which for want of water was thus barren, they did not fow above one or two years together, and then broke up fresh ground, leaving the other to lie fallow, untill it had again recovered its former strength.

Their Mayz, or Wheat fields, which had the benefit of water, they fowed every year, dunging them after every crop, as we do our Gardens, which made them extremely frultfull; and with the Maye they fowed a finall feed, like Rice, which they call Quinua, and grows much in cold Countries.

Of the Order they observed in manuring their Lands: and what Feast and For they made when they tilled the Grounds of the Inca, and of the Sun.

IN cultivating their Lands they observed this Rule and Method; those of the Sun were preferred in the first place, then those belonging to Orphans, and Widows, and Persons impotent, by reason of age and sickness; all which remaining under the notion of poor, were by order of the Inca provided for, and their Lands manured by special Command: To person which, there were Deputies appointed in every Parish, or Community of the People, to take care that those Lands were tilled and dressed. These Deputies were called Liastacamann, which is as much as Monitors of the People, whose charge it was according to the Seafons of the Year, to plow, and fowe, and reap, and gather the fruit, laying it up in places which they had built like Barnes to receive them. The fummons which the People had to this work, was by found of Trumper, or other loud Infrument, to crave attention; and then the Crier proclaimed, That fuch a day the work of the poor was to be done, and therefore that every one should provide againft that time to attend that fervice; and then where they were first to begin, and how to proceed, either in that of their Relations, or Neighbours, was affigned by the Overseer. Every workman that came to labour in the fields of the Orphans, or Widows, or impotent brought his own Provisions with him; for that the Poor were obliged to no care, their infirmities and wants excusing them from other troubles, than a patient sufferance of their own evils. If the poor wanted feed to fow their Lands, it was administred to them out of the publish work his ways and the control of the publish work his ways and the control of the publish work his ways and the control of the publish work his ways and the control of the publish work his ways and the control of the publish work his ways and the control of the publish work his ways and the control of the publish work his ways and the control of the publish work his ways and the control of the publish work his ways and the control of the publish work his ways and the control of the publish work his ways and the control of the publish ways are control of the publish ways and the control of the publish ways are control of the publish ways and the control of the publish ways are control of the publish ways and the control of the publish ways are control of the publish ways and the control of the publish ways are control of the publish ways ar lick Granaries, of which we shall have occasion to speak hereafter.

The Lands of Souldiers, whilft they were actually employed in the Wars were manured with the fame care and manner as those of the poor; their Wives. during the absence of their Husbands, being listed into the number of Widows. and the Children of those who were slain in the Wars were provided for, and carefully educated, untill the time of their Marriage.

The Lands of the poor being already tilled, in the next place every private Person might attend to his own Farm, and the first that had done was to help his fellows: then the Lands of the Curaca were to be served, and were the last in order after those of the People; the which was observed so severely, that in the Reign of Huspia Capac, a certain Indian Overleer was hanged for tilling the Land of a Curaca, who was his Kinfman, before that of a Widow; and to make the or a curacia, who was his kiniman, before that or a vy-now; and to make the punishment more exemplary, the Gallows was fet up in the very Land of the Curaca. The feverity of this Law was grounded on the fame practice, which was observed in the Lands of the Incu himself; for that the Incu always preferred the Tillage of his Subjects before his own, it being their sure Maxime, that the Happiness of the Prince depends on the Prosperity of the People, without which they become unable to ferve him, either in times of War or Peace.

The laft Lands to be tilled were those of the King, to which, and to those of the Sun, the People in general applied themselves with great alacrity and rejoicing, they then at that work appeared in their best Cloths, full of Gold and Silver plates, and seathers on their Heads, in the same manner as they were dressed on their selfual days. When they ploughed, which seemed the more pleasant work they sing the Sonners made in prasse of their sacas, with which the time passed for early, that their Labour seemed a Recreation, so great was their Devotion to a wards their Cool and their King.

Within the City of Cozco, bordering on the fide of that Hill where the Callle Within the City of Coxco, bordering on the fide of that Filli where the Caffe was built, there was a fpatious Walk or Alley, containing many acres of ground, called Colleampata, and is ftill remaining, unless they have built houses upon it, fince the time I was there: the plat of ground on which it was, took its name from the Walk it felf, being the best piece of Land, and as it were the Jewel, and Flower of all the Estate belonging to the Sun, and was the first plat of Earth which the Incas had dedicated to him. This Walk was like a Garden, manured which the Incas had dedicated to him. This Walk was like a Garden, manured to the Country of the Part Rend, present was encouraged to the provide a control of the Part Rend, present provides and provide the control of the Part Rend, present provides and provide the control of the Part Rend, present provides and provides a control of the Part Rend, present provides a control of the Part Rend, present provides and provides a control of the Part Rend, present provides and present provides a control of the Part Rend, present provides a control and cultivated onely by Incas of the Royal Bloud, nor was any other admitted to be Gardiner or Labourer there, under the degree of Inca, or Palla, which was a Lady of the Royal Family. All the Songs they made, were Panegyricks in praife of the Sun; and the fubftance of them was taken from the word Hoyli, which of the Sun; and the fubftance of them was taken from the word Htylli, which in the common language of Peru fignifies triumph; as if they were victorious, and triumphed over the Earth, when they ploughed and digged into its bowels, forcing it to fructify, and raking fruit from thence. With these Sonnets they intermixed the quick and acute Sentences and Sayings of discreet Lovers, and valiant Souldiers, tending to the Subject and Work in hand, concluding every suffice franza of their Verses with the word Htylii, which was the burthen of the Song, and repeated as often as was necessary to fill up the cadence of the Tune; and thus they sang, and worked backward and forward, as they made the Furrows, with which describables the roll and labour was much alleviated.

thus they fang, and worked backward and forward, as they made the Furrows, with which chearfulnels the toil and labour was much alleviated.

The Plough they use was made of a piece of Wood, of about four fingers broad, and a yard long, it was state before, and round behind, and pointed at the end, that so it might the more easily pierce, and enter the Earth; then about half a yard high, on the main shaft they bound two pieces of Wood for a stay to the Foot, with which the Indian pressing very hard, thrust his Plough, or Shovel, up to the very step, or stay to the Foot; and therewith seven and seven, or eight and eight a breast, according to the number of the Kindred, or Partnership, drawing all together, they turned up turss, and clods of Earth of an incredible bigness, so that those who have not seen this Invention before, would wonder that so weak as Instrument could be able to doe so great and heavy a work, and with that the an Inftrument could be able to doe to great and heavy a work, and with that dif-patch and eafe also, as did not put the Labourers out of breath, fo as to spoil the Air and Cadence of the Tune. The Women likewise were affistents to the Men in this work, helping to turn up the turf and clods, and pluck up the Weeds and roots, that they might dye and wither; in which labour they bore also part in the Mulick, and joined in the Clorus of Hayli, Hayli,

The Indian Tunes having a kind of fweet Air with them, the Mulick-Mafter of the Cathedral Church at Coze, in the Year 1551, or 1552, composed an Antheme, and fet it to one of their Tunes, which he plaid on the Organ, upon the Festival of the most Holy Sacrament, at which Solemnity he introduced eight Fettival of the most Flory Sacrament, at which Solemnity he introduced eight Mongrel Boys, of mixed Bloud between Spanish and Indians, and my School-fellows, finging the Songs which he had fet according to the true Air of Incas Musick, and each of them carrying a Plough in his hand, accompanied the Procession, representing and initiating the Hoplii of the Indians; all the Chapell in the mean time joining in the Chaptas, to the great fatisfaction of the Spaniards, and contentment of the Indians, who were over-joyed to see the Spaniards so far to honour them, as to practise their Dances and Musick, when they celebrated the Festival Code which they called Publicanus, and is as made as a fine to be a content of the code of t them, as to practite their Dances and municity, when they celeorated the rettival of their Lord God, which they called Pachacamac, and is as much as to fay, he that gives Life to the whole Univerte.

Thus I have related the manner how the Incis celebrated the Feaft which they held at the time of ploughing, and fowing the Grounds dedicated to the Sun, the which I faw, and observed for two or three following years, when I was a Child, and by them we may guess at the form and manner of the Fetfivals following the state of the state other parts of Peru, on the fame occasion, though those Feasts which I saw, as the Indians assured me, were but faint representations of those in ancient times, and were not to be effeemed comparable to them.

CHAP. III.

Of the Proportion of Land which was allotted to every Indian. and with what fort of Dung they improved it.

To every Indian was given a Tupu of Land, which was as much as he might fow with a Hanega, (which is as much as a Bushel and a half of Marx.) or Indian Wheat, though the Hanega of Peru is a Hanega and a half of Spain.) This word Tupu fignifies also a League in travelling, likewise all forts of measures of Water, or Wine, or any other Liquour; as also the great Pins with which Women tack up their dressings: The Measure of Seed-corn hath also another name, which is Poccha.

One Tupu of Land was esteemed sufficient to maintain an ordinary Countrey-Fellow and his Wife, provided he had not Children; for then, so soon as he had a Son, they added another Tupu of Land to his Estate, and if a Daughter, half an one: When the Son married, so that he left his Fother's House, then he refigned over to the Son his Tupu of Land, in which he had an Original Right and Propriety.

But this was differently observed as to Daughters, for they were not to take their Lands with them in marriage, it having been given them for their fubfiftence during their Minority onely, but not to accrue to them by way of Portion; for every Husband claiming his thare of Land in his own Right, was obliged to support his Wife, the Law taking no farther cognizance of Women after their Marriage; the Land remaining with the Father, in case he had need of it, and if not, then it returned again to the Community, for it was not lawfull either to sell or alienate it.

Proportionably to those Lands which they gave for bearing Mayz, they also adjoined others, which were dry Lands, and did not require Water, and yet produced Pulse and other seeds.

To Noble and great Families, fuch as were those of the Curacas, or Lords who had Subjects under them, they allotted so much Land as was sufficient to maintain their Wives and Children, Concubines and Servants. To the Incas of the tain their Wives and Children, Concubines and Servants. To the Incas of the Bloud Royal the same advantage and benefit was allowed, in any part wheresoever they were pleased to fix their aboad; and their Lands were to be the best and richest of any: And this they were to enjoy over and above the common share and right which they claimed in the Estates of the King, and the Sun, as Children of the one, and Brothers of the other.

They need to dung their Lands, that they might make them fruitfull, and it is observable, that in all the Valley about Cosco, and in the hilly Countries, where they sowed Maye, they esteemed the best manure to be Man's Dung; and to that end they saved and gathered it with great care, and drying it, they cast it upon their Land before they sowed their Maye. But in the Countrey of Collao, which is above an hundred and sifty Leagues long, which, by reason of the coldness of the Climate, doth not produce Maye, though it bear other fort of Grane, there they esteem the Dung of Cattle to be the best manure and improvement.

By the Sea-coast, from below Arequepa, as far as Turapage, which is above two

By the Sea-coaft, from below Arequepa, as far as Tarapaca, which is above two hundred Leagues, they use no other Dung, but such as comes from the Sea-birds, nuncred Leagues, they are no other Dung, but mon as comes from the Sea-birds, of which there are great numbers, and incredible flocks on the Coaft of Perns; they breed in little Illands, which lie in the Sea, and are unpeopled, where they lay fuch heaps of Dung, that at a diffrance they feem to be Hills of Snow. In the times of the hears, who were Kings, great care was taken of thee Birds in the feafon of their Breeding; for then on pain of Death no Man was to enter on those Illands, left they should diffurb the Birds, or spoil their Nests; nor was it lawfull to take or kill them at any time, either off or upon the Island. 126

Every Island was by order of the Inca, affigned to fuch and fuch Provinces, and if the Island were very large, then two or three of them divided the foilage, the which they laid up in feparate heaps, that so one Province might not encroach on the proportion allotted to the other; and when they came to make their Division to particular Persons, and Neighbours, they then weighed and shared out to every Man the quantity he was to receive; and it was felony for any man to take more than what belonged to him, or to rob or steal it from the ground of his Neighbour, for in regard that every man had as much as was necessary for his own Lands, the taking a greater quantity than what belonged to him, was judged a Crime, and a high offence; for that this fort of Birds dung was esteemed pretious, being the best improvement and manure for Land in the World.

Howsoever in other parts of that Coast, and in the Low Countries of Asica, Asignipa, Villacori, Malla and Chillea, and other Vallies, they dung their grounds with the Heads of a small fish, like our Pilchards, and with no other sunder the same Climate, live with great labour and toil, where they can neither water their Grounds with the trams from the Springs or Fountains, nor yet with the Rain or Climate, live with great labour and toil, where they can neither water their Grounds with streams from the Springs or Fountains, nor yet with the Rain or Dews from Heaven: For it is a certain truth, that for the space of seven hundred Leagues along that Coast it did never rain, nor are there in all that tract of Land streams, or places for water, the whole Countrey being exceedingly hot, dry, and nothing almost but sand; for which reason the Natives endeavouring to moissen their grounds, so as to make them capable to yield Mays, they approach as near to the Sea, as they are able, where they turn aside, and cast away the Sand which lies upon the surface, and dig down as deep as a Man's Body is in length, and sometimes twice as deep, untill, having passed the Sand, they come to such a fort of Earth as is able to bear the weight of Water, which places the Spaniards call Hoyas, or Vaults; and being of different proportions, some greater, and some lesser; some are not capacious enough to receive above half a measure of Seed. In leffer; some are not capacious enough to receive above half a measure of Seed-corn, others again are so large as to receive three or sour measures of Seed: In these places they neither plow, nor reap, because they rather set than sow, planting their grane of  $M_{0} \approx$  at an equal distance one from the other; and in the holes or surrows which they make; they cast three or sour grains of  $M_{0} \approx$ , with a sew Pilchards Heads; which being all the dung they use, and which is onely, as they say, profitable in that soil, they expect their Harvest at its due season. And to see how Divine Providence taketh care of all Creatures, for that neither the season may want that Manure, which onely makes their Land fruitfull, nor the Birds of the slidands their food, there are such quantities of Pilchards cast up by the Sea at those seasons are not onely difficient for the Food of Men and Birds. Birds of the Islands their food, there are such quantities of Pilchards cast up by the Sea at those feasons, as are not onely sufficient for the Food of Men, and Birds, and for dunging the Earth, but even to lade many Ships, if occasion should require: It is said, that this Fish is chased ashore by some Dolphins, or greater Fish; be it by what means it will, the advantage is great, and the Providence of God is admirable in these his Blessings towards his poor Ceratures. Who was the first Inventer of this manner of planting in holes with the Heads of Pilchards, is uncertain; we may rather attribute it to Necessity, which is the Mother of Ingenuity; for in regard, as we have said, that there is great want of Bread in all parts of Pern, the same Understanding which in some parts taught them to plant their Maze in holes, the same also instructed them to make their Allies in the parts of Coeto, and by this means every one sowing for his own maintenance, and not to sell, all People enjoyed sufficient for their support, never any scarcity or famine having been known in that Land. having been known in that Land.

CHAP. IV.

How they divided their Water into several Rivulets for the refreshment of their Land; and what Punishment they inflicted on the idle and negligent People that would not work.

IN those Countries where Water was scarce, they took care to divide their Waters to every one according to his necessities, and by such equal proportions, and with that order; that all quarrels and contentions for it were avoided; and hereunto they had most especial regard in dry years, when Rain was wanting; for then they allotted out unto every one his certain hours, having by experience learned in how much time an Acre of Ground might be supplied, and drink the Water it required. In which benefit neither the Rich nor the more Noble, nor the Kinssman of the Curaca, nor the Curaca himself, nor the Governour, nor the Kinssman of the Curaca, nor the Curaca himself, nor the Governour, nor the Kinssman to the sum, as his Lands and Furrows lay in order. He that was negligent to take his turn, and to watch his ground whilst the Water ran into the Furrows, and Dams, was punished for a sluggard in the most affrontive manner; for he was to receive publickly three or four thumps on the Back with a Stone, or whipped on the Armes and Legs with Switches of Osier, and shamed with the disgracefull term of an idle and sloathfull fellow, which was a great distinguand differentation to them, calling them Mizquitullus, which is Easte-bones, being a word compounded of Mizqui, which signifies sweet, and Tullus which is bones.

CHAP. V.

Of the Tribute which they gave to the Inca, and of the Veffels they made to receive their Fruits.

Having already declared the manner by which the Incas divided the Lands, and the ways and inventions by which the Subjects improved them; we are in the next place to proceed to fliew what Tribute they gave unto their Kings. The chiefest part of their Tribute did consist in their labour, which was to cultivate and manure the Lands belonging to the Sun, and to the Inca, and also to gather and reap the Fruits, and lay them up in the Kings Barns: One fort of fruit which was in esteem amongst them, was that which they call $\mathcal{Uchn}$, and the $\sigma_{paniards} \times \tilde{\pi_{paniards}}$ and we in English Red Pepper. The places in which they laid their Corn called $\mathcal{Pirma}$, were made of Clay, tempered with Straw: In the times of the *Incas* they were very curious in this work, and made them of different fizes and fashions; some being long and narrow, and others square; some of them were made to receive thirty, some fifty, and some an hundred measures of Corn: Every one of these Clay-vessels was put into a Chamber by it self, just fitted to the proportion of the Vessel, and fixed with Walls on each side, so as not to be removed;

removed: and in the middle of the Chamber a paffage was left to go from one to the other to empty and fill them according to the featons of the year; for emptying these Vessels, they opened a little shutter before, of about a quarter of a Yard square, or bigger, or lessels, according to its proportion, by which they knew certainly the quantity that was taken out, and what remained without measuring of it; whereby, and by the langeness of the Vessels, they cassly made the account of the quantity of the Mayz which remained in every Barn or Magazine. I remember that I once saw some of these Clay-vessels, which remained ever since the time of the beas; they were such as were of the best fort, for they had belonged to the Convent of the Select Virgins, who were Wives to the Sun, and made folely for the service of those Women; when I saw them, they were in the House of the Sens of Pesho de Barca, who had been School-sellows with me. The Provisions of the Sun, and of the beas, were laid up apart, and in different Vessels, though in the same Store-house or Magazine. The Corn for Seed was given out by the Lord of the Land, who was the Sun and the beas; as also the Corn which made Bread for the Land, who was the Sun and the beas; as also the Corn which made Bread for the Land, who was the Sun and the beas; as also the Corn which made Bread for the Land, who was the Sun and the beas; as alto the Corn which made Bread for the Land, who was the Sun and the beas; as alto the Corn which made Bread for the Land, who was the Sun and the beas; as alto the Corn which made Bread for the Land, who was the Sun and the beas; as alto the Corn which made Bread for the Land, who was the Sun and the beas; as alto the fiscenth Chapter of his fixth Book, in these words: "The beas gave the third part of "the Lands to the People's but it is not certain whether this third part was so easier of all Tax or Imposition. The truth of which is affirthed by Alesse in the fiscenth Chapter of his fixth Book, in these words: "The beas gave the third pa

In all the Province of Colla, which is above 150 Leagues long, Mayz doth not grow, by reason of the coldness of the Climate; but in the place of it they have great abundance of Quinna, which is a fort of Rice, besides plenty of other Grane and Pulse, and such Corn as grows low upon the ground; such as is that which they call Papa, which is round and juicy, and by reason of the great humidity of it inclines much to corruption, and is soon rotten; but the better to conserve it, they spread it on the ground upon Straw, of which there is great store, and very good in that Countrey, exposing it for many Nights to the Frost; for the Frosts are very that p and lasting there; after it hath in this manner, as it were, been digested and ripened by the colds, they then gently press it, that the warrithness may pass away with the crude humour caused by the Frost; and after they have thus well pressed it, they lay it out in the Sun, keeping it from the serine damps of the Night, untill it is perfectly dried. And by these means they conserve the Papa for a long time, which then they call by the Name of Chimum, and by that Name all the Papa passed, which was gathered from the Lands of the Sun, and of the Inca, and which they conserved in their Store-houses, with other Grane, and with their Pease and Vetches, and such like.

How they made Cloaths, and Arms, and Shoes for the Souldiery.

Belides this Tribute of Labour which the Indians bestowed on the Lands of the Sun, and the Inca, and of the gathering in their Fruit; the second Tribute required was a contribution towards the Cloathing, Shoes and Arms of the Souldiety, as also for the poor and needy, who by reason of Age, or want of Health, were not able to labour and provide for themselves: And herein the same rule and order was observed, as in the former Tribute: The Cloathing in all the Hilly Countries was made of Wool; which was produced by those multitudes of Cattel which were pastured in those parts for account of the Sun; but in the Plains along the Sea-coast, where the Countrey is hot, they made all their Garments of Cottons, which grew in the Lands belonging to the Inca and the Sun, to that the Indians were at no farther experice therein, than that onely which proveeded from the labour of their hands. Their Woolen Cloathing was of three forts; the coursest, which they called Avasca, was for the common people; the next degree, which was something siner, they called Compi, which was fit for Captains and Nobles, and the better fort of people, and were made of divers colours, and dressed and curried like the Dutch Cloths: To the finest fort likewise they gave the same name of Compi, which was onely for the cloathing of Insa of the Royal Bloud, and such of them as were Souldiers and Officers both of War and Royal Bloud, and fuch of them as were Souldiers and Officers both of War and Peace. This finest fort was made in Countries where the best Workmen lived. and the most ingenious Artifles; and the courfer was made by the more dull and courfer fort of Heads. All the Wool for this Cloathing was Spun by the Women; as likewise the Avasca, or courser sort, was Woven by them; but the finest was Woven by the Men, because they always Weaved standing; and both one and the other was the Work of the Subjects, and not of the Incas, though it were for their own Cloathing, though some are of opinion that the Incas worked and weaved for themselves; which we must contradict, and shall shew hereaster, when we come to treat of the Arms of Horsemen, what it was that they termed the Spinning of the mear. Those Provinces were most charged with the Assessment for Shoeing, where Hemp grew in most plenty, and was made from the Stalk of a Plant called Magney; their Arms likewife were made in those Countries where the Materials for them were most plentifull: In some places they made Bows and the Materials for them were most plentifull: In some places they made Bows and Arrows, in others Lances and Darts, in others Clubs and Bills; some Countries provided Ropes and Winlesses for lading and saftning of Burtlens, and others made Helmets and Targets, besides which they had no other defensive Arms. In short, every Province surnished and supplied such Commodities as the Nature of the Countrey did most easily produce, and such Manusactories as they could make at home; for it was a settled and an established Law through the whole Empire, that no Indian should be obliged to seek or ransack other Countries for the Tribute he was to pay; for as that would not be just nor equal, so it would be a means to make them Vagabonds, and so open a door to the Inhabitants to go on means to make them Vagabonds, and to open a door to the Inhabitants to go out of their Countrey, and forfake their own habitations; fo that the Subjects were obliged to furnish the Inca with four things, viz. Provisions or food ariling from the proper grounds of the Inca; Cloathing made of the Wool of his own Flocks, Shoes and Arms, arifing from Countries where the Materials are most common; all these Assessments were laid and imposed with great order and attention; for those Provinces which were charged with Cloths, by reason of the quantity of Wool, which abounded in their parts, were freed from the charge and care of providing Shoes; those that provided Shoes, were freed from Arms, so that hone could be twice charged, nor the Subject agrieved by the weight of his Oppressions. By this gentleness and lenity of the Yoke which the bica laid on his people, people, every one ferved him with fuch chearfulness and alacrity, that a Spanify Hiltorian much admiring thereat, utled these words: "The Riches of those bar"barous Kings consisted in the Number of their Subjects, who were all Slaves

"to them; and what is most wonderfull is, that all the labour and toil they used "for their Kings, was their greatest delight and recreation; and such was the good rule and order observed in it, that no labour was tedious, but rather of contentment and fairsfaction. These words are not my own, but the expressions of sosph de Acosta, a Person of good authority, which I gladly infert here, as in other places, to desend my self against the Malice and Obloquy of those who are ready to charge me with Fables forged in honour and favour to my own Kindred and Country. And this is what we have to say of the Tribute which was given to these Idolatrous Kings.

There was another fort of Tribute which the Kings exacted from the Impotent, and fach as were called Poor; and that was, that every one was obliged from for many days, to fach a time, to deliver into the hands of the Governours a Reed filled with Lice. It is faid, that the reation why the hear required this ftrange fort of Tribute, was, that fo no perion, how impotent foever, might pretend an entire exemption from Tribute; and because Lice were the easiest Tribute, the King exacted fach as they could pay; and the rather, that to this people by fuch obligation might be forced for payment to clear and make clean themselves of Vermine, and not pretend to be void of all employment; and the care of this Collection was encharged to a Decurion, or Officer of ten, as before mentioned. By such Acts of mercy and compassion as this towards the Poor, the hear merited the Title of a Lover of the Poor, the which Name he affunded to himself.

amongst his other Dignities and Titles of Honour.

The persons exempt from all Tribute were the Incas of the Bloud-Royal, the Priefts and Ministers of the Temple, the Curacus and Sovereign Lords, Colonels. and Captains, and Centurions, though they were not of the Bloud-Royal; also Governours, Judges, Ministers of State, during the time of their Offices, they were onely obliged to attend their charge and employments, without other trouble or diversion: All Souldiers who were actually in Arms, and attending in the War, were excused from other Services; and Youths under the Age of twenty five years, being untill that time esteemed Servants to their Fathers, and without power over themselves; and not capable to dispose of themselves in Marriage, were not obliged to pay any fort of Tribute; as also new-married persons for the first year were dispensed with in that particular. Old Men from lifty years and upwards, as also Women, and Maids, and Widows, and Married people were also exempt from Tribute, though the Spanish Writers alledge, that Women were obliged unto that payment, because they were observed to work and labour as other people; but herein they were miltaken, for that Women were not obliged to this labour by way of Tribute, out onely for the help and athiftence of their Parents or Husbands, that fo they might more speedily dispatch their tasks, and finish the labour allotted to them. It was also an excuse for any to prove himself to have been fick and indifposed in his health; the lame also and the blind, but not the dumb nor deaf were freed from their personal labour; the which belonging properly to every particular person, became a debt not to be remitted, unless on the preceding Conditions and Provifoes. And thus much Blas Liders alledges to agreeable to our fenfe, as if what we shall hereafter declare in this matter, or have already herein delivered, had been onely a Copy, or Extract, out of his Wri-

That Gold, and Silver, and other things of value, were not given by way of Tribute, but of Presents.

A LL that great quantity of Gold and Silver, and pretious Stones which the Inca poffeffed, were not Rents, nor Fruits iffuing from Tribute, but Prefents which the People voluntarily offered to their Kings; for neither Gold nor Silver were efteemed necessary for maintenance of Peace, nor (as we will have it) the Sinews of War, nor reckoned as any part of Riches, or Estate, nor were they measures in buying or selling, or given in payment to the Souldiers; for they could neither drink nor satisfie their hunger with those Metalls, and therefore were valued at no other rate, than for their glittering Lustre, and resplendent Beauty, designed onely for Ornaments to adorn the Temples of the Sun, and the Palaces of the Incas, and the Monasteries of the Virgins, as we have already made appear, and shall hereafter have occasion to prove more at large. They sound out the Mines of quick-silver, but knew not the use of it, onely that it was hurtfall, and of a quality noxious to the Head, and for that reason prohibited the People from gathering or medling with it.

We say then, that Gold and Silver was a free Offering from the Subjects to their Prince, and never demanded by them in way of Tribute, or Duty: and in regard it was a custome amongst that People, never to appear before their Superiours with empty hands, for when nothing better offered, even a basket of dry or ripe fruit was acceptable: and that also it was accustomary for the Curaca, and Princes, who had fovereign Authority over Subjects, to prefent themselves before the Inca at the principal feafts of the Year, which were dedicated to the Sun. fuch as Raymi, and at other times when Triumphs were celebrated for great and fignal Victories, or when a Prince and Heir was born, or his Head fhorn, or that the Inca visited the Provinces, and the like, the Curacas did then never prefume to appear before the Inca, and kifs his Hands, without their Prefents of Gold, or Silver, or pretious Stones, such as the Indians, who were their Vaslals, had at their leifure times extracted from the Mines; for in regard that these things were not necessary for support of humane Life, the acquisition of them was scarce escenned worth their labour, and the employment onely appointed for their vacant hours; for when they knew that there was no other use for them, but onely for the adornment of their Temples, and Palaces of the Inca, they then esteemed them worthy their trouble, for no other reason, than that they might appear with confidence before their Gods, who were the Sun and the Inca,

Moreover besides such rich Gifts as these, the Caracous did commonly present to the King Timber of the best and strongest nature for his Buildings, with excelent Masters, and the most able Artists and Workmen to erect them; for if there were any Persons ingenious, or excellent in Arts, or Crafts, such as Silver-sinishs, Painters, Stone-cutters, Carpenters, or others, they were always preserved and recommended by the Caracous to the service of the Inca; for indeed such Person as these could find no Employment or Encouragement with the common People, every one of which had skill and art sufficient for building his own poor Hutt or Cotrage where he dwelt, and making his own Shoes and Garments; for though anciently the Community had the care of providing every Eamily with a House, yet now, since every single Person hath learnt that mystery, and become a rare Architect, and can, with the affishence of a few Friends and Relations, be able to form his own Neft and Habitation; the Art of Surveyors, and the Labour of Workmen is of little use to them, for being poor, and living onely with design to supply the necessities of humane Life, they have no need of those supply

Moreover they prefented to the Inca wild Beafts, fuch as Tygers, Lions and Bears, with other Creatures less fierce, such as Drills, Monkies, Mountain-Care Deer, Parots, and other greater Birds, as Offritches, and another fort of Bird called a Cuntur, which is the biggeft of any in the world: Hereunto they fome times added Serpents which were produced in Anti; the biggeft and largeft of which they call Amaru, being twenty five or thirty foot in length, as also Toacs of a montrous bigness, and Snakes that were very fierce. And from the Sea-coast they sent Soils and Allagators, which they called Capmaner, and were some of they tent Soils and Allagators, which they called Capmanes, and were some of them twenty five or thirty foot in length. In short, there was no creature excellent in its kind either for ferocity, or bigness, or nimbleness, which they omitted to carry and present with their Offerings of Silver and Gold, that so by this way of Homage, and Duty, they might acknowledge him the supreme and universal Lord of all, and testify the zeal and affection they bore to his Service.

CHAP. VIII.

How this Tribute was conserved, and laid up, and how it was expended, and in what Service.

E are come now to enquire in what manner this Tribute was conferred, in what it was expended, and what account was given of it: and herein it is to be observed, that there were three Treasuries in the whole Kingdom, wherein they amassed and kept the Tributes, and publick Profits. In every Province whether it were great, or finall, there were always two Magazines, or Storehouses, in one of which they laid up corn, and provisions for support of the Natives against years of scarcity, or famine; in the other, all the Profits and Benefits belonging to the Sun, and the Inca, were laid up: besides which they had other smaller Store houses, built upon the King's High-way, about three or four Leagues one from the other, which the Spaniards make use of at present for Inns and Lodgings when they travell.

All the Estate of the Sun, and the Inca which lay within fifty Leagues about the City of Cozco, was all brought thither for maintenance, and support of the Court, that so the Inca might not onely have a sufficient plenty for himself and Family, but likewife to bestow in Rewards and Presents to his Captains and Curac.u, and to entertain and treat them: But some part of the Revenue which belonged to the Sun, and which was within the aforesaid limits of fifty Leagues, was separated, and laid up apart for the common benefit of the People.

What Revenue was coming in from other places more remote, without the compass of the fifty Leagues, was laid up in the King's Store-houles, which he had in every Province, and from thence it was transported to the places which were built on the common Road, for receiving Provisions, Arms, Cloths, Shoes, and all neceffaries for an Army, that to in all parts they might readily be tupplied, whento-ever they marched unto any of the four quarters of the World, which the Indiant called Taxaninfing. These Store houses being thus, as we have said, provided, were able to supply and furnish an Army with whatsoever they needed; so that in their march they neither lay upon free quarter, nor burthened the People; nor might any Souldier rob or vex the Inhabitants upon pain of Death. Pedro de Cieça in the 6oth Chapter of his Book, speaking of the great Roads, hath these Words.
"The Incas had great and large Store-houses, wherein they stowed and laid up " all their Ammunition and Provisions of War, in which they were so careful, " that they never failed to make due and large Provisions, and in failure thereof

" the Officer encharged was feverely punished; and confequently the Army being " thus well provided, no perfor was permitted to break into the Fields or Houses of the Indians, though the damage were never fo inconfiderable, under less than of the Indians, though the camage were never to monnterators, under teistman "a capital punithment. Thus far are the Words of Pedro de Cicca; and the reafon of this leverity was grounded on the fufficient maintenance which the Souldiers received, who were thus well provided for by the People, on condition that they might be secured from their violence and outrages; and thus as the Magazines in the Roads were emptied by the Souldiers in their March, fo they were again replenished, and supplied by the Provincial Stores. Augustin de Carate dif-couring of the great Roads, or the King's High-Ways, (as we shall hereafter have occasion to mention more at large) doth in the 14th. Chapter of his first Book fay: "That befides these common Store-houses on the Roads, Guarnacause gave command for building in all the mountainous Countries large and capacious Houses, able to receive him, and his Court, and all his Army, and to be feated at the diffance of a days march, one from the other. In the plains also he built others of the like capacious Form, but those were situated more allo ne built others of the INEC CAJACIOUS FORM, but those were intuated more remote one from the other, being at eight or ten, or perhaps fifteen or twenty. Leagues afunder, according as the Rivers or conveniences of Water happened; and thefe Houles were called Tombos, where the Indians laid up fuch quantities and ftores of Arms, and other necessaries, for an Army, that every one of them was sufficient to cloath, and arme, and feed twenty or thirty thousand. Men, with the Provisions contained within it self; and yet the Army, though Men, with the Provinons contained within it tert; and yet the Army, though it was numerous, was yet well accounted with all forts of Weapons, fuch as "Pikes, Halberts, Clubs and Pole-Axes, made of Silver, and Copper, and fome of them of Gold, having tharp points, and fome of them hardened by the fire, befides Slings, and Darts thrown by hand. Thus far are the Words of Angulin Carate, touching the Provisions lodged in the Roads for accommodation of the Army.

If the King were at any time put unto exceffive charge in his Wars, fo that his Revenue could not reach the expence, then in that case it was lawfull for the Inca, as universal Heir to his Father the Sun, to make use of his Riches, and Revenue, and that whensoever the Wars were finished, the overplus which remained of fuch Provisions were carefully laid up in the respective Store-houles, for support and maintenance of the People in Years of Famine and Scarcity; in which fuch care was taken, that the loca himself judged it an Employment fit to be supervised

by his own particular regard and inspection.

The Priefts, in all parts of the Empire, were maintained at the charges of the Sun, that is, whilft they were actually employed in the Service of the Temple, for they attended by Weeks, according to their turns; but when they were arrhome, and out of waiting, they then fed and maintained themfelves from the fruits of those grounds, which were equally divided to them with other People; by which, and the like Parsmony, used in expending the Revenue of the Sun, his Stores were always great and plentifull, and sufficient to affist, and fuccour the beautiful and progressive and measures did require. Inca, as his necessities and urgencies did require.

CHAP. IX.

That the People were supplied with Clothing, and that no Beggars were allowed amongst them.

AS by this good Order, and Method, the Souldiery was well provided with Clothing, so with the like care every two years a certain proportion of Wool was distributed to the Commonalty, and to the Curacas in general, where with to make Garments for themselves, their Wives, and their Families; and it was the Office of the Decurions to fee, and render an account to the Superiour Officers. how far this Wool was employed to the uses, unto which it was designed. cers, how far this Wool was employed to the ules, unto which it was defigned. The Indians were generally very poor in Cattel, and the Curacus themselves for the most part were Matters of so sew as were not sufficient for supply of themselves and their Families, whereas on the other side, the Sun, and the Inca, had such valt Flocks and Herds, as were almost innumerable. The Indians report, that when the Spaniards came first in amongst them, their flocks of Cattel were greater than their Passures could feed, and I have heard from my Father, and others who lived in his time, that the Spaniards made great Destruction of the Cattel, as we shall hereafter have occasion more largely to relate. In the Countries they gave them Cottons to spin for the clothing of themselves and Families; so that every one having a sufficiency of Food and Raiment, none could properly be termed poor, nor could any be forced to beg, because his Necessitive fupplied; it is true, that none could be called rich, if Riches be placed in affluence and abundance; for as none wanted, so noon had more than his Needs required. What we have declared at large, is confirmed by $\(\textit{Act}\)\textit{fail} in a few words, who in the 15th Chapter of his 6th Book, speaking of $Peru$, hath this passage: "At the seasons they shore their Cattel, and then divided unto every one sufficiently." ent for him to spin, and weave for his own, and the clothing of his House and " Family, and how diligent he was in his work, and how well he complied with his Task, was carefully inspected by an Officer, appointed for that Affair: " what Wool or Cotton remained after fuch Division, was laid up in the com-" mon Storehouses, which was performed with that good Husbandry, that they were found full when the Spaniards entred their Countrey. And herein no " thinking Man can without due reflexion admire and wonder at the Providence " of this People, and their political Government; for though they had not been refined with the pure Doctrine of the Christian Religion, nor yet had been taught the Rules of a Monaftical Life, yet they had learned that point (which we call perfection) how, and in what manner to provide all necessaries both "for the King and his People, without appropriating any thing to a particular possession." And thus Acofea ends this 15th Chapter, which he entitles, The Revenue and Tribute of the Inca. In another Chapter following, discoursing there of the Offices held by the Indians, he touches many points which we have already declared, and which we shall have occasion to speak of more at large hereafter, he hath farther these express words. "The Indians of Peru had this Rule and Maxime amongst them, that it was necessary to teach their Children so soon as they were capable, those works which were conducing to humane Life; for in regard they had no Trades amongst them, such as Shoemakers, Weavers, and the like, whose Profession it was to make Shoes and Clothing for others, as well as themselves; but every one applyed himself to make and provide that of which he had need and occasion; so that all knowing how to weave and fow, provided themselves with Garments out of the Wool which the Inca dionly provided themere with Gamens out the wood which the man difficult to them. Every one knew how to plow, and manure his Land without putting himfelf to the charge of Labourers; every one was a Carpenter, and Mason, and was able to build his own House, especially the Women were the most ingenious and diligent of any; for being bred up, and educated "in hardfhip and toil, contributed much to the affiftence of their Husbands in all their labours. But those Professions and Arts which were not common, and which did not so properly belong to the necessity of Humane Life, such as Silversiniths, Painters, Potters, Boatmen, Accountants and Pipers, had their particular Masters and Professions; but the ordinary and necessary Works were taught and practised in every Family, every one doing his own business, did not hire, or pay another for it, but made his own Cloaths and Shoes, sowed his own Fields, and gathered in his own Harvest: And this, as it was the ancient custome amongst them, so it hath continued even to this day; wherein they seem to have imitated the Lives of the Ancient Monks, as the Fathers of the Church have delivered them to us. The truth is, they are a people neither covetous, nor luxurious by nature; that, in reality, were the life they lead a point of free-will, rather than necessity, or chosen for the sake of Mortification; certainly these people would be rarely well disposed to receive the Doctrine of the Gospel, which is an enemy to pride, and covetousness, and luxurious living, though the Preachers up of these Graces unto the Indians do not always live according to those Precepts which they deliver in their Pulpits. And then soon after he adds; "That it was an Established Law amongst them, that no Man should change the Habit and Fashion of his Countrey, though he altered his Habitation out of one Province into another; the observance of which Rule, the Inca enjoined with great severity as a matter of importance in relation to the Government. Thus far are the words of Acossa. To which I shall add, that the Indians wonder much to see the Spaniards so frequently change their Habits, and attribute it to their pride, prefumption, and wantonness of their

In the Year 1560, when I departed from Peru, it was not the custome for any to beg, or ask Alms; for where ever I travelled in that Countrey, I never obseryed any Man or Woman to beg, unless it were an Old Woman which I knew at Ved any Ivian or vy ofinat to beg, times it were an Old vy ofinal which at Cozeo, called I Jabel; and she neither had no great necessity, onely she was delighted to Gossip from house to house, and, like a Gypsie, with her Jests and Tricks, persuaded the Neighbours to be kind to her. Howsoever, the Indians detested her way of living, and in token of their abhorrence thereof would reprove her with words, and then fpit on the ground, which was a kind of reproach, and for that reason this Woman would never beg of the Indians, but onely of the Spiniards; and because at that time, in my Countrey, there was no Money coined, they gave her Mayz, which was the chief thing she desired; and if she found this come freely, the would beg a little Flesh, and then some of their Drink; and then with her Tricks and Jests she would get some of their Cuca, which is that pretious Plant for much in efteem amongst the Indians, and which they commonly carry in their Mouths; and thus the passed a merry and wanted they commonly they on the Peighbours. Nor were the Incas, amongst their other Charities, forgetfull of the conveniencies for Travellers, but in all the great Roads built Houses, or Inns, for them, which they called Corpahnaci, where they were provided with Victuals, and other necessaries, for their Journies, out of the Royal Stores, which were laid up in every Province; and in case any Traveller fell sick in the way, he was there attended, and care taken of him, in a better manner perhaps than at his own home: But the truth is, no person Travelled for his curiofity, or pleasure, or business, but for the service, and by order of the King, or his Curacas, when they had occasion to diffacth Meffengers, fuch as Captains for the War, or other Officers for confervation of the Peace; and then these were well provided for, and treated with all conveniencies; whereas others who had not the pretence and pass-port for their Travels, were taken up for Vagabonds, and punished accordingly.

CHAP. X.

The Rule they observed in the Division of their Flocks, and of other strange Beasts.

THE Flocks of Cattel which belonged to the Inca were fo numerous, that for the better keeping an account of them, they separated them by diffined Droves, according to their colours; for their Cattel are of Party-colours in those Countries, as the Horfes are in Spain; and for every colour they have a proper word: Those creatures which have great variety of colours, they call Maramura, which the Spaniards by corruption call Moromoro. As for instance, so soon as a Lamb was Yean'd of a different colour to the Ewe which was her Dam, they presently separated it, and made it to affociate with the Flocks of the same coprefently feparated it, and made it to affociate with the Flocks of the fame colour; in which manner they eafily kept an account of their Cattel by their Knots, which were always made of the fame colour with that of their Cattel.

The Beasts which carried their burthens were a fort of Sheep, with a bunched back like Camels, but in every thing else had a likeness with our Sheep; and though it was common for the Indians to Lade their burthens on these creatures, yet the Inda never made use of them himself, unless it were in some case of necessity, or for the publick profit and use; such as carrying Materials for building Fortresses, Royal Palaces or Bridges, or for making the High-ways, Allies and Water-works; these being publick and common concernments, admitted of no excuse or exemption from them.

We have already mentioned that the Gold and Silver which was prefented by the Subjects to their Inca, was employed in Adorning the Temple of the Sun, and of the Royal Palaces; and herein we shall enlarge, when we come to speak farther of the House belonging to the Select Virgins.

All the strange Birds and Beasts, such as Serpents of all forts and fizes, Lizards, and other creeping things which the Coraca prefented, they kept in certain Provinces, which to this day have their Names from those creatures: They also kept fome of them in the Court, both for grandeur, and also to please the Indians, who esteemed themselves greatly obliged by the acceptance which the Inca did vouchfafe to make of them.

I remember that when I came from Cozco, there remained some Ruines of those places where they kept these creatures, which they called Amarucancha; which is as much as to fay, the Confervatory of those Serpents which were of the largest fize, for Amaru fignifies a great Serpent, on which place now the College of Jesuits is erected: So likewise they called those Dens where they kept the Lions, and Tygers, and Bears, Puma curcu and Puma chupan; for Puma was their word for a Lion, one of which Dens was formerly at the foot of the Ca(tle-hill, and the other just behind the Monastery of St. Dominick.

Their Aviary for the better Air, and chearfulness of the Birds, was placed without the City, which they called Surihualla, which fignifies the Field of Offritches, which is about half a League Southward from Cozco, and was the Inheritance of my Tutor John de Alcobaça, and descended afterwards to his Son Diego de Alcobaça, who was a Priest and my School sellow.

Those fierce creatures, such as Tygers and Lions, Serpents and Toads of a prodigious bignels, ferved not onely for oftentation and the grandeur of the Court, but also were sometimes made use of to punish and devour Malesactors, of which we thall have occasion to speak where we treat of those Laws and Ordinances which were made against Offenders in Criminal matters.

And thus much shall serve for what we have to say concerning the Tribute which they gave to their Incas, and of the Manner and Occasion for which it was expended. From the Papers of that curious and learned Father Blus Valera, I have made this following Extract, that so we may by his Authority confirm the truth of what we have related, touching the Beginnings, Cuftoms, Laws and Govern-of what we ment of this people.

And because he hath wrote on this subject with much perspicuity, order and supply the elegancy of expression, I have thought fit to Adom this History, and supply the defects of it by some of those Excellencies which I have copied from his Works.

CHAP. XI.

Of the Laws and Statutes which the Incas made for the good and benefit of their Subjects.

THat which now immediately follows concerning the Government of the Incas, we have for the better confirmation and authority of what we have already declared, Translated Verbatim out of the Elegant Latin of Blas Valera.

"The Indians of Peru, faith he, began to lay fome Foundations of a Political Go-"vernment in the Reigns of the Inca, Manco Capac, and of the Inca Roca, who was alto one of their Kings; for before that time, in all preceding Ages, they " lived like Brutes, in all filthines and beftiality, without order, rule, or any go-" vernment: But from that time they began to educate their Children with some vernment: Dut from that time they began to educate their Children with foline mean rudiments of learning, and to enter into civil and mutual communication; they then alto began to Cloath themfelves, not onely with a refpect to modefly, but likewife for ornament; they then plowed and cultivated their Fields with induftry and labour, and therein afforded mutual affiftence each to treids with induity and abour, and therein anomed mitual affiltence each to other; they then conflitted ludges, and kept Courts, they built Honfes both for private Dwellings and publick Meetings, with many other things commendable, and worthy of praite. Those Laws and Statutes which their Princes from the mere light of reason dictated and prescribed to them, they readily embraced, and thereunto directed and conformed all their Actions in that exact manner, that for my part I cannot but prefer these Incar of Peru, not onely before the Inhabitants of China and Japan, and all those of the East-Indices, but even before the Natural Gentiles of Assa, and the Natives of Greece: For if, it well considered, the labour and industry which Nama Pompilius exercised in framing and constituting Laws agreeable to the humour and disposition of the Romans; and that Solon was an excellent Legislatour for the Athenians, and Licurgus for the Lacedemonians, is not much to be admired, because they were Men expert, and knowing in all the points of Humane literature; which was a great advantage, and availed them much in compoling Laws and Cultoms proper and necessary for those present days, and the happiness and westare of future Ages. But it is strange and wonderfull, that these poor tudi.urs, who had none of those helps nor advantages, should be able to lay such a solid soundation of excellent Laws, which (excepting the Errour of their Idolatrous Worthip) were truly rational and comparable in every respect to the Constitutions of the most learned Statesmen, and which these constant Indians conserve with sacredness and veneration unto this day: And which is most strange, that without letters or writing, and onely by knots of thread of divers colours they should be able to dittinguish their Laws, and reade them with their true lense and fignification; and fo well by this invention to commit them to the knowledge of poflerity, that fince they were established by their first Kings, fix hundred years are fully elapted, and yet are as faithfully and as lively conferred in the memory of that people, as if they had been Laws of later date. Such was their Municipal Law, which treated of the particular advantage of every Nation, " and the Privileges and Immunities respective to every people. They had their Agrarian Law, which determined and measured out the bounds and limits of 11 2

BOOK V.

Provinces, which was with fingular diligence and rectitude observed; for they had their fworn Measurers, who meted out their Lands with Cords by Acres which they called Tupu, whereby they made a just division to the Neighbour. hood, affigning to every one his just thare and proportion. They had also that which they called a Common Law, which, as they said, respected every one (unless Old Men, and sick, and Children, and infirm, which were exempted) but all others were obliged to labour in matters relating to the benefit of the Common-wealth, fuch as in the building of Temples, Palaces for the King and the great Lords, raising Bridges, making and mending High-ways, and other matters of like nature. They had another Law, which they named the Law of Brotherhood, which laid an obligation on the people to be aiding and affifting one to the other, in plowing, and fowing, and gathering in the Fruits and in building Houses one for the other, without pay, or expectation of re-" much as to fay, a rotation, or a turn, or circulation of labour, which was no more than that in all the work which was performed by publick affiftence, the " like account should be observed, and measures taken, as was in the division of " the Lands, that so no Province, People, Lineage or Person, should be obliged " to labour beyond their due proportion, but that their Lives should have their " turns and times mixed with recreation and leifures, as well as labours. They " had also a Sumptuary Law, which prohibited all kind of vanity and expence in "Cloathing and Adornments of them with Gold, or Silver, or pretious Stones; and especially all profuseness in banquets and delicacies in Diet were forbidden, " onely the Neighbourhood were enjoined to Dine two or three times a Month " together, in presence of their Curacas, and then afterwards to exercise them-" felves in feats of Arms, or in sports and divertisements, which was esteemed a " probable means to reconcile Mens affections, and conferve them in love and " friendship one with the other: And this Law was also made in favour to the "Shepherds, and other Field-labourers, that so they might tast some some and recreations. They had also a Law in relation to those whom they call "Poor; which was, That fuch as were blind, dumb, latne, old, decrepit and lingering with any long or Chronical difease, so as that they were uncapable of work, should be cloathed and sed out of the King's Store. Likewise it was a " Law, that out of these Stores all Strangers and Travellers should be provided; for whom also lines and places of refreshment were erected, which they called "Cerpahnaci, which is as much as a House of Hospitality in which Men had their " charge and expence defrayed by the Publick: And in this Law also it was Or-" dained, that twice or thrice a Month they were to invite those which, as before mentioned, are termed Poor unto their Meetings and publick Feafts, that fo " their miseries might receive some consolation and diversion by the common joy and feciety. Another Law they called the Ordinance of good Husbandry, " which enjoined and required two things: First, that no person should remain idle, or be exempt from labour; for (as we have faid before) even Children of five years of Age were employed in something agreeable to their capacities, nor were the lame and infirm altogether excused, but some work was given " them, which they were best able to perform; for idleness, which was punish-" able with much difhonour and infamy, was not indulged on any pretence but what was of necessity, and unavoidable. And farther it was Ordained by this "Law, That the Indians should dine and sup with their Doors open, that to the Officers and Ministers of the Judges might have free and open access to them "at their pleafure; for there were certain Officers appointed to vifit the Houses of particular persons, as well as the Temples, and publick Houses, and Edifices, whom they called Liastacamapu; and these were Monitors, or Visitors, appointed " to overfee, and make enquiry into the Houses of particular persons, observing " the order, and regular care, and diligence which the Husband and Wife used in their labour and families, and what obedience and respect the Children paid unto their Parents; the evidence and measures of which they took from the " neatness and politeness of their Attire, and from the cleanliness of their Uten-" fils and good Housewisery in their Houses; such as they found in all things cleanly, they praifed and commended in publick; and fuch as were flovenly and "afly, they punished with stripes, whipping them on their Armes and Legs, or with such other instiction as the Law required; by which care, and severe in spection,

"fpection, every one became laborious, and that industry produced such abundance of all things necessary to humane Life; that those things were given almost for nothing, which now are to be purchased at excessive rates. What other Laws, and moral Constitutions they observed, either relating to Men in a common or a single capacity, they were all regulated, and squared by the rule of right Reason; and which may be known and collected from those particulars, which we shall hereaster relate, concerning the Lives and Customs of this People. And we shall hereaster; in the eight and ninth Chapters, specifie the cause and manner, why, and how they came to loose these Laws and Customs, which were thus worthy and commendable; all which declined, and fell with the Government of the Incast: And that the barbarity of the Indians is much more savage, and their living much less political; and greater want of all things necessary in these days amongst them, than was in the ancient times, when the Incas bore the sway and rule in those Dominions.

CHAP. XII.

How they conquered and civilized their new Subjects.

THE Policy and Arts which the Incas used in their Conquests, and the manner and methods they purfued in civilizing the People, and reducing them ner and methods they puritied in civilizing the recopie, and reducing them to a course of moral Living, is very curious, and worthy to be observed. For from the first soundation, which their Kings laid of Government, which served afterwards for an example, or pattern to their Successours, their Maxime was, Never to make War on their Neighbours without just cause, or reason; so the Barbarity and Ignorance of the People seemed a good and lawfull motive, and next the Oppression and Violence which the Neighbours used towards their Subjects was goother. But before their attentioned on their but and of the Mills. jects, was another; but before they attempted on them by any acts of Hostility, they first sent their summons three or four times, requiring their Obedience: After any Province was subdued, the first thing that the Inca did, was to take their ter any Province was indoned, the first thing that the mea did, was to take their principal Idol as an Hoftage, and carry it to Coze, where it was to remain in the Temple as a Captive, untill fuch time as the People, being difabused by the Vanity and Inability of their Gods, should be reduced to a complyance with the mean in their Worship and Adoration of the Sun-Howsdever they did not prefently overturn and demolish the strange Gods of the Countrey so soon as they had subdued it; but rather out of respect to the Inhabitants, they tolerated for formating their Idole, untill that having instructed. fome time their Idols, untill that having instructed, and persuaded them in a better Religion, as they thought, they might without their displeasure, and perhaps with their confent, deftroy and fuppress the God they had adored. Next they carried the principal Cacique of the Countrey, with all his Sons, to Cocco, there to carefs, and treat them with all kindness and humanity; by which occasion they informing them of the Laws, Cultoms and propriety of their Speech, and instructions that their carefs. ing them in their superstitious Rites and Ceremonies, they became more easily reconciled to the Laws and Servitude of the Inca: After which the Curaca being reftored to his Ancient Honour and Rule, was permitted to return unto his Subjects, who were commanded, as formerly, to obey him as their natural Prince and Lord. And that the conquered Nations might be reconciled with their Conquerours, and that the rancour and malice which lay on the Spirits of those, who conceived themselves injured, by acts of Violence and War, might be abated, and affuaged by gentle Lenitives, an Act of Oblivion was paffed, and Banquets were prepared for feafting of the new Subjects, together with the Conquerours of them, that so a perpetual Peace and Amity might be concluded by a coalition of their Minds, reconciled at these Feasts; to which also the blind, the lame, and the infirm were admitted, that so they also might partake of the bounty and liberality of the Inca. At these Banquets they were entertained with the

Dances of the young Maidens, and activity of the Youth, and with the military Exercifes of the Souldiery; befides which they prefented them with gifts of Gold, and Silver, and Feathers, for the adornment of their Habits, at the times of their principal Yeffivials; and alfo they gave them Cloths, and other finall curiofities, which they highly efteemed; to that those People, though never to barbarous and brutish at first, were yet made sensible of these kindnesses to such a degree, that they never asterwards so much as attempted to arise in Rebellion. And to take away all occasions of complaint from the Subjects of Aggreivances and Oppressions whatsoever; left those Complaints should from words proceed to blows, and open violence; wherefore to prevent that, their Estates and Liberties were always conserved to them; onely they were required to be obedient to the Laws, Statutes, and ancient Institutions, which were published, and openly promulged amongst them, for unto these, and to the Worthip of the Sun, their submission was required, and no Dispensation allowed in the case, and being obstinate, they were to be compelled by force; sometimes, where it was convenient, they transplanted Colonies from one place to another, but then they provided them with Lands, and Houses and Cattel, and Servants, and whatsoever was necessary and requisite for their livelihood; and into their places they transported perhaps some of the Citizens of Cosco, or others of approved Loyalty, which served for Gnards and Garrisons, to keep the Neighbourhood in awe and subjection, and also to teach and instruct those Savages, and ignorant People in their Laws and Religion, together with the Tongue and Language of their Countrey.

All the other points of Government, and Injunctions impofed by the Isea Kings, were more eafie and gentle than of any other Princes, who ruled the Nations of the New World; the which is not onely made manifeft and apparent by their own Hittorical Knots, by which they committed the occurrences of paft times unto memory, but are allo approved and confirmed by the faithfull Commentaries of the Vice-King Don Francisco de Toledo, who having informed himself of the Custome and manners of every Province from the Indians themselves, made a Collection of them with his own hand-writing, and commanded his Visitors, Judges and Registers to transcribe them, Copies whereof are conserved unto this day in the publick Archives, and serve to evidence that Benignity and Gentleness, which the Kings of Pern in exercise of their Government used towards their Subjects: for as we have noted before, that excepting some particular matters, enjoined and imposed for the Desence and Security of the Empire; all other Laws, and Statutes had no other aspect, than what regarded the sole benefit, and interest of the Subjects; for every Man's private Estate and Patrimony had the same Protection, as that of the publick; no Souldiers were permitted to pillage, or plander even those People whom they had subdued by force of Arms; but received and treated them, as if they were saidfull and true Servants; and for those who voluntarily submitted and furrendred themselves, they conserved in some short time Places and Others of writing to civil or military Commands.

and Offices of preferment, relating to civil or military Commands.

The Duty of Tribute which these Kings laid on their Subjects was so trivial, and inconsiderable, that when in the sequel of this History we shall come to treat of the particulars thereof, and wherein it consisted, it will seem ridiculous to the Reader; in return notwithstanding hereof, the breas were not onely contented to bestow on their Subjects their Food and Rayment, but many other presents, which they bountfully conserved on the Consens, and Great Men, extending also their largesses to the poor, and necessitious; as if they had been Stewards or Masters of Families, whole Office was to make Provision for others, rather than Kings, who bore the renowned Title of Capac Titus, which the Indians conferred upon them; Capac signifying as much as a Prince powerfull in Riches, and Titus as much as Liberal, Magnanimous, a Demi-God, or Angustus. Hence proceeded that great Love and Affection which the Perusions bore towards their Kings, that even to this day, though they are become Christians, they cannot sorget the memory of them, but are ready on all occasions, when their prefent Oppressions prieve them, with sighs and groans to invoke their Names; and in reality they had much reason; for we do not reade in all the Histories of Asa, Asrica, or Europe, that ever those Kings were so gratious to their Subjects, as these; or that they were so frank, or familiar with them, or so gente and carefull managers of their Interest. And now, from what we have already said, and what we shall hereaster declare, the Reader may be able to collect, and understand what were the ancient Laws, Customs, and Statutes of the Indians of Peru, and how, and in what manner they lived; and that by the same accustomed Methods of Gentlenes, we may believe, that these People may be best and most easily reduced unto the Christian Religion.

CHAP. XIII.

How, and in what manner they inflituted, and invested Officers in their respective Employments.

BLas Valera, in the process of this Discourse, hath one Chapter under this title, and also how the Overseers of the labours of the People distributed to every one his respective task. How also they dispensed the Estate belonging to the publick, and to particular Persons, and how also they proportioned and laid their Tributes.

The Inca having subdued any new Province, and carried the Idol God captive cc to Cozco. he then endeavoured to fatisfie and appeale the minds of the Lords of the Countrey, and gain the good-will of the People; commanding that all Indians ee in common, as also their Priests and Sorcerers should worship and adore the God es as the Almighty, or supreme God of Gods. The next command laid on them, was, That they should acknowledge the Inea for their sovereign Lord and Kings. ee and that the Caciques should by their turns appear, and present their Persons at the « Court once every year, or every two years, according as the diffance of the Province was remote from Cozeos by which means fo great was the concourfe of people to ce was remote from Cozeo; by which means fo great was the concourse of people to that City, that it became the most populous part and place of the New World. The Moreover it was ordained, that the Natives and Strangers which came to fojourn in any Province, should be numbred, and registred according to their Age, Line-cage, Offices, Estates and Qualities; all which being performed by help of their Tribute; and measured every thing which had related and proportioned their Tribute; and measured every thing which had relation to the publick Interest. The next thing the Inca did after such Conquest; was to nominate his Generals, and several Officers of the Army, such as Colonels, Captains, Ensigns, Serjeants, and Corporals: Some of which commanded ten, some fifty Souldiers; but a Captain of the most inferiour degree was set over at least an hundred, others commanded five hundred, others a thousand, but the Major-Generals commanded four or five thousand Men: a General was not called cc Major-Generals commanded four or five thousand Men; a General was not called ec fo, unless he were at the Head of ten thousand Men, and then his Title was Hatun Apu, which was as much as Great Captain. Those whom they called Curveas, et were fovereign Lords, such as our Dukes, and Earls, and Marquesses, who being the Natural Lords of their People, ruled and presided over them, both in the first soft was one of their Tribute; and it was their duty also to provide, and to take care for their Subjects in hard times of want and necessity. The Captains of the highest, as well as those of inferiour rank, though they were not capacitated to make Laws, and tay they are the Captains of the make Laws, and they are those of inferiour rank, though they were not capacitated to make Laws, did yet by right of Inheritance succeedings the Offices of their Pa thingelf, as well as thole of inferiour rank, though they were not capacitated to the make Laws, did yet by right of Inheritance fucceed into the Offices of their Pactions, their military Employments privileged and exempted them from the payers ment of Tribute, being freed of all Taxes, and Impolitions, and in case of want were to be supplied out of the Royal, and not out of the common Stores. Hower foever the Officers of inferiour rank, such as were the Chiefs of ten or fifty Men, were not freed of their Tribute, because they were not of Noble Descent. The Generals of the Armies had power to make and commissionate Officers, and confittute them in their Employments, but being once so settled and established, they

"the Royal Houses, and dispensing Food and Rayment to the Commonalty, was accepted in the place of their Tribute, and no other charge required at their hands. cc Under the great Ministers other subordinate Officers were substituted in all marcc ters relating either to Government, or to the Tribute, it being effeemed the best ec and most certain way to prevent cheats and frauds in Accounts. They had also cc Chief Shepherds, and fervants that were under them, to whose care the Flocks es were committed, which belonged both to the King, and to the Community, which they conferved with that fidelity, that not a Lamb was miffing, nor Paffor es Fido more faithfull to his charge, than thefe trufty Shepherds, whose chief dread and fear was of Wild-beafts, which they watchfully chased away; but as for thieves, there being none, they passed their time with the less fear. They had Guardians, and Surveyors of the Fields, and Possessions; they had also Stewards, Administrators, Judges and Visitors, whose chief care and incumbency was to see that nothing should be wanting, either to the People in common, or to any pricc vate person whatsoever; for in case any one did signifie his necessities to the Decc curions, they were obliged immediately to make their needs known to the Curace cat, and they to the brea, who readily supplied their occasions, it being his greatest colory to be esteemed the Father of his Countrey, and the Guardian of his People. The Was the Office of the Judges and Vifitors to fee that the Men employed them felves in their respective duties; and that the Women were good Housewives, tacc king care of their Houses, keeping their Rooms clean, and nursing and educating ce king care of their Houles, keeping their Kooms clean, and nurfing and educating their Children; and in short, that every one bussed him or hersolf in spinning and ex weaving. That the young Women obeyed their Mothers and Mistresses, and were diligent about the Assairs of their Houles, and other works appertaining to their seek. The aged and infirm were excused from all laborious works, and hadno is injunctions laid on them, but such as tended to their own benefit, such as gathering cessives, and straws, and lousing themselves, being afterwards obliged to carry their Lice to the Chief of their Squadron, and so they took a discharge for their Tries bute. The Employment for blind men was to cleanse the Cottons of the Seeds, and solubless and tuln out the Mavy from the stalks or base in which is great. ce and foulness, and rub out the Mayz from the falks, or Ears in which it grew.

ce And besides these principal Officers which respected the orderly Government of the Commonwealth, there were Heads, or Master-workmen set over the Silver ce Smiths, and Goldsmiths, Carpenters, and Masons and Jewellers; which Order cand Rule, had it been continued, and confirmed by the Acts and Patents of the ce Emperour Charles the Fifth; with the same care and policy, as it was first sets. cc blished by the Incas, that People would at this day have been more flourishing, cc and confiderable, and all things, both for eating and clothing, would have been ce more plentifull, and this happiness of affairs would have been a good preparation to the preaching and admission of the Gospel. But now our negligence, and want ce of due care, hath been the cause of the decay and ruine of that People; of which ce the poor Indians were to fenfible, that they often murmured, and complained of the prefent Government in all their private Cabals, and Meetings; but how they cc compared the particulars of these times with the Reigns of the Incas, we shall difcc course more largely hereaster, in the 9th Chap, of our 2d Book, pag, 55. Thus far are the Words of Father Blu Valera. And this Authour proceeding farther, in his Discourse, hath these words. cc Besides what we have said already, they cc had Officers fet over the Countrey Labourers, over the Fowlers, over the Fisheree men, who fished either in the Sea, or in the Rivers; some also were set over the cc Weavers, Shoemakers, and over those who hewed Timber for the Royal Palaces, cc and publick Edifices; also over those Smiths, who made instruments of Copper, cc for several uses. They had also Heads and Chiefs over the Mechanicks, who did eall attend with great care and diligence to their Trades; so that it is strange to consider in these our days, that these People who were so fond, and tenacious of cc conserving their ancient Customs and Practices, should be so careless in conservace tion of their Arts, they being wholly disused, and now lost and forgotten amongst

What the Rule and Account was which they observed in publick and private Estates.

"A Fter the Inca had fubdued a Province, he confirmed the Right of possession of the Natives of it, and then constituted Governous over the people, and "Instructors who were to teach them the Doctrine and Ways of Religion, and to "compose all troubles and differences arising amongst them: For better dispatch of which, it was ordered, that they should decipher and set down by their Knots, "a Plat, or Map, of all the Meadows, Mountains, Hills, Arable Grounds, Mines, "Salt-pans, Fountains, Lakes, Rivers, and Plantations of Cottons and Fruit-trees; "together with their Flocks which produced Wool, and Herds of other Cattel. All which particulars, with many more, they ordered to be measured, and laid down diffinctly by themselves. As first a Scheme was drawn of the whole Pro-"vince; then how it was divided into its feveral people; and laftly, how it bor-" dered on all parts and quarters on its Neighbours; then the length and breadth "of it was measured, and notice taken of the quality of the Land, as what was "barren, and what part of it was fruitfull; the defign of all which was, not in or-"der to apply any part or parcel thereof to the Estate, or benefit of the Inca; but "onely that a due knowledge and confideration being had of the fruitfulness or fle-"rility of the Land, fure and certain measures might be the better taken of what "every Countrey was able to provide and give towards their Tribute; and that "having made a just calculate of all things, they might be the better enabled to lay "a due proportion of those supplies which were required from them in times of "Pestilence, Famine, or other Calamities: And lastly, it was publickly promul-"ged, and made known to every Individual person, what Service the Inca, or the "Curacus, or the Commonwealth required at his hands: And lastly, it was Ordai-"ned, that according to fuch Models and Measures as were laid down of the Pro-"vince, and the fituation of it, that Boundaries and Land-marks should be fet up " for diffinction and feparation from the Frontiers belonging to the Neighbouring "Countries. And left in times to come there should happen out any mistakes or "confusion for want of due distinction, they gave new and proper Names to every "Mountain, Hill, Field, Meadow, Fountain, and all other particular places; and "if any of them had Names anciently given them, they confirmed them again, ad"ding fomething new and more diffinguishing; the which will be more remarka-"them especially to be carefull, that these Lands thus measured, and laid out, and " bounded, should in no-wife be mixed or confounded with the Pafturage or Moun-" tains of other people, but that every one should know its own Land-marks and "Boundaries allotted. The Mines of Gold and Silver, whether anciently known, or "discovered of late times, were allowed to the Curacus to enjoy for themselves, "their kindred and fervants; not for Treasure, for they contemned that, but onely " to Adorn their Cloaths and Vestments with which they were apparelled on Festi-"val-days, and with fuch a quantity as might ferve for Cups and Veffels for the "Cursea to drink in, for he was stinted and limited to such a certain number of "them: befides thefe uses, they had little regard unto their Mines, but rather suf-"fered them to be forgotten and loft; which was the reason, that when the spani-"ardy came in, though the Artifts and Labourers in other Crafts were very nume-"rous, yet in this alone few Founders, or skilfull in Melting Ore, were to be found "Such as were employed in the King's Service were abundantly provided with all "Utenfils and Infruments, together with Cloaths and Diet at the charge and ex-" pence of the King, or of the Lord. These Artists were obliged to work two X "Months

"Months of the Year in Service of the Inca, which was in difcharge of their Tribute, the remainder of the Year was their own, free, and might difpose of themselves as they thought fit; this was a particular Trade and Mystery, and such as a laboured in it were called Smelters. That fort of Copper which they called Anterior to, ferved them in the place of Iron, of which they made their Knives and Carpenters Tools, and the great Pins with which the Women tucked up their Cloths; and likewise of they made great and large Plates, which served for Looking-glasses, and likewise of the same Metal they made all their Rakes and Hammers; so that being of an Universal use to them, they preferred it before Gold or Silver, and for that reason worked more in the Mines of Copper, than in the richer Mines of Gold or Silver.

"The Salt which they made, whether it were from their Salt Springs, or Sea." Water, as also Fish taken in the Seas, or Rivers, or Lakes and Fruit growing from their Wild Trees, as also Cottons and fine Ruthes were by Command of the Inca deemed and judged to be the Common Estate of the people, and the Goods of the Inhabitants in every Province, of which they had right and licence to take and use as much as their occasions did require; but of those Trees which any particular person had planted, the Fruit was peculiar, and appropriated onely the theory of the province of the properties of the province of the province

"any particular person had planted, the Fruit was peculiar, and appropriated onely to the use of him who planted them.

The Corn which the Countries yielded for Bread, and those also which produced other Grane, were by order of the Inca divided into three parts, and applied to different uses. The first was for the Sun, his Priests and Ministers; the second was for the King, and for the support and maintenance of his Governous and Officers, whom he dispatched and employed in foreign parts; and the third was for the Natives and Sojourners of the Provinces, which was equally divided according as the needs which every Family required. This was the division which the Inca observed and proportioned in all parts of his Empire; to that there was no other Tribute required of the Indians payable either to their King, or their Lords or Governours, or to the Temple or Priests, or any person, or for any other matter or thing whatsoever. What overplus remained of the King's Provisions, were at the end of the Year transported to the Common Stores of the people; and what overplus remained to the Sun, was distributed amongst the poor, the lame, and the blind, and others who were in any manner disabled; but no distribution hereof was made, untill such time as the Sacrifices were completed, which were many; and plentifull provision made for the Priests and Ministers of the Temple, who were almost innumerable.

In what the Tribute was paid, and in what quantity, and what Laws were made in relation to the same.

duly reflect on the quality and quantity of the Matters required, we may boldly " affirm, that the great Cafars, who were styled August and Pious, were not to be " compared to thele Incar, in respect of that protection and compassion they had to wards their People; for indeed, if it be well considered, these Princes seemed to have paid Toll and Tribute to their Vassals, rather than they unto their Kings, " whole care and business it was to lay out themselves for the good and welfare of "their people. The quantity of their Tribute being reduced to the Account and "Measures we make in these days, would be very inconsiderable; for the days " work of the Labourers, and the value of the things in themselves, and the con-" fumption which the Incas made of their Stores, being all duly calculated, it will "humpton which the mean made of their scores, being an duty calculated, it will be found that many Indians did not pay the value of four Ryals of our Money:

"And left this finall Tribute should feem burthensome in the payment thereof, ci-"ther to their Inca, or their Caraca, they expressed much joy and chearfulnes when they carried it into the Stores; having some consideration that the Tribute was but small, and yet greatly tended to the conservation and benefit of themselves and the publick. Those Laws and Statutes which were made in favour of the "Tributaries, were fo faithfully and inviolably conferved, that neither the Gover-"nours, nor Captains, nor Generals, nor the Inca himfelf had power to corrupt or cancel them in prejudice of his Subjects. The which Laws are these which fola cancer them in prejudice of ins Subjects. The which Laws are these which tolalow. The First and principal Law was this: That whosoever hath at any time been free, and exempt from Tribute, cannot at any time afterwards be obliged to the payment thereof. Those that were free and privileged, were all those of the Bloud-Royal, all Captains of high or low degree, even the very Centurions, "with their Children and Grandchildren; together with the Curacas, and all those of their Generation: Souldiers also actually employed in the War were excu-"fed; and Young Men, untill they arrived at the Age of twenty five, were not within the Order, because untill that time they were judged to be under the Tui-« tion, or Pupillage of their Parents. Old Men of fifty years, and upwards, were « also exempted from Tribute; as likewife all Women, whether Virgins, or Wives, " or Widows: The fick and infirm, untill they had recovered their health, were « excused; and the blind, and lame, and deaf, and dumb, were employed in such a Tributary Work as they were capable of. The Second Law was, That all others, unless Priests and Ministers attending on the Temple of the Sun, and the Select Virgins, were all without any limitation, or restriction, (except before excepted) obliged to payment of their Tribute. A Third Law was, That no Indian what-"obliged to payment of their Tribute. A Third Law was, That no Indian what Gover was obliged to pay his Tribute, or any part thereof, out of his own Stores or Eftate, but onely by his Labour, or in difcharge of his Office, or by the time which he employed in the publick Service of his King and Countrey; and here in every Man was equal, the Rich being not farther charged than he that was "Poor: We call him Rich that had many Children and Servants, who affifted him in his Work, and speedily to dispatch the task of Tribute which was imposed fed upon him; for a Man might be Rich in other things, and yet Poor in this particular. A Fourth Law was, That no Man could be obliged to any other Labour, but that which was properly his own, unless it were upon Tillage of Land, and in the Wars, for those were Matters of common concernment. A Fifth Law was, That no Nation, or Province, in payment of their Tribute, was obadied to any Contribution, but of that which was of the Growth of their own X 2. "Counties' is continued to the contribution of the counties in the counties in the Counties' in the counties in the Counties in the Growth of their own X 2. "Counties' is continued to the counties in X 2

"Countrey; for otherwise it would be an agreivance unto the people to be obli-"ged to wander into foreign parts for fruits of different nature to them which "their foil did produce, The Sixth Law was, That all those Officers and Matter-"their foil did produce. The Sixth Law was, That an those Onicers and avaster—workmen who were engaged in fervice of the Inca, or the Curacas, were to be pro"vided at the charge of the Employers, with fuch Tools and Inftruments as their "Trade, and fuch materials as their work required. As for example, he that "worked upon Metalls was to be provided with Gold, or Silver, or Copper, on "which he was to exercise his art and labour; the weaver was to be supplied with "Wool, or Cottons, the Painter with Colours, and so the like in other matters: " fo that the Artift was not obliged to bestow more than his time and skill: and "then at the end of two months, or three at most, he was dismissed from his task "and made free from his Labour, for the remaining part of the whole year: and in "case any one, out of his own voluntary good-will and pleasure, or out of a desire to "finish and perfect any part of his work, already begun, should think fit to con-"finish and perfect any part of his work, already begun, inoute think fit to con"tinue his labour untill a longer time, then such overplus of time was passed to his "credit, and discounted in the two months of the following Year, and notified,

"all those Artists who laboured in any Trade or Mystery, being in discharge of "their Tribute, were to be provided of all necessaries, either for Food or Rayment,
"and of Medicines in case of sickness; and that not onely they, but also their
"William and best the terms to their offshare were also." "Wives and Children, and those that came to their affiltence were also to be main-"tained with the like provisions; but then the account was kept according to the "task imposed, and not by the time; for if a Man could, with the help of his Af-"task imposed, and not by the time; for it a Man could, with the help of his Af"fiftents, perform that in a week, which would require two months of his own
"fingle work, he was judged to have complied with his obligation, and so dischar"ged from his service. And this shall serve to discover the errour of those who alledge, that anciently the Mother, and Sons, and Daughters, paid their Tribute, the same being a mittake, by not rightly distinguishing that from right and duty, which was onely performed by a voluntary affishence, which the Wives, and Chil"dren, and Servants, yielded to their Fathers and Masters," for in case the Husband

The Order they used in imposing and proportioning their Tribute; and how the Inca requited the Curacas in return of those pretious things they gave him for Presents.

"THE Eighth Law ordained and prescribed the manner and rule how every person was to be taxed for his proportion of Tribute, for equality and just proportion was observed in all matters by them; and the manner was this: Upon a certain day appointed, the principal People of every Province, such as their Judges, Tax-gatherers, Accountants, and Keepers of their Knots in threads, as semany as the Inhabitants of the Province were, they made their Accounts so exact, that I know not who are more to be commended, either those who without figures of Arithmetick were able by a quicker way, than our Accountants, to make a speedy or just reckoning, or the Governour and Ministers, who easily apprehended the method and reason of their Accounts, by such obscure and unin-

" telligible ways to us.

BOOK V.

By these Knots they were informed of the work done by every Indian, what "Offices he had acted, what journies he had undertaken by order of his Curaca, or "Superiour, what Trade he had exercised, all which was placed to his Account, "Superiour, what Trade he had exercifed, all which was placed to his Account, "in difcharge of his Tribute: Then they readily made appear to the Judges and "Governours every thing diffinctly by it felf, as how much Provifion was laid up "in the Stores, and what was the quality of them, as Pepper, Cloths, Shoes, "Arms, and other things, which were matters of Tribute, together with the Gold, "Silver, pretious Stones, and Copper; and what thereof appertained to the Inca, and what proportion unto the Sun. They also accounted for the Stores of every "Province; and farther the Law ordained, that every Inca, Governour of a Province, should keep a Copy of the Accounts or Tally in his own possession, as a means to avoid and prevent all fraud and cheats in the Ministers. A Ninth Law "was, that what overplus remained of Tribute after the occasions of the Inca were supplied, were to be transported to the common Magazines of the Countrey, and there lodged for common support and maintenance of the Natives in the times of there lodged for common support and maintenance of the Natives in the times of fearcity and famine, As to Jewels, and pretious Stones, Gold, and Silver, Feathers of Birds, with various Colours for Painting, and Miniature, with divers there of Birds, with various Colours for Painting, and Miniature, with divers other Curiofities, which the Curious every year prefented to the Inca; they were all taken, and disposed of for adornment of the King, and his near Relations; and then afterwards, in case any overplus remained, or that there was more than the occasions of the Royal Family required, they were in grace and favour to the Captains, and Lords, who presented them, returned again to them; for though they were the goods and product of their own Countrey, and that they could not make use of them; yet being restored with such obliging circumstances from the Inca, the savour and honour was highly esteemed: from all which it is evident, that the Inca enjoyed the simallest part of all the Tribute, and that the Taxes and Impositions were more for the benefit of the People, than of the King. The Tenth Law enumerated, and particularized the several Works and Employments, which were to be performed by way of Tribute, for service of the King and Countrey; as making and plaining the High-ways, building or repairing the Temples of the Sun, and other Holatorsus Sanctuaries, crecting publick Houses, as Store-houses, and places for the Tribunals of Justice, and seats for the Governours, making Bridges, or taking the Employment of Messengers, whom they called Chasqui, tiling the Grounds, and inclosing Orchards, seeding Flocks and Herds of Cattel, watching the Possessing and Storeshouses, and giving their attendance there for succourtality for Strangers and Travellers, and giving their attendance there for succourtality for Strangers and Travellers, and giving their attendance there for succourtality for Strangers and Travellers, and giving their attendance there for succourtality for Strangers and Travellers, and giving their attendance there for succourtality for Strangers and Travellers, and giving their attendance there for succourtality for Strangers and Travellers, and giving their attendance there for succourtality for Strangers and Travellers, and giv 158

" and help of fuch as were in their journey. Moreover they had some farther charge " and duty laid upon them, for the common good and benefit, and which had re-"lation to the service of the King, and of the Curacas, but in regard there were at "that time great numbers of Indians, which were obliged to take their turns in that "Office, the which was observed without partiality or favour to any, the time of the trouble was fo short, that no person could be sensible of the inconvenience. "It was also farther provided by this Law, that care should be taken for the amend-"ment of the High-ways, and that the Overfeers (hould repair the Bridges, and clear the Aqueducts and Chanels by which the Lands were watered, all which "being for the common good and advantage, was to be performed without any " charge or expence whatfoever.

These were the principal Laws which had any relation to the Tribute: there were other Orders of less consideration, which for brevity sake we omit; thus far were other Orders or less connectation, which has been a deep and the words of Blas Valera. And now I should gladly demand of a certain Historian this one question; Wherein did the severity of those Laws, relating to Tribute consist? which he charges on the Incas; and indeed I would the more willingly be resolved herein, because I find that the Kings of Spain, of glorious memory, did afterwards confirm the same, which they would never have done, had they been blaineable, and severe to that high degree which he pretends; and in this opinion Blas Valera concurs with me. And thus let us now return to the Prince Viracocha, whom we left embroiled in a thousand difficulties to defend his own Reputation, and the Honour of his Ancestours.

CHAP.

The Inca Viracocha receives intelligence of the approach of the Enemy, and of the Recruits and Succours coming to him.

THE noble Actions of the Inca Viracocha, do now call upon us to omit other Relations, and return to the History of his Wars and Bravery. We left him towards the end of his Father's Reign at Mayna, from whence (as we faid) he returned to Cozco, rallying, and gathering in his way the People into a body, who were wandring, and dispersed through the Fields and Countrey; and that when he departed from the City, he intended to march towards the Enemy with resolution to dye with Honour, rather than live with Infamy, and basely to behold his City made captive by the violence of Rebels, and the Temple of the Sun, and the Convent of the pure Virgins, and all that was effeemed facred by them. prophaned and unhallowed by the infolence of polluted Hands. Now we must know, that about half a League Northward from the City, there is a certain plain, where the Prince Viracocha appointed his general rendezvous; that the People both from Cozco, and other parts might there meet, and join in a Body, which being in a floot time affembled, formed an Army of about eight thousand Men, who were all Incar, and refolved to dye before the face of their Prince, and in defence of their Countrey. During this flay news came to the Camp, that the Enemy was within nine or ten Leagues of the City, having already paffed the, great River of Apprimacs, but this ill news was the next day followed by a more comfortable Melfage, which was, that from the parts of Contifugu an Army of twenty thousand Men were marching for relief of the Prince, being composed of the Nations of Ancelona, Companina, Cotanera, Timara, and other parts, bordering on the revolted Provinces, and that they were come near, and not many Leagues distant.

The Quechuas, who were the nearest Neighbours to the Chancas, were the first that discovered the Conspiracy, and in regard the urgency of the Affair admitted of no delay, nor time to advife the Inca, and receive his orders, they immediately complied with the prefent necessity, and putting all their People into arms. they marched directly towards the City, resolving to evidence their Loyalty to wards their King with the last drop of their Bloud. These People were of those who in the time of the Inca. Capac Yupangui, (as we have already declared) volume tarily submitted themselves to the Obedience of the Inca, and therefore being moved by a Principle of Love and Affection towards his Government, did readily give a testimony thereof, by the seasonable Succours they brought to his service: and also the ancient hatred they bore towards the Chancus was a farther incentive hereunto; for being jealous, and fearfull, that in case the Changas should prevail, they were in danger of falling again under their Tyranny, and the Yoke of that Sewitude, from whence they had been lately refcued by the power of the Incus, they took a resolution to march with all expedition imaginable, that so they might arrive at the City before the Enemy could attempt it, and croffing the nearest way towards the Northward, the Enemy was not sooner come, than they appeared also to bid them defiance.

Book V.

The Prince Viracocha, and his People, were much furprifed with the news of this unexpected Succour, admiring from whence it should come; untill at length recollecting themselves, they called to mind the Apparition of his Uncle Vivica: cha, who in a Dream promifed his favour and affiftence, at times of his greatest Extremity, and that he being of his Bloud and Flesh, would in all occasions of necessity perform the Office of a faithfull Kinsman: from the remembrance Hereof they certainly concluded, that these Forces and Recruits were effects and accompliffuments of this Promife, and were fent in an extraordinary manner, as in were, from Heaven; the which being often mentioned by the Prince, and inculcated into his People, it took fuch deep impression in their minds, that being encouraged thereby, they refolved with full affurance of Victory to meet the Enemy, and attack them within the Hills, and difadvantageous Paffes, which are between the River Aparimac and the Mountains of Villa-cunca, which being high and rugged, are not to be attempted without hazard and difficulty. How foever it was refolved first to attend the arrival and conjunction of the Recruits with them, and that then afterwards they should allow some day of repose and refreshment to the Forces wearied with their long march, and should likewise give time to the Enemy to diflodge themselves out of their advantageous posts, and thew themselves in a more equal field: It was likewise agreed by the Prince and his Council, that confidering the increase of their Army, their best and wifest course was to continue their Camp in their present station, where they were not onely enabled to relieve the City, but also more easily supplied with Provisions and Ammunition for their numerous Army: with this resolution the Prince remained quietly expecting his additional fuccours, which shortly after arrived, to the number of twelve thousand Souldiers. The Prince received them with all the gratious Expressions of Thanks and Acknowledgments for their Loyalty towards the Inca, and rewarding the Captains and Curacus of each Nation, together with the Souldiery, with fuch Gifts and Prefents, as then offered; he highly applauded their Loyalty; promising for the future some more signal rewards for such eminent and feafonable fervices. The Curacus having performed their Complements and Respects towards the Inca Viracocha, acquainted him that about two days march off, were other five thousand Men coming; which for haste and expedition fake they thought not fit to expect, but leave them to follow with what convenient speed they were able. The Prince having returned them thanks for the affiftence of both Armies, and confulting with his Kindred in the cafe, gave orders to the Curacas, immediately to dispatch an Express to those who were coming, adviling them, that the Prince was encamped with his Army in the plains, and that they should march towards certain hollows, and close places in a mountain not far distant from thence, where they should lie in ambush, expecting the Enemy, where, in case the Enemy should offer Battel, he with his Forces would be ready to enter into the heat of the fight, and they might them fally forth, and attacking one wing of them, might make the victory easie and secure; and in case they declined the engagement, they had still performed the Office of good Souldiers, according to the Rule of Martial Discipline. Two days after these Recruits came, the Van-guard of the Enemy appeared on the top of the Mountain called Rimac-tampu; where having notice that the Inca lay encamped about five Leagues off, they made a halt, and passed the Word to the Rere, that both the Main Body and Rere-guard should hasten to come up and joyn with the Van of the Army and rere-guard mound nation of our up and joyn with the varior the Almy.

In this manner and order having marched the whole day, they came at length and joined at Sacfabassa, a place diffant about three Leagues and a half from the Quarters of the Prince Viracocha; where afterwards that famous Battel was given between Gonçalo Picarro, and de la Gasca.

Of the Bloudy Battel which followed, and the Courage with which the Prince overcame his Enemies.

THE Prince Viracocha fent his Ambaffadours to the Enemy then encamped at Sacfahuana, with offers of peace and friendship, promiting to them Pardon, and an Act of Oblivion for all that was part. But the Chancus being well informed that the Inca Yabuar-huacae had left his City, and retired into fome remote part; they were fo encouraged thereby, that though they knew that the Prince his Son was in Arms, and in a posture to defend the City; yet they so flighted his Ambaffadours, that they would not fo much as hear them, or give them Audience; for being puft up with the vain opinion, that the Father being fled, the Son would speedily give place, promised to themselves an affurance of Victory, with these hopes; next day following they removed their Camp from Sacsahuana, and marched towards Cozco ; and though they made what hafte they were able; vet in regard they were to March in order of Battel, the night came on before they could arrive at the Prince's Camp, and therefore they pitched about half a League thort of the Enemies Quarter: Notwithstanding which, the Inea Viracecha dispatched other Messensers to them with Tenders of Peace and Pardon; but the Chancas still continued obstinate, not vouchsasing other Answer, than with great fcorn and disdain; saying, That to morrow it should be determined who deferyed the Title of King, and in whose power it was to offer Peace, and Conditions of Pardon.

This Answer being given, both Armies remained the whole night upon their Guard, with Centinels fet on each fide; and in the morning, by break of day, the Squadrons Arming themfelves, with great Noife and Shouts, with found of Trumpets, and Timbrels, and Cornets, they began the on-fet. The Inca Viracocha marching in the head of his Army, was he that threw the first Dart at the Enemy, with which the Battel began. The Chancas in hopes of Victory, of which they with which the Battel began. The connects in nopes or victory, or which they feemed to be affured, fought with great refolution: And the Ineas, who did not definair neither of fuccefs, adventured to refcue the Life of their Prince, and revenge the affront which the Rebels offered. The Fight continued until Noon, being maintained with equal Courage on both fides; the flaughter was great, and not as yet determined to which party the Victory inclined: At length the 5000 Indians which lay in Ambush made their fally, and with extraordinary resolution and shouts attacking the right Wing of the Enemy, began to give a turn to Fortune; for being frelh, they so pressed the Chancas, that they were forced to give way, and retreat with great loss and flaughter: Howfoever, animating one the other, they engaged a fecond time, endeavouring to recover the Ground which they had loft, being enraged to meet that opposition which they never expected, and so much difficulty in attaining a Victory which they promifed to themselves with fo much ease and affurance.

After this fecond onfet they fought two hours longer, the advantage still continuing doubtfull and uncertain: At length the Chancas growing tired and wearv. been to faint; and observing that fresh recruits continually re-inforced the Army began to failt 3 and other than the chances became discouraged, and desperate of Victory: For those people, who before were fled from the City with fear, and the Neighbouring Countries thereabouts, having received intelligence, that the Prince Viracocha was returned, and made head against the Enemy, in defence of the Temple of the Sun: they joined together into small Bodies of fifty, and a hundred in a Company; and in fuch Troops rufhed into the Battel with more noise than numbers. The Incar observing these unexpected succours to come in, cried out, that the Son and the God Viracocha had converted the Rocks and Stones of the Country into Men, and had raifed them up to fight in defence of his own cause and people, the which report took the easier impression in the minds of that people; who being accustomed to the belief of superstitions Fables, were willing in this exigence to support their courage with the power of a Miracle. The Chamcas also, who were a people of the like superstitious fancy, giving ready credence to this rumour, were strook and affrighted with a strange amazement; and this belief so far dilated and radicated it felf afterwards in the minds of the simple people of the whole Kingdom, that it was accounted an Impiety, and a piece of Atheilm and Prophaneness to distrust, or question, the truth of this report. Of which Geronimo Roman writing in his Treatile of the Welf-Indies, and in the 11th Chapter of his fecond Book, speaking particularly of this Battel, hath these very words

"It is certain, according to the report of all the Indians, who discourse of that famous Battel, that the Inca remained Master of the Field, and won the day; and "they farther believe, that by a miraculous power of the Sun, the Stones of the Field were Metamorphofed, or transformed into Men, and arofe up in Battel against the Enemy; and that this was done in accomplishment of that promise "which was given to the Valiant Pachacui Inca Tupanqui; for fo also they give this Title to the Prince Viracocha. These are the Words of that curious Authour of the aforementioned Book, who in the said Chapter touches many points in brief, of which we have recited some, and shall farther have occasion to touch on others in the Sequel of this History of the Kings of Peru. In like manner Acoffa mentions the Vision which appeared to Viracocha, though there be some difference in the proper Names belonging to the Kings of that Age. And indeed both he and other Writers mention this Battel, as other matters, with fuch brevity, that they feem almost to pass it by, as a matter inconsiderable: And indeed, for the most part, all the Relations which the Spaniards give of the Indians are very intricate and confused; the which we may lawfully attribute to the little knowledge they had of their Language, and the loss of those Knots, which were the Monuments and Characters of their History; howsoever, they deliver the substance of them without any regard either to time or order; but in what manner or method foever that they are wrote, I am yet pleafed to recite the paffages which they deliver, that so by their Authority I may be acquitted of the Scandal of writing Fables; for if they prove fuch, they ought to be effeemed the Fictions of my Parents, and fuch as the Spaniards themselves have heard, and perhaps believed, though not with fuch Faith as I have done, who fucked in those Stories with my Milk, and received a deep impression of them in the time of my tender Infancy.

This Acofta farther proceeds in these words, which I have copied from the 21st Chapter of his fixth Book. " Pachacuti Inca Yupanqui reigned 70 Years, and made great Conquests; the principal cause and original of his success was occasioned by his Elder Brother, who taking upon him the Government by confent of his Father, was overthrown in a Battel by the Chancas, who are a Nation which inhabit in the Vally of Andaguarlas, which is about thirty Leagues distant from Cocco, in the way to Lima: His Younger Brother Tupanqui taking advantage of this difgrace, feigned a report, that he being at a certain time penfive and melancholy in a folitary retirement, a strange Apparition under the Name of Viracecha presented it self before him; complaining, that he being the Universal Creatour, and Lord of all things, who had made Heaven, and the Sun, the World, and Men, and placed them under his feet, and in fubjection to him, had not received that due respect and obedience which was owing to him; but in lieu thereof, Mankind was become so blind as to divide their Service and

" Worthip,

Worship, and to share a proportion of the veneration which was owing to him the onely God, unto the Sun, to the Thunder, and other Creatures who had no other Being, Vertue and Beauty, but such as they received from him; and that therefore he was now come to make known to him, that his Habitation was in Heaven where he was Worshipped under the Title of Viracocha Patchayachachie, which signifies the Universal Creatour of all things. And that they might be assured to raise him People and Armies by his Omnipotent power; and that though the Chancas were numerous and victorious, yet he would send him invisible Troops, and such as should not be known from whence they came, should aid and succour him against his Enemies. With this assurance and belief he raised his Men, which slocked to him in those Numbers, that he obtained a Victory; and afterwards deposing both his Father, and his Elder Brother, he made himself Absolute and Sovereign Prince of the Empire. From the time of which Victory he Established a Law, that Viracocha should be Worshipped and Adored as the sole and Supreme Lord of the Universe; and that the lmages of the Sun and Thunder should bow before his Idol, and doe him reverence; and from that time afterwards the Image of Viracocha was exalted above those "Worthip, and to there a proportion of the veneration which was owing to ges of the Sun and I hunder infolia Dow Defore his Idol, and doe him reverence; and from that time afterwards the Image of Viracocha was exalted above those of the Sun and the Thunder, and the other Minor Guacas, or Little Deities. And though this Juca Tupanqui did affign, and set out Lands and Flocks for the maintenance of the Sun and Thunder; yet he made no Establishment for the Viracocha, by reason that he being the Universal Lord, and Creatour of all, contained All-sufficiency within himself, having no need of supplies from the Creatures which his Denga had made. tures which his Power had made.

After this Battel was ended with Signal Victory over the Chancas, he decla-"red to his Souldiers, that it was not by their Force and Valour that their face amies were subdued, but it was by the Aid and Affistence of Numbers of Men with great Beards, which the Viracocha had fent to fight for them, and that they were invifible to all, but to himself: And that now their Work being finished, they were returned again to their former invisible Beings, and Nature of Stones: Howfoever, it feemed neither decent, nor convenient to omit due acknowledgements, even to those insensible Beings, which none but he could know; and therefore going into the Mountains, he cast up heaps of Stones, which he culled and separated with his own hands from the rest, setting them up for Guacas. or Demi-gods, commanding Adoration and Sacrifices to be offered to them, calling them by the Name of Paramanca, the which they carried with them to the Wars with great devotion. And such credit did this Fable gain in their " minds, that by force of this superstitious impression, this Inca obtained many great and fignal Victories. Thus far are the Words of Acofta, which agree in the fubstance with what we have before related; but as to what he alledges concerning the Image of Viracocha, that it was exalted above the Idol of the Sun; it was a novelty, and new manner of Worship introduced by the Indians, in compliance with the Spaniards: For it is a mistake to conceive, that they apprehended any notion of the Name of God, with a peculiar respect of his Supreme and Omnipotent Essence, for they had no conceit of any but of two Deities, one was the invisible and unknown, which was the Pachacamac; the other was the Sun, which was clear and apparent to the fight of the Universe; but as to Viracocha, and other Incas, they efteemed them as Children, and Off-spring of the Sun.

CHAP. XIX.

Of the Gratuities which the Prince Inca Viracocha bestowed on his Souldiers after the Victory.

THE Incas finding their Enemies to faint, and retreat, cried out the more violently, invocating the Name of Sutio Inca Viracocha, which was the Vifion that appeared to the Prince, and therewith strenuously invaded the Enemy, non mat appeared to the Prince, and therewith including invaled the Enemy, fubduing them with mere violence and dint of Sword; great numbers and heaps were flain, and thrown one on the other; the remainder turned their backs, and fled, not being able to make farther refiftence. The Prince having purfued the Enemy a while, caused a retreat to be sounded, and Command given to design racmy a while, cauted a retreat to be founded, and Command given to defilt from farther flaughter, the Victory being already evident and complete; and then the Prince in Perfon ran through the Plain where the Battel was fought, giving order to bury the dead, and to take care that the wounded and disabled should be used: To the Prisoners he freely gave liberty and licence to return into their own Countries, proclaiming Mercy and Pardon unto all. The Battel continued for the fiace of eight hours, being fought with fuch courage and refolution, that the Bloud did not onely Dye the Fields, but the streams of it overflowed the Banks of a Brook which ran through the Plains; for which cause they gave the Name of Tahnar Pampa to that place, which signifies as much as the Field of Bloud. In this Fight there were thirty thousand Indians stain, eight thousand of which were of the side of the Incar, the rest were such as rook part with the Rebels, consisting of several Nations of Chanca, viz. Hanchobadlu, Oramarca, Villea and Untunfulla, with Hanchobnallu having received a flight wound, was carefully cured; and being taken Priloner with two others of his chief Officers, were referved for the greater glory and oftentation on the day of Triumph, which was afterwards with great Solemnity performed. But fome few days after this Battel, an Uncle of the Prince with much gravity reproved the bold infolence of those Priloners, for daring to raile themselves up against the Family of the Sun; who, that they might appear invincible, the very Stones and Trees, by virtue of the Sun were transformed into Men, as was apparent in the last Battel, and would again be made manifest so often, as Enemies and Rebels should dare to lift up their hands and armes against the Divine Race. Many other Stories and Fables he recounted in favour of the Incas; concluding as the furn of all, that they were obliged in duty to render a thousand thanks to the Sun for sending his Gratious Children into the World, commanding them to the compatition and mercy, and to receive the Rebellious Indian; unto pardon; for which reason the Prince did not onely conser upon them their Lives as a gift, but reftore them also to their Estates and Dwellings, and their Curacus to their Dominion and Government, though the crimes they had committed deserved no less than Death; conditionally, that for the future they behave themselves as good Subjects, lest by a second offence they provoke the Sun to avenge the first, and cause the Earth to open its bowels, and swallow them alive. After this Lecture the Curacas with profound humility acknowledged the favour, promising all Loyalty, Duty and Obedience for the suture.

After this Victory the Inca Viracocha immediately dispatched away three Expresses; One of them was sent to the Temple of the Sun, to inform him of the good news of this Victory, which by his aid and fuccour they had obtained; for though they efteemed the Sun for a God, yet in all respects they treated him as a Man, and as one who had need of intelligence and information of matters which fucceeded; befides which, they formed other gross conceptions of him; as to drink to him; and that he might pledge them again on their Festival-days, they filled a Golden Cup with Liquour, which they fet in a part of the Temple, which was most open to the Sun-beams; and what was exhaled by that heat, they they judged to be drank up by the Sun; they also set meat for him to eat, and when any novelty occurred, they fent him the advices of it by Messengers, and when they were victorious, they returned him Thanks for their Successes. In pursuance of this ancient custome the Prince Viracocha sent advice to the Sun of this his Victory; and commanded the Priefts, that having recalled those others. which for fear were fled away, they should join together in offering new Sacriwhich for lear were ned away, they included but objected in ording new Sacrifices, with Praifes and Thankfgivings, to the Sun. Another Mellenger he difference to the House of the Select Virgins, giving them to understand, that by means of their Prayers and Intercessions, the Sun had bestowed that Favour and Victory upon him. A third Messenger, whom they call Chasqui, he dispeeded to his Father the Inca, giving him the particulars of all the late Successes, desiring him to continue in the fame station where he was, untill he should in person prefent himfelf before him.

CHAP. XX.

The Prince pursues his Conquest, returns to Cozco, sees his Father, and dispossesses him of his Empire.

HAving made these dispatches, he selected fix thousand Souldiers to accompany him in the pursuit of his Enemies; the rest of his Army he disbanded, giving them licence to return unto their own homes, the Body which he referved was commanded, befides other inferiour Officers, by two Major Generals, who were his Uncles; and with this Force two days after the Battel, he marched in the pursuit of his Enemies, not with intention to treat them ill, but to cure them of their fears, affuring them of pardon for their late Offence; fo that as many as they overtook, in case they were wounded, he ordered them to be cured; and fuch as were whole and found, he treated them with gentleness and kind usage; fending likewife Messengers to the respective Provinces and People, to assure them of the pardon and favour of the Inca, and that he was coming in person to give them farther testimonies thereof. Having by these pre-advices comforted and encouraged the people, he marched with great expedition, and being come to the Province of Antahuaylla, which belongs to the Chancas, all the Women and Children affembled together, and came forth to meet him, and carrying green branches in their hands, went crying, O thou undoubted Child of the Sun, who art the The Prince received these people with grace and favour, telling them, that it was not they, but their Fathers, and Husbands, who were guilty of the crime; and that even them also he had pardoned for their actual Rebellion; and to affire them hereof, and confirm them in this belief, he was come in person to pronounce their pardon with his own mouth. He ordered likewise that they should give them such provisions as their necessities required, treating them with all civility and affection imaginable, and that especial care should be taken of the Widows and Orphans of those who were slain in the Battel of Yahuar Pampa.

In this manner he over-ran all the revolted Provinces, constituting his Governours with fufficient Guards over them, and made fuch expedition, that in a months time (as the Indians report, who count their Months by their Moons,) he finished his march, and returned again to his City of Cozco. The Indians, as well those who were loyal, as those who had rebelled, were wonderfully surprized with this strange gentleness of the Prince, whose Humour and Disposition being sowre and fevere, promifed nothing but Revenge and Destruction to the last drop of his Enemies bloud; but finding his Nature otherwise changed, they concluded that the command of the Sun had altered his Disposition, and reduced him to the natural temper of his Fore-fathers. But the truth is, that Ambition and thirst of Honour which makes great changes in the minds of Men, had fo miraculously operated on his rough and hard temper, that his Nature feemed entirely to be altered, and to have put on that gentle and fweet humour, which was Royal and natural to his

Royal Commentaries.

This being done, the Inca Viracocha made his entry into Cozco on foot, that he might appear more a Souldier than a King; he descended thither by the way of Caramenta, and in triumphant manner, being encompaffed by his Souldiers, and on each hand supported by his two Uncles, that were Major Generals, causing the prisoners to be conducted behind, with great joy and loud acclamations he was received into the City. The grave lness aged, and ftricken in years came forth to meet him, and with due reverence having faluted and adored him and acknowledged him for a true Child of the Sun, entred amongst the ranks of the Souldiery, to partate of the glory of this Triumph; adding farther this complement to their Courthip, That they wished themselves youthfull again for no other reason, than that they might be Souldiers, and serve in the Wars under his fortunate and auspicious Conduct. His Mother also Coya Mama Chic-ya, with her Women, and others nearly allied in Bloud to the Prince, being attended also with a multitude of Pallas, or Ladies, went forth, with Songs and Dancings, to meet and receive him; some embraced him, others wiped off the sweat from his Brows. others fivept the duft from his Feet, strewing the ways with Flowers, and odoriferous Herbs, in which joyfull and folemn manner the Prince first visited the Temple of the Sun, in which making his entry on his bare Feet, according to their utual cuttome, he returned thanks for the Victory, which his Father the Sun had given him. Then he vifited the Select Virgins, Wives of the Sun; and after these two Offices were performed, he departed from the City to see his Father, who all this while conserved himself within the Straits of Muma, and in the same place where he had formerly left him.

The Inca Yahuar-Huacac received the Prince his Sun with all the expressions of iov and contentment imaginable, congratulating his Success, and victorious Atchievements, but yet his Countenance appeared to melancholy and referved, that he feemed thereby to testifie more of Emulation and Envy, than of real Satisfaction; for the shame and confusion he conceived in seeing his Son victorious seemed to upbraid his Cowardife; nor can it well be determined, whether the Envy of his Son's Honour, or the fense he had for basely forsaking the Temple of the Sun, or the fear of being deposed for his mean and pusillanimous Behaviour, was most prevalent in his confused mind. But certain it is, that at this publick interview few words paffed between them; what afterwards happened in private is not certainly known, but it is believed by the Indians, that the whole Difcourfe was in reference to the Government, which of the two should reign, and which appeared by the feguel, it being resolved between them, that the Father having forsaken and abandoned the City, was no more worthy to return unto it. For Ambition, and defire of Government, is so prevalent in the minds of Princes, that they are willing to take any pretext to cover their aspiring thoughts; and indeed this imputation of Cowardife feemed the more plaufible reason, in that it was feconded by the fuffrages of the people, and the confent of the Court; to which the Father condefcended, being conftrained thereunto by force, and by an abhorrence he naturally had to War, especially to Civil Diffentions. Upon which agreement the draught of a Palace was immediately defigned, and intended to be built between the Straits of Muyna and Quespicancha, where was an excellent Air, and pleasant Situation, and easily improveable by Gardens, and Orchards, and all the Divertifements of Hunting, Fishing, and other Royal Pastimes, being much advantaged therein by the benefit of the River Tucay, into which many Streams and Brooks fall, on the East-quarter of the House. The Foundation of this House being laid, (some ruines of which do to this day remain) the Prince returned to Cozco, where he changed his yellow for the crimfon Wreath, and yet was contented that his Father should still conserve his Royalty in the colour of his Ribbon, on condition that he renounced the substantial parts of Government; for proud and ambitious Men can endure punctilio's, and immaterial circumstances in others, whilft Power and Greatness is reserved for themselves. This Fabrick in others, whilft Power and Greatness is referved for themselves. This Fabrick being completed, it was furnished with all things necessary, and such attendance allowed, as was agreeable to the State and Magnistence of a King, so that Tahnar-huncae sound no difference in his living, unless it were in being freed and eased from the Burthen of Government. In this solitary manner this poor King passed to the Countrey, having exchanged his condition with his Son, who now lived and governed in the City, whilst the Father lived an Exile in the fields, having his Conversation with Beatls rather than Men.

This mydanys Fortung (as the Indiana believe) was the effect of the dianal.

This unhappy Fortune (as the Indians believe) was the effect of that direfull This unhappy Fortune (as the Indians believe) was the effect of that direfull Omen of weeping bloud; but yet in their political reflexions on some passages, they concluded, that in case the Inea, in the time of the obstinacy and perversences of his Son, had, instead of a confinement to a Countrey Lite, given him a small Dose of that Poison which was in practice amongst the Tyrants and Magicians of that Empire, he might easily have diverted that sad Fate, which his Tears of Bloud portended. But others, better inclined to speak savourably of the Prince, for though they could not wholly acquit him of Crime towards his Father, yet they moderated it in some manner, by alledging, that his Father's Fate might have been worse, in case his Enemies had prevailed; for having forsaken the Protection of his City, and Empire, out of mere Cowardise, it was some Happiness to have his Desaults repaired by the Valour of his Son, under whom the Succession was secured, and his own Life spared and desended. Others, seaking of the general Praise of their Kings, said to this effect. That this thers, speaking of the general Praise of their Kings, said to this effect, That this unhappy Inca had no thought or imagination of Poifon, for that all other his Predecedors having made it their business to prohibit the practice of it, and destroy the use of it in the World, he himself was ready to have checked any such motion within his own Mind, in case either his Thoughts, or persuation of others had suggested such a remedy to him. Others herein applauded the Religion and Generosity of the Incas, who scorned to act that which their own Decrees had made unlawfull; it being unfeemly, and beneath the Dignity of the Sun's Race, to allow that in themselves, which they had made illegal in their

Many fuch Discourses and Reflexions passed on this matter, according to every Man's particular fancy and opinion; with which we shall conclude our Historian ry of Tahnar-Huacac, and not farther mention other particulars of his Life, leaving him at his Countrey retirement to die with obscurity.

CHAP. XXI.

Of the word Viracocha, and why they called the Spaniards by that Name.

BUT to return now to the Prince, to whom they gave the Name of Viracocha, by reason that the Vision which appeared to him in a Dream, so called himself. And in regard this Phantafin was described by the Prince to appear with a long Beard, and Garments trailing on the ground, which was a much different habit to the fashion of the Indians, who naturally have little Hair in their Faces, and beard, and Gaments thango the Judians, who naturally have little Hair in their Faces, and by custome wear Coats not reaching farther than their knees; so so so as they had a sight of the first Spaniards that invaded Pern, and observed their long Beards and Garments which clothed all parts of their Bodies; and that their first Action was to take and kill Atabualpa, their Tyrant King, who not long before had murthered Huasear, the lawfull Heir and Successor, who not long before had murthered Huasear, the lawfull Heir and Successor, who not long before had murthered Huasear, the lawfull Heir and Successor, who not long before had murthered Huasear, the lawfull Heir and Successor, without any regard to Age or Sex, with many other Cruelcies, which we shall recount in their due place. When, I say, they observed that the Spaniards revenged the Bloud of their Insas, and punished the enormous Crimes, they called to mind the Apparition Viracocha, and comparing the punishment which he executed on the Chancas for their rebellion, with the Justice which the Spaniards performed on Atabualpa in revenge of the Murthers he committed on the Royal Family, they presently concluded, that the God Viracocha was the Parent of the Spaniards, for which reafon they received and welcomed them to their Countrey, and worshipped and adored them with the Natne of Viracocha; and hence it was, that the Conquest and them with the Name of Viracocha; and hence it was, that the Conquest of Peru became so easie, that six Spaniards onely, of whom Hernando de Soto, and Pedro de Barco were two, adventured to travell from Cassamarca to Cozco, which is a Journey of two hundred and thirty Leagues, by which they made a discovery of the Riches of that City, and other places; and to shew their great kindness and civility they carried them over the Countries in Chairs, or Sedans; giving them the Title of Incan, and Children of the Sun, in the same manner, as they did their own Kings. Now had the Spaniards taken the advantage of this credulity of the Indians, persuading them, that the true God had sent them, for their deliverance from the tyrannical Usurpations of the Divel, which enslaved them more than all the Cruelties of Arabnaspa; and had preached the Holy Gospel with that sanctity and good example, which the innocence of that Doctrine requires, they had certainly made great Progresses in the advancement of Religion. But the Spanish Histories report things in a different way of proceedings, to which, for the truth thereof, I refer the Reader, lest being an Indian my self, I should seem partial in the relation: But this truth we may considently aver, that though many were blameable, yet the greater number discharged the Office and Duty of good Christians; howfover amongst a people so ignorant and simple, as these poor Gentiles, one ill man is able to doe more mischief, than the endeavours of a hundred good Men are able to repair. adored them with the Name of Viracocha; and hence it was, that the Conquest good Men are able to repair.

The Spanish Historians farther say, that the Indians gave this Name to the Spaniards, because they came over the Sea, deriving Viracocha from the composition of two words, namely, Vira, which is vaft, immenfe, and Cocha, which fignifies the Sea or Ocean. But the Spaniards are much miltaken in this composition, for though Cocha is truly the Name for the Sea, yet Vira fignifies fatness; and is no other than the proper Name which that Apparition gave to it felf; the which I more confidently aver, because that Language being natural to me, and that which I sucked in and learned with my Mother's Milk, I may more reasonably be allowed to be a Judge of the true Idioms of that Tongue, rather than Spaniards, who are Strangers and Aliens to that Countrey. But befides what we have already mentioned, there may yet be another reason for it, which is, that the Indians gave them that Name from the Cannon and Guns they used, which they taking to be Lightning and Thunder, believed them Gods, by whose hands they were used. Blav Valera and funded; believed the doctors of the word and funded, says, that it fignifies a Deity, which comprehends the Will and Power of a God; not that the word doth properly fignifie fo much, but that it is a Name which the Indians found out to give to this Apparition; which they Worthipped in the fecond place to the Sun, and after that they Ado.

Royal Commentaries.

which they vornipped in the record place to the out, and after that they Adored their Kings and Incat, as if they had been Gods.

It is disputable whether the Inca Viracocha was more admired for his Victory, or for his Dream; but certain it is, that he was so reverenced for both, that they efteemed him for a God, and adored him as one expressly fent from the Sun to efteemed him for a God, and adored him as one expretly tent from the Sun to fave his Family, and the Divine Off-fipring from utter ruine; and because that by him the Imperial City, the Temple of the Sun, and the Convent of the Select Virgins were preferved; he was afterwards Worthipped with greater oftentation and honour, than any other of his Ancient Progenitors. And though this Inca endeavoured to persuade his Subjects to transfer the Honour which they gave to him, unto his Uncle, the Vision which appeared to him; yet so far was this devotion infixed in their minds, that they could not be diverted from performing Divine Honours towards him, untill at length they compounded for their superfition, and agreed to impart and divide their Worship equally between them and whereas they had both the same Name, they should Adore them together under the same Title and Notion: And for this reason the Inca Viracocha (as we shall hereafter mention) erected a Temple in Honour and Memory of his Uncle

Viracocha; in which also his own Fame was celebrated.

We may believe that the Devil, who is a cunning Sophister, did appear to the Prince either sleeping or waking in that Figure; though the Indians confidently report that the Prince was waking, and that this Apparition presented it self to him as he lay reposing himself under the shadow of a Rock: We may imagine also that this Enemy of Mankind played this trick to delude the World, and confirm the Authority of that Idolatrous superstition, which he had already planted in the minds of this people: the which seemed the most plausible way that he could proceed; for that in regard a soundation was already laid of the *Indian Em*pire, and that by the Constitutions of it, the Incas were to be the Lawgivers, and the Oracles of their Religion; and that they were to be believed, and effeemed. and obeyed for Gods; whatfoever contributed to this end, and to augment the reputation and fanctity of the Incas, was a point gained towards the advancement of this Gentilifin; of which, though there go many Stories, yet none is recounted by them with that admiration, as this Apparition of Viracocha, who coming with the popular character of an Allye to the Sun, and Brother to the Incas: And having the good fortune to have his Dream confirmed with the success of a Victory, carried fo much force of belief with it, that on all occasions afterwards of their distress, they had recourse to his Temple, where the Oracle was consulted, and directions taken for the management of their affairs. This is that imaginary God Viracocha, of which some Writers report, that the Indians esteemed him for their principal God, to whom they were more devoted than to the Sun: But this is certainly a miltake, and ferved onely for a piece of flattery to the Spaniards, that they might believe they gave them the fame Title and Name, as they did to their chiefest God: but in reality they Adored no God with such devotion as they did the Sun, (unless it were the Pachacamac) which they called the unknown God: For as to the Spaniards, they gave them at first the Title of Children to the Sun. in fuch manner as they did to the Apparition Viracocha.

The Inca Viracocha gives Order for Building a Temple in Memory of his Uncle, who appeared to him in a Vision.

THE Inca Viracocha, that he might the better perpetuate the Memory of his Dream, and keep the Honour of it up in the efteem of the people, commanded that a Temple should be erected in Honour of his Uncle, who appeared diffant from the City to the Southward: He ordered, that the Pabrick and Modern from the City to the Southward: He ordered, that the Pabrick and Modern from the City to the Southward: del of it should, as near as could be possible, imitate, or resemble the place where the Vision presented it self; which was like the open Field, without covering; joining unto which there was to be a little Chapel with the roof of Stone, refembling the hollow of the Rock, under which he reposed himself: The whole Fabrick was made of Stone rarely polifhed, as are all the Buildings of the Indians; it had four Doors corresponding to the four Quarters of the Heavens; three of them were shut, being rather Portals, than Gates, serving for Ornament more than Use. The Gate which looked Eastward, was that alone by which they entred, and by which they went out, being placed exactly in the middle; and because the Indians were not arrived to such Excellency in Architecture, as to lay the weight of their Building on Arched Work; they supplied that defect by flrong and deep foundations of Stone Walls, which were more lafting than Timber, and for ever durable. These Walls were laid three Foot in thickness, and feven Foot diffant each from the other, making twelve feveral Rows, or Isles; the top was not covered with Boards, but paved Stone, for about ten Foot in length, and half a Yard in thickness: At the Entrance to this Temple, turning to the right hand, they walked to the end of the first Isle; thence turning to the left, they went forward to the end of this Walk, and then faced again to the right, and fo winding about again through the feveral rows; they came at length to the end of the twelfth Ifle, where was a Stair-cafe, by which they afcended to the top of the Temple. At the Front of every Ifle, on each hand, there was a Window, like a Port-hole, to let in the light; and below every Window there was a Nich made in the Wall for a feat, where the Porter might fit, without incumbring, or flopping, the paffage. The Stair-case had two passages, one to go up, and the other to come down; that to go up fronted a top with the High Altar: The Floor above was paved with a kind of black Marble, rarely polifhed, that it looked like Jett, brought from some Quarry, far distant. In place of the High Altar there was a Chapel of about twelve Foot square, covered with the same fort of black Stone, in-laid in divers Figures, in form of Mofaick Work, which was the most excellent piece of Art in the whole Fabrick: Within this Chapel was the Image of the Apparition placed within the hollow of the Wall, as in a Tabernacle, with which two other Tabernacles were made to correspond on each fide for ornament and better uniformity. The Walls of this Temple, from the top to the bottom, were but three Yards in height, without any Window, the Cornish of which on all sides, both within and without, was made of polithed Stone; and within the Tabernacle of the Chapel was placed a Pedeftal, on which an Image of Stone was erected, representing the Image of the Apparition, in fuch shape and figure as the Inea Viracocha had directed. This Image represented the figure of a Man, with a Beard of about a fpan long, his Cloaths reaching to his feet, not very wide, but fomething feanty, like a Caffock: About his Neck a strange kind of creature was chained, with Claws like a Lion, the Image holding one of the links of the Chain in his hand; all which was framed and engraven out of Stone: And left the Workmen, who had never feen this Figure, should mistake any thing of giving it the due form; it is reported, that the Inc. himself did oftentimes lit, and shew himself to them in the same habit and figure. nument and orientances in, and move infinite to their in the failer habit and figure, in which, he faid, the Apparition prefented it felf: Nor would be permit, that the Image of the God Viracetha flould be undervalued by any form, or other flage than that of a King, fuch efteem and superflition did they conceive of their Idol

Royal Commentaries.

This Statue did fomething refemble the Images we make of our Bleffed Ano. files, particularly that of St. Bartholomew, whom they paint with the Devil at his ittes, particularly that of of. Bartholomew, whom they paint with the Devil at his feet, as they did this Figure of Viracocha, with fome unknown Beaft couching beneath him. The Spaniards observing this Temple, and the form and fashion of this Statue, will have it, that the Apostle St. Bartholomew came as far as Peru to Preach the Gospel to thee Gentiles, and that in Honour and Memory of him the Indians had erected this Temple and Image. And fuch as were Natives of Cozeo, and of the Mongrel breed between Spanish and Indian Bloud, have for a bove thirty years past Associated themselves into a Fraternity, or Community. into which they would not fuffer any Spaniard to enter. These upon their Solenn days are at great Expences, taking St. Bartholomor for their Aposstle, and in despight of all contradiction, they will have it, that he came and preached in Pern, and for that reason will own no other than him for their Patron; which seemeth a ridiculous fancy to fome Spaniards, who laughing at the bravery and fine Verlments they produce on that day, tell them, that this Feftival and Proceffion is not defigued in Honour of the Apostle, but of the Inca Viracocha.

But why the Inca Viracocha should build this Temple in Cacha, rather than in Chita, where the Spirit appeared to him, or in Yahuarpampa, where the Victory was fought; the Indians cannot well affign any more probable and just reason for it, than the free will and pleasure of the Inca, unless it were some secret and hidden caufe, not revealed or made known to any. This Temple being of fuch an odd and fitange Model, as we have declared, was demolified by the Spaniard, as many other fately Fabricks in Peru have been deftroyed by them; which in my opinion ought rather to have been conserved and kept in good repair, that Ages to come might fee and know the Grandeur and Valour of their Ancestours, who were able by their good fortune and conduct to subdue a Nation which was capable to erect such Buildings and Monuments of their Art and Wisedom; but perhaps envy or fcorn of that people might have moved the Spaniards to destroy their Works, not allowing them the Honour to be maintained in repair; and indeed the Dilapidation hath been fo great', that scarce one Stone remains on another; the which destruction, Men of Curiofity, and Lovers of Antiquity, do much lament. But the reason which they give for it is, that they could not be persuaded, but that much Treasure lay buried under the Foundation of those Buildings, which could not be discovered, but by a total subversion of the Fabrick. The first thing demolished in this Temple was the Statue, they having an opinion, that much Gold was buried under the Pedestal on which it was erected: other parts of the Temple they digged up, fometimes in one place, and then in another, until at length they defaced, or destroyed the whole Pile and Mass of Building: Howfoever, the Image of Stone is still in being unto this day, though much broken and battered by the Stones, which they threw at it.

CHAP. XXIII.

Of a famous PiEture; and of the Reward which was given to those who assisted the Prince.

IN this our discourse concerning Viracocha, we must not omit to add how much joyed and pleased he was with the new Adoration and Worship which the Indians gave him; so that he did not think fit to terminate the Magnificence of his Royal Mind with the stately Structure of this Temple onely, but to extend his Acts and Monuments with greater glory to posterity; and to this purpose he caused an Emblem to be drawn, representing the low and mean spirit of his Facaused an Emblem to be drawn, representing the low and mean spirit of his Father, and the generosity of his own mind, ordering it to be painted on one of those many Rocks, amongst which his Father absconded himself, when for fear of the Chancas, he abandoned and sorsook his City. The Emblem was of two Birds, which the Indians call Cuntur, which are Fowl of such large spreading Wings, that they measure five Yards from the end of one Pinion, to the tip of the other: they are Birds of prey, and so very fierce, that Nature denied them Talons to their feet, giving them onely Claws, like those of a Hen; but their Beak is so strong and sharp, that with one nip they are able to tear out the Skin of a Bullock; and two of them are sufficient to kill an Ox, as if they were Wolves. They are of a brownish colour, with white Spots, like Pyes. Two Birds of this fort he ordered to be painted, one of them with his Wings close clapped together, his Head shrung in, and drooping, like an affrighted Hen, which hides it felf, with its Beak turned towards Cohasson, and its Tail towards Coxeo the other Bird was on the contrary painted in a Rampant manner, with its Wings nuces it ieit, with its deak turned towards cottajum, and its 1411 towards Cozco: the other Bird was on the contrary painted in a Rampant manner, with its Wings extended, hovering on the Wing, and ready to floop at its Prey. The Indians fay, that the first of these represented the Father in his timorous and dejected condition; and the other was the Emblem of Viracceta, under the covern g of whose Wings the City and Empire was fecured and defended.

This Picture, in the Year 1580, was in being, and very perfect; and in the Year 1595, I asked a certain Priest which was born there, and who came from Perm into Spain, if he had seen it, and in what condition it was? and he told me, that it was so defaced by Rain, and the weather, none taking care to preserve it, that it was caree discernible what it was 5 the which was the fate and missortune also of divers other Antiquities in that Countrey.

The Inca Viracocha having in this manner obtained a supreme and absolute Dominion over all his Subjects, being infinitely beloved, and reverenced, and adored by them as a God; his great Work at the beginning of his Reign, was to Establish his Dominions in perfect peace and tranquillity for the good and benefit of all his

In order unto which, the first thing he did was to gratifie and reward all such with Favours and Honours who had served him in the late War, and taken Arms in his affiftence against his Rebellious Subjects; and herein a more particular notice was taken of the Quechuas, who belonged to the Countries of Cotapampa, and Cotanera; for in regard that they had been very active in promoting the interest of the Inca, and unanimously arose in Arms for his Aid and Defence; he bestowed on them the privilege of wearing their Hair shorn, and their Heads bound with the Wreath, and of having their Ears boared after the manner of the Ima, though the holes of the Ears were not to be so wide as theirs, but proportioned to such a fize as the first Inca, Manco Capac, had ordained.

To other Nations he bestowed Privileges of different Natures, as were most agreeable to their Countrey, and Conditions; and in fine, every one remaining entirely fatisfied and contented, he vifited his feveral Kingdoms, affording to his people the fatisfaction of beholding his Person, which their Eyes so much longed to fee; and of whom so many Wonders and Miracles were recounted, that nothing could come more defirable, and nothing more welcome than his Prefence. Having in this manner frent some Years, he returned to Cozco, where by advice of his Council, he refolved to conquer those great Povinces, which are called, Caranca, Ullaca, Llipi and Chicha; the Subjection of which was omirted by his Father, who was diverted from that delign by the jealousie and sear he conceived of this his Son, as we have already mentioned; but now in order to this Expedition, the Inca Viracocha commanded that thirty thousand Souldiers should be raised in Collasium, and Cuntisum, and put in a readiness against the next Spring; one of his Brothers, called Palmac Maria Inca, he made his General, or Commander in Chief; the Sirname of Palmac (which fignifies flying) was given him for his admirable fwiftness, being nimble and active, beyond any Man in his time.

BOOK V.

For the affiftence of his Brother he ordained four Incas to be Counfellours, and Major-Generals; who departing from Cozco, collected their numbers and increated their Army in the way, as they marched. At length they arrived at the afore faid Provinces, two of which, called Chica, and Ampara, adored the lofty top of a fnowy Mountain for their God; for they admiring the Beauty and Height thereof, from whence those Streams proceeded which refreshed their Lands, and made their grounds fruitfull, they were eafily perfuaded in natural gratitude to own that for their Deity, from whence they received fuch benefit and bleffing. In these proceedings they encountred some light Skirmishes with the Enemy, who rather designed to give a proof of their warlike Disposition, than fight in hopes of prevailing against the Bosa, whose Reputation was exalted so high the Valour and Atchievements of Viracocha; that their power seemed invincible, and not to be fubdued by humane force. For this reason, these great Provinces submitted to the Dominion of the Incas yielding with more readiness, and with less danger, and loss of bloud than was expected from a people, esteemed numerous, and of a warlike Temper. Howfoever three years past in this expedition, before the Conquest was completed, and the Nations reduced to an abfolute and entire fubmiffion.

CHAP. XXIV.

Of the New Provinces, subdued by the Inca. and of the Chanels they made to water their Pastures.

THE Inca Palmac Mayta, and his Uncle having concluded this War, and placed Governours and Officers to rule and inftruct their new Subjects, they returned to Cozco, where they received from the Inca a hearty wellcome, being rewarded by him with fuch Honours and Favours, as their Services and Labours had deferved. And now it feemed as if the Inca Viracocha had extended his Territories to the utmost limits of the Universe, for to the Eastward they reached as far as the foot of the snowy Mountain; to the Westward they were bounded by the Sea; to the Southward they extended to the utmost parts of the Province of the Charcas, which are above two hundred Leagues distant from the City; fo that on all these three Quarters there remained no farther Land to conquer; for on one fide the Sea bounded their proceedings, and the Snows, and inaccessible places of the Mountains of Antis on the other; and to the Southward the Defarts and Sands between Peru, and the Kingdom of Chili, made the way impaffable for the march of an Army. How foever the Defire of Rule, and the unfatiable thirst of Dominion moved the mind of this Inca to bend his forces towards the Northern Countries, which are in the Division of Chinchasury; and having communicated his refolution to those of his Council, he appointed that an Army should be raised, intending himself in person to command it, with the affiftence of fix others, who were men of Valour and Experience. During the ablence of Virscocha the City was governed by his Brother Pahnac-Majia, whom he left Deputy in his place; and all things being provided, and in a readiness, the Army marched towards the parts of Chincafuyu, and came to the Province Analogy, which belongs to the Chinca, a people branded with the infamous Epithete of falle, and treacherous, by reason of their Rebellion against the Inca, which imputation hath so closely cleaved to them even to this day, that scarce at any time are the Chancas mentioned without the addition of Auca, which is as much as falle, or treacherous; this word also fignifies a Tyrant, a breaker of his Faith, and every thing which denotes Falseness and Treachery: Moreover it may ferve to express Contentions, and Battels, by which variety of fignifications, we may observe how copious and full this Language of Peru is, which comprehends fuch variety and divertity of fenses in one word.

The poor Chancas confcious of their former crimes, feared greatly the approach of the Inca Virococha, left he should now revenge their offence upon them; but then finding, contrary to all expectation, nothing but Mercy and Gentleness in their Prince, they prefently quitted their Fears, receiving him with all the Demonstrations of Joy and Fertivity, that an afflicted people was capable to express. And to confirm them in this good humour, he not onely treated them with gratious Words, but conferred on them Prefents of Garments, and other curiofities. He also visited the several Provinces, taking care to provide what was wanting, and to amend that which was amilis, and then appointing a General rendezvous for the whole Army, he marched forwards to those Countries, which were not as yet reduced to Obedience. The first and nearest Province, rich and populous, was Humara, a people warlike and mutinous, fuch as had flewed themselves in the Head and Van of the Rebels. But how front soever they had been, fo foon as the Inca Viracocha had fent them a fummons by his Ambassadours, they with readiness submitted and obeyed, coming forth with all humility to receive and acknowledge him for their Lord; for as yet the Battel of Tahuar-pampa was fresh in their memory, and the success thereof confirmed them in a belief, that the Inca was invincible: this humble Submiffion met a like Generofity in the Inca, who received them with a gratious acceptance agreeable to their Humility, onely charging them to live quietly and in peace, as being most for the common good, and most acceptable to himself.

Thence he marched forwards to another Province called Poera, known sometimes by the name of Hummunea; thence he proceeded to Almann, Pineo, Piney and Acot, all which chearfully fubmitted, efteeming it a great honour to remain under the Empire and Protection of the Inca, whose mighty Actions had acquired him Renown in all Quarters of that new World. And having thus gained this people to his power, he dispeeded his Army away, lest they should be burthensome to the Countrey, and then employed his Thoughts and Endeavours for fecuring his Government, and performing those matters which might conduce to the common Good and Welfare of the people; particularly he opened and made a Chanel of water, of about twelve Foot in depth, running for abour one hundred and twenty Leagues in length: the fource or head of it arole from certain Springs on the top of a high Mountain, between Paren and Pieny, which was 60 plentifull, that at the very head of the Fountains they feemed to be Rivers. This Current of Water had its courfe through all the Country of the Ruemas, and ferved to water the Pasturage of those uninhabited Lands, which are about eighteen Leagues in breadth, watering almost the whole Countrey of

There is another Aqueduct much like this, which traverses the whole Province of Camifing, running above one hundred and fifty Leagues from South to North; its Head or Original is from the top of high Mountains, the which Waters falling into the Plains of the Quechnas, greatly refresh their Pasturage, when the heats of the Summer and Autumn have dried and burnt up the mossture of the Earth. There are many Streams of like nature, which run through divers parts of the Empire, which being conveyed by Aqueducts, at the charge and expense of the Incas, are works of Grandeur and Ostentation, and which recommend the Magnisticence of the Incas to all posterity. For these Aqueducts may well be compared to the miraculous Fabricks which have been the works of mighty Princes, who have left their prodigious Monuments of Ostentation to be admired by suture Ages; for indeed we ought to consider, that these Waters had their source and beginning from vast high Mountains, and were carried over craggy Rocks, and inaccessible passages; and to make these ways plain, they had no help of Instruments forged of Steel or Iron, such as Pick-axes, or Sledges, how she the invention of Arches, to convey their Water on the level from one precipice to the other; but traced round the Mountain, until they found ways and passages at the same height and level with the Head of the Springs. The Citterns, or Conservatories, which they made for these Waters at the top of the Mountain, were about twelve Foot deep; the passage was broken through the Rocks, and Chanels made of hewen Stone of about two yards long, and about a yard high; all which were well cemented together, and rammed in with earth, so hard, that no Water could pass between to weaken or vent it self by the holes of the Chanel.

This Current of Water, which passes through all the Division of Cunissyu, I have seen in the Province of Quechua, which is part of that Division, and considered it as an extraordinary Work, and indeed surpassing the Description and Report which hath been made of it: But the Spaniards, who were Aliens and Strangers, little regarded the convenience of these works, either to serve themselves of the use of them, or keep them in repair, nor yet to take so much notice of them, as to mention them in their Histories; but rather out of a sconfull and disclaining humour, have suffered them to run unto ruine, beyond all recovery.

The same sate hath befallen the Aqueducts, which the Indians made for watering their Corn-lands, of which two thirds at least are wholly destroyed, and none kept in repair, unless some sew, which are so usefull, that without them they cannot sustain themselves with Bread, nor with the necessary provisions for Life. All which works are not so totally destroyed, but that there still remain some ruines and appearances of them.

CHAP. XXV.

The Inca visits the remote parts of his Empire, and Ambassadours come thither to him, offering the Subjection, and Vassadge of their People.

THE Inca Viracocha having provided all things towards the work of this great. Aqueduct, which was necessary for watering the Herbage of those Countries, he passed from the Province of Chinchassing, to Cantissya, with intention to visit all the parts of his Empire. The first Provinces which offered in this Journey, belonged to Quechua, two of which being of greater note, than others, were Congampa, and Cotanera; to which the Inca made extraordinary demonstrations of Honour, out of respect to the Service they had done him, in his late War against the Chancas. Thence he travelled forwards through all the other Provinces of Cantissya, as well the Mountainous Countries, as the Plains and Valliages, and Lands along the Seacost, that so no place or Region might complain of disfavora, or want of the Inca's presence, which was the most welcome and desirable object to them in the whole Universe.

In all the places where he came, he made ftrict inquifition concerning the behaviour of his Othicers and Ministers, and in what manner they discharged their Duty and Trust, such as were found guilty of any neglect, or injustice, he punished with the utmost rigour and severity, saying, that those who had made use of the Royal Authority to pillage or oppress his Subjects, were more criminal than those common Robbers, who in contempt of the Imperial Ordinances and Laws, and by force of their own private power, invaded the Rights and Properties of the People. From Consispus he entred into the Provinces of Collasgus, passing from one unto the other, as they offered in his way, all which he comforted with the Rays of his Favours, which he imparted in their respective degrees, as well to the Commonalty, as to the Curacus; and on the Sea-coast he journyed as far as to Taracaba

During the stay which the Inca made in the Countrey of the Chancas, Ambassadours came to him from the Kingdom of Tucma, which the Spaniards call Tucuman, being distant about two hundred Leagues Southwest from the Chancas; addressing themselves unto him after this manner. "Most mighty" Prince, Capa Inca Virtacoha, The Report of your samous Deeds, the Equity and Justice of your Proceedings, the Excellency of your Laws, instituted for the sole Benefit and Welfare of your Subjects, the Purity of your Religion, Clemency and Mercy, and the wonderfull Miracles which your Father the Sun hath performed in your savour, and for your affistence, hath reached the utmost Conlines of our Dominions, and is yet carried farther on the Wings of Fame, the which Report hath made such impression on the Hearts of all the Curacas of Tucman, that they have sent us hither to implore the powerfull Protection of your facred Empire, and that you would appoint Incas of the Royal Bloud to preside over them, who may not onely administer Justice to them, but likewise instruct them in those Laws, and Customs, and Religion, which they are to obsceive; in hopes and expectation of which, we do here in the name and behalf of all our Kingdom, prostrate our selves before you, as the undoubted Off-spring and Inty thereof, we do here ofter our Persons, with the Fruit of our Lands, as Livery and Selsin, and in token and evidence that we surrender our Persons and Lands into your possession, had one could be a surface that we surrender our Persons and Lands into your possession. Having staid thus much, they laid open their Presents of Garments, made of Cotton, Pots of excellent Honey, as also Corn, and divers forts of Pulse; but as to Gold, or Silver, they produced none, being not of the Growth of their Countrey; and which the Spaniards, notwithstanding the fearch and pursuit which they made after it, have not discovered in those Ouar-

The Ambaffadours having made these Presents, they prostrated themselves with profound reverence before the Inca, who received them with a gratious acceptance. according to his accustomed goodness; and in farther token of his favour, he commanded the Incas, who were his Kindred, to drink with them, which was the greatest Honour he could confer. At this entertainment they were farther affinred of the Good-will of the Inca, and how much he took this voluntary submisfion and refignation of themselves and Countrey in good part; in return whereunto, they affured them of all the kind treatment imaginable, and that the hea diffinguished between those, who out of good-will and affection, freely became his Subjects, and those who by force of Arms were compelled to Obedience. Then they gave them for Prefents to their Curacas, Vestments of such fort as were made for the Inca, woven by the hands of the Select Virgins, and which, for that reason, were accounted Divine and Sacred; and to the Ambassadours many other Prefents were made of different qualities. Then the Incas of the Royal Bloud were appointed, who were to inftruct them in Religion, and prefide over them as Governours; that leaving their bestial and brutish course of living, they might receive and observe the Laws and Ordinances of the Incas: And in company with these Ministers, several Artists and Workmen were sent, who were skilfull in making Aqueducts, and cultivating the Lands, that fo by good husbandry the Estate of the Sun, and of the King, might be improved and increased.

The Ambaffadours having been thus entertained for fome days at the Court of the Inca, where they observed the good Order, and Rule, and Excellent Laws of his Government: They confessed, that such Constitutions as those could have no other Original than from the Sun, or fomething Divine; and that their own Customs and Laws did partake of nothing but what was brutish, and without any Morality. And with this confideration being made zealous for the Inca's Service and Glory, they expressed themselves in this manner to the Inca: Sir, said they, we are greatly sensible that the World is made happy by your Laws and Government; of which that every part may partake some share and proportion, we are to make known unto you, that not far from our Countrey, to the South-West from 111, there lyes a Kingdom called Chili, which is very rich and populous; and though we our selves have had no Commerce, or correspondence therewith, by reason of those snowy Mountains, and inaccessible Passages, which divide us from them ; yet we have received by an undoubted Tradition from our Forefathers. that there is such a Nation worthy the Employment of your Arms, and of your Dominion: The which we the more willingly discover, that so they also with us may Adore your Father the Sun, and enjoy the same common Benefits and Laws which are made and designed to civilize and improve the Nature of Mankind. The Inca having taken notice of this advice, ordered the Ambaffadours to be dispatched, that they might return again into their own Countrey.

Thence he proceeded forward on his progress through all the Provinces of Collafuju, dispersing his Favours and Rewards to the Curacas and Captains, not neglecting the Commonalty, and people of low degree and condition; so that all forts, from the highest to the lowest, received particular satisfaction and contentment from the presence of the Inca: For so much had the Fame of his Divine Dream, and his Victory at Yahuarpampa, raifed his Esteem in the minds of the people, that they not onely received him with Joy and Acclamations, but paid him Divine Honours and Veneration, as if he had been fome New God; though now by the Mercies of the true God they have quitted that Idolatry, and being difabuled, and rightly informed in Religion, they onely conferve a gratefull Memory of that King, who was fo fortunate and propitious to them both in War and Peace.

From Collafum he paffed into Amifum, where the people being poor, and mean, were not able to demonstrate such Ostentation and Magnificence as others had done; howfoever, according to their degree and quality, they shewed as joyfull hearts, as their simplicity was capable to express: In evidence of which, they erected Triumphal Arches in the way by which he was to pass; the which being formed of Timber, they covered with Ruthes, and crowned with Garlands, ffrowing all the ways with Flowers, expressing the joyfulness of their hearts, after the cufrome of their Countrey, and as was usual at their greatest Festivals. In these visits the Inca spent three years, not omitting at the due seasons to celebrate the Feasts of the Sun, which they called Raymi, and Citua: And though they could not be performed with fuch Solemnity as at Cozco, yet in compliance with their Religion, they expressed their Devotion with such Rites and Ceremonies, as the circumstances of time and place would admit.

And now having accomplished his Progress, he returned to the City, where his Presence was greatly desired, as the Protectour and Desender of it, or rather as he who had laid a new foundation of an abandoned and ruined place: And therefore the Court and City affociated together with new Sonnets and Panegyricks, composed in his praise, to meet and conduct their Adored King to his place of Relidence.

CHAP. XXVI.

The Valiant Hanco-huallu flies out of the Empire of the Incas.

Thus, in the manner which we have declared, this Inca travelled twice through all Outrers of his Dominions and all outrers of his Dominions all Quarters of his Dominions; and when that in his fecond Progress he passed through the Province of the Chichas, which is the most remote part of Peru to the Southward, News was brought him of the flight of the brave Hancobuallus at which he was greatly concerned, wondring at the reason, or cause, for fuch a refolution.

This Man, it feems, was King of the Chancas; and though for nine or ten Years he had proved the gentle Government of the Incas, who in revenge, or punishment, of his late offence, had not diminished the least point of his Power or Jurisdiction; but rather, on the contrary, treated him with due honour and re-spect; yet in regard that he and his Foresathers had reigned as absolute Lords and Princes over many Nations, whom they had fubdued by their Arms and Power; his generous spirit could not yield to any Subordination, or hold his Countrey in feud to a Superiour: He also envied the Quechnas for the Esteem they had gained in the favour of the Inca, by the Services, which in the late War they had performed; and by whose means and affistence the Victory was wrested from himself: Nor could he endure to behold that people which was Inferiour, and once truckled to him, to stand now in equality, and in competition with him for Monour and Power: the which unpleafing imaginations to possessed his disquiet mind, that contrary to the sense and opinion of the Lords and Nobles of his Countrey, he refolved to purchase his own Liberty, and absolute Power, though with the loss and resignation of the Estate he possessed in his own Dominions. In order hereunto he imparted his Refolutions to certain Indians, who were his Friends, and faithfull to his Interest; giving them to understand, that he could not support a Subjection to the Will and Dominion of another; and therefore was refolved to Abandon his Native Patrimony and Inheritance, to recover an Absolute Sovereignty in remote parts, or dye in prosecution of it. This defign of Hanco-buallu being rumoured abroad amongh his people, it was agreed, that fuch Men as inclined to his party, should, with their Wives and Children, depart privately in small Companies, lest Numbers of People and Troops should make a noife, and give jealousite to the Inca; and that at length they should assemble and meet at a general Rendezvous in some place beyond the Dominions of the Inca, where he himself would follow after them, and appear in the Head of them as A a their their King and Leader. This feemed to be the most agreeable counsel, and her expedient to recover their Liberty; for that it were a folly, and rathness, to endeavour it by force, or to fet up their Power against the Puissance of the bica. Nay, though fuch a defign should feem feasible, and practicable, yet considering the gentleness of the Inca, and with what kindness and humanity he had returned the Acts of Hostilities which they had offered him, it would seem a part of in. gratitude and perfidiousness, which could not enter into the Breast of a Generous Prince to rife again in Arms against him: But then to recover their Liberty by a peaceable furrender of their Estates and Power, was not onely inno. cent and inoffensive, but allowable also under the strictest circumstances and obligations by which they were bound to the Inca, than whom there could not be a more benign, and more indulgent King in the whole Universe.

With these Arguments and Reasons the brave Hanco-hually prevailed on the minds of those to whom he first communicated his design; and they whispering it one to the other, it became the common discourse; and found such a general approbation and concurrence, that the Chancas, who naturally loved their Lord and Sovereign, were easily persuaded to run the fortune of their Prince; so that in a fhort time they numbred 8000 fighting Men, which in a Body marched out of their Countrey, befides Women and Children, under the Command and Conduct of the Valiant Hanco-hually; the fame of whose Courage, and the fierceness of the Chancas, who were always reputed for a fighting and warlike Nation, struck fuch terrour in all places and regions through which they marched, that none durft oppose, or interrupt them in their passage: The fear likewise of them caused the Inhabitants to furnish them with Provisions untill they came to the Provinces of Jarma and Pumpu, which are about 70 Leagues distant from their own Countrey. And though in this March they encountred certain inconfiderable Skirmishes, and could easily have overcome the Natives, and planted themselves in their possessions; yet they seemed as yet to have too near a Neighbourhood with the Empire of the Inca, whose ambition might soon arrive them, and bring them under the fame subjection from which they fled, and endeavoured to avoid: For which reason they marched forward, removing themselves as far as it was possible from the reach of the luca, at least to such a distance, as during his life, it was not probable that his Arms could extend. With this intention they travelled, bending on the right hand towards the great Mountains of Antis, with defign to inhabit there, and people those places which were most commodious for Humane life. Those of this Nation of the Chancas report, that they removed 200 Leagues from their own Land, but at what place they entred, or what parts they peopled, it is not certain; onely that they entred by a great River, and planted their Colonies by the banks of a great Lake, where it is faid, they encreased in such Riches, and performed such mighty Acts, that they feem rather Romances, than Reports fit for a true History. And though we may believe, or fanfie nothing too great for the Courage and Wisedom of Hanco-bradly; yet his Actions not falling within the subject of our History, we shall put a period to a Relation of them in this place, as impertinent and foreign to our prefent discourse.

CHAP. XXVII.

Of the Colonies fent to inhabit the Lands of Hanco-huallu: and the Description of the Valley of Yucav.

THE Inca Viracocha was much furprifed with the News, that Hanco-huallu was fled; and had abandoned his Countrey; which he would have prevented had he been pre-advised of his Intention; but fince now there was no remedy. and that no cause was given to move or force his departure, the Inca was the less concerned, though the people were generally rejoyced at his Flight, to whom the Humour and haughty Disposition of a Prince, like him, was never pleasant. The News of the flight of Hanco-hualln, with all the particulars of it, being made known and confirmed; the Inca commanded his Brother Pabuac Marta, whom he had left Governour at Cozco, with two others of his Council, to pass with a considerable number of Souldiers, into the Countrey of the Chancas, there to see and inform themselves of the true state of that remaining people, whom they were ro treat and carefs with all gentleness, giving them comfort and affurance of Protection; for that though their Prince was fled, yet they should not want the care of the Inca, who was both more able to defend them, as also more mild and loving than their fierce Hanco hually.

These Incas having visited all the Provinces belonging to the Chancas, and difposed them to a quiet and satisfied condition, they went to the two famous Fortreffes of Hanco-hually, built by his Ancestours called Challey marca, and Sura mareas Marea in that Language fignifying a Castle or Fortress. In these places Hancobually passed some days before his departure, which (as the Indians report) he was more troubled to leave, than all the other possessions he enjoyed in his Dominions. The diffurbance which the flight of Hanco-huallu had caused, and the consternation in the minds of the People, being in some manner quieted and appealed; and all other matters of the Empire being well ordered and established, the Inca returned again to Cozco to enjoy the fruits of Peace, and employ his time in the administration of Justice, and performance of matters beneficial to the wellfare of his Subjects; hoping that with time the fears and jealousies which Hanco-huallie had raifed, would blow over, and vanish. The first thing therefore that he did was to publish certain Laws, which in that conjuncture of Affairs were seasonable and convenient, and which ferved to prevent infurrections of the like nature for the future. Next he fent a Colony of about ten thousand Persons, under the Command of Incas, into the Countrey of the Chancas, to Supply the places of those who were flain in the Battel of Tabuar-pampu, and of those who had deserted their Countrey in company with Hanco-buallu. Then he appointed several sumptuous Houses to be built in all places of his Empire, particularly in the valley of Yucay, which is lower than Tampu. For this Valley is the most pleasant and delightfull place in all Peru; having for that reason been chosen by all the Kings, since the time of Manco Capae, for their Garden, and place of Recreation; to which they often retired, to refresh and divertise themselves after the toils and labours which are incident to Government. The fituation of it is about four Leagues diftant Northeast from the City, in a most sweet and healthfull Air, where the Climate is so temperate, that neither cold or heat are in excess; the Waters are excellent and cool, nor are the Flies or Gnats troublefome, or any other infect there poisonous or vexatious. It is placed between two Mountains, that to the East is the snowy Mountain, an arme of which extends to the plain, and supplies it with continued fireams, from which they draw feveral Branches, and convey it by Chanels to water their Grounds. Though the middle of this Mountain be lofty, rugged and afperons; yet at the foot and skirts of it are verdant Pastures, and Lands abounding with Fruits: where also are all forts of Game, such as Stags, and Fallow-Deer, the

Aaa

the Huanacus and Vicunna, (which is a Mountain Goat, from whence they have the Bezar-stone.) as also Partridges, and all forts of other Fowl; and though the havock which the Spaniards have made hath destroyed all the Game in those parts, yet in the place thereof they have planted Vines, and Fruit-trees, and Sugar-canes, which is the improvement they have made in that quarter. The other Mountain to the Welt is not fo high, or lofty, being not above a League in the afcent. At the foot thereof runs the plentifull River of Yuc.19, deep, and not rapid, but passing with a smooth and gentle Current, and therefore abounds with great quantities of excellent fish, and is frequented with Hearns, Wild-Ducks. and all forts of Water-fowl. Those that were fick at Cozo, which is a cold and flarp Air, and therefore not so proper for infirm Bodies usually resorted thister to recover their healths; so that there is now no Spaniard who lives at Cozo, and esteemed a Man of an Estate, but who hath a Country house, or some possession in that Valley. This Inca Viracocha had a particular delight and affection for that place; and therefore built feveral Houses there, both for oftentation, and for plea. fure.

He enlarged the Temple of the Sun, both in the Building, and also in the num. ber of Servants and Officers, endowing it with a Revenue agreeable to the Enlargement. And as all the Incas conceived a particular Veneration, and Devotion for that Temple, so Vivacocha seemed more sensibly affected from his religious fervour to that Spirit which appeared to him.

CHAP. XXVIII.

The Name which Viracocha gave to his Eldest Son; and his Prophecy concerning the Invalion of the Spaniards.

TE have seen already by what hath preceded, in what manner Viracocha pasfed some years, and in what tranquillity and prosperity he governed his Empire. We are now to speak of his Children and Family; his Eldest Son was born of Coya Mama Runtu, who was his Sifter, and true and lawfull Wife; he was at first called Titu Manco Capac, though afterwards by the last Will and Appointment of his Father, his Name was changed to Pachacutec, which fignifies as much ment of his Patner, his Name was changed to Pacadettee, which fignifies as much as one who fubverts the World, or turns it upfide down; and though it was commonly taken in the worft fenfe, for some alteration from bad to worfe, yet it is said he was so affected with this Word, that he was desirous to have called himfelf by that Name; but in regard that the Name of Viracocha was so dilated over all Countries, and the Voices of the people so accustomed to it; that he could not affume that Appellation to himself, yet he was desirous to communicate it to his Son, being, as he believed, a means to keep alive the memory of the Apparition, and the renowned Actions of his Father. Acofe in the 20th Chap, of his 6th Book faith, "That the people were so much scandalized at the Name of Viracocha, which this Inca took to himself, because it was the proper name of God, that he was forced to clear himself of this prophanation, by saying that the Spirit which appeared to him in his Dream, had commanded him to take that Name and Title upon himself: And that the Inca Pachacuti, who succeeded him, was and The upon himler: And that the linea Pachaeumi, who increeded nim, was "a great Souldier and Politician, having invented many superstitious rites, which he introduced into the Worship of their Religion; which are the words with which Acosta concludes that Chapter: All which is in confirmation of what I have said, namely, that a Vision appeared to him in his Dream; that he took the Name of that Apparition, and that afterwards he gave the Name of Pachaeumica the South of the said of the tec to the Son who fucceeded him.

The Name of the Queen was Mama Runtu, which Word Runtu fignifies an For, so called, because of the whiteness of her Face being perhaps fairer than the Women commonly are of that Countrey.

The Indians report, that this Viracocha was the Authour of the Prophecy which foretold the Invalion of the Spaniards, and was conferved amongst the Archives of the Kings of Peru: which was, "That at a certain period of Years after the of the Kings of Peri: Which was, a trial at celtain period of freas after the fucceffion of fuch a number of Kings, there should come a fort of people from a far remote Countries, never seen, or known before in those Regions, who should " take away their Religion, and Subvert their Empire. The Substance of which Prophecy was contained in two fuch obscure Sentences, as were difficult to be explained or interpreted. The Indians fay, that this Inca, after the fuccels and verification of his Dream, became the Oracle of Mankind; for that the Amount who were the Philosophers of those times, as also the High Priest and the most Ancient Elders of the Temple of the Sun, who were the Magicians, that wells Ancient Elders of the Temple of the Sun, who were the Magicians, filat prefaged of things to come, did often interrogate him concerning his Dream; and of Comets feen in the Heavens, as allo of Divinations by the flying and fingling of Birds, and of feveral other fuperfittious Prognoftications which they made from their Sacrifices, and Entrails of Beafts, and to all the Refponses which Firmach, made to their Enquiries, they yielded entire Faith and Oredence, effecting was judged worthy to be conserved by Tradition in the memory of their Kings onely; and that the knowledge of fuch divine Revelations was not to be made companied to the Beophel. mon, or prophaned by the Discourse of the People; for that it was not fit for them to be pre-acquainted with the times and feafons, when their Idolatrous Wintthis should have an end, and the Empire be overthrown, and the Divinity of the Incar questioned, and changed into the state and common condition of humane kind. For which reason there was no farther mention made of this Prophecy. untill the time of Huayna Capac, who revealed it openly a little before his Death, as we shall hereafter declare more at large; though some Historians make but a short tale of it, and say, that a God which the Indians worshipped, called Tici Viracocha, delivered this Prophecy. But for what I have delivered herein, I have the authority of an old Inca, whom I have often heard recount the Fables and Antiquities of their Kings in presence of my Mother.

And in regard the coming of the Spaniards into Peru, and the Conquest of it by them; the destruction of their Idolatry, and the preaching of the Gospel of Christ in those parts, did correspond with the Prophecy of Viracocha; the Indians did therefore give the Name of Viracocha to the Spaniards, fanfying them to be Sons of that imaginary God, whom he had purpolely fent (as we have already faid) to relieve the Incas from the Oppression and Violence of the cruel Tyrant. Thus we have cursorily touched on this wonderfull Prophecy, which for many years had been revealed to the Inca-Kings; and which was afterwards accomplished in the Reigns of Huascar, and Atahnalpa, which were great Grandchildren to the third Generation to this Inca Viracocha.

CHAP. XXIX.

Of the Death of Viracocha; and how the Authour saw his Body.

T length the Inca Viracocha, in the Height of Majesty, and Zenith of his Profeerityl, submitted to the common fate of Mankind; he was gene rally lamented, and bewailed by all the Empire, and adored afterwards as a Child of the Sun, to whom they offered Prayers and Sacrifices. He left to Pachacute his Eldest Son, the Inheritance, besides whom he had many legitimate Sons and Daughters of the Royal Bloud, with others born to him by his Concubines: he conquered and reduced Eleven Provinces, four of which were to the South of Cozeo, and feven towards the North. It is not certainly known to what age he lived, nor how long he reigned, though according to common report, he governed above fiftyYears; and so he seemed to me to have been an ancient Man, when I faw his Body at Cozco, about the beginning of the Year 1570, which was the time when I was upon my departure for Spains; and then I remember, that going to take my leave of the Governour, or Chief Justice of the City, called Paul Ondegardo, a Native of Salamanca; amongst other Favours which he did me, he was pleased to lead me into an inward room, and there tell me, that before I departed it would be convenient for me to have a fight of fome of my Relations. that so I might have another Story to tell of them in Spain; with that he shewed me five Bodies of Incas, three of Men, and two of Women; one of which the Indians report to have been the Body of Viracocha, which feemed to be verv aged, the Hairs of the Head being as white as Snow: The fecond they fav was the Great Tupac Tupanqui, who was great Grandson to Viracocha: The third was Huayna Capac, the Son of Tupac Tupanqui; and Grandson of the Fourth Generation to Viracocha; the two last were Men with gray Hairs, yet did not feem so aged as Voracocha. One of the Women was said to be the Body of the Queen Mama Runin, Wife of Viracocha; the other of Coya Mama Occlo, Mother of Huayna Capac; and it is probable that they might be Husband and Wife, confidering that the Bodies were laid and found fo close together; and what is more strange, these Bodies were more entire than the Mummies, wanting neither Hair on the Head, nor Eye-brows, and even the very Eye-lashes were vifible. They were clothed with the same fort of Garments which they wore in their Life time; the Lift or Wreath appeared about their Heads, which was all the Badg or Ornament they shewed of their Royal Dignity. The posture they were in was fitting, after the manner of the Indians, their Hands crossed on their Breafts, with the right hand upon the left, their Eyes cast downwards looking towards the Earth. Acoffa it feems had feen one of these Bodies, of which discoursing in the 21st Chap. of his 6th Book, saith, "That it was fo well conferred by a certain fort of bituminous matter, with which they embalmed it," "that it feemed to be alive; the Eyes were fo well counterfeited by a mixture of Gold, that they feemed lively and natural. I must consess, that my want of Curiofity did not move me to make fo narrow a fcrutiny into this matter, as I should have done, had I believed that I should have had occasion to write of them; for then I should not onely have viewed and confidered the Bodies themselves more exactly, but also have made enquiry of the Natives concerning the manner and receipt of this way of embalming; which perhaps they might rather have imparted to me, who am a Native, and one of their Relations, than to the Spaniards, who are Strangers and Aliens to them, unless perhaps the Art and Secret is loft amongft them, as many other things are, of the like nature. For my part, I could not difcover any thing of this bituminous matter, of which Acela ipeaks, though certainly there must have been some excellent Secret, without which it was impossible to have conserved Bodies, with their Flesh so plump and full as these were. This Acosta treating farther of these Bodies, in the 6th Chapter of his 6th Book, bath these Words which follow. "In the first place, faith he, they had an Art to conferve the Bodies of their Kings, and Great Men, with-" our flinking or corruption, for the frace of above two hundred Years; in which " manner the Bodies of the Inca-Kings were found at Cozco, erected in their Cha-" pels and Oratories, where they were adored; which the Marquels of Cannete, when he was Vice-roy of the Indies, caused to be removed from thence, that he might abolith the Idolatrous Worthip, which they performed towards then. and transported three or four of them to a place called the King's Town; which appeared very flyange and flupendious to the Spaniards, to fee Bodies after for many years fo firm and found as they were. These are the Words of Acolla, from whence I observe, that these Bodies had been removed to the King's Town almost twenty years before he had a fight of them; which being a hot and moith Air, was more apt to taint and corrupt Fleth, than the cold and dry Air of Cozco: and yet notwithstanding he faith. That twenty Years after their removal they were still firm and uncorrupt, as formerly, and appeared with such Life, that they wanted onely Speech to make them feem to be living. I am of opinion, that the way to conferve Bodies, is after they are dead to carry them to the Mountains of Snow, where being well dried, and congealed by the cold, and all humours confumed and digefted, then afterwards to apply that bituminous matter, which may plump up the Flesh, and render it full and solid as the Living. But I onely adventure on this conjecture, from what I have feen the Indians doe, when they have carried a piece of raw Flesh into the cold Mountains, where after it hath been well dried by the Frost, they have kept it as long as they pleased without falt, or any other prefervative; and this was the manner which the Incas used. for drying and keeping all the flesh Provisions which they carried for Food to maintain their Army. I remember that I once touched a finger of Huavna Capac, which feemed to me like a flick of wood; and fo light were these Bodies. that an Indian could eafily carry one of them in his Armes, or on his Shoulders to the Houses of Spanish Gentlemen, who defired to see them. When they carried them through the Streets, they covered them with white Linen; and the Indians falling down on their knees before them, fighed, and wept, thewing them all the reverence imaginable; and some of the Spaniards also would take off their Caps, and uncover their Heads to them, as they passed, in testimony of the respect they bore to the Bodies of Kings; with which the Indians were so pleased and overloved, that they knew not in what manner to express their thankfulness to them.

This is all that we have been able to deliver concerning the Actions of Viraco-tha in particular; the other Monuments and Sayings of this famous King are loft, for want of Letters and Learning to record them to pofterity, and have incurred the Fate of many famous Men, whose glorious Exploits and Deeds have been buried in the Graves with them.

Onely Blas Valera reports one memorable Saying of this Viracocha, which being often repeated by him, was observed by three Incas, who kept it in remembrance; as also the Sayings of some other Kings, which we shall hereafter specifie. That which this Inca delivered, had reference to the education of Children, of which he was made the more fenfible, by that Severity and Disfavour with which he was treated by his Father in the time of his Minority; his Saying was this, That Parents are oftentimes the cause of raine to their Children, when either they educate them with fuch fondness, that they never cross them in their Wills, or desires, but suffer them to all and doe what soever they please, whereby they become so corrupt in the manners of their infuncy, that Vice grows ripe with them at the Years of Manhood. Others, on the contrary are so severe and cruel to their Children, that they break the tenderness of their Spirits, and affright them from learning, discouraging them in that manner by menaces and lettures of a supercilious Pedant, that their Wits are abased, and despair of attaining to knowledge and vertue. The way is to keep an indifferent mean between both, by which Youth becomes valiant and hardy in Itar, and wife and political in the time of Peace. With which Blue Valera concludes the Reign of this Inca Viracocha.

Of the Buildings, Ornament and Furniture of the Royal Palaces.

HE Services and Ornaments of the Royal Palaces belonging to the Kings of Peru, were agreeable to the Greatness, Riches and Majesty of their Empire, with which also corresponded the Magnificence of their Court and Attendance; which, if well confidered, might equal, if not exceed the State and Grandeur of all the Kings and Emperours of the Universe. As to their Houses and Temples, Gardens and Baths, they were all built of Free Stone, rarely well polished, and so well joined together, and so close laid, that they admitted no kind of Cement; the truth is, if any were used, it was of that fort of coloured Mortar which in their Language they call Llancac Allpa, which is a fort of flimy Cement, made up like a Cream, which fo united and closed the Stones together. that no feam or crevife appeared between them; for which reason the Spaniards were of opinion, that they worked without Mortar; others faid, that they used Lime, but both are mistakes; for the Indians of Peru neither knew the manner or use of Lime, Mortar, Tile or Brick.

In many of the Royal Palaces, and Temples of the Sun, they closed up the Seams of their Building with melted Gold, or Silver, or Lead. Pedro de Cieça, a Spanish Historian, saith, That for greater Magnificence they filled the joints between the Stones with Gold or Silver, which was afterwards the cause of the total destruction of those Buildings; for the Spaniards having found these exteriour appearances of Gold, and fome other heaps of Metall within, have for farther Discovery subverted the very Foundations of those Edifices, in hopes of finding greater Treasure, which otherwise were so firmly built, as might have continued for many Ages. Pedro de Cieça confirms the fame at large, and faith farther, That the Temples of the Sun were plated with Gold, as also all the Royal Apartments. They also framed many Figures of Men and Women, of Birds of the Air, and Fifthes of the Sea; likewife of fierce Animals, fuch as Tygers, and Lions, and Bears, Foxes, Dogs and Cats, in thort, all Creatures whatfoever known amongst them, they cast and moulded into true and natural Figures, of the same shape and form of those Creatures which they represented, placing them in corners or cones of the Walls, purposely made and fitted for them.

They counterfeited the Plants and Wall-flowers fo well, that being on the Walls they feemed to be Natural: The Creatures which were shaped on the Walk they teemed to be reactions. The Creating which were maped on the Walls, fuch as Lizards, Butter-flyes, Snakes and Serpents, fome crawling up, and fome down, were fo artificially done, that they feemed Natural, and wanted nothing but Motion. The Inca commonly fate on a Stool of Maffie Gold, with they called Tiana, being about three quarters of a Yard high, without Arms or Back. and the fact formething hollow in the middle; this was fet on a large fourer Plate of Gold, which ferved for a Pedeftal to raife it. All the Veffels which were for the service of the Inca, both of the Kitchin, and of the Buttery, were all made of Gold or Silver; and these were in such quantities, that every House, or Palace belonging to the Inca, was furnished in that manner with them, that there was belonging to the men, was furnished in that the man there was no occation, when he Travelled, to remove them from one place to the dwar In these Palaces also there were Magazines, or Granaries, made of Gold and Sil. ver. which were fit to receive Corn, or Grane, but they were rather places of Space and Magnificence, than of use.

The Inca had his Palace well furnished with Bedding, and so many changes of Apparel, that having worn a Suit twice, he gave it to his Kindred, or his Servants. Their Bed-cloaths were Blankets, like our Freezes made of Goats Wool and fo foft and fine, that amongst other curiofities of that Countrey, they care ried over some of the Blankets for the Beds of Philip the Second King of Spain: these Blankets served them for Beds to lye on, as well as Coverings: But they would by no means be reconciled to Quilts, or be perfuaded to fleep upon them: perhaps because, that having seen them in the Chambers of the Spaniards, they feemed too effeminate and foft for Men, who made profession of a more hardy feemed too effeminate and foft for Men, who made profession of a more hardy life; and who had not created to themselves so many superfluous necessities as Men, who ranged both Sea and Land for Riches and Treasure. They had no occasion of Hangings for their Walls, which (as we have said) they Adomed with Plates of Gold or Silver: The Dishes of Meat provided for the Incas Table, were many, because many Incas of his Kindred were his frequent Guess, and his Servants were very numerous, being all to be sed at the charge and care of the Incas. The usual hour of Eating, for all sorts of people, was from eight, or night in the Mogning to the Eurang they surved by Daulight, making as to nine in the Morning; in the Evening they supped by Day-light, making no more than these two Meals. In Drinking they were more intemperate; for though they did not Drink during the time of their Meal, yet afterwards, when they fate to it, they drank commonly till Night. But this was a cultome amongst the Rich, and Men of Estates, and not amongst the Poor, whose poverty obliged them to a necessity of being absternious: And the common custome and practice amongst all in general, was to retire betimes to their repose, and to rise early in the Morning to follow their Employments.

Royal Commentaries.

How all the Ornaments and Curiofities, which Beautified the Royal Palaces, were made of Gold and Silver.

A LL the Royal Palaces had their Gardens, and Orchards, and places of Plea-fure, wherein the Inca might delight, and divertife himfelf; and theie Gardens were planted with Fruit-trees of the greatest beauty, with Flowers, and Odoriferous Herbs, of all forts and kinds which that Climate did produce. In refemblance of these they made Trees, and Flowers of Gold and Silver, and so retendance of there they made trees, and Flowers of Gold and Shiver, and flowers of Gold and Shiver, and committee them to the life, that they feemed to be natural: fome Trees appeared with their Fruit in the bloffom, others full grown, others ripe according to the feveral feafons of the year; they counterfeited also the Mayz, or Stalk, of the Indian Wheat, with all its Grane and Spikes: Also the Flax with its Leaves and Roots as it grows in the Fields; and every Herb and Flower was a Copy to them. to frame the like in Gold and Silver.

They fashioned likewise all forts of Beasts and Birds in Gold and Silver; namely, Conies, Rats, Lizards, Serpents, Butterflyes, Foxes, Mountain Cats, for they had no tame Cats in their Houses; and then they made Sparrows, and all forts of leffer Birds, fome flying, others perching on the Trees; in fhort, no Creature, that was either Wild, or Domestick, but was made and represented by them according to its exact and natural shape.

In many Houses they had great Cisterns of Gold in which they bathed themfelves, with Cocks and Pipes of the fame Metal for conveyance of the Water. And amongst many other pieces of State and Magnificence, they had heaps, or flacks, of Faggots and Billets made of Gold and Silver, piled up in their Storehouses, as if they had been there laid for service of the Inc.a.

The greatest part of these Riches, when the Spaniards came in, were thrown into Wells, and deep waters, by the Indians, who observing their Enemies to be covetous, and thirsty of Gold, out of Malice to them, concealed, or destroyed them in fuch unrecoverable places, where they could never be again retrieved, that so the Memory and Tradition of the hidden treasures might be designedly lost that to the Memory and Tradition of the inducen tradities inglice be definedly foltotheir posterity, because they thought it a Prophanation to have that Wealth and Substances which was Dedicated to their Kings, to be converted to the common benefit and use of Strangers. Whatsoever we have related concerning the Riches of the Ineas, is confirmed by all the Historians who write of Peru, with a more enlarged report of the prodigious Treasures. Those Writers who treat of these matters most fully, are Pedro de Cieça de Leon, and Angulin de Carate, who was Accountant General in those parts; which latter, in the 14th Chapter of his first Book, hath these words: "Gold was a Metal of great esteem amongs? "them, because the principal Vessels for service of their Kings were made there-"of, and the Jewels of his Dignity and State were set in it: Likewise they "made Offerings of it in their Temples: And the King Tigaya made "a Chair of Gold, in which he fate weighing twenty five Quilats, and which "was worth twenty five thousand Ducats, and was the same which Don Francisco
"de Picarro challehged for his own prize; because it was agreed, at the time of the Conqueft, that befides his own thare and proportion with the reft, he might claim that Jewel which he should chuse and esteem of the greatest value. Guagnacava, at the Birth of his Eldest Son, made a Chain of Gold so big and weighty, that 200 Indians having feized the Links of it to the Rings in their Ears, were scarce able to raise it from the ground: And in memory of this joy at his Birth, and of this great Chain, they gave him the Name of Guafest, "which is as much as Chain, or Cable, with the Addition of Inca, which was the Title of all belonging to the Royal Family. The which particular I purposely alledge in this place to confute the opinion of those who living in Spain, and being ignorant of the affairs of the Indies, believed that the Indians had no efteem of Gold, nor knew the value or price of it: Besides which, they had Vessels made of Gold wherein to lodge their Corn, also the Figures of Men, of Trees, and Plants, and Herbs made in Gold, as all Animals of what fort soever: which are the Words of that famous Authour in his History of Peru.

That rich Prize which fell to the lot of D. Francisco Picarro, was part of that which Atahnalpa gave for his Ransome, and which Picarro justly claimed as his due by Military Right, being General of the Army: He might moreover challenge, by agreement, the best Jewel from the great heaps of Riches: And though there were others perhaps more valuable, such as Jars, and Vesses: And though the regard that this had been the Seat of a King, and the seizure of it presaged the Dominion of the Spanish Monarchy, it seemed a prize more singular, and worthy the choice of Picarro before any other of greater estimation. In the Life of Huayna Capac, who was the last of all the Incas, we shall speak more at large of Huapha Capae, Who was the latt of all the Incas, we man speak more at large of this Gold Chain, which was a thing incredible.

What Pedro de Cieça writes of the Riches of Pern, and how the Indians made them away, and concealed them, is that which he specifies in the 21st Chapter of his Book, as follows: "If, says he, all that which was buried in Pern, and in "these Countries, were discovered, and brought to use and light, the value of it would be ineftimable, and all the possessions of the Spaniards inconsiderable in comparison of the hidden treasures: For, says he, I being at Cozco, in presence of many Persons of Quality, heard Panlo the Inca discoursing of this matter, and saying, That if all the Treasures which belonged to the Provinces and Temples, which are now loft, should be again recovered and amassed toge. ther, they would be fo.immense and great, that all the Riches which the ob-mards possess, would be no more in comparison of them, than a drop of water is to a whole Bucket: And to make the similated more clear; the Indians tais to a whole Bucket: And to make the immittude more clear; the Indians taking a handfull of Grane from a whole measure, said, Thus much the Christians have gained; and the remainder is lodged there, where neither we, nor any else is able to affign: Whatsoever this Treasure may have been, though the Spaniards had not been Masters of it, would certainly have been offered to their Devils, and Temples, and Sepulchres of their Dead; for the Indians, who neither purchase Lands, nor Houses, nor Cities with it, nor esteem it the sinews and nerves of War, do onely Adorn themselves with it, being alive, and bury it with them in their Graves, being dead: Howfoever, in my opinion, it was our duty to have advifed the Indians of these Errours, and to have made it our business to instruct them in the knowledge of the Gospel, and our Holy Faith, rather than our profession and whole concernment, to fill our Purses, and en-"rich our Coffers: These are the Words of Pedro de Gieça, in the 21st Chapter of his Book, which I have copied Verbatim from thence. This Inca, which was called Paulo, or by them Paullu, of whom all the Spanish Historians make mention, was one of the many Sons of Huayna Capac, being a Man of Courage, who took the King of Spain's fide in his Wars against the Spaniards; at his Baptism he took the Name of Christopher Paulla, to whom my Master Garcitasso at this Dapthim ne took the Name of Christopher Paulla, to whom my Master Garcitasso de la Vega was Godfather, as also to his Brother Titu Aqui, who afterwards was Baptized by the Name of Philip, in respect to Philip the Second, then Prince of Spain; I was well acquainted with them both, as also with their Mother called Annas, though the two Sons died foon afterwards.

Lopes de Gomara writing of the Riches of the Kings of Pern, in the 122d Chapter of his Book, hath these very words: "All the Utensils of Inca's House, "Table and Kitchin, were all of Gold and Silver, at least of Silver and Copper. In the with-drawing Rooms and Antichambers, were Statues of Gold cast in the form of Giants, and the Figures of all kinds of Animals in a like large proportion, as also Trees and Herbs, Fishes of the Sea, and fresh Waters of all forts, which their Kingdom produced: they had also Ropes and Chains, Baskets and Hampers of Gold and Silver, and Faggors of Gold, piled up in Stacks, as if they were intended for sewel: In short, there was no Figure of any Creatine in the whole Kingdom, which they did not imitate, and represent in Gold: They report also that the Incas had a Garden situated in an Island near to Puna, where being desirous to enjoy the Air of the Sea, they passed over to divertise, and recreate themselves 3 and therein were Trees, and Plants, and Flowers made

" all of Gold and Silver, with rare Art and Invention: On the other fide of this " Island were vast heaps of Gold and Silver laid up, with intention to carry it to Cozee; that it might be worked there; all which was loft by the Death of "Gualcar: For the Indians observing that the Spaniards thirsted after Gold, and " transported all into Spain, that they could seize, and lay their hands upon; they " made it away, and concealed as much of it as they were able. Thus far are the Words of Lopez de Gomera. As to the Garden, which he says, the Kings of Peru had near Puna, in which all Creatures were represented in Gold and Silver; he particularly specifies that place, because that when the Spaniards came in, it was the onely Garden which continued in its Beauty and Ornaments; for the Indians, in despight of their Enemies, destroyed all the rest, and consounded the Riches of them in fuch manner, as are never to be recovered; in which Relation this Authour, and all other Spanish Historians, do agree. That infinite treasure of Gold and Silver, which, he says, was heaped up with intention to be carried to Cosco, and there worked, was the surplusage of what remained, after all the Royal Palaces were surnished, and adorned in the manner we have before related. This may not feem incredible to those who have accounted and observed those valt and immense quantities of Gold and Silver, which have been transported from my Countrey into Spain, there having paffed over the Bar of St. Lucar, in the Year 1,995, in the space of eight Months, onely five and thirty Millions in Gold and Silver.

CHAP. III.

Of the Servants of the Court, and those who carried the King's Chair, or Sedan.

THE Servants defined for the Services of the Court were many in number, figh as Sweepers. Carriers of Water, and Clearest of Water. fuch as Sweepers, Carriers of Water, and Cleavers of Wood, Cooks. Butlers, Porters, Keepers of the Ward-rope, and of the Jewels, Gardiners and Stewards of the Houshold; in short, there were as many Officers and Servants retained in this Court, as in the most magnificent and splendid Palaces of our Kings, or Emperours: But herein there was fomething different from our Courts; for here particular Men had not the charge of an Office committed to them; but it was the care, or incumbence of two or three Provinces to provide fufficient Men for every Office, such as were faithfull, diligent and dexterous for the place; and fuch a number of them, as that they might take their turns by Days, or Weeks, or Months, as often as they should think fit to exchange them. This being part of the Tribute which was exacted from every Province, great care was taken in the choice of able Men; for that the default, or crime, of every particular person, reflected on the whole Province, who made themselves answerable for his good behaviour, and were accordingly punished with such severity, as all offences against the Royal Majesty did require. And fince we have spoken of Hewers of Wood, we must not understand, as if these were sent into the Mountains to cut and fell Trees; but fuch Timber or Wood as was brought by the Vaffals in payment of their Tribute, was received by these Officers, and by them and their Asfiltants laid up, and flowed in the Houles for that purpole: The like may we understand of all other Offices, wherein there was no servile labour appointed; it being a gentile employment to ferve the Inca in fuch capacity, and to be near his Royal Person, which was the greatest honour and happiness that any one could

City of Cozco, and were the Generation or Children of those Fathers whom the first Inca, Manco Capac, sent abroad to instruct and reduce the wild Salvages of those times to a Humane manner of living; and to whom, as a particular note and savour of distinction from the more rude and uncivilized Nations, he bestowed the Honour and Title of Incas, with privilege to wear the Habit and Wreath belonging to the Royal Person. As we have declared at the beginning of this History.

The Sedan-men that were appointed to carry the Inca in his Chair of Gold upon their Shoulders, were always chosen out of two Provinces, which have the same Name, and border one upon the other, being both called Rucana; but for distinction sake, one was called Haum Rucana, or Rucana Major: the Inhabitant thereof are a strong, nervous people, healthy and well-complexioned, and about fifteen thousand Inhabitants in number. These people had a custome to train up the Young Men at about twenty years of Age to carry Chairs steady, and without tottering or stumbling; for in case any Man should be so unfortunate as to fall, or stumble, in carrying the Inca, the Chief or Cape of these Sedan-men was obliged to punish him with some notorious disgrace, and cashiere him from farther service of the Inca; as is practised also in Spainy; and as a certain Historian reports, the missortune of such a failure was punished with Death. This Service was the Tribute which this people paid the Inca; who being many in number, took their turns, so that the attendance was the less grievous; and in regard it was a singular honour to carry the Inca; Person, his weight seemed no burthen; of which so much care was taken, that lest by mischance any of the Chair-men should stumble, or stall, there were twenty four or twenty five Men attending on each fide ready to catch the seat, and prevent the fall.

The Provision of Victuals for the Court, especially of Flesh, was very great, because that all those of the Royal Family residing in the City, were supplied out of the King's Kitchin: Howsever, there was no great consumption of Bread made of Mayz, because no other provision was made thereof, than what was sufficient for the immediate Attendants in the Family; for all Houses and Families had their separate Allowances of Bread laid up in their Store-houses, as we have before mentioned. All forts of Game, such as Deer, Stags, Wild Goats, and the like, were not ordinarily killed for common provision of the Court, or the Tables of the Caracas, or Lords, but were referved for Sports and Hunting, which they called Chacas; and the Flesh, and Wool, and Skins of such Game as was taken, was afterwards distributed amongst the Poor and Rich: of which we thall treat in a particular Chapter.

The Drink spent in the Court of the Inca was great; for in regard that their courtesse was such, as to make every one drink that came thither; whether they were Curacus, or Commoners, or came upon business, or on visits, or complements; there was no set or established Allowance for it, but the entertainment was free without measure or account, and the quantity consumed was almost incredible.

CHAP. IV.

Of the great Halls, and Rooms of State, and other things belonging to the Court.

'N many of the King's Palaces were long and spatious Galleries, of about two hundred paces in length, and about fifty or fixty in breadth, wherein they often danced and celebrated their Feafts at those seasons of the year, when the Rains and bad weather incommoded them in the open Air. I remember that in Cocco I saw four of these Galleries, which when I was a Child, were still in being, and not ruined: One of them was in Amarucanha Street, where Hernando Picarro then lived, and is now the Jesuits College: The other was in Cassana Street, but now built and converted into Shops, the Rent of which belonged to my School-fellow John de Cillorico: Another was in Colleampata Alley, where the Inca Paully, and his Son Don Carlos, who also was my School-fellow, had a Rent in Houses: This Gallery was the least of all the four, and the biggest was that of Callana, being capable to receive three thousand persons. It is wonderfull to consider, where it was possible for them to find Timbers so long and square, as were fit for the Roofs of fuch Edifices. The fourth Gallery is now turned into were nt for the Roots of inch Ediffices. The fourth Gallery is now turned into the Cathedral Church. One thing is remarkable, that the Indians of Peru in building their Houtes, did never raife one Story above another, nor did they join one Room to another, but always left some space or distance of one Chamber from the other, and perhaps a whole Court-Yard, or Quadrangle, between, unless sometimes to their large Halls they built at the corners some Closets, or withdrawing Rooms, for better convenience; and in the Divisions they made of their feveral Offices, they raifed Walls of Apartment to keep them private one from the other. It is farther also observable, that when they had built the sour Walls of Stone or Brick for a House or Chamber, they erected Pillars, or Posts, in the middle of it, for support of the Roof; for they knew not how to cross their Beams, or Rafters, or how to fasten them with Nails, or Wooden Pins, but laid their Timbers loofe upon the Walls, fastning them onely to each other with Spart, or Cords made of Straw, or Rufles, as strong as our Hempen Ropes. These main Beams they crossed with Rasters, fastning them one to the other; on which they laid a covering of Straw so thick, that the Thatch was a Yard deep, extending its Eves above a Yard over the Walls, so as to be a Pend-house to them to preferve them from the Rain. I remember that in the Vally of Yucay I once faw one of these large Rooms, which was about seventy Foot square, covered in form of a Pyramid; the Spire of which was twelve Rod high, though the Walls were not above three, having two little Chambers on each fide, This Building was not burnt by the Indians, when they made their general Infurrection against the Spaniards; for though they destroyed many other Houses of pleasure in that Vally, the Ruines of which I have feen; yet they foared this Structure out of respect to their mean, who had frequented this place, being a large and open Square, or Quadrangle, which terved for a wide and spatious Theatre whereon to represent their shows and sports at the times of their principal Festivals.

Besides the Walls of Stone, they made also Walls of Clay, which they sorted in Clay, which they sorted in Clay which they s

Befides the Walls of Stone, they made also Walls of Clay, which they formed in Cases or Moulds, for that purpose, mixing the Clay with Straw for beter binding. The Moulds they made as little, or as large as they pleased in measure, or proportion to the Wall; the shortest were about a Yard long, and about the fixth part of a Yard broad, and of a like thickness; which, after they had well dried in the Sun, they laid them one upon another in order; and after that they had I ain two or three Years under covering from the Sun, and the Water, so that they were fully dried; they then used them in their Buildings, as we do our Bricks, cementing them with the same Clay, well tempered, and mixed with

They knew not how to make Mud-Walls, nor did the Spaniards use other than Clay, in making their Sun-burnt Bricks. In case any of these great Houses which we have mentioned should by any accident have been burnt, they did not build again upon the same Walls, because, as they said, the Straw which strengthened and bound the Clay, and made it firm, and folid, being consumed by the fire, the Wall must necessarily be weakned, and the Clay become loose; and unable to bear the weight of the roof and covering which was laid upon it; but this was but an erroneous conceit of theirs, for I have seen and observed several of the Walls of those Houses, which have been burnt, that have remained firm and so lid as before.

So foon as the King happened to dye, they prefently locked the door of the Chamber where he did ufually fleep, with all the Omaments and Riches of Gold and Silver, which furnished it, or were found therein at the time of his death; and this Chamber was in this manner kept always locked, that none should enter; for that place being ever afterwards eftermed facred, was not to be prophaned by the Feet of any; onely the room was without-fide kept and maintained in good repair. The like Ceremony was observed in the Chambers of all the other Royal Palaces, where the Inca had reposed and slept, though it had been but the space of one night, as he travelled, or in a journey where he passed: And then immediately they fell to building other Chambers for the living Successiour, in place of the living but he had been such that the death of the late King.

thatery they left to buttening other Chambers for the living Saccerious, in plate of those which had been flut up at the death of the late King.

All the Veffels and Services of Gold and Silver, which belonged to the former linea, fuch as Cups, Jarres, or Goblets of Gold, in which he drank, as also all the Dishes and Plates of his Kitchin, with Cloths, and Jewels, appertaining to his Person, were all buried and interred in the same Grave with him; which absurdity proceeded from an opinion they had, that the Inea would have occasion of such Utensils and Services in the next World. All the other Ornaments of Majesty and State which belonged to the Chambers, Gardens, Baths, and the like, were the Inheritance of the Succession:

All the Wood and Water which was confumed in the Inca's Court at Cozo, was brought thither by the People of the four Divifions, (called Tavanninfun) being the Inhabitants neareft adjacent to the City, that is within fifteei or twenty Leagues about. The Water which they ufed for their beverage, (which in their Language they call Aoa) was a fort of heavy water, and fomething brackilh; and indeed they did not much defire a fweet and light Water, for they were of opinion it made them lean, and would not flick by the ribs, but eafily corrupted in the Stomach; for this reafon the Indians not being curious in their Waters, did not delight in fountains, or clear Springs; nor indeed was there any good Water near the City of Cozo. When my Father, after the War of Francifeo Hermander, in the Year 1555, and ---56, was Governour of the City, they then brought their Water from Ticatica, which water was excellent good, arifing about a quarter of a League from the Town, to the chief Market-place; from whence, as I hear, they have now turned it by a Conduit pipe, to the Square of St. Francifeo; and inflead thereof they have brought another Fountain to that place, of exquilite Water, running with a plentifull ftream.

Of the manner how they Interred their Kings; and that the Obsequies and Rites of Burial continued for the space of a whole Year.

THE Rites of Burial which they performed for their Kings were folemn, and of long continuance. In the first place they embalmed their Bodies with fuch rare Art, that (as we have said before) in the year 1559, they were so firm and plump, that they seemed to be living Flesh. Their Bowels were interred in a Temple, which was situated in the Countrey, called Tumpu, upon the Banks of a River, below Tucay, about five Leagues distant from the City of Coxco, where were many stately Edifices of Stone. Of which Pedro de Cieça speaking in the 94th Chapter of his Book, saith that it was reported for certain, how that in some places of the Palace, or Temple of the Sun, the Stones were joined or cramped with melted Gold, which with the cement they used, were well fixed and consolidated together.

When the Inca, or some principal Curaca dyed, the Servants, who were his greatest Favourites, and the Wives, that were the most beloved by him, did either kill themselves, or offer themselves to be buried alive in the Tomb of their Masters, that so they might accompany them into the other World, and renew their immortal Services in the other Life, which, as their Religion taught them, was a corporeal, and not a spiritual Being; whereby it may appear, that what some Historians write relating to this matter; namely, that they killed the Servants after the death of their Masters, is a mistake; for that would have been a piece of Tyranny, and Inhumanity, above the capacity of humane Nature; for under this pretence one Man might lawfully kill another, and remove him out of the way who was hatefull to him, or stood in opposition to his Designs or Interest. The truth is, they needed no Law or compulsion to enforce them to follow the Fate of their Master; for when he was dead, his Servants crouded so fast after him, desiring death, that the Magistrates were forced sometimes to interpose with their Authority, and persuade them, that for the present their Master had no need of more attendance, but that in due time, when they naturally yielded to their own Mortality, it might then be seasonable enough for them to repair to their Services and Offices in the other World.

The Bodies of their Kings, after they were embalmed, were feated before the Image of the Sun, in the Temple at Cozco, to whom they offered Sacrifices, as to Demons, or Men of Divine Race. For the first month after the death of the Mea, the whole City bewailed their loss with loud cries and lamentations, and every Parish, or quarter of the Town, went out in their several Divisions into the fields, carrying the Trophies of the Inca, his Banners, and Arms, and Garments, and whatsoever was to be buried in the grave with his Bowels; with their sighs and lamentations they mentioned and repeated the mighty Acts that he had done in the Wars, and the good Acts of Charity and Beneficence that he had shewed to them and their Neighbourhood. After the end of the first month, they then commemorated the Death of their Inca, at the Full and New of the Moon, and of continued till the end of the first Year, when they concluded the solemnity with full pomp and state, appointing Men and Women practised in the Art of Cries and Lamentations, who, like excellent Tragedians, acted their parts of fortow in the most formal and passionate manner imaginable, singing the Acts of the dead King in forrowfull Tones and Accents. What we have said hitherto, was the part onely of the Commonalty, besides which the Court and Nobility Personned the Obsequies with as much difference to those of the people, as there was of Eminence in their condition, and of Wealth and Politeness in the manner

What was practifed in the City of this kind was also imitated in the Countries the respective Curacas stirring up the people to demonstrate by their outward ge. three and actions, their inward forrow and paffion for the death of their lines With these Cries and Lamentations they went to visit all the places within their Province, where at any time their Inca had pitched his Camp, or made his abode or residence, though but for a night; and there they all with loud Lamentations repeated the Favours, and Honours, and Benefits that he had performed for them in that place. And thus much shall serve to have said touching the Funeral of the Incas, in imitation of which, fomething of this nature was performed in honour of their Caciques, of which I remember to have feen fome passages in the time of my infant Years; for in the Province of the Quechnas, I once faw a mal. titude of people gathered in a field, to lament the Death of a Cacique, Carrying his Garments upon Poles, in fashion of Banners, or Ensignes; my curiosity prompted me to ask them what all that noise and tumuli meant; to which they answe red me, that it was the Funeral Lamentation of Huamam-pallpa, for fo they called the deceased Cacique.

$\mathbf{V}$ I. CHAP.

Of the General and Solemn Huntings which the Kings made in all parts of their Kingdom.

THE Kings of Peru enjoyed, with their other parts of Greatness and State, certain days appointed for Solemn and General Huntings, called in their Tongue Chacu. And herein it is to be observed, that all forts of Game were forbidden to be killed, unless Partridges, Pidgeons, Doves, or lesser Birds, for the Service and Table onely of the Incas, who were Governours, or of the Curacas; nor was thus much permitted neither, but under a limited quantity, and by command and order also of the Justice.

This prohibition was observed under the same penalties that all other observances of their Law were enjoined, and herein they were rigorous, and fevere, lest Men betaking themselves to the pleasure of the Field, should delight in a continued course of sports, and so neglect the necessary provisions and maintenance of their Families.

By which strict restraint the Game both of Birds and Beasts was so common, and in abundance, and tame, that they entred even into their Houses; where though they could not kill them, yet howsoever they might affright and drive them out of their Fields and Pastures; for that though the Inca was Master of the Game, yet he loved his Subjects better than to have them prejudiced by Laws which were made for the good, and not for the detriment of his People.

At a certain feason of the Year, after breeding-time was over, the Inca appointed a place for Hunting, where either his own pleasure directed, or where was most convenient for his Affairs, either of War or Peace; and there he appointed 20 or 30000 Indians to encompass all that space of Land, which was defigned for the Hunt; half of whom taking to the Right-hand, and the other half to the Left, were to beat twenty or thirty Leagues round, by the sides of Rivers and brooks and churchy or thirty Leagues round, by the sides of Rivers and brooks and churchy or thirty Leagues round. yers, and Brooks, and through woody and mountainous places, wherefoever the limits and bounds of the chase did extend, but by no means were they to touch or encroach on other Lands, which were laid out for the Hunt of the following year. Thus they went beating and peeping into every bush, and when they faw or met any game, they hooped and hollowed to give notice thereof to their Companions, and fo marched along till they came fo to straiten the beats on all fides with a narrow compass, that they could come and take them up with

BOOK VI.

What fierce Beafts they encountred, as they beat the Woods and Mountains : fuch as Lions. Bears, Foxes, Mountain-Cats, which they call Ozcollo, as also Serpents and venomous Creatures they killed before they came within the Field. or Gircle of their Hunting. We make no mention here of Tygers, because there were none in those Countries, but onely in the vast and horrid Mountains of Antis. What number of Game they might kill at fuch a Hunting, is uncertain. that happening according to the Countrey, and their fortune; for fometimes they killed twenty, thirty or forty thousand head of Beasts, such as Stags, Fallow Deer. the Huanacu which yields a fort of course Wool, and the Vicuna, which is a Goat with very fine Wool; with many other Creatures, which afforded not onely profit, but foort and pastime in the taking of them. Such in those times was the abundance of their Game; but now it is faid, that fuch havock hath been made by the Guns which the Spaniards use, that there is scarce a Huanacus, or Vicuna to be found; but what are affrighted into the Mountains, and inacceffible places. where no path or way can be made.

All the Game being thus furrounded and encompassed, they took up with their hands. The Female Deer, whether red or fallow, they fuffered to escape, because they had no Wool, but old and barren Does they killed: they let go also as many Males as were thought necessary to serve the Females, and all the telt they killed, and divided their Fleth amongst the Commonalty, likewise having shorn the Huanacus and the Vicuna, they let them escape, keeping an exact account of all these wild Cattel, as if they had been tame Flocks, noting them in their Quipus, which is their Book of Register, distinguishing the Males from their Females in exact and orderly manner. They likewise noted the Number of the Beafts they killed, as well fuch as were fierce and hurtfull, as those that were tame and ufefull, that so knowing the direct Numbers that remained, they might the better fee at their next Hunting feafon, how their stock was multiplied

The course Wool of the Huanacus was distributed amongst the common people; and that of the Vicuna, because it was very fine, was reserved for the Inca, who divided it also amongst the Incas of his Kindred: For besides them, no other upon pain of Death might prefume to wear it, unless in favour; some part thereof was given to a particular Curaca, who upon no other terms could pretend to that honour and privilege. The Fleth of the Humacus and Vicuma was distributed amongst the common people, with whom the Curaeas would vouchsafe to take some part, as also of the Venison; not that they wanted it, but to shew their compliance and familiarity with the people; and that they who laboured in the Hunting, did not form to receive their share of the prey.

These general and solemn Huntings were appointed every fourth Year in the respective Divisions; for the Indians were of opinion, that in such time the Wool of the Vicuna would be at its full growth, and that the wild Cattel would have time to increase; and would be less affrighted at the approach of Men, than if they were every year teased and hunted: Howloever, they hunted in one place or other every year; but with tuch method and order, that the Provinces being divided into four parts, each division took its turn but once in four years.

In this orderly manner and method the Incas appointed the times of Hunting, as well for the pleature and delight, as for the profit of his people; it being an opinion amongst them, that the Pachacamae, or the God and Creatour of all things, had commanded that the fame care should be taken of the wild, as of the tame Flocks; and that they were to destroy the hurtfull and devouring Beasts, as they were to cut and root out noxious Weeds or Herbs out of their Corn, and Fields that were fown. And fince we observe the order which these Incas directed in their very Huntings, which they called Chacu; how can we doubt, but that thefe people maintained the like in matters of Government, and things of greater importance, and were not so brutish and salvage as the World hath figured them. It is farther to be noted, that the Bezar-stone brought from that Countrey, (in the goodness whereof there is great difference) was taken from some of those wild cattel, which we have before mentioned.

then, but to infect and overtee the just and due difficultion of the veniion taken in Hunting amongst the common people; and see that those also who were old, or fick, or infirm, should have their share and just proportion.

Unless it were the Collin, the Commonalty in general were so poor in Cattel, that they seldom or never eat Flesh, but what was dispensed to them by the Charity and Beneficence of their Curacus, sunless former times they killed a few tame Conies which they kept and fed in their Houses, called by them Coy: So that the Inca, and the Curacas, took great care, that an equal division should be made a-mongst the Commonalty of all the Venison which was taken in Hunting: the which Fleth they cut out into large flices, (called Charqui) and then dried them in fuch manner, that they were not fubject to corrupt; and being abftenious and frugal in their diet, their provision served them for the whole year round, until the next feafon of Hunting returned again.

In dreffing their Meat, they used all forts of Herbs, whether fweet, or bitter, or fower, or of any quality, but fuch as were poisonous or hurtfull: The bitter Herbs they did usually boil in two or three several Waters, and then dried them in the Sun, and used them at those seasons when green were not to be procured. And fo fond they were of green Herbs, that they would eat the Duck-weed which grows in Ponds; which after they had well washed and dried, they would eat in the feation, as alfo Herbs raw or crude, fuch as Lettuce and Radithes, which were efteemed fubfrantial Diffies, rather than Salads, or Sauces to provoke an appetite.

CHAP. VII.

Of the Posts, and the Dispatches which they carried.

THE Posts, or Carriers, who were intrusted with the charge of carrying the King's Orders and Commands were called Chasqui; and these also brought the News and Advices to the Court from the most remote Provinces: In settlement of which Pofts, they ordained and appointed four or fix nimble Indian Boys to be laid at the end of every quarter of a League, and lodged under a Stall like that of our Centinels, to defend them from the Sun and Rain. These had the that of our Centineis, to defend them from the Sun and Rain. These had the charge of carrying the Message from one Post to another, and to take their turns in running; and also of fallying out to see or discover at a distance the coming of a Post, that so they might be ready to take his message without loss of time. And these Stalls, or Lodges, were raised something high, and placed with that advantage, that they might be seen at a distance, and not farther than a quarter of a League one from the other; being so much as they said, a Man may be able to true in full breast and strength. able to run in full breath and strength.

able to run in full breath and strength.

The word Chasqui signifies changing, or giving, or taking, for they gave and received their Messages interchangeably one from the other. They were not called Guehr, for that signifies a Message, and, as they used it, an Ambassadour, whom they sent to Sovereign Lords and Princes. The Advices which the Chasqui carried were by word of mouth, for the Indians did not understand Letters: Wherefore the Messages were ordered, and disposed in such thore and concile words, as were easily apprehended and remembred. He that brought the Message, before he came to the Lodge, cried loud, and called out as he ran to give warning of his coming, as our Posts wind their Horn to give notice at the Stage of their near approach; and when he was come, he then delivered his Message to the other Post-boy, repeating the words two or three times, untill he had rightly rightly understood them, and taken the words to perfectly, as to be guilty of no

If there were any other Meffages, they were committed to writing, and not to word of mouth: Writing, I mean, not fuch as we deliver and express in Letters, but in Knots made up in different threads of various colours, which ferved for cyphers, which were well understood by the Inca and his Governours: For by these Knots and Colours of thread, they specified what number of Souldiers, what Garments, what Provisions, and what other necessaries were to be surnished, and put into a readiness for the service of the Army. These knotted threads which the Indians called Quipn, were the Cyphers which they used in all their Advices, and the Figures in their Accounts: of which we shall treat more at large in the following Chapter. But as to these Chasqui, or Post-boys, when at any time any extraordinary business was in action, they encreased them often to gen and quick; if at any time an extraordinary occasion happened, they gave their Signal in the day-time to them by making a finoak, and in the night-time by the flame of a Beacon; which being discovered at a distance, it served as a warning to every Stage to have their Posts in a readiness, and to watch night and day for the coming of this Meffage. But there Beacons were never fired but on some great occasion of Rebellion, or Infurrection of a Province, that for the news of it might speedily arrive at Court in the space of two or three hours, though it happen five or fix hundred Leagues from thence; the which ferved to give an Alla-rum untill fuch time as the particulars of the News arrived with greater certainty. And this was the Office and Use of the Chasqui.

CHAP. VIII.

That they made their Reckonings and Accounts by Threads and Knots; and that the Accountants were Men of great faith and integrity.

Oipu fignifies as much as Knots, and fometimes Accounts; in ordering of which the Indians Dyed their Threads with divers colours; fome were of one colour onely, fome of two, others of three, or more; which, with the mixed colours, were of divers and various fignifications. These strings were twisted of three or four Threads, and about three quarters of a Yard in length; all which they filed on another firing in falhion of a Fringe. And by these colours they understood the number and meaning of every particular: By the yellow they signified Gold, by the white Silver, by the red Souldiers and Armies, and so of other things diftinguished by their colours.

But as for other things which could not be so distinguished by Colours, they described them by their order and degrees of quality and goodness: For as we in Spain take every thing in their degrees of comparison, so they having occasion to mention Corn, do first nominate Wheat, then Barly, then Pease and Pulse, exc. So when they contribute the contribute of the contrib when they gave an account of Arms; the first mentioned were the most Noble, fuch as Lances, next Darts, then Bows and Arrows, Pole-axes and Hatchets, and fo forward. So when they had occasion to number the people and several Families: The first were Aged Men of seventy years and upwards, then Men of sifty, and the several families are the seventy years and upwards, then Men of sifty, and the several families are the several families. and for of feventy, then of forty; and fo from ten to ten, until they came to fucking Children: The which Order also was kept in numbring their Women.

Then amongst these grosser strings, there were others which were more short, and slender adjoining to them; and these were Exceptions to the other more general Rules: for in the account made of Men and Women married, there was another string annexed to it, which fignified Widows, and Widowers of such an age; all which accounts ferved onely for one Year.

These Knots expressed numbers in their several orders, as by units, tens, hundreds, thousands, tens of thousands, but seldom went so far as to hundreds of thousands, but in case they should have had occasion to have arrien to so great a number, no doubt but their Language, which is full and copious, would have found words sufficient to express that fum, and the greatest number to which Arithmetick could arrive. All which Accounts were made by Knots on ftrings one underneath the other, and knit on a cord, as the knots are on the Girdle of

At the top of the cord the greatest number was placed, as the tens of thousands. under that flood the thousands, and last of all was the place of the units; all which were placed directly with exactness one under the other, as our good Accounwere placed directly with exactness one under the other, as our good Accountants, well skilled in the Art of Cyphering, are used to set and place their figures. The Indians who kept the Quipus, or to whose charge the keeping of Accounts was committed, were called Quipumann, and were esteemed Men of good reputation, and chosen for that Service, on good assurance and proof of their fidelity and honesty; and though the supplicity of those people in that Age was without any mixture of malice, and that the strictness of the government admitted out any mixture of mance, and that the fifteeness of the government admittee on cheats, or frauds on any fcore whatfoever, yet notwithflanding great care was taken to chufe Men for this work of approved Ability, and of a tried and experienced Faithfulness and Probity. For indeed Offices were never amongst them chosen for favour, nor bought, or fold, because that Money was not current amongst them; but it was Vertue and Merit onely which purchased a Trust and Office: And though buying and felling was not known to them, yet it was ordinary for them to truck or barter their provisions of Food one for the other; but nothing else either of Garments, Houles, or Inheritance.

The Quipucanasus, or Accountants, being honeft and faithfull, (as we have faid) ferved in the nature of Registers, of which there were four at least appointed for every Lineage, or People, how little foever it were; and in case the Country was great, they entertained twenty or thirty; for though one Accountant might have served the turn, yet to avoid all mistakes and frauds, they judged it requi-fite to constitute many in an Office of such importance.

CHAP. IX.

What it was that they fet down and placed in their Accounts; and how they understood them.

A I.L the Tribute that was yearly payable to the Inca, was paffed to account, as also what every Family, according to their degrees, and qualities, were to pay. The people likewise which went to the War were numbred; and Bills of Mortality were kept of as many as dyed, and were born, or miscarried by any accident; which were all noted in the months wherein they happened. In thort, they noted every thing that could fall under Numeration, as how many Battels or Skirmishes were fought, how many Ambassadours had been sent to the Inca, and how many Answers the King had been pleafed to return thereunto. But what the fublilance of those Embaffies was, or what were the particulars of the King's Discourse, or what occurrences passed in way of History, were too various to be expressed by the barrenness of their Knots, which served onely for numbers, but not for words, wherefore to supply this defect they framed certain historical Hieroglyphicks, which served for Monuments, in an obscure manner, of what had occurred in War and Peace; as also of Embassies from foreign Princes, and the feveral Negotiations with them; which Work was the Office of the Quinnmous, who made fome floor and concile Memoir, leaving the reft to the remembrance of the Age, who by tradition conferved the fame to fucceeding Generations: And herein every Province was particularly attent, and carefull to contions: And herein every Province was particularly attent, and careful to conferre the Hiftory of its own Countrey; for on that, and on the Actions of their Ancestours, they much esteemed and valued themselves. The Amantas, or Philosophers, for a farther help to History, did compose certain Novels, or Fa-1 bles, mixed with true passages, which they made so familiar, and easie to the capacity of Children, and common People, that they attentively hearkened to them, and were so pleased with them, that recounting them one to the other in common Discourse, and way of Conversation, they so inculcated them into the minds of the hearers, that the Tale becoming common, was transferred from one Generation to another. The Poets likewise, whom they call Haravicin, were great Conservators of History; for they in verse, and in thort and compendious Sentences couched the Actions of their King, fuch as the Embaffies he received. the Answers he gave, the Battels he won, and the Triumphs he celebrated; and the Antwers he gave, the batters he won, and the Triumphs he cerebrated; and that wherein the Quipus, and the Amantus came fhort, was all fupplied by the fancy of Poets, whole Verfes ferved for Sonnets, and Ballads, which they fang at their Festivals, and on the days of Triumph. All which notwithstanding were faint Representations and imperfect Conservatories of true History, in comparison of the Reports we deliver to faithfull Writings and Letters, which perpetuare of the Reports we deriver to faithful withing and Letters, which perpetuate the memory of Actions to all Ages. Howfoever we may here observe the ingenuity of that people, who assayed and offered at something like our Letters, though it were by Knots, and Novels, and Hieroglyphicks, and Verses; such is the desire of Mankind to perpetuate their Beings in the memory and minds of all Ages.

When any Curaca, or Noble Person, defired to know, and be informed of things passed, and matters occurring in their Provinces, they presently sent to the Quipucamayus to be fatisfied in their demands; and they, or their Under-Officers, who kept the Registers, making search into their Knots and Cyphers, made such Answers as appeared in their Register.

By the fame Rule, they answered the Enquiries made of Laws, and Rites, and Ceremonies, which were expressed by the colour of their Knots; and of what punishment was inflicted for such and such Crimes.

By the same Rule also they were put in mind of the Sacrifices and Ceremonies which were to be performed at the feveral Festivals, celebrated in honour of the Sun; with what provision was made for Orphans, and Widows, and Poor, and Travellers, and of all other matters which were committed to the cultody of Tradition: For these several Knots ferved to put them in mind of all particulars, which they defired to have remembred; for as we by the number Ten remember the ten Commandments, and by other numbers call to mind the Sacraments, good Works, and Acts of Mercy, which we learn in our Catechism, so these Indians, by these Knots, and Strings, and Colours, remembred more perfectly what their Fathers had delivered to them by Tradition; which they regarded with respect and reverence due to the sacred Conservatories of that Law, and Idolatrous Religion, which they professed; for without this help, having no Writings, they would certainly have been as ignorant of their own History, as the Spaniards themselves are, or any other Strangers, or Aliens. The knowledge which I had of their Quipus, and Knots, I gained by the means of some Indians, who served my Father, and of certain Caracas, who came every Midsummer and Christmas to the City, to pay their Tribute; and these Curacus desired my Mother that she would prevail with me faithfully to examine their Accounts, and read the Acquittances which the Spaniards had given them, for they were jealous of their actings, and reposed much more confidence in me, than in them; which when I had perufed, and read to them, they compared them with their Knots, and finding them to agree, they remained fatisfied. 'And by this means I came to have some knowledge in their way of Accounts.

THE Inca Viracocha being dead, Pachaentee, his legitimate Son and Heir, fucceeded in the Empire, and having folemnly performed the funeral Rites of his Father, he refided for three Years at his Court, attending to the due adminifiration of his Government. Afterwards he took a progress into all parts of his Dominions, passing orderly from one Province to another; and though the pre-Dominions, paffing orderly from one Province to another; and though the prefence of the Inca might feem of no moment, in regard the Lords, and Governous were fo diligent, and faithfull to their truft, that the Inca, in all the way he travelled, received no complaints from the people of Aggrievances and Opprefions, laid illegally on them by their Rulers; for the frequent appearance of the Inca at certain times, did fo overawe the Ministers, that they were fearfull to act any thing which was not permitted to them by Law or Equity. Moreover the appearance of the Inca personally before his Subjects, gave them the opportunity to prefer their Petitions, and offer their Complaints by way of immediate Address, which was much more beneficial to the Subjects, than to have their Aggrievance and because he a bird hand which have foreous or friendship right diffusions. made known by a third hand, which by favour or friendship might disguise the laments, and make Injustices appear less than they were, to the prejudice of the Plaintiffs; and herein fuch care was taken, that never any people, who lived by the mere Light of Nature, and Law of Reason, did ever surpass the equitable proceedings of the Incas; which indifferency, and unbiassed judgment, gained them that love of their people, that even to this day, and to many future Ages, will their Memory be sweet and pretious. At the end of three Years this Incareturned again to his City, and left he should seem to spend all his time in Peace and Repose, he judged it convenient to attend at length unto military Exercise, and gain the Reputation of a Souldier by War, as well as of a civil and just Governour in the time of Peace; to this end he raised an Army of thirty thousand Men, with which together with his Brother Capac Tupangni, a valiant Man, and worthy of that name, he marched through all the Division of Chinchasury, untill he came to Villea, which was the utmost extent on that side of their Con-

There he remained himself, whilst he sent his Brother with an Army well surnished with all provisions of War, into the Province called Sausa, which the Spamiards corruptly call Xanxa, which is a most pleasant Countrey, containing about thirty thousand inhabitants, all of the same Lineage and Name of Huanca. They boasted themselves to be descended from one Man, and one Woman, which they boalted themletves to be detected from one man, and one woman, which they fay had their Original from a Fountain; they were a fort of fierce and warlike Pople, fleaing those whom they took in the Wars, the Skins of which they filled with Ashes, and hanged them up in their Temples, for Trophies of their Victories; with the Skins of some they made Drums, being of opinion, that the sound of them would terrifie and affright their Enemies. These though they were a small people, yet had well strengthened and fortified themselves, for being all some being the property of the strength of the of one Nation, they united their Interests to encroach on the Lands and Territories of their Neighbours; and to make that good which they had acquired, they fortified themselves in such places of Defence, as were accustomary in those

In the times of their ancient Gentilism before they were reduced under the power of the Inca, they worthipped the Image of a Dog in their Temples, eating the Flesh of Dogs for the greatest rarity and delicacy in the World; so that it is believed their Appetite to Dogs-slesh was the original of their Devotion, which was so great to that Beast; that the most solemn Feasts and Entertainments were ferved with many Diffies of Dogs-flefh; and to demonstrate their great refuects to Does, they made a fort of Trumpet with their Heads, which they founded for their most pleasant Musick, at times of their most solemn Festivals, and Danfor their more pleasant wanters, at times of their more following and Dancings; and in their Wars they used the same to terrifie and affright their Enemies, for, said they, our God causes these two different Effects by the same Infruments; in us it railes Joy and Delight, and in our Enemies Horrour and Confernation: But all these Superstitions and Errours were quitted, and rooted our by the better Instruction and Rudiments of the Inca; howsoever to indulge their humour fo far as was warrantable, they permitted them in place of Dogs-heads to make their Trumpets with the Heads of Deer, or Stags, or any other Wild-beaft, as they pleafed, which afterwards they used at their Festivals and Balls. and times as they pleated, which atterwards they uted at their Feltivals and Balls, and times of rejoicing; and because the Flesh of Dogs was so extremely pleasing and savoury to them, they gained the Sirname of Dog; that whensoever Fluanca was named, they added Sir-reverence the Dog. They had likewise another Idol, in figure and shape of a Man, which was an Oracle through which the Devil spake, and returned Answers to all Demands, which uttering nothing that was in contradiction or disparagement to the Religion which the Incas protessed, was still conserved, and left undemolished, though the Idol of the Dog was broken the analysis of the still represent the still rep down and confounded.

Royal Commentaries.

This confiderable Nation, and the most kindly affectionate to Dogs, the Incu Capac Tupanqui subdued by fair terms, and presents, rather than by force; for this was always the Masterpiece of the Incas, who made it their Profession to take the Bodies of Men, by captivating first and alluring their Souls and Minds. All things paffing in this manner smoothly with the Huancas, and every thing being settled in peace and quietness, the Inca divided their Nation into three Divisions. the better to divide and superfede the old Feuds and Disputes amongst them, arifing about the Boundaries and Limits of their Land: The first Division they called Sausa, the second Marca viller, and the third Liacsapallanca. The attire of their Heads was ordered not to be altered in the form and manner of it, but differenced onely for diffinction take, by variety of colours. This Province, which anciently was called Huanca, was by the Spaniards, I know not for what reason, named Huanga villea, without confidering that there is another Province, called Huanca villea, not far from Tumpiz, and three hundred Leagues distant one from the other: This latter is fituate on the Sea-coast, and the former far within the Land; the which we here intimate to the Reader, that so he may know in the perufal of this Hiftory to diffinguish one from the other, that when we shall come to relate many strange occurrences in the Countrey of Huancavillea, he may not be confounded by mistaking it for Huanca.

Of other Provinces which the Inca subdued; of their Manners and Customs, and the severity they used against those who were guilty of Sodomy.

BY the same good policy the Inca Capac Tupanqui allured and invited several other Provinces to submission and Obedience, which extend themselves on both hands of the common road; amongst which the Provinces of principal note and consideration were Turma and Pumpu, which the Spaniards call Bombon, being very fertile Soils, and abounding with all sorts of Fruit. These being allured by fair Words, and Promises, gently submitted to the affable and courteous treatment of Capac Tupanqui; howsoever these people being wastike, and firece by Nature, did not entirely yield to the persuasions of their Enemies, but withstood them in some Battels and Skirmishes, though the Desence they made was readed more faint than was expected, by the Wheedles, and fine Words, and Gist of the Inca.

The Inhabitants of these Provinces of Turma and Pompu, and the borderers upon them, did in signal of Matrimony, seal the Agreement with a kiss, the Bridegroom kissing the Bride on the Fore-head, or the Cheek. Widows could not marry within the Year, and shore the Hair of their Heads for a sign of Mouning. The Men on their falling days neither ate Flesh, nor Pepper, nor Salt, not accompanied with their Wives: Such as were Priests, or addicted themselves much to religious Worship, fasted the whole Year in this kind of Abstinence.

In this manner the Inca Capac Tupanqui reduced the Provinces of Turma and Pompu, with many others, lying Eastward, near Antis; the Natives of which lived like Salvages, without Order, or Government, or Religion; and as Brute, and Wild-beasts, were dispersed through the Woods and Mountains, killing one the other, as they casually mnet, or encourted, without knowing or affigning any cause or reason for their Slaughters; these Men lived in a state of common War, because they were ignorant of the usefulness of Peace; and having no Lord or Ruler, had consequently no Name, their Countrey being onely distinguished by the Climate or Position of the Place under such a degree, running thirty degrees North and South, and as many East and West. These were with great facility reduced to the Obedience of the Inca; for being a fort of poor simple Animals, which were easily allured by the good was offered them, were willing to embrace the Religion and Manners which were taught them, and to suffer themselves to be carried to any Place or Colony, where the Inca should think fit to transport them. Of these People nothing offers farther, nor of any other Province worthy to be related, until we come to the Countrey of Chucmpu, which was well peopled with a warlike Nation, barbarous and fierce in their Nature and manners; and as an evidence hereof, and in a conformity to this humour, they worshipped a Tyger for their God.

The Fierceness and natural Bravery of this Nation made them to form all proposals of Accommodation, and bid Defiance to their Enemies, so that Gapac Tuponqui being put by his Art of gentle Iufinuations, was forced to have recourse to his Arms, and engaging in several Skirmishes, wherein above four thousand butterns were stain, they at length yielded and submitted themselves to the invincible Prowess and force of the Inea, which yet had not fo great an influence over them, as had the gentle Temper and compassionate Bowels of the Inea; for they being sensible, that when it was in the hand of the Inea to have destroyed, and totally exterminated them, yet even then he used a tenderness towards them, offering them the conditions of an advantageous Peace; with a sense of which being in part overcome, they affented to an Accommodation, receiving the Inea Pachacu-tee for their fupreme Lord and Mafter, embracing his Laws and Cuftoms, and forfaking their God the Tyger, they were ever after contented to adore the Sun, and live after the manner of his Followers and Worshippers.

This fierce and resolute people having received Conditions and Terms of Peace. and submitted themselves to the Obedience of the Inca, Capac Tupanqui, esteemed his fuccess herein to be a great piece of his Art, and an Effect of his good Conduct, as well as of his Fortune; for had they perfifted in that obstinate resolution off dying as one Man, the destruction and stay permeter in the advantage resolution have blasted that good opinion which the World conceived of the Gentleness and Mercy of the Inca; and on the other side for the Inca, on consideration of Compaffion and good Nature, to have defifted from his Conquelts, and left them free, pannon and good relature, to have defined from the Conquerts, and left them free, would have argued Cowardife, or want of power to fubdue them; fo that ufing force, and fair terms, equally between these two extremes all matters were reconciled, and the Province of Chucurpu received into friendship: And so constituting Teachers to instruct them in Religion, and Governours to rule them according to Law; Garrisons and Souldiers were set over them, to constrain and continue them in their Obedience. Thence taking the right-hand from the great Road, with the fame good Fortune and Conduct, he reduced two other Provinces, large and populous, the one was called Ancara, and the other Hunyllan, in which, as in the others, he left Teachers, and Governours, and Souldiers, to keep them in Awe and Obedience. In the Province of Huayllas fome accusations were brought against certain Persons, who secretly practised that abominable sin of Sodomy; which wickedness having not been as yet known amongst the Indians of the hilly Countries, though in the Plains it had some times been secretly practifed, gave fuch a general scandal to all that heard of it, that they detested the Society of the Huayllas, and in common Reproach and Derifton of that Nation would commonly fcoff at them, and fay, Afraya Huayllas, which is as much, as faugh, be gone Huayllas, thou stinkest, and art loathsome; such detestation had the Indians of this fin, though it were acted in fecret, and had already been feverely punished by the Inca Capac Tupanqui; who having performed what we have related, and made sufficient provision for security of his Conquests, which reached seventy Leagues in length North and South; and all the Plains in breadth to the foot of the snowy Mountain, he thought it convenient after three years, fince the time he had departed from Cozco, to return again to the City, where his Brother Pachacutee received him with favour and kindness, commanding the People to rejoyce for the space of a whole Moon, (for the Indians make the account of their Months by Moons) and to celebrate their sestival with triumphal sports for the victories obtained.

Of their Edifices, and Laws, and new Conquests obtained by the Inca Pachacutec.

HE Holy-days or Festivals being over, the Officers of the Army, Curacai and common Souldiers, were rewarded according to their respective degrees and qualities, and merit of their valour; for the Actions of particular Perfons were taken notice of, and as every one fignalized himfelf fo was his Reward. Then did the Inca resolve again after some few months to visit his Dominions which were always pleafed and enlivened with the Bleffing and Favour of his Prefence. In the more famous Provinces where he passed, he commanded rich and magnificent Temples to be erected, wherein the Indians might with the more awe and reverence adore the Sun; and likewise founded Houses for the select Virgins, for thefe two were always Neighbours, and where one was, the other was built by it. This great care which the Incar took to have their Subjects incited in their Devotion, was a farther endearment of them to their Kings; for it made them not onely religious, but gave them the privileges of Naturaliza-tion, and being Citizens of the City of Cozco. Belides these Temples he built Fortreffes and Caffles on the Frontiers, and Royal Palaces in the Vallies, and in the places of best Air and most delightfull situation, and in those parts which were in the common Road and way, at fuch distances as were most convenient for the Inc.s to take up their Lodgings and Refidence, when they travelled or marched with their Army: He also built Magazines, and Store-houses in every Province, for the provision and maintenance of the People in years of Dearth and

He ordained many Laws and Statutes, indulging to every People and Nation their own ancient Cuftoms, in fuch things as did not contradict or interfere with the Religion eftablifted, or oppose the rules of common honesty; by which gentleness the people lived without Tyranny or Compulsion, not being sensible of any unpleasant alteration, but such as tended to their good and benefit, leading them from a bestial to a rational and moral Life, which was the great design and intention of the Incas.

Having in this Vifit and Travails spent three Years, he returned again to Coxos, where having passed some Months in joy and selftivals, he consulted with his Brother, who was his chief Minister, and others of his Council, concerning the entire Conquest of the Provinces of Chinchassy, for there were no other Countries on that side remaining to be subjected to their Dominion; for on the other quarter, towards Antisym, bordering on the snowy Mountain, there was nothing discovered besides Rocks, and Precipices, and inaccessible places.

The Inca, Capac Yupanqui having so well acquitted himself with Prudence and Valour in his late Expedition, it was resolved, that he should again take upon himself the Command and Conduct of the Army, and that his Nephew, called Yupanqui, who was Prince, and Heir apparent, a Youth of about fixteen Years old, should accompany him in the War, it being the custome for young Men of that Age, to take up their Arms, and make their first Campaign; according to the Ceremony practised in Hauran, (as we shall hereaster more particularly Discourse) that so they being initiated, and exercised in military Discipline, and Arts, shight become experienced and valiant Capitains in their more mature years. To this intent fifty thousand Souldiers being levied, and put in a posture of War, the Uncle and Nephew marched with the Van, which was one third of the Army towards the Province called Chnempu, which was the ultimate extent of the Empire on that side.

Thence were the usual Summons dispatched to the Inhabitants of the Province called Pincu; who finding themselves in no condition to resist the power which marched against them; and being well informed of the happines of those people, who became Vassals to the Incu; they readily accepted the Propositions of Peace, with this Complement, That they rejoiced to receive the Blessings of the Incu; protection, and to be numbred with those Subjects who were under his Dominion and Empire. Thus the Incu; entred that Province, from whence they sent the like Summons to the Neighbouring Countries, of which Huarras, Piscop.impa, and Cunchneu were the chief. But these, instead of following the example of Pincu, unexpectedly took other counsels, and confederating one with the other, resolved to join in the common desence; agreeing to tend this Answer, That they would rather dye, than receive new Laws, new Customs, or a new Religion; for they were so well satisfied with those Gods, which they and their Ancestous had from all Ages served and adored; that they had no need to change them for that specious shew of Religion, by which the Incu had allured and decived the Neighbouring Nations, and usurped a Tyrannical Power and Dominion over them.

Royal Commentaries.

Having given this answer, and knowing themselves unable to resist the Inca in open Field, they retired to their strong holds and fast places, being resolved to defend the narrow and difficult Passes; and to that end, with all diligence and care, they Victualled their Camp, making the best provisions they were able against a long stees.

CHAP. XIII.

The Inca fubdues the Rebellious Provinces by Famine, and Strategems of War.

THE General Capac Yupanqui received, without the leaft furprize, this rude and obfinate Answer from his salvage Enemies; for being a Person of great Prudence and Constancy, he had learned how to bear with the same equality, as well the good as unfortunate successes, and not to be moved into passion by the wild and surely Answers of an untaught and immoral people. But not to despise the weakness of an Enemy, which was retired into their strong Holds, he divided his Army into sour Battalions, each of which consisted of ten thousand Men, commanding them to march towards the Fortresses of the Enemy, but not to engage with them, but onely to besiege and straiten them in such manner, that at length being almost familhed, they might be compelled to a voluntary surrender; and that he, with the Prince, would post himself in that advantageous station, as to be ready on all occasions, and emergencies, to administer Succours where his affistence was required. And lest the destruction which the Enemy had made of all provisions, for sustenance of an Army, should occasion great Famine, and scarcity of all things necessary, he commanded that the Neighbouring Provinces should bring supplies, and administer a quantity of all provisions, double to that proportion which was ordinarily appointed.

In this manner Capac Tupanqui being well provided, a most cruel and desperate

In this manner Capac Yupsingui being well provided, a most cruel and desperate War began with great Mortality on both sides; for the Enemy desended themselves and their strong holds with much bravery and courage; and when they perceived the Incas cautious, and backward to attack them, they would then adventure to make their fallies, every Party and Province of them endeavouring to our vye eath other, and demonstrate its Valour by some signal action.

The Incas all this while remained on the defensive part, resolving to straiten the Enemy by Famine, and sorce them to a surrender by other inconveniencies of War; and when they sound any of the Women, or Children, belonging to the Enemy wandring in the Fields and Countrey, which by reason of weaknets, or sicknets, were not able to keep company with their friends and relations; the Incas took care of them, nourished and carested them, fed them and cloathed them; giving them assurances, that their design was no other, than to better their condition by good and reasonable Laws and Customs, and not to tyrannize over their Persons or Liberties: And then afterwards they gave and permitted them free and safe passage into the quarters of the Enemy; and herein they acted with a kind of Militarry subtilty and policy, knowing that the numbers of useless people were cumbersome to an Army, and served to increase their troubles and necessities; and that the cries of Wives and Children for bread and sustenance would serve to affect the minds of the Husbands and Parents, and sooner move them out of renderness and compassion to them unto a surrender, than bow their fierce and stubborn spirits with sear, or dread of any misery, or death which the Enemy could inflict.

This kindness towards the Women and Children was well taken by the Enemy, but yet did not so far affect them, as to soften their spirits, but rather seemed to ensame and harden them with greater obstinacy and resolution. Untill persisting in this manner for the space of five or six Months, when Famine and Sickness began to rage amongst them; they then casting a compassionate eye on their Wives and Families, entertained those thoughts for their sakes of a surrender, to which otherwise neither fair promises could have allured them, nor Sword, nor Famine, nor Death it self could have affrighted them. But now being mollissed and worked into a more gentle temper, by common consent of the Captains and Souldiers of the respective Forts, they dispatched Ambassadours to the sweat with instructions to ask pardon for the rebellion and offences committed, and to offer themselves for the suture to become Vassals, and obedient to the Empire of the Inca.

The Ineas received this submission with their accustomed elemency and gentleness, treating them with the kindest words they were able to express, exhorting them to return to their people and families; for that by being onely loyal and faithfull Subjects to the Inea, they would merit his favour, and cause him to forget their Rebellion, and pass an Act of Oblivion for all that was past.

The Ambaffadours highly fatisfied with this Gratious Answer returned to their people; who being over-joyed with this happy negotiation, received the good news with hearts now revived, having been lately dead, and benumbed with fear and despair: And in compliance with the Commands of the Incar, they immediately repaired to their homes and dwellings, where care was taken of them, and provisions made for the first year wherewith to feed and sustain them; and in regard, that during the time of War, there had neither been sowing nor planting, so that all provisions failed, there was occasion to make use of that double proportion of Victuals, which Capac Tupanqui had providently appointed at the beginning of the War: Bestides which, such Officers were ordained as were required for administration of. Justice amongst them, and to oversee the Revenue, and instruct them in matters of their Idolatrous Religion and Worthip.

CHAP. XIV.

Of the good Curaca Huamachucu; and in what manner he was reduced.

THE bug proceeding forward, after his Conquest arrived at the Confines of that Province, which was called Humanchieu, where lived a certain great Lord of the fame Name, efteemed for a Person of profound judgment and prudence; to him therefore he dispatched his usual Summons, offering terms of Peace and Friendfhip, provided that he would receive fuch Laws, Customs and Religion, as should advance and improve his Countrey to a more happy and bleffed condition: For the Nation which he governed was a barbarous and cruel people. abominable in their manners and facrifices Worthipping Stocks and Stones, efficcially fuch as had brightness and lustre with them: the Jaspar was esteemed a God, and all the pebles near banks of Rivers, which had any variety of colours, were efteemed to have fomething of Divinity in them, and therefore they carefully gathered them, laid them up in their Houses, and Worshipped them. Their Sacrifices were of Humane bloud, living in the Fields and Mountains, under theds. like brute beafts, without rule or order. All this falvage manner of living, the good Huamachucu endeavoured to reform; but the fear he conceived of this wild people suppressed the defires he had long entertained, until he was encouraged by the message sent him from t'.e. theat. And then being ready to put the conceptions he had formerly sigured to himself of a Moral and Rational life into practice, did with a deep fenfe of joy entertain the Meffengers of the Luca, telling them how pleafed he was, that the Dominion and Empire of their Mafter was extended to the Confines of his Province: For having heard fuch an admirable report. and description of their Laws and Religion, he had long defired the Government of the Inca, and to be enrolled in the number of his Vaffals; but in regard he lived amidit a barbarous people, and furrounded with Neighbours, who were Enemies to the Inca and his Empire, he durft not adventure to thew his affection thereunto, or own the honour and obedience he fecretly entertained towards the Person and Laws of the Inca: And that therefore since he had now means and opportunity to make his inclinations known, he befeeched the Inca gratiously to receive these late demonstrations of his duty, with the same favour and compassion fion as he had done to other Indians, who lived under the happy influence of his beneficence and direction.

The Prince Tipmqui, and the General his Uncle, being invited by these expessions of Humachueu, marched into his Countrey; at the entrance into which, the Ciraca met them, with such Presents as his Countrey afforded, offering them is People and Estate to serve them; and putting himself into an humble posture before them, worthipped them with such devotion, as was due to the Children and Offspring of the Sun. The General received him with his accustomary savour and elemency, returning him thanks for his affection and good-will; and the Prince bestowed several Garments on him and his relations, and his companions with him, of such fort and sincenses, as were worn by himself and his Father; affuring him of the great esteem which the Inca had for his Perion, in consideration of the service he had done him by that voluntary and free furrencer; the which was made good by the Inca Pachaentee, who conceiving a particular kinders and affection for this Humanehueur and his Family, enobled them afterwards with Titles of Honour and Dignity.

The Ceremonies and Rejoicings at this Reception being paft, the great Curaca Huamachucu defired the General, that he would be pleafed to modelize and reform with all expedition the corrupt and falvage manners of his State, and to befrow upon them other Cultoms and Religion in place of those bestial and ridiculous practices which were observed amongst them; for they being now his Vassak he might exercise an absolute and despotical Power over them, they being ready to hear and receive all the Commands and Rules which the Sun and his Children should enjoin them. According to these desires the Inc. in the first place commanded that the people, who were differfed through the Countries under sheets and trees, should be gathered into a Political society, and live like Citizens in friendship and amity together, in a Town regularly built with Streets, and fitnate in fuch a Countrey as was both fruitfull and pleasant. Then he commanded that Proclamation should be made, that they should own and worship no other God but the Sun, and that the pebles and shining stones which they kept in their hou-fes for divine Worship should be thrown into the streets; and for better govern-ment and instruction of this people, Governours and Teachers were appointed and fet over them.

CHAP. XV.

The People of Cassamarca make some resistence, but are at length subdued.

ALL these things being performed and established according to the desire of Huamachucu, the Incas proceeded forward in their Conquests; and being arrived on the Confines of Cassanarca, (which was a place famous for the impriforment of Arabaalpa) being a rich and fruitfull Province, and the people flour and warlike; they dispatched their usual Summons by a Herald, requiring them to yield themselves on terms of peace and friendship.

The people of Cassanarca having long observed the progress of the Incas, and the motion which their Arms had made towards them, had already provided for a War, having possessed the strong Holds and Passes of the Countrey, and furnished them with Victuals, and Ammunition of War; and in confidence of such fecurity, returned a proud answer of defiance to the Incas, giving them to understand, that they would neither accept of new Gods, nor new Laws; nor a Stranger, or Foreigner, for their King; but would adhere to those ancient Statutes and Religion, which were known to them and their Ancestours; and rather than relinquish them, to embrace Novelties, they were resolved to dye, and undergoall the miseries which a cruel and enraged Conquerour could inflict. With this Anfwer Tupanqui being provoked, entred boldly into the Confines of Cassamarca, where the Natives, like a brave and hardy people, manfully opposed themselves against him in all dangerous and difficult passes, being resolved to dye or overcome. The Inca, though unwilling to engage, out of a desire he had to spare the efficiency of the Inca, though unwilling to engage, out of a desire he had to spare the efficiency of the Inca, though unwilling to engage, out of a desire he had to spare the efficiency of the Inca, though unwilling to engage, out of a desire he had to spare the efficiency of the Inca, though unwilling to engage the incapation of the Inca, though unwilling to engage the incapation of the Inca, though unwilling the incapation of the Inca, though unwilling to engage the incapation of the Inca, though unwilling to engage the Incapation of the Incapat fion of bloud, was yet forced fometimes to fight, that he might gain possession of the most difficult passes; in defence of which, the Enemy combating with all their might, many were flain on one fide and the other; nor did they fometimes refuse Battel in the open Field; but in regard the Conduct and Numbers of the Inca was more excellent and great, than that of the Enemy, they were forced to retreat into the Mountains, and Rocks, and fast places; from whence making oftentimes their Sallies, great flaughters did ensue. Thus was the War continued for the space of four Months, because the Incas were unwilling to take advantages entirely to destroy them, but rather to suffer, and weary them out, untill their fury and mettle began to abate: During all which time, the Incas used their accustomary lenitives, endeavouring to win them with all fair and mild treatment; for as many as they took in War, they released; such as were wounded, they healed and cured, and then fent them away; affuring them, that so often as they took them, they would use them with the same compassion, being never wearied with doing good; for that was the profession of the Incas, and was their method to overcome by Mildnels and Beneficence, rather than by Tyranny and Oppression; the Women and Children which they found in the Mountains and Caves, after they had fed them, and treated them with respect, and gentle terms, they fent away, that so they might relate the courteses they had received, and persuade their Fathers and Husbands not to perfift longer in their Opposition and Rebellion

against the invincible Family of the Sun-

These and such like Instances of kindness being frequently repeated during the whole course of the War, began to operate on the rude and fierce disposition of this People, whose hard and obdurate temper being a little softened, it was obvious and plain to them, that it could be no unhappy condition to fall into the hands of fuch, who being incited by a thousand provocations to destroy them, did not onely feek ways to preferve and keep them from utter ruine, but how also to bestow benefits, and even also against their own Will to shew them mercy. They considered also that the power of the Inca did daily increase, as theirs did diministration nilh, and that Famine and the Sword were evils inevitable. Wherefore confulting with their Curacas upon these difficulties, they concluded and agreed to receive the conditions offered them by the Inca, rather than perilli out of an obstinate and perverse humour. Upon this resolution they dispatched their Ambassadours to the Inca, confessing the Faults and Errours they were guilty of, in so long oppoing and trying the Patience of the Incat, whose Generosity could not be parallelled by any of humane Race; and therefore confessing them to be of the lucid family of the Sun, they with all humility begged to be received into the num ber of their Vassals; and that both the Prince, and the General his Uncle, would be pleased to intercede with the Majesty of the Imperial Inca in their behalf, that fo he would condescend and youchsafe to own and receive them for his Subjects.

Scarce were these Ambassadours come into the presence of the Inca, before the Curaca Cassamarca, and his Nobles resolved to go themselves, and personally demand Pardon for their Offences; and accordingly appearing before the General, they prostrated themselves after the most humble fashion of their Countrey, repeating in substance the same words which their Ambassadours had uttered. The Inca Capac Tupanqui gratiously accepted this Address, encouraging them with great affurances of the Inca's Pardon and Favour; and that he would be as kind and tender of them, as he was of his other Subjects; and for the opposition they had already made, and the acts of Hostility committed during the time of War, they should never more be called to remembrance, provided that they continued obedient, and by their Services and Duty performed and endeavoured to deferve those benefits which the Sun had encharged unto his Children to communicate unto fuch who willingly and without compulition yielded themselves and their people faithfull and loyal Subjects to the Inca, which being said, the Curaca and his followers bowed themselves, and worshipped, saying, that their Generosity and Heroick Actions deservedly entitled them to an universal Dominion over all others, and gave a clear evidence of their undoubted Descent from the Sun, and Extraction from fomething else than humane Race. After which they were difmissed, and returned to their own Habitations.

CHAP. XVI

Of the Conquest of Yauyu; and of the Triumph celebrated in honour of the Uncle and Nephew.

THE General was much pleased with this Conquest, and considering the fruitsulness of the Soil, and pleasant situation, he esteemed it the best Flower he could add to his Brother's Crown, and therefore most worthy to be improved; to which end, he directed that the scattered Cottages, should be reduced into a Town, in which the people might live in a more comfortable and man litical Society. That a Temple should be erected to the Sun, and a House for the felect Virgins, the which were afterwards fo well endowed, and adorned by the Magnificence of succeeding Princes, that they became the most renowned the Magnineence of increeding Princes, that they became the most renowing and famous Edifices of all Peru. Moreover Teachers were appointed to inftrud them in the Rules of their Idolatrous Worfhip, and Governours, and Magifirates fet over them to precide in civil matters; Officers were also ordained to gather the fruits belonging to the Sun, and to the Inca; befides Engineers, and Workmen for making Aqueducts, and draining Lands; and lattly, Guards were quartered in their Country, to secure the Peace, and conserve them in Ob-

All which being performed and established; they resolved to return to Coco. but by the way to foend a little time in reducing a corner of Land, which they had left behind, for which being out of the way, they had not touched at it in their march outward. This Province was called Tanyn, the Countrey was mountainous, and rocky, and the people warlike; howfoever it being concluded that twelve thousand Men were sufficient for this Atchievement, the rest of the Anny was difinified, that they might not be haraffed and wearied with unnecessary Marches. Being arrived on the Confines of this Province, the usual summons were dispatched, offering them terms either of War or Peace.

The Tauytines entred into confultation upon the matter of these summons, and in debate thereupon divers opinions arose; some were stout and obstinate, and were ready to dye in desence of their Gods, and their ancient Customes; but o thers, of more cool and prudent temper, refuted the rafhness, and folly of such resolution, considering that they were already surrounded by a puissant Enemy, whom other greater Provinces than theirs were not able to relift, nor their Gods to defend them. That the Clemency and Wisedom of the Incas was amiable, and fuch as ought to move them to defire, and embrace rather than decline their Government: With which confideration they unanimously concluded on a surrender, the contrary course threatning nothing but entire ruine and desolation; so that this more moderate counsel prevailing, they unanimously received the mean with solemn Festivals and Rejoicings; and the Incae in return vested their Carrent, with Joienn Fettivais and Kejoicings; and the Inc.u in return velted their Curacu, and Nobles, with Garments of the finett fort, called Compi, and the Commonalty with Avafca, which was of a courfer thread, all concluding to the general fatisfaction of that people, who were overjoyed and proud to become the Subjects of fo gratious, and powerfull a King. Officers and Governous being here appointed and established, according to the usual Stile and Custome; the Inc.u returned to Cozco, whence the Inc.a Pachacutec went out to meet his Son and Brother, and conduct them to the Civil commonding that they found that the corridation in the commond of the corridation in the commond of the corridation in the conduct them to the Civil commond that the corridation is the conduct them. conduct them to the City; commanding that they should be carried in triumphal Chairs on the Shoulders of some People belonging to the late conquered Provinces, and received with all the joy, and festivity, which was due to the solemnity of that day.

The feveral Nations which lived in the City, and the Curaca which prefided the feveral orders, with different inftruments of Drums, and Trumpets, and Cornets, present themselves after the fashion of their Countrey, chanting out the Songs which they had composed in honour and praise of the mighty and excellent Actions performed by the General Capac Yupanqui, and his Nephew the Prince, by whole happy beginnings his Pather conceived entire fatisfaction and hopes, that he would one day answer the desires and expectations of his Subjects. After the Citizens the Souldiers followed in their ranks and orders, according to their Companies and Divisions; finging also the Songs which they had composed in praise of the Heroick Actions of their Inc. 15. making their Valour, and Conduct, and Excellencies, the fubject of their Sonnets, adjoining thereunto Panegyricks in commendation of their Piety, Charity, Liberality and Magnificence towards their Captains and Souldiers, filling up the burthen of their Songs with the Names of the Uncle and Nephew, adding Titles unto them, and Dignities which their Vertues and brave Actions had acquired. After the Souldiers followed the Incas of the Bloud, all armed with the fame fort of Weapons, as well those who had remained at home, as those who had been at the War; all being equally to share in the Booty and Honour; the Merits of those who had presided over the Civil Government at home, being no less esteemed than the hazards and labours of those who adventured abroad.

Amide the best was the General and his Nephew furrounded, and after them came the Inca Pachacutec, mounted on his Chair of Gold, in which order they proceeded to the facred Limits and Verge of the Temple, where the Incas alighting, took off their Shoes, and all, excepting the lnea, who was Emperour, walked barefoot to the Gate of the Temple; at which place also the lnea himself with bare feet, attended onely by Incas, entred in and worthipped; and having given thanks for the Victories obtained, they all returned to the publick Marketplace, where they celebrated the Festival, with Songs and Dances, with Eating and Drinking, which was their best entertainment on those days of merriment. In their Dancings they observed this order to avoid consustion. That every Nation according to their Seniority and Place took their turns in Dancing after the mode and fathion of their Countrey, whilft their Servants beat the Drums, and other Instruments, joining in the Chorus at the end of every period. Those who had performed their Dances drank one to another, and then arose and danced again, in such manner, as this pastime interchangeably continued for the whole day. And in this manner was the Ceremony and folemnity of their Triumphs observed, for the space of a whole month; which we have here described more particularly on occasion of the Victories which Capac Tupangui had obtained; being then folemnized with the most order and magnificence.

CHAP. XVII.

Two Vallies are subdued: with the proud and insolent Answer of Chinca.

A Fter the Festivals were finished, the Incas passed three years in peace and repose; dedicating their time to the administration of Justice and adornment of the Empire, improving the Provinces with Fountains and Aqueducts, and stately Edifices. After such time that the Souldiers had taken their repose, another War was agreed and concluded to be carried on towards the Plains, or Low-Countries, not having on that side extended the borders of the Empire, farther than to Nanasca; for this design thirty thousand Men were designed to be raised, and immediately to be dispeeded for this Conquest; and in regard these Vallis were very unhealthfull, and sickly for the camp; it was resolved at a Council of War, that another Army of thirty thousand Men should be raised, which every two months was to relieve the other, and so interchangeably take their turns and hazards in that unwholsome Air, which to the Natives themselves was almost pessed to the contraction of the contraction of the Politaria.

The Armies being raifed, the Inca Pachaentee commanded, that thirty thousand Men should quarter in the neighbouring parts, so as to be ready for the Invasion, and relief of the Guards at the times appointed; and with the first Army he with his Son the Prince, and Brother Tupunqui proceeded by short marches to the Provinces called Rucana, and Hatum-rucana, resolving there to fix his Court, as the most convenient place near the confines, whence at all times he might be in a readiness to give the Succours which the War required, and apply those arts which were agreeable to Peace. In the mean time the Incas, who were his Son and Brother, proceeded towards Nanasca, and being arrived there, they dispatched their usual Summons to the People, who live in the Valley of Yea, lying northward from Nanasca. The Natives desired time to communicate, and consider together concerning the Proposals offered them, who after they had held a consultation which admitted of some debate; they resolved to receive the Inca for their Lord and Master, being thereunto the rather moved from the report they had heard of the gentle Government of the Incas, and which they had already, by reason of the Neighbourhood with Nanasca, in part known and tried. By this Example the Natives likewise of the Valley of Pisco submitted, though their ill Neighbours of the Valley of Chicha endeavoured to corrupt and alienate their Minds from Obedience to the Incas, by promises to enter into a League and mutual Confederacy with them; but they being sensible that their united strength was not able to defend them from the prevailing power of the Incas, resolved to take the secure, and faving course of Submission, and accept the Laws, Customs, and Religion of the Incas, promissing to adore the Sun, and esteem all other Gods vain and Idolatrous, but such onely as the Incas should impose upon them.

This Vale of Tea, is a fertile and fruitfull foil, as are all those other low Lands and Vallies, and therefore esteemed worthy to be improved by the Power and Industry of their Kings, in order whereunto they erected a fair Aqueduct, whereby the waters were conveyed from the highest part of the Mountains by a plential stream; the which naturally running from the East, they with art turned to the West, by bringing the Current to fall into a Chanel which received the Rains in the Winter, which being dried up in the Summer, all those Plains became burnt, and scorched up for want of moisture, which was afterwards supplied by the great convenience and benefit of these new Waters; so that their Tilage and Lands were improved thereby, that ever after the People lived with great ease and abundance; which when the conquered hims, and those not as yet subdued, had seen and proved, they became Admirers of the *Incar Finpire*, and desirous to be numbred with the Subjects to it, that so they might lay claim to a share of those bleffings, which the vigilance and ingenuity of the Inca bestowed on his

It is here to be noted, that the Indians, who inhabited along the Coast for the space of almost 500 Leagues, extending from Tragillo to Tarapaca, which is the atmost border North and South of Pern, generally adored and worshipped the Sea for God, (unless it were some petty Idol, or diminutive God, which was peculiar to the Province) by reason that the Sea fed and sustained them with Fish for their nourishment, and threw up vast quantities of Pilchards, with the Heads of which they dunged their Lands, (as we have said before) by reason of which benefits they gave it the Name of Mamacocha, or Mother-sea. They likewise adored the Whale for its vast bulk and bigness; and some Provinces adored this, and others that fort of Fish, as they were most plentifull, and yielded most benefit to the Natives. This was, in short, the Idolatrous Religion of the Tamcas before the times of the Imeas, or that they came to have Rule and Dominion over them.

The Vallies of 26a and Pisco being thus reduced, the Incas dispatched their Summons to the great and powerfull Valley of Chincha, (so called from Chinchassum, which is one of the four quarters into which the Incas divided their Empire) requiring them either to pay their Obedience to the Inca Pachacutec, who was a Child of the Sun, or otherwise to prepare themselves for War, and defend their Cause and Countrey with their Arms: But the people of Chincha confiding in their Numbers, and puffed up with an opinion of their bravery, and skill in War. returned an answer of Defiance; that they would neither receive the Sun for their God, nor the Inca for their King; that the Sea was the Deity, which they had most reason to Adore, in regard it supplied them with Fish for their nourishment. and was in other particulars and inftances the most usefull and beneficial; whenas the Sun on the other fide (corched their Countrey, and parched and tormented their Bodies; fo that they wished rather to live remote from him, than to be troubled with the inconveniences of his Neighbourhood; that perhaps he might be a more proper God for those who inhabit the cold Climates under the frozen Zones; but as to themselves, his Rays and Presence were offensive. That as to the King, they had a Natural Prince of their own, whom they loved, and would not part with for all the race and lineage of the Sun; and for their Arms, they were always ready to be employed against those who provoked their Passion, or instinged their Liberty, or invaded their Countrey or despised their Gods; the chief and principal of which was called Chincha Camac, who was the Maker and Confervator of Chinea, a God to powerfull, that the hear would doe well to confider how they provoked or injured the King of Chineha, who was supported by the Providence of that powerfull God. The Natives of this Countrey do likewife much avail themselves on a Tradition, that their Forefathers came from a far Countrey, (though they do not fay whence) under the Conduct of a valiant and religious General, by force of whose Arms they conquered that Countrey, by deftroying all the people, which were the natural Inhabitants of it not suffering one of them to survive, because they were a vile and brutish Race; befides many other brave Actions, which they recount of their Fore-fathers.

CHAP. XVIII.

Of the Obstinacy which the People of Chincha shewed; and how they were at lenoth reduced.

THE Incas, heated with the distain of this Answer, proceeded towards Chin-cha, and the Curaca, or Lord, called by the same Name, with a considera-ble band of Men as readily marched to encounter them, and skirmished with them in the Valley; but the Sand and Dust was so great, that the Armies could not remain long engaged; wherefore the Yuncas retreated to take possession of a País, at the entrance to which, though they opposed the Incas, yet so faint was the refiftence which they made, that they gave ground and admission to the Enemy to lodge, and take up their quarters within the place which they endeavoured to defend: All which was performed with fignal courage, and with bloud and wounds on both fides; the Yuneas labouring to defend their Countrey, and the

During these many days of Skirmishes and Defiance, the Incas did not omit their invitations and perfuafions to prefer terms of Peace, before the cruelties and extremities of War; but all to little purpole, for the Timeas continuing oblinate in their resolutions, and being of opinion that the heat of the Sun would at length constrain the Enemy, accustomed to a more moderate climate, to relinquish their defign; refused all propositions of Peace, rather shewing themselves every day more averse and rebellious on confidence of these hopes and expectations: Notwithflanding which, the beast ftill maintaining the ancient principles, and conflant practice of gentleness and moderation, did not take the advantage they might have done on many occasions, to the destruction of their Enemies; but rather endeavoured to weary them out, and by long patience work them into a more pliable temper; for continuation of which, at the end of two Months, the Army which was appointed to relieve the other, was commanded with all diligence to march, and take the place of those who had preceded them, before the heat of the Countrey had produced Calentures amongst them, or any other diseases incident to the bodies of Men unaccustomed to excess of heat.

The Officers halfning the March of the Army, with all expedition possible they arrived in a few days at Chincha, where the General Tupanqui stayed to receive them, and difinifs the former Army, which he ordered to be lodged and quartered in fuch Neighbouring places, as to be near and ready to relieve the Guards another time, if the obstinacy of the Enemy should protract and delay the accomplishment of their subjection. The Prince departed with the Army which was relieved, for better security and conservation of his health.

The War being renewed by exchange of Forces, the General befieged and fraitned them, as close as he was able, destroying their Harvest and Fruits, and hindering all Provisions from coming to their Camp: He also cut off their Chanels of Water, fo that they could not refresh their Fruits and Plantations; every thing being burnt, and footched up, but what they had already reaped, and gathered in 3 and this was the greatest misery that afflicted the Timeas, whose Countrey being exceeding hot, was not capable to produce any Fruit but what was watered every three or four Days.

The Tincas grew now more fensible of their lost condition, for finding their flreams of Water to be cut off, and themselves straitned in the narrowness of their quarters; and being disappointed of the hope and expectation they once conceived, that the Heat of the Countrey, and the ill Air, would conftrain the Incas to quit and abandon it; and, on the contrary, perceiving the policy of their Government, that by relieving and exchanging their Guards, they were enabled to continue the War, they began to abate fomething of their pride and confidence; but were not as yet so humbled, as readily to submit without trying the utmost extremity: For in this posture of War they persisted for the space of two Months longer, refusing all proposals of Peace, though tendred to them every eight Days bings, friam an appoining them with Arms in their hands, in deliping to Famine, and Sword, and all the inconveniences of War; imploring in the mean time with earnest devotion, and vows, the affistence of their God Chincha Camaca to whom the Women especially directed their prayers, and with tears and facrifices begged his protection and deliverance of them.

It is observable that the Indians of this famous Valley of Chincha adored an Idol. which they called Chincha Camac, fashioned after the form of Pachacamac, or the unknown God, whom (as we have faid before) the Incas spiritually, or mentally, adored: for they taking notice, that the Inhabitants of the Neighbouring Valley had erected an Idol, named Pachacamac, which fignifies the Sustainer of the Universe, and dedicated a Temple to it; did after their example mould another Idol after fimilitude of the former, giving it the Name of Chinchacamac, or the Sustainer, or Protector of Chincha; for the other denomination being Universal, seemed in their fancy, of fuch a valt extent, that the God, who had so great an employment, as the care and conservation of the Universe, could not be at leisure to defend them, or think fo narrow a corner, as Chincha, worthy his trouble or concernment; wherefore that they might gain a more peculiar Deity, and fuch as they might appropriate to themselves, they figured a Chincha cannae, or a Domestick God, by whose favour and power they promised to themselves succour and deliverance from their Enemies.

The Incas all this while patiently endured the teadiousness of this War, and the obstinacy of their Enemies, who could not as yet provoke them to destroy them utterly, though policy of War and necessity compelled them to straigen, and diffrest them as far as they were able. At length Capac Tupanqui having observed the observed that refolution of the Enemy, and that he lost both time and reputation by a terrapus attendance on their pertinacious humour; and considering that this gentleness and mercy towards the Enemy, might be converted into a cruelty towards his own Subjects, in cafe that long delays, and protraction of time, should produce a fickness in the Camp, as was much to be feared from the violent Heats, and unwholfome Air: Wherefore to avoid, and prevent this danger, he difpatched a Messenger to them; acquainting them in express terms, that having already complied with the compassionate and tender Instructions of his Brother the Inca, by his long forbearance of them; he fent now to let them know, that he gave them eight days to yield, and furrender themselves; in which space of time. in case they submitted, they should then be pardoned, and received to mercy; and if they refused, that they should no longer expect compassion, or quarter, for that he was refolved to put them all to the Sword, and people their Countrey again with a new Colony and Nation more wife and obedient to the Inca: which message being delivered, he ordered the Heralds to return without attending for an answer.

The Yuncas being terrified with this positive message, apprehended that the just rage of the Incas might reasonably transport them to an execution thereof; for that the Incas having received fuch bad returns for all the pity and gentleness they had shewn towards them, no other forbearance could be now expected; and confulting their present state of famine, and want, and other incommodities of War, they took a resolution to send their Ambassadours to the Inca to implore his pardon, and that he would vouchfafe to receive them for his Subjects, promifing to exchange the rebellion and obstinacy they had used, into a faithfull and loyal Obedience to the Inca; the day following the Curaca, accompanied with his Kindred and Nobles, went to kis the hands of the Inca, and personally make tender of their Duty and Obedience.

CHAP.

CHAP. XIX.

Of the Ancient Conquests, and vain Rodomontadoes, of the Chinchas.

THE Inca much fatisfied with this fubmiffion, congratulated with the Chinala Chincha the happines of the enfuing Peace, whereby an end was put to the miseries of a bloudy War, which was destructive to his people: And speaking kindly to this great Commander of the Tancas, affured him of pardon from his Brother the Emperour; and because he perceived him to be much dejected and afflicted for his fault, he encouraged him with many kind and obliging expressions, telling him, that the King his Brother was a gratious and mercifull Prince, who never recalled to memory the enmity shewn him at first, provided that having once submitted, and acknowledged him for their Lord, they did never as terwards return to their rebellion: And as an evidence of savour and acceptance, he commanded, that Vestments should be given them of the finest fort; and so all concluded in a mutual satisfaction.

These Indians of Chincha boast much of this resistence they had made against the Incas, pretending that they repelled them twice, because they reckoned the exchange of the first Army with the second to be a kind of retreat. The report also, that the Incas were many years before they could conquer them take they submitted upon conditions and promises; and that they were won rather by gifts and presents, than subdued by force of Arms. Thus was the mild usage and treatment which the Incas shewed to them, interpreted for a sign of their own Valour and Courage; whenas, in reality, the power of the Incas was fogreat in those days, that they could with facility have subdued them, had they in earnest applied their Strength, and Military Art, in that Conquest: but Men have liberty to talk of the Mighty Actions of former times, and of their Ance.

flours, without offence to any in the prefent Age.

They report farther of themselves, that before they were Subjects to the Inca, they were of that power, and Martial disposition, that they made frequent such floors into the Neighbouring Countries, from whence they carried Spoils and Trophies of Victory; that they were so dreadfull to those who inhabited the Mountains, that those people, for sear of them, deserted their Countrey, and that they often came as far as the Province of Collis. All which appears to be falls, because these Tuncas are naturally a fluggish and dull Nation, and not given to labour, or travel, and therefore it is not probable, that they would undertake a March of almost 200 Leagues, through greater Provinces, and more populous than their own. And that which makes this report still more improbable is. That the Tuncas, being (as we have said) born in a very hot Countrey, where it never Rains, and where consequently the noise of Thunder is never heard; are so affrighted with the sound, and claps of it, so often as they enter into the Hilly-Countries, that with consternation and terrour they return into their own Climate; and therefore it is not credible they should adventure into Mountains where the voice of Thunder is often heard, and which their ignorance made so horrible and affrighting to them.

Whilst Trapagui employed himself in Establishing the Government of Chineha, and putting all things into the best order and posture he was able; he gave intelligence to his Brother of the success of his proceedings, desiring him to relieve the Army, which remained then on Duty; by exchange for another, that so he might proceed in the entire conquest of the Timeas. And whilst he was thus setting the Government in Chineha, and imposing new Laws and Customs on them; Informations were brought him against certain persons gullty of Sodomy, to which sin that Courtey was much addicted: All which he took, and condemned, and burned alive; commanding their Houses to be thrown down, their Inheritances to be destroyed, their Trees rooted up, that so no steps or marks might appear of any thing which had been built, or planted by the hands of Sodomites, and that their memory, as well as their actions, might be abolished; with them they destroyed both their Wives as their actions, might be about the market may seem unjust, was yet an evidence of

and Children, which feverity, though it may feem unjust, was yet an evidence of that abhorrence which the Incas conceived against this unnatural Crime.

Some time after this Conquest the Incan-Kings honoured, and enobled this valley of Chincha, with a famous Temple dedicated to the Sun, with a House also for the Select Virgins; it contained about thirty thousand souls, being one of the most pleasant and delightfull Vallies of Pern. The Actions and Exploits of the Inca Pachacute were many and various, though his Conquests for the most part were performed in the same manner; wherefore to divert the Reader with some varieties, we shall now intermix our Discourse with two principal Festivals which the Incu celebrated with the greatest solemnities, and then we shall return again to the Life and Atchievements of this King.

CHAP. XX.

Of the principal Festival of the Sun; and in what manner they prepared themselves for the Celebration of it.

THE principal Festival was called Raymi, which sounds, or at leasts signifies as much with them as Pascha, (which with us in English is Easter) amongst the four Festivals, celebrated by the Incas in the City of Cozco, which was the Metropolis of their Religion, (as Rame is to us) none was observed with that solemnity, as this which they called Ynip Raymi, held in the month of June, in honour of the Sun, soon after the Summer Solstice; and if they attributed this name of Raymi to any other Feast, it was in reserence, or as it depended on this chief Festival.

This Solemnity was performed to the Sun, under Notion of the Supreme, Sole and Universal God, by virtue of whose Heat and Light all living Creatures were generated and sustained. At which also they commemorated their first Father Inca Mineo Capac, and Coya Mama Occlo, his Wife and Sister, owning and acknowledging them to be descended from the Sun, and sent by him into the World for the common benefit of Mankind. For which important Reasons this Festival being esteemed the most solenn, all the principal Captains and Commanders of the Army, and Curacas or Lords of Provinces, assembled themselves at Cozco to celebrate this Feast; not that it was of Precept or Injunction, but out of mere Devotion to the Sun, and respect to the Inca. In case any Curaca or Officer were hindred by Age, or Instrinty, or by any distant Employment in service of the Inca, he then sent his Son, or his Brother, or some other Relation, to affist at this Function in his Name and Place; nor did the Inca esteem himself excused from this personal attendance, unless the War, or remote Visits of his Kingdoms obliged him to be absent.

At the first Ceremonies the King, as High-Priest, did always administer; for though there was another High-Priest, of the same legitimate Bloud, being a Brother or Uncle of the Inca, to whom it properly belonged at other times to officiate; yet this being the chief of all the Festivals, was ever graced and honoured by the administration of the Inca, who was the first and eldest Child of the Sun.

The Curacas were habited and dreffed at this time in the finest Cloths and gayeties that they could bring; some wore Garments plated with Gold and Silver, adoming themselves with Garlands, or Crowns of Gold, platted over their Wreaths; some of them appeared in Lions Skins, having their Heads and Bodies covered with them, and these were such, who boasted themselves to be descended from that generous Creature.

Such as had a great efteem and veneration for that Fowl which they call Cuntur, fo as to fanfie the Original of their first Parents to be descended from it, appeared in fashion of Angels, with the Wings of that Bird, which they say are so large, that some of them being killed by the Spaniards, have measured sourteen or fifteen Foot from the point of one pinion to the other.

Others appeared in antick Shapes, with horrid Vizards, and these were Timeat; who, to make themselves the more ridiculous, entred with Grimaces, making mouths, and turning themselves into a thousand fantastical gestures, like Fools, or Madmen; carrying instruments in their hands, agreeable to their postures, such as Flutes, and ill-tuned Cymbols, without Musick or Harmony, which served to make up their wild Masonerade.

The Curacas, according to their qualities, carried the Enfigns of their refpective Countries; fome bore the Weapons which they used in War, such as Bows and Arrows, others Launces, and Darts, and Slings, and Pole-axes to be managed with one hand, and Halberts which they weilded with both; in their Colours and Enfigns the Actions and Stories of their Valour, which they had acted in the Service of the Sun, and Inca were painted and designed: in short, every Curaca came behabited in the best manner that he was able, and attended with his best Equipage, every one endeavouring to outdoe his Neighbour, or Companion, in something that was fine and extraordinary.

Fasting was the general preparation and introduction to the Raymi, or Festival of the Sun, which was fo rigorous, that it continued for the space of three days, during which time they are nothing, but a little white Mayz unbaked, with a sew herbs called Chucam, and drank nothing but water; no fire was kindled in the whole City, during this solemn fast, nor was it lawfull for any Man to accompany with his Wife. The Fast being ended, upon the Eve or Vigil thereof the seas, who were Priests, and appointed to offer the Sacrifice, were employed in preparing the Sheep, and Lambs, and Drinks, which the day sollowing were to be offered to the Sun; all which were provided according to the number of the propie which came to the Festival, in regard, that not onely the Curacas, and their Deputies, but the common People, and their Servants, were to partake of the Benefit and Blessings of these Sacrifices.

The Virgins, or Wives of the Sun, were employed on the Eve in kneading great quantities of Dough, made of Mayz, which they call Canco, which they falhioned into round Cakes about the bigness of our Apples. For it is observable, that the Indians never eat their Mayz kneaded into Bread, but at this Feast, and at the other which they call Citina; nor do they eat this Bread at their Meals, but onely two or three mouthfulls at the beginning; for that which they ordinarily use for Bread is Cara, which they cither parch, or boil before they eat it.

The Flower of this fort of Bread which the brea and those of the Royal Family did eat, was grinded, and kneaded by the select Virgins, who were Wives of the Sun, and who likewise dressed all the other Dishes which were provided for his Festival; so that the Sun rather seemed to entertain his Family, than his Children to bestow a Treat or Banquet upon him: But as to the common fort, great numbers of other Women were set at work to make Bread, and dress Victuals for them; in making this common Bread great care was taken to have it of the best Flower, and such as was pure, and without mixture, being esteemed facred, and such as was not to be eaten, but onely at this Festival, which was the principal of all their Feats.

CHAP. XXI.

How having adored the Sun, they went in Procession to his Temple, and sacrificed a Lamb to him.

A LL things being well prepared, and disposed on the Eve, the Feast being come, the Inca, accompanied with his Brethren, and every one ranked in his place and order, according to his Quality and Age, went in procession by break of day into the Market-place of the City, which they call Haucappata, where remaining bare-foot, they looked attentively toward the East in expectation of the Sun's Rising; when so soon as they saw him appear, they all immediately, casting themselves down on their breeches, (which is as much as with us on our knees) adored and worshipped him, and with open Armes and Hands lifted up, putting them before their Mouths, threw empty Kisses into the Air, and so worshipped with prosound reverence, acknowledging the Sun for their God, and their natural Father.

The Curacat, which were not of the Bloud Royal, affembled in a feparate Company in another place called Cuffipata, where they performed the fame Ceremonies with the Incas. Then the King raifing himfelf on his Feet, whilft the others remained fitting, he took two great Cups of Gold, which they call Aquilla, into his Hands, filled with that Drink which is their chief Beverage; and then in the name and stead of his Father the Sun, (being esteemed the first-born) he lifted up the Bowl, which he held in his Right-hand, and invited the Inca, being himself, and all his Relations, to the Festival, to pledge him in that Liquour; for this Ceremony of drinking one to another, is the most familiar instance can be given of Friendship and Good-will.

Having performed this Ceremony of Invitation, he poured the Drink which was in his Right-hand Bowl into a golden, Jarr, dedicated to the Sun; from which the Liquour ran into a fimooth Chanel, made of Stone, which reached from the Market-place to the Temple, as if the Sun himfelf had drank it. Then the Inca drank of the Bowl which he held in his Left-hand, pledging the Sun, giving to every Inca some part thereos, in a small Cup of Gold, or Silver, which every one had ready to receive it; so that by little and little they had drained the great Bowl; the Liquour of which being sanctified by the hand of the Sun, or the Inca, was esteemed of Virtue and Blessings to all those who communicated of it; and of which all those of the Royal Family received. The Cupacas drank of another Cup, though of the same sort of Liquour, prepared by the Wives of the Sun; which was not esteemed so holy and sacred as that which was consecrated by the Inca himself.

This Ceremony being performed, which was but an Antepast to what they had afterwards to drink, they proceeded all in their order to the Temple of the Sun; and being about two hundred paces from the door, they all (except the King) pulled off their Shoes, and walked to the Gate of the Temple. Then the Inca, and all his Kindred, entred in, and performed, as legitimate Children, their Obeisance and Adoration to the Image of the Sun; whilst the Curaca, as unworthy of so great a Privilege, attended without in the great Court, which was before the Gate of the Temple.

Then the Inca offered with his own hand those Vessels of Gold with which he had performed this Ceremony; and the other Incas delivered theirs into the hands of the Priests, who were Incas and particularly nominated and dedicated to the Sun; for it was not lawfull for any Incas to officiate at this holy Service, who was a Secular, or not ordained to this facred Function. When the Priests had thus received the Chalices from the Incas, they went afterwards to the Gate, to take others from the hands of the Curacas, every one of which proceeded in their order, according to feniority, or priority of time, in which they had become Subjects of the Empire, and so configned into the hands of the Priests their Ver fels of Gold and Silver, with all forts of Animals, fuch as Sheep, Lambs, Li. res of Gold and Silver, with an lots of Animas, fuch as Sneep, Lambs, Li-zards, Toads, Serpents, Foxes, Lions and Tygers, &c. all rarely well caft, and moulded in Gold and Silver, which they prefented for their Offerings to the Sun, every one in some small quantity according to their Abilities.

The Offertory being made, every one returned to his place, and then the Incar who were Priests came with great droves of Lambs, Ewes and Rams of diverge colours: for the Flocks of those Countries have as much variety in their colours as the Horses have in Spain; all which Cattle were the proper Goods and Estate of the Sun; out of which they chose a black Lamb, for that colour was preferred before all others, as most proper for Sacrifice, and most pleasing to Divinity; for they faid, that brown Cattel were of the like colour, as well within as with out, and that the white, though white over all their Bodies, had yet fome black foots on the tip of their Snouts, or Nofes, which was esteemed a defect, and there fore less fit for unspotted Sacrifices; for which reason the Kings most commonly were clothed in black, their mourning being a kind of yellowill, and footted on

From the first Sacrifice of the black Lamb, they made their Prognostications and Divinations of matters relating to the Feaft; likewise in all matters of im. portance, relating to Peace or War, they took their Omens and Signs from the Sacrifices of Lambs, fearching into their Heart and Lungs; and thence divined from the colour and clearness of them, whether their Offerings were acceptable to the Sun. or not; whether the day of battel were to be successfull and victorious: and whether the Year were to be fruitfull: Howfoever they did not always confulr the entrails of Lambs; but in some matters they opened the Bowels of a Ram, in others of a barren Ewe; for it is observable, that they never killed a breeding Ewe, but fuch onely as were barren, or by age unfit for Procreation. When they killed a Lamb, or Sheep, they turned his Head towards the Fall, and without tying his Legs, either before or behind, three or four Indian held him falt; and laying him down, the Priest opened his left side, into which thrusing his Hand, he tore from thence his Heart, and Lungs, and all his vitals, not cutting them, but tearing them out whole with his hand, from the very upper parts of the Throat and Palate, to the lowermost Entrails, great care being taken that all the Vessels should be kept entite, and united with the same connexion that they had in the Body.

XXII. CHAP.

Of the Divinations made from these Sacrifices, and the Fire with which they were confumed.

THE most happy Omen of all they held to be the throbs and palpitations of the Lungs, which if they ftill moved, and continued living when they the Lungs, which it they ftill moved, and continued living when they were first drawn from the Body, they then esteemed the Omen certainly good, and could dispence with other less promising Symptoms, for that this had a superiour and an over-ruling power over all other unlucky appearances. Then they drew out the Guts, and blowing them up with Wind, they tied the neck very hard and close, and they pressed them on each side with their Hands, observing by which way the Wind sound its easiest passage into the Veins and Lungs, which the more they swelled, and became replete with Wind, the better was the Omen accounted. There were many other particulars observed by them, which I have forgotten. but these which I have before mentioned I am well assured of, having noted them in my Journals, and remember, that when I was a Youth, I faw them twice performed by certain old Indians, not as yet baptifed; I do not mean the Sacrifice of Raymi, for that was abolished long before I was born; onely the superstitious inspection into the Entrails of Lambs, and Sheep, in order to Divination; and the Sacrifices of them after fuch inspection was still continued in my time, the which Sacrifices were offered after the manner of those at the principal Feafts. It was held for a very bad Omen if the Lamb, or Sheep, after they had opened his fide, proved to ftrong as to be able by ftrugling to get the Maftery of them which held him, and to ftand upon his Feet. It was also efteemed for a bad Omen, if in drawing out the Entrails the mouth of the Small-guts broke off from the Ligatures of the Stomach, fo as not to come out whole and entire. It was also a bad Omen for the Lungs to come forth bruifed, or broken, or the Heart wounded; befides other things, as I have faid, which I neither noted, nor made enquiry of, onely these I remember, being told me by certain Indians, whom I found offering these Sacrifices; and indeed they were willing to be free with me. and resolve me in any thing I asked them concerning their good or bad Omens; for I being then but a Youth, they entertained no jealoufie or fufficion of me. But to return to the Solemnity of the Festival of Raymi, we farther tay, If the Salcrifice of the Lamb declared not that fortunate Omen which was defired, then they made trial of another with a Ram, and if that neither promifed fair or happy Tidings, then they confulted the Bowels of a barren Ewe, and if that also did not foretell fomething more hopefull, they then proceeded in their Sacrifices and Solemnities of the Feaft, with Sorrow and Mourning, faying, that the Sun their Father was for some Crime, or Omission in his Service, angry and displeased with them, and therefore in vengeance thereof, expected the punishment of War or Famine, or some other Judgment; but then when the Omens were happy and fmiling, they rejoiced with high contentment, being full of hopes and expectations of fortunate successes.

This Sacrifice of the first Lamb, from whence they made their Divinations, being offered; great droves of Lambs and Sheep were brought afterwards for the common Sacrifice; but then they did not open their fides, being alive, as they did the first, but after the usual manner they fairly cut their Throats, and slead them; the Bloud they faved, and with it offered the Heart unto the Sun, burning the Body altogether, untill the whole Lamb was confumed, and converted into Ashes.

The Fire for that Sacrifice was to be new, and then kindled (as they called it) from the hand of the Sun; to allight this Fire they made use of a great Bracelet, worn by the High Prieft, which they called Chipana, being after the fathion of those which the Incas commonly put on the Wrist of their Lest hand; this being greater

greater than ordinary, was held over a Cylinder of the bigness of a half Orange, bright and well polished, which uniting the Rays of the Sun in one point, cast such a restexion into the Cylinder, as easily set fire to the Cotton, which being sinely combined, was put into it, and readily received the same: With this sine alighted from the Sun, they burnt their Sacrifices, and dressed all their Meat for that days provision; of this fire they carried some into the Temple of the Sun, and some to the Convent of the Select Virgins, to be there conserved for the space of the following Year; being esteemed a most unhappy Omen, in case it should by any accident have been extinguished. If on the Vigil or Day before the Festival, which is the time when they prepared all things in a readiness for the Sacrifice, the weather should have proved cloudy, so that the Sun did not appear, then for kindling this Fire they made use of two round pieces of a hard so of Wood, being about the bigness of the middle singer, and about half a yard long, called V yaca, which being rubbed hard together, produced a Flame, and with these the Indians struck sire, as we do with a Steel and Flint, when they travelled, and passed through desart and unpeopled Countries, and I have frequently seen the Shepherds make use of the same.

Howfoever it was accounted a bad Omen to be enforced on that day to have recourse unto that instrument; for in regard the Sun did then hide his face from them, it argued his displeasure and anger for some offence committed. All the step which was prepared for that Sacrifice, was dressed in the publick Market place, and there divided amongst the Guests which came to the Feast, and distributed first to the Incas, then to the Curacas, and afterwards to the Commonalty, according to the several Orders and Degrees. The first Dish, or Course, served in a this folemn Banquet, was that fort of Bread which they called Cancas; then they brought in several varieties of Meats, without Drink, it being the custome over all Peru, not to drink at the time of their Meals.

From what we have faid concerning the Indians fipping from the Bowl or Cap, offered them by the hand of the Prieft, the Spaniards raifed a report, that the Indians communicated in the fame manner as do the Christians; but having plainly do livered the matter of Fact, we shall leave the similitude, or comparison, to every Man's fancy.

The Dinner, or Banquet of Meats being over, great quantities of Drink were brought in, in which the Indians were notoriously addicted to exceed, thoughby the Mercies of God, they are so well reformed from that Vice, by example of that Temperance and Sobriety which they observed in the Spaniards, that it is now a strange thing to see an Indian drunk, the Vice being generally become detestable, and esteemed infamous; so that had the like good example been shewn in other things to this People, as hath been in this, it might have produced the same good effect, and signalized the Spaniards for true Apostolical Preachers of the Gospel.

CHAP. XXIII.

Of the Order in which they drank one to the other.

THE Inca being feated on his Chair of Massie Gold, raised on a Pedestal of the same metal, he sent a Message to his Kindred called Hanan Cozco, and Harin Cozco, that they should in his name drink a Health to those Indians, who were the most samous and renowned in their respective Nations. I First they no minated the Captains, who had signalized their valour in the War, being for their Martial Exploits, preferred before the Curacus; and in case a Curacus, who was a Lord over some Vassals, had merited also the honour of a Captain, they called and mentioned him with both Titles. In the next place the Inca sent to Cozco, being such as had been reduced by the first Inca Manco Capac, and for that reason having the privilege of being called Incas, they were preferred in the next place to the Incas of the Royal Bloud, and before all other Nations; for it was a Maxime amongst those Kings never to alter or diminish those Titles of Honour or Privileges which their Ancestours had bestowed as savours on their Subjects, but were rather willing to confirm and enlarge them.

Now their form and manner of Drinking one to another, was this; all the Lidians generally (according to their condition and quality) had and do ftill keep a couple of Cups to drink in, equally matched, being of the fame fixe and fhape, and of the fame Metal, either of Gold, Silver, or Wood, that fo every Man might drink allke, and have his equal proportion one with the other. He that invited to the Drink, held up his two Cups in each hand, and then gave to him whom he invited the Cup which was in his Right-hand, in cafe he were of greater Quality, and if he were of inferiour Degree, then that in his Left, and then both drank at the fame time; and afterwards receiving his Cup again, he returned to his place; though commonly at these Feasts the Person inviting was greater than the Person invited, so that the Invitation was an evidence of grace and savour of the Superiour to his Inferiour; though from this Custome afterwards it came, that when the Inferiour invited the Superiour, it was by way of acknowledgment of his Service and Vasfalage.

In observance of this common Custome of Invitation, the Ineas, who carried the Drink from the King, said to the Person invited, The Capa Inca hash fent me to invite you to drinking, and I am come to drink with you in his name. Whereupon the Captain, or Curaca, took the Cup into his Hands, and lifting up his Eyes unto the Sun, as if he would return him thanks for the great Favour he received from his Offspring; and then having taken the Draught with silence, returned back the Cup, making signs of prosound Reverence and Adoration with his Flands, and kiffing the Air with his Lips.

But it is to be noted, that the Inca did never fend Invitations of drinking to all the Curacus in general, but to fome particular perfons of them, who were famous, and had a great intereft with their People, and well beloved by the Commonalty, and were Men zealous of the publick good; for this matter of publick good was the great concernment to which the Inca, the Curacus, and all the Ministers of War and Peace bended their chief aim and fludies. To other Curacus the Inca who carried the Cups drank in their own, and not in the name of the Luca, In which the Cursus were abundantly fatisfied, acknowledging it an Honour stricient for them to drink with one who was of the Family, and allied to the Sun, as well as the King himfelf.

The first Ceremony of Drinking being sinished, then immediately the Captains and Curacas of the several Nations made their Invitations in the same manner and order as they had been themselves invited; some making their immediate Address to the King, and others to the Ineas, in return to their late Complement. When they approached the Inea, it was with deep filence, and humble profiration; and the Inea received them with great Courtesie, and grations Countenance; and in regard he was to pledge them all, he took the Cup from every Man's hand, touching it with his Lips; though he drank more plentifully out of the Bowl of those to whose Dignity and Quality he bore some particular respect; what remained at the bottom of the Cup, the Inea commanded his Servants, who were also Ineas by privilege, to drink of the remainder, which being done, the Cups were again returned to the Owners.

These Cups having touched the Hands and Lips of the Capa Inca, were ever afterwards conserved as sacred Reliques, and held in great Veneration, never afterwards being applied to common uses, but separated, as were their Idols, for Worship and Adoration; for in reality such was the interiour Devotion which they conceived towards their Kings, that we cannot express the Love and Veneration which these poor Indians entertained of every thing which had relation to them. In this manner the Health's being gone about, and every one pledged, they all returned orderly to their places; and then the Dances and Songs began; all Nations prefenting themselves respectively in their Masquerades, and Colours, and antick Postures, according to the fashion of their Countrey; during all which the drinking still went on, the Incas inviting each other, as also the Captains and Captains and Relations in their feveral Countries.

Thus were nine days spent in the solemn celebration of this Feast of Romi, where was plenty of Meat and Drink (as we have said) accompanied with alkinds of Mirth and Jollity; though the first day onely was appointed for Sacifices, and for inspection into the Entrails of Beasts, from whence they made their Divinations of suture Events. After the nine days were over, the Chracas taking their leave of the King, returned to their respective Countries, having received entire satisfaction in the solemn performance of the principal Feast, which they dedicated to their God the Sun. When the King was employed in the War, or was far remote in visitations of foreign Countries, he always observed the solemn Celebration of this Festival, in that place, where his occasions had drawn him, though not with the pomp and magnificence, as it was performed at Cozco; where in the absence of the King, the Governour and High-Priest, who were always Ducas of the Bloud, took care to celebrate the Festival, at which the Chracas, or their Deputies did appear for them, with a great concourse of people from the adjacent Provinces.

CHAP. XXIV.

In what manner the Incas took their Degrees of Chivalry, and what Examination they passed.

THis word Huaracu is of the true Peruvian Language, and fignifies as much as to arm a Cavalier; meaning no other thing than those Badges of Honour and Banners which they gave to the young Men of the Royal Bloud, whereby they received their first admission into the War, and were capacitated to take their Degrees and places of Dignity; without these attestations given to these young Men. they could pretend to no Place, or Degree, in Civil or Martial Affairs; and farther to capacitate them thereunto they were to be Batchelours, or fingle Men, according to the Books and Rules of Chivalry. Now to qualifie them farther to receive these Honours, they were (as we shall more amply discourse hereafter) to pass a most severe and rigorous Novitiate, which was an examination of all the Toils, Labours and Hardships incident to War, and which became a Souldier to undergo in prosperous or adverse Fortune. For the better understanding of which, it will be necessary to recite all the particulars performed at this Festival; which, confidering the barbarity of this People, is extraordinary, and admirable, and which might be owned by fuch as are expert, and far advanced in the Art of Military Discipline. At this Festival the Common People demonstrated great Joy. litary Discipline. At this retrival the Columbin People denominated great by and the Incas both old and young received the Honours due to their Merit and Conditions, the old Men were pleased to have their valiant and noble acts recited, and young Men to be thought worthy of being admitted and enrolled in the Lists of Chivalry; and because the Honour or Dishonour of this Test, which the Novices underwent in their Examination, was derived to all their Parentage, and Kindred; the clear and handsome approbation which every one received, became the concernment of the whole Family of the Incus, though they were more particularly interested in the Reputation of such who were of the limpid and lawfull Bloud.

Every Year, or two, more or lefs, according as it was judged convenient, the young Incas, of fixteen Years and upwards, were admitted to this military probation; and no others, though Sons of the greateft Lords, and Curacas: Their Custome was to educate them in a certain House properly constituted for these military Exercises, built within the precincts of Colleanpasa, which I remember once to have seen, when they celebrated some part of these Ceremonies in it, but sell so show or representations, than real performances of them. The Masters or Instructures of the Novices in this House were ancient Incas, who were well experienced in the Arts of War and Peace; and these were those who made trial of them in these following particulars; and in others which I have now for gotten. One of the trials they made of them, was, how they were able to endure a fast of fix days, onely with some sew handfulls of unbaked Cara, which is a fort of their Wheat, and with no other Drink than a small Jarr of Water, and without any thing else, either Salt or Vehn, which is the red Spanish Pepper, yielding such a pleasing fort of taste to them, that it made every thing to reliss, and for that reason it was forbidden to the Novices in their fastings.

This fevere Fast was never enjoined to any above three days, but onely to the Novitiates, who were to be proved to the utmost extremity, whether they were able to suffer Hunger, and Thirst, in the Wars, in case any accident should necessfatte them thereunto; but then another Fast, less rigorous than this, the Fathers, Brothers, and near Relations to the Novitiates imposed on themselves, which they folemnly observed, supplicating their Father the Sun, that he would vouchaste to bestow on his Children, who were now Probationers, force and strength to undergo their task, and acquit themselves with honour; for such as were not able to fustain such hardships as these, they rejected, as not worthy to be admitted into the number of Novitiates. The Fast being performed, and that they were re-freshed and strengthened again with their usual nourishment; then trial was made of their natural nimbleness, and activity of Body in running, from the Mountain called Huanacauri, which was efteemed facred by them, to the Caftle of the City. being about a League and a half; at the end of which race a fignal was fet up, where he that first arrived, was elected Captain over all the rest. Nor did all the others lofe their Honour hereby, for the fecond, third, unto the tenth, acquired reputation: but those who fainted in the course, and were not able to hold our Parents and Relations, would intercept them in the way as they ran, encuraging them to firain and force themselves all they were able, telling them, that they had better dve, and break their hearts in the Race, than come off with Infamy and Diffronour.

Another day these Novitiates were to be divided into two equal parts: one half was to garrifon and maintain the Fortress, and the other half was to affault and form it and having thus fought and contended a whole day, then the day following they changed their flations, and those who had before defended the Fortress, were now to affault it; so that trials were made in every respect of their Strength and Agility of Body, and of their Art and Conduct in War. In the Skirmishes, though they fought with blunted Arms, yet so much was the hear with which both fides contended for their Reputation, that many were wounded and oftentimes some killed in earnest.

CHAP. XXV.

That these Novitiates were to know how to make their own Arms and Shoes.

Having performed these Exercises, they were in the next place to wrestle one with the other, being matched according to their age, and proportion of Body; then they were to leap, and throw the Stone, the Launce, and Dart, and other Weapons, which were thrown by hand; then they shot at Butts with Bow and Arrows, to try their dexterity in Archery; then they tried who could throw farthest against the Walls of the Fortress, for proof of the strength and exthrow farthert against the waits of the Fortress, for proof of the strength and exercise of their Armes; in like manner they threw at marks with their Slings, and managed all forts of Arms which they used in War; then they tried their vigilance and watchfulnes, how well they were able to endure the want of Sleep, setting them on the Centinel for ten or twelve nights together; and in case any one was sound fleeping on the Guard, he was feverely reproached, as unworthy to take any Degree of military Order. They tried also how hardy they were in their Flesh, and how able to endure and fuffer Wounds, which they made with the sharp points of Rods in their Arms and Legs, and other parts, which according to the Habit and Fashion of Pern, were commonly naked; they observed when those Wounds were made, with what courage they received them, whether they changed their countenance, or fhrunk up their Legs or Arms; for unless they seemed insensible of the smart, they were rejected as nice, and esseminate, and their Flesh not har-

of the imart, they were rejected as ince, and eneminate, and their Frent not had dy, nor enduring the Blows and wounds of an Enemy.

Sometimes they placed them in a narrow Trench, where a Fencing-mafter with a club wielded with both hands, or a Quarter-staff, which the Indiani call Micana, came to them, or with a half Pike, which they call Chaqui, which they brandified and flourished before their Eyes and Faces, making offers at their Legs and Heads, at which if they unluckily feemed to wink, or shrink away, as if they feared the blow, they were rejected, and not fuffered to pass the Muster, saving, that such as were fearfull of receiving blows, which were practifed in Exercise onely, withas were fearful of receiving blows, which were practice in Exercise onery, without delign of hurt, would be much more timorous when they appeared before the face of an Enemy, from whom they could expect nothing but Death, or Wounds without favour or mercy; fo that none were approved, but fuch as were unfhaken, and were Bullies as immovable as the Rock it felf.

Royal Commentaries.

Moreover and befides all this, they were to have learned the Trade of making with their own hands all forts of offensive Arms, which were used in the War, at least, such as were most common, and which were made without the help of a forge, or art of a Smith; fuch as Bows and Arrows, and Launces, which were sharpened and pointed without Iron; and Slings which were made of Hemp or Flax; of all which Arms they were to make use, as occasion required: As to defenitive Arms they made use of none, unless they were shields, or Targets, which they called Hualcanea. These Targets they were obliged to make with their own hands. at least to know how to make them; as also their Shoes, which they call Usura, which is a Sole of Leather tied about the Foot with packthread, fich as some wear in Spain, and are like the Sandals of the Franciscan Friars.

The strings which they used for these Shoes were made of Wool twisted with a Spindle, which they held in one Hand, and the Thread in the other, the string was made as thick as the middle finger, and broad, that it might not hurt or gard the Foot, half a yard whereof for each Foot was fufficient, which may ferve to confute the Words of a Spanilly Historian, who, writing of the Indians, says that they wove they knew not how, nor for whom; but we may pardon this false Relation, so much to the Disreputation of the Indians, which also is not altogether without fome reflexion on the Spaniards themselves; for such Men as these being Strangers, and not verfed in the Cuftons of that Countrey, take up at hazard any Report which Men out of Ignorance or Interest deliver to them. Onely this Opinion I would have the World to entertain of these Indians, that of all the Gentiles in the World, there never was any Nation more manly, and which valued themselves more on the account of Hardiness and Bravery, in detestation of all forts of efferminacy, than did the Incas; for they being generally puffed up, and exalted with the lofty thoughts of Alliance to the Sun, were Heroick to an high Degree, and aspiring to greater matters than those which fall within the sphere and compass of their management.

This manner of spinning Wool they called Millny, which signifies as much as to spin Wool for making strings to tie Shoes, or Ropes for carriages or Burthens; the which work was the proper business of Men, the Women had another fort of Spinning, which they called Bubca, which fignifies as much as to fpin with a Diftaff, and is that Word which is onely applied to the Work of Women; which different Expreffions and Proprieties of Speech I have denoted, for fatisfaction of flich as are curious in this Language, for want of which knowledge in the propriety of Words belonging to that Speech, many Spaniards who have writ Hittories of Peru, and dispersed them in Spain, have been guilty of groß mistakes, having charged the Inc.s with many Customs and Practices never known, or in use amongh them. But to return again to our purpole: We fay, that the Novitiates were obliged to learn the Trade of making their own Arms and Shoes, so as to be able to provide themselves with such necessaries at any time, when the urgency of War, or any other emergent accident constrained them to have recourse to their own Art and Industry.

That the Prince himself underwent the rigour of Approbation, and that they dealt more severely with him than with others.

Uring the time of Probation one of the Captains, or Mafters of these Ceremonies, did every day make a Speech to the Novitates, putting them in mind of their lofty Lineage, and descendency from the Sun, repeating the noble and heroick Actions performed and atchieved by their Kings, and other famous Princes of the Royal Bloud; and that according to their Examples they ought to fignalize their Vertue and Valour, towards the enlargement of their Dominions and with generous Constancy and Patience exert all the faculties of Heroick Souls. Moreover they recommended to them Clemency, Piety, and Gentlenes towards the poor, Impartiality in their Justice, and to see that none did Wrong without due punishment, to be liberal and magnificent, as became the bright Son of fo glorious a Father: and in fum, they instructed them in all those Lectures of Morality unto which their Philosophy had as yet attained, ever inculcating the remembrance of their more than Humane Race, and of their Descent from the Ce membrance of their more than Flumane Nace, and of their Delcent from the Celeftial Region. They made them also sleep on the ground, walk bare-foot, excising them in all other points of hardship which was incident to a Souldier's Life. Nor was the Prince, who was the Eldest Son, and Heir to the Inca, exempted from these Exercises of Probation, or treated with less rigour or severity than the others, unless perhaps the greatness of his Birth might excuse him from the labour orners, unless terraps the greatest and some the stage which became the prize and reward of the most swift, was by him laid at the Feet of the Prince, a his undoubted right, to whom also the Inheritance of the Kingdom appertained but as to all other Exercises, such as Fastings, military Discipline, making his own Arms, and Shoes, sleeping on the ground, eating and faring hardly, and marching bare-foot, they were required of him, as the most necessary qualities belonging to a Prince, who being exalted above all others in the sublime Station of his Power and Sovereignty, was also to excell others in his Vertues and Abilities, both of Body and Mind: For in cale at any time their Princes should be reduced to an equality of Fortune, it would not become the Royalty of their Persons to be less worth than other Men, or less able to contend with the cross accidents of an adverse condition; for as they had the advantage of others, both in Prosperity and Adversity, so ought they to be endued with predominant Verus (especially such as are warlike) above the ordinary capacity and scantling of the

By virtue of fuch Excellencies as these, they were of Opinion, that the Prince deserved the Inheritance, and claimed it on a better Title, than of being born Heir to his Father. They were of opinion also, that it was necessary for Kings and Princes to have tried and experienced in their own Persons the Labours and Difficulties of War, that so they might be more sensible, and better able to judge of the merits, and gratise the hazards of their Souldiers. During all this time of Approbation, which continued for the space of one New Moon to another, the Prince went habited in the most poor and mean Clothing that can be imagined, being all made up with rags and patches; with which he was not athanned to appear in publick, so often as his occasions required. And this was done with this farther intent, that when he should behold himself on the Throne of his Majesty, he should look down from thence with a compassionate Eye on the poor, in remembrance that he himself was once one of that number, and on that score endearing his Person to them with Friendship and Charity he might duly claim the Title of Huachaenyae, which signifies a Lover of the Poor. These Exercises of Probation

BOOK VI. Royal Commentaries.

Probation being paft, they were declared worthy of being dignified by the Inc.t, and to be entitled true and legitimate Children of the Sun. Then came the Mothers and Sifters of these young Men, bringing them Usutas, or Sandals of Packthread, which they put on their Feet, in testimony that they had passed and overcome all the severe methods of military Exercises.

CHAP. XXVII.

That the Inca conferred onely the chief and principal Mark of Dignity; and that one of his Kindred conferred the rest.

These Ceremonies being performed, notice was given thereof unto the Inca, who being attended with the grave Seniours of his Royal Family, came to the Novitiates, and in a short Oration, acquainted them, that they were not to rest in the bare Formalities of Chivalry, and Marks of the Royal Bloud, onely to satisfie their light humour with the vanity of empty Honour; but to emulate the Vertues of their Ancestours in their Justice to all, and Mercy to the poor; and that being the true and undoubted Progeny of the Sun, they ought to imitate their Father, shining with the splendour of good Works, which tended to the common benefit of all his Vassak, which was the fole Design and Errant for which they were made, and sent from Heaven to inhabit the Earth. Then the Novitiates came one by one to the King, and presenting themselves before him on their Knees, they received from his hand the sirst Mark and Signal of Royal Dignity, which was to have their Ears bored, and pierced by him in the soft part of the Ear, with a large Nail of Gold, leaving it in the holes both for cure of the Wound, as also to widen the Orifice, and stretch the Ear, being often extended to an incredible bigness.

The Novitiates, in recompence for this favour, kissed the Hand of the Inca, and every one in his turn having received the order, atose from his Knees from before the other Inca; who was Brother, or Uncle, to the Inca; and the Person next in Authority to him; who having loosed their Vsias of unspun hemp, shod them with Sandals of Woollen Manusactory, of the most gentile and fashionable forr, after the manner of the King, and the Incas, that in token of Approbation, and having passed examination, were found and esteemed worthy. This Ceremony of putting on the Shoes, did something resemble the practice of buckling the spuns on the heels of Knights of the military Order in Spain, which being done they kissed them on the right Shoulder, saying, That Child of the Sun, who hath given these evidences of his Merits, deserves to be kissed. For the same Word which with them signifies Kisses, signifies also Adoration, Honour and Courtesse. This Ceremony being pass, where the ancient Incas vested him with the Habit agreeable to his Order, which, until that time, it was not lawfull to put on. This Vestment was made with three corners, two of which hung down at length, to cover the Privy parts, being girt about the Wast with a Twist of the Thickness of a singer; the other part behind was girt or laced about the Thighs, so that though all the other Garments were stripped off, yet this habit would remain a sufficient and decent covering for the Body.

But the chief and principal Mark of this Order was the boring of the Ears, which, as it was a Badge of Royalty, fo this of the Vestment was of Chivalry: the Ceremony of the Woollen Shoes was a Novelty introduced, fignifying the Wearines of the Novitiate after his Labours, and were bestowed by way of re-

freshment rather than as any effential Ceremony belonging to the Order, From this word Huaracu, which fully expresses all the Solemnity of this Festival, the word Huaracu, which fignifies a Cloth or Vestment, and implicitly denotes, that that Person who deserves such Habit, hath a lawfull Title of presence to all those Dignities, Honours, and Royalties, which may be acquired, either by War or Peace. Moreover they placed on the Head of these Novitiates Garlands War or Peace. Moreover they placed on the Head of these Novitiates Garlands of two several forts of Flowers; one was of that which they call Cantut, being of a very beautifull form, and of various Colours, such as yellow, murry, red, and others, all being very lively and chearfull. The other fort of Flower was called Chibuayhua, being of a deep incarnation, not unlike the Gillishowers of Spain. These two forts of Flowers were appropriated onely to those of the Royal Family; it not being lawfull for the Commonalty, nor for any Curraca, how great soever he were to wear that fort of Flower. Moreover they wore upon their Heads the Leaf of an Herb called Vinay Huayna, which fignifies youthfull, being very verdant and green, and bearing a Leaf like that of the Lilly; it conferves it felf fresh for a long green, and bearing a Leaf like that of the Lilly; it conferves it felf fresh for a long time, and though it be withered, yet it continues its colour.

All the Badges of Chivalry and Honour, such as the Flowers and Leaves be fore mentioned, and other things, were conferred alike on all Novitiates, as well as on the Heir apparent; who was differenced from them onely in the Wreath which bound his Temples, which was four singers broad, not round, as the Spaniard imagine it, but like a Fringe, made of Wool; for the Indiana had no Silk in their Countrey; the colour was of a pale yellow, like a Lemon-colour. This diffinction was not worn by the Prince, untill he had passed his time of Approbation, and then it was his single and peculiar Badge of Honour, not being allowed to any other, no not to his own Brother.

The last Royal distinction they gave unto the Prince, was a kind of Poleax, with a Handle of about a yard long, which they called Champi. This Iron had an edge like a sword on one side, and the point of a Diamond on the other, being like a Partesan, onely that it wanted a point. When this Weapon was put into like a Partefan, onely that it wanted a point. When this Weapon was put into his Hand, they faid Ancacunapac, which is a Noun of the Dative Cafe, and figni fies for Tyrants, for Traytors, for cruel Persons, for false Breakers of their Faith, for this and much more this word Anca signifies; these Arms which were put into his Hands, served for an Embleme of Justice, with which he was to punish Offenders: the other particulars of Flowers, and odoriferous Herbs, fignified Cle mency, Piety, Gentleness, and other Vertues and Royal Endowments of a Prince, which he ought to make use of towards his faithfull and loyal Subjects. For as his Father the Sun had caused those Flowers to grow in the Fields for the contentment and pleasure of Mankind; so likewise ought a Prince to cultivate the Flowers of Vertue in his Mind, that so he might justly claim the Title of Lover of the Poor, and that under that character and notion his Name might smell fweet, and be pretious in the World.

The Officers of Chivalry having in the prefence of the Inca made and concluded this Difcourfe unto the Prince; then immediately the Uncles and Brothers of the Prince prefenting themselves on their Knees before him, adored and reverenced him for the true and undoubted Child of the Sun, and Heir of the Inca. The which Ceremony feems a kind of Inftalment of the Prince, and Admiffion to the here-ditary Succeffion of the Empire; which being done, they bound his Temples with the yellowith Wreath. And thus the Feaft of the Novitiates, admitted into the Order of Chivalry, concluded.

The Distinctions which the Kings, and the other Incas, and the Masters of Novitiates wore.

THE King wore the fame fort of Wreath about his Temples, but of a dif-THE King wore the value to the victor about its reinpies, but of a different colour, being red, befides which the Inca carried another more peculiar diffinction, proper to himfelf, which was the two pinion Feathers of the Bird called Corequenque; the which are streaked white and black, and as large as the Wings of a Falcon, or long-winged Hawk; they were to be fellows of the fame. Bird, as I once remember to have feen them planted on the Head of Inca Sayri Tupac. The Birds which have these Feathers are found onely in the Defart of Villanuta, being about thirty Leagues distant from the City of Cozco, situate near a little Lake, lying at the foot of the inaccessible snowy Mountain. Those that are acquainted with that fort of Fowl fay, that never above two of them, namely a Male and Female, are feen together; but whence they come, or where they are bred, is not known: befides which place, the Indians fay, that none are feen in any other part of Peru, though there are other Lakes, and fnowy Mountains, and Defarts, befides that of Vilkannia: perhaps this Bird may be like the Phenix, which none having feen, we may fanfie it after the form and colour of this Bird.

Now in regard that these Birds were fingular in the World, and that none befides them were ever feen before, nor fince, the Incas efteemed them fuch a rarity, as did not become any befides the Royal Head; for the Birds, for the fin-gularity of them, refembling (as they faid) their two original Parents, Man and Woman, which descended from Heaven, served to continue the memory of them, and therefore as their Feathers were facred, fo they were the peculiar note and mark of the Imperial Dignity: For my part, I am of opinion that there are many other Birds of the fame species with these; and that though I will not deny but that there may be a Phenix in the World, yet that this Bird is not of that kind is most probable; howsoever the Indians may maintain what opinion they please, and in devotion to their Fore-fathers, may fansie them like these Creatures which are rare, and esteemed facred. It is certain that the Feathers of these Birds were highly efteemed of in those days, though they are more common now. being worn by many, who fallly pretend to a defcent from the Royal Bloud of the Incas, though in reality the Race of those Princes is almost totally extinct, for in regard the example of foreign fathions hath confounded the true distinctions on the Head, by which the quality of every Person was known, so it gave a confidence to many to usurp this Royal Mark, and pretend to Princely Descent, every one almost affurning the Title of an Inca, or a Pallus.

These Feathers were planted over the coloured Wreath which bound their There reathers were planted over the coloured vyreath which bound their Temples, the pique Feathers pointing upwards, removed at a little diffance one from the other, as they were naturally fpread. Having these Feathers on their Heads, they carried great respect for all forts of Birds and Fowl, so that they took care how they affrighted or chased them away. Every new Inca that succeeded to the Empire, procured new Feathers; for that the former belonged to the King deceased, who being embalaned, conserved all his Ensigns of Regality, of which these Feathers was an essential work. Such was the Mainthy of this Bird Core. thele Feathers were an especial mark. Such was the Majesty of this Bird Corequenque, and such was the Reverence and Respect which the Inc. we expressed towards it; which though the matter it felf be of little importance to the People of opain, yet the knowledge thereof may be pertinent to fuch, as have the curiofity to be acquainted with the Cuftoms and practices of the Incan-Kings. But to return again to our Novitiates: So foon as they had received these Marks of Chivalry, they were conducted to the principal place of the City, where a general lefting markital to the conducted to the principal place of the City, where a general Festival was publickly solemnized for many days with Songs and Dances, in honour and triumph for their Victories; the like also was more privately celebrated in the Families of their Parents and near Relations; who boafted and rejoiced much in the proficiency of their Sons, challenging to themselves a share in their much in the pronciency of their sons, chauenging to themselves a share in their commendations; for they having instructed them in martial Exercises, how to manage their Arms, and make their Shoes, and educated them with hardship temote from effeminacy and softness, did justly triumph and glory, that having peformed their duty towards their Sons, in their Childhood, had now accomplished them with Abilities to serve their Countrey either in War or Peace.

CHAP. XXIX.

How Chuquimancu, a Lord of four Vallies, vielded himfelf.

BUT to return again now to the Reign and Conquelts of the Inca Pachachie, we are to understand, that the General Cabas Tunawaii basing fished and we are to understand, that the General Capac Tupanqui having subdued and we are to understand, that the Golden of the life of the great Curaca Chincha, fent to the King his Brother for a new Army, whereby he might be enabled to overcome those Vallies, or Plain Countries which presented themselves before him. The Inca with all readiness supplied him with new Forces, commanded by good Officers, providing them with all forts of Victuals and Ammunition, agreeable to the greatness of the Enterprise. The new Army being come, with which also the Prince Tupanqui returned, being very defirous to exercise and signalize himself in the War; the General of Chincha boldy proceeded out of his Quarters, and posted himself in the pleasant Valley of Rundbuanac; which is as much as the People's Terrour, because in the River which runs through that Valley many people had been drowned, who supposing the Water to be as shallow in the Winter as in the Summer, rather than go a League a bout by way of the Bridge, have foolifhly adventured to wade over it; but the Chanel being deep, and the Current rapid, have most miserably perished in the Waters. But the Spanish Historians give this Valley, and the River, the name of Lungquana, by corruption of three Letters of this Word; one Writer says, that the Word Guano fignifies mudd, or dung, because it affords good Sullage, and great improvement for their arable Lands, but this Letter G. ought to be H. 60 that the true word is Huano, for the Peruvian Tongue doth not admit of the Letter G. which word Huano fignifies dreadfull; by this particular, and many other in flances that we could give, it is very apparent how little the Spaniards underflood that Language; and what groß miltakes also the Mongrels, or those that are mixed of Spanish and Indian Bloud, did likewise make; for they taking the accent in part from their Fathers, both in speaking and writing are often guilty of strange corruptions; which when I have observed, I have endeavoured to correct a mongs them, but to little purpose, considering how prevalent conversation is, and the communication of a people to whom they are subdued, and become Val

In those days this Plain of Runahuanac was greatly peopled, as also another Low-Countrey lying to the Northward of it called Huaren, which contained thirty thousand Inhabitants; in like manner also Chincha was inhabited, and other Country and Country Country are the Country of the Country o tries fituated North and South of it; but now there are not two thousand Inhabi tants reputed to be there in all, and fome lie wholly defolate, unless they be fome few Spaniards who have taken up their dwellings in those parts.

Having already related the Conquest of Timeas, we are now to take notice, that the Plain of Runahuanac with three others to the Northward of it called Huarts. Malla, Chillea, were all in Subjection to a great Lord called Chaquimanca, who has ving several of these Provinces under his Jurisdiction presumed to give himself the Title of King, and by reason of his Power claimed an Authority and Dominion over others, who were not really, and duly his Subjects. This King (for fo we may term him) hearing that the Incas marched against him, joined what forces he was able to make, and boldly attempted to meet, and give a flop to the Enehe was able to make, and boddy attempted to meet, and give a riop to the Energy at the pass of the River; where after several Skirmithes, wherein many were flain on each side, the Inca at length passed the River by help of some flat botomed Boats, and Floats, which he had made for that purpose. Nor did the Tuncas make all the relistence they were able, in regard their King Chuquimancu declared his Design of retreating to the Valley of Huaren, which, as he falsly supposed was the most advantageous Post; but being unskilfull in the Art of War, he was deceived in his measures, as will hereafter appear; for the Incas having well encamped their Army, made their benefit of this ill Counsel, and in less than a months time gained all the delightfull and pleasant Valley of Huarcu:

The Inca, for fecurity of his Arrear, and for Convoy to his Provisions. having left a fufficient force in Runahuanac, marched forward into Huarcu, where a cruel and bloudy War began, for Chuquimancu having gathered all his Forces into a and bloudy Wall began, to:
Body, to the number of twenty thouland Men, pretended with good Conduct and Strategems of War to defend his people, and gain the reputation of a renowned Captain. On the other fide the Incas used all their Arts to subdue them with the least effusion of Bloud that was possible; though in this War eight months time passed, with many bloudy Skirmishes, not to be avoided, during which time the Incas relieved their Armies with three, fome fay four exchanges of their forces. and that the Enemy might despair of wearying them out, and constrain them at length to remove their Camp; they gave them fure evidences of their resolution to continue in that station until their surrender; for as a token that they lived at to continue in that tratton until their infection, 100 as a token that they lived at eale, with all the conveniences of the City, they called the Quarter of the Inca Cocco; and to the parts about it, where the Army was lodged they gave the name of the principal streets. Pedro de Cieça says, that this War continued above four years, and that the Inca in that time founded a new City, which he called by the name of Cozco; but this Relation he pretends to have received from the Tuncas themselves, who out of vain glory might be apt to magnifie the greatness of their Actions: But the truth is, the four years were no other than a relieving of the Army four times, and the Foundation of a City was no other than the denomination of Cozco given to the Camp.

By this time the Tuncas began to be fensible of Hunger and Famine, which is the most cruel Enemy, and that which abates and brings low the heat and resolution of the most proud and haughty Spirits; but some time before that extreme Famine diffressed them, the Natives of Runahmanac had instantly petitioned their King Chaquimancu to submit to the Incar, before it was too late, and before their oblinacy had exasperated the mind of the heast to give away their Houses, Lands and Inheritances to their Neighbours of Chincha, who were their mortal Enemies: The people being apprehensive of these matters, and finding their King obstinate in his resistence, privately with drew, and sled from the Camp, giving private intelligence to the Inca of the condition and want in the Enemies Army.

Chaquimanca growing now fensible of his Weakness and Distress, and fearing to be wholly abandoned by his people, and at length to fall without any conditions into the hands of the Incas, began to shew himself inclinable to hearken to proposals of Peace; whereupon calling a Council, they resolved to go in Person, and without Mediation of Ambassadours, to humble themselves before the Incas; and accordingly they proceeded to the Royal Quarters, where cafting themselves on their knees, they begged Mercy and Pardon for their Offences, declaring their readinest to acknowledge themselves Vassals to the Inca, fince it was the pleasure and determination of the Sun his Father to make him supreme Lord and Sovereign

The Incas, both Uncle and Nephew, courteoufly received them, according to their usual Grace and Favour, affuring them of pardon, and having vested them with fuch Garments as were accustomary, dispatched them with contentment, and licence to return unto their own homes.

The Natives of these four Provinces, like those of Chincha, make great boastings of the wonderfull Prowefs and Valour of their Ancestours, whom the Incar when not able to fubdue in less than four years War; besides many other Stories of their mighty Deeds, which we omit, because they are not pertinent to our History.

Howfoever this is certain, that the Incas effected it so great a work to have conquered the King Chuquimancu, that as a Trophy of their Victory, and in perpetual remembrance of the valiant Actions performed in this War, both by their own people, and by the Timeas in their own defence, they built a Fortress in the Valley of Huarcu, which, though it were of little compass, yet it was a wonderfull and rare Work for that people, being made with due Symmetry, and according to the Rules of Fortification; and for that Readon, and for the struction of the place, being built on the Sea shore, it ought to be permitted to remain for an ancient plece of antiquity; and indeed the work was so strong and durable, as may last for many ages without any repair; for when I passed by it in the Year 1560, it still shewed what it had been, and which neither I nor any other could behold, without some resenting thoughts of this unconstant and transitory World.

CHAP. XXX.

Of the Vallies of Pachacamac and Rimac; and of their

THE King Chaquimanca being thus subdued, and the Government established in his Countrey, according to the Laws, Rites and Customs practised and observed by the Subjects of the Inca. They passed forwards in farther pursuance of their Conquests, over the Vallies of Pachacamac, Rimac, Chancay and Hamnon, (which the Spaniards call the Baranca, or Breach of Earth between two Hills,) all which four were under the Command and Dominion of a powerfull Ruler, called Cuyssmanca, who also had the vanity to take upon himself the Title of King; and though amongst the Indians they have not a word properly to express the name of King, yet the term of Hatun Apn, which is as much as a great Lord, hath some affinity with that signification: And as to these Vallies of Pachacamac and Rimac, which I shall say once for all, that the Spaniards, by corruption of the last Word, give it the name of Lima, by which it is known to this day.

Now as we have faid before, so we must fay again, and as all the Spanish Historians write, That the Kings of Peru did by the mere light of natural Reason attain to the knowledge of one God, the Maker of all things, whom they called Pachacamac, and Sustainer of the Universe; the which Doctrine was more ancient than the time of the Incas, and which was dispersed through all their Kingdoms, both before and after their Conquests. They sarther affirmed, that he was invisible, and because he would not suffer himself to be seen, for that reason they did not build Temples to him, nor offer him Sacrifices, as they did to the Sun, but onely adored him interiourly with profound Veneration in their Hearts, as may appear by their outward gestures, of bowing their Heads, lifting up their eyes, and opening their Arms whensever his sacred Name came to be mentioned. This Doctrine (as we have said) was everywhere dilated; for so soon as any people was subjected to the Incas, this Principle was instilled, in case it had not taken place and root before: But those who had chiefly admitted and received this Doctrine before the times of the Incas, were the Ancestours of this King Constantaes, who having built a Temple to Pachacamae, did afterwards give the same Name to the Valley where it was erected; which in those days was of the greatest Fame and Renown of any in that Coast. In this Temple the Tuncas placed their Idols, which were the Figures of divers forts of Fish; and amongst them they had also introduced the Image of a Shee-sox.

This Temple of Pachacamae, which was the onely place to dedicated in all Peru, was very magnificent both for the flructure, and for the tervices performed there; for the Timeas offered many Sacrifices of Beafts, and other things; not exempting the Bloud of Men, Women and Children, which they killed at their principal Feflivals, being practifed allo in many other Provinces, untill reformed by the Government of the Incas; and this shall serve at present to have spoken of Pachacamae, intending to touch farther thereupon, as we shall have occasion in the occurrences of this History.

Royal Commentaries.

The Valley of Rimae lies four Leagues to the Northward from Pachacamae; Rimae fignifies something which speaks, having its name from a certain Idol, of the Figure of a Man, which spake, and answered questions, like the Oracle of Apollo at Delphos, and several others in the World, by which the Devil deluded the people in times of the ancient Gentilism. This Idol was seated in a most sumption of the great Lords of Pern either went in Person, or enquired by their Ambassadours, of all important Affairs relating to their Provinces. The Tuncas held this pleasant Veneration, as likewise did the Ineas, after they had subdued that pleasant Valley where the Spaniards sounded that City which they call the King's City, or King's Town, having had its first Foundation begun on that day which we celebrate in remembrance of our Saviour's first manifesting himself to the Gentiles; to that Rimae and Lima, or the King's Town, is all one, bearing Three Crowns, with a Star, for its Arms.

The Spanish Hiltorians consound the Temple of Rimae with Puchaeamae, saying that the Idol of Pachaeamae was the speaking Oracle; but this is but one of those many mistakes of which, for want of knowledge in the propriety of that Tongue, they have been guilty; and indeed the neighboured of those Vallies, and vicinity of one of them to the other, being not above sour Leagues distant, may make their Errour the more tolerable. And thus much shall serve to shew that the speaking Idol was Rimae, and not Pachaeamae; with which let us return to our for-

Before the General Cupac Ynpanqui arrived with his Army at the Valley of Pa-chacamae, he dispatched after his usual Custome, his Summons to the King Cnysmauer, requiring him to yield Obedience to the Inca Pachacance, and that he should prepare to acknowledge and receive him for his supreme Lord and Sovereign, and to observe his Laws and Customs, and that renouncing all other Gods and Idols, they should adore the Sun for the chief and principal God: These were the conditions which he offered to him, which if he refused to accept, he was resolved to make War upon him, and constrain him thereunto, either by sair means or foul, by eentle persuaffons, or ruder arguments of the Sword.

XXXI CHAP.

Of the Answer demanded of Cuysmancu to these Summons. and of what Capitulations were made with him.

THE late successes of the Inca in the neighbouring Countries, had sufficient ly allarmed this great Prince Cussimancu, and warned him to provide for a War, and for his own defence; wherefore having gathered his Army, in presence of the Captains and Souldiers he received the Summons of the Inca; for answer whereunto he replied, That neither he nor his people ftood in need of other Prince or Ruler besides himself, that the Laws and Customs which they observed were descended and derived to them from their Fore-fathers, which they found so good and laudable, that they could not refolve to forfake them to embrace Manners and a Religion wholly frange and foreign to them; that amongst other Gods they adored the Pachacamac, who was the Maker and Sustainer of the Universe. and for that reason must be greater than the Sun; that they had built a Temple and for that reaton mult be greater than the Sun; that they had built a Temple wherein they facrificed unto him of the best of their Substance, and offered he Bloud of their Men, Women and Children to him, esteeming nothing too dear whereby they might testifie the great Reverence and Veneration they had for him, which was so prosound and dreadfull, that they durst not behold his Image in the Face, but approached to him at his hinder parts, as also did the Priests, who dust not so much as lift up their Eyes to behold him; that they had another God called Rimac, whom also they adored, who was more familiar with them, and difcourfed and talked with them, and gave them Counfel in their most difficult Affairs; that they worshipped also a Fox for his Crast and Subtilty, and the Mamacocha, or Mother-Sea, because it provided them with Fish for their nourishment, all which were a sufficient number of Gods for their protection and use, but as to the Sun, they never had heard any great report of him for a God, or that any had heard him fpeak like Rimae; nor had they need of much more heat than what was natural to the Climate of their Countrey, and therefore they defired the Inca to grant them Liberty of Conscience, and Freedom in their way of Worship, for that they did not find any great need they had either of the Inca's Government, or his Religion.

The Incas were so well satisfied to understand that the Yuncas conceived much Devotion for the Pachacamac, whom they inwardly and mentally adored in their Hearts, that they proposed to reduce them without War, and overcome them with perfuafions, reasonings and gentle promises and allurements, reserving the force of Arms and compulfion for the last and ultimate Remedy. With this Intention the Incas proceeded into the Valley of Pachacamac, where they were encountred by the King Cuysmancu with a strong Band of Men, resolved to defend their Countrey: Whereupon the General Yupangui dispatched a Mesfenger to them, advising them not to engage in Battel, untill such time as they had paffed a Conference together, touching the Honour and Worthip of their Gods: For that befides the Sun, whom they adored, they thought fit to acquaint them, that they conceived a great Devotion for the Pachacamac, to whom though they had erected no Temples, nor offered Sacrifices, because he was invisible, and incomprehenfible, and above their Conceptions, yet they inwardly worthipped him in their Hearts, and conceived so great an Awe and Reverence for him, that they durst not take his Name in vain, or pronounce it with their Mouths, without profound and humble Adoration; wherefore fince they worshipped the fame God, and were of the fame Religion, there was no ground or foundation of Quarrel; but Reason rather perfuaded, that they should live in Friendship and Amity together. Moreover the Incas, befides this Devotion which they paid to Pachacamae, whom they held to be the Maker and Sustainer of the Universe;

they had a farther Honour to the facred Oracle of Rimac, which the Timeas also adored; and therefore fince the Ingas condescended to far to them, as to worthin their Idol of Rimae, they ought also to correspond with the like Brotherly kindtheir 1001 of Almac, they ought also to correspond with the like Blotherly kindness, and comply with them in the religious Worthip of the Sun, who was a visible God, and whose Beauty and Splendour deserved Veneration, and whose Benefits bestowed on Mankind, did merit the gratefull acknowledgment of all Creatures, being much more to be preferred before the Deity of a Fox, or other low and infignificant Animals of Sea and Land, to which they paid Divine Honours. Wherefore now by way of friendly Accommodation they proposed to them to acknowledge the Inca his Brother for their Lord and Sovereign, and to obey him as a true born Child of the Sun, being efteemed for fuch, and a God upon Earth, the which he evidenced and proved by his impartial Justice dispensed to all by his Clemency and Piety, by his Gentleness, and by the Excellencies of his Laws and Government, which were so easie and beneficial, as rendred him amiable, and desired by many Nations, who upon the Report of his Vertues, and rare qualifications of his Maiestv. have voluntarily defired to be admitted, and came from remote Countries to lift themselves in the Roll of his Subjects; wherefore since the In hath been pleased to spare them these pains, and come and offer them in their own Countrey fo much felicity, there was no reason they should neglect or refuse fo pretious a Bleffing, because it was free: Wherefore they entreated them again to confider, without prejudice or passion, of these Offers, and not constrain the ha to impose that on them by rude and forcible terms, which he desired gently winfill into them with the most fost persuasions imaginable, and not be forced to have recourse unto his Arms, against which no humane power was capable to make refiftence.

Royal Commentaries.

The King Cuysmancu and his Subjects lent a favourable Ear to all these Discourses, and having obtained a Truce for some days, at length by the Industry and Prudence of the Incas, a Peace was concluded on these following Conditions:

That the Yuncas should adore the Sun and the Incas; that they should build a Temple apart to Pachacamac, where they might facrifice, and make him any Offerings they pleased, provided they were not of the Bloud of Mankind; it being against the Law, and light of Nature, for one Man to murther another, or kill him for a Sacrifice to his God: Wherefore that Custome was wholly to be abolished. That all the Idols in the Temple of Pachacamae should be ejected thence, it being neither reasonable, nor decent to entertain mean and petty Deities in the Temple of that Great God, who is the Maker and Sustainer of the Universe; and who being invisible, ought invisibly to be worshipped; and for that reason, that no Image or Representation of him should be erected in his Temple, where it had not pleased himself to discover his Shape and Form, or to evidence his Beauty in that manner as the Sun daily appears unto us. That for the better Ornament and Fame of this Valley of Pachacamac, a Monastery of Select Virgins should be founded there, with a Temple dedicated to the Sun, both which gave a great Reputation to this Valley, because it resembled the City of Cozco in that matter which made the City it felf illustrious and sacred. That the King Cuysmancu hould fill remain Prince in his own Dominions, and the Curacus continue with their Authority, onely that they should acknowledge Obedience to the Inca, as their Supreme, and observe his Laws and Customs. And finally, That the Incas should bear all Reverence and Respect to the Oracle of Rimae, and should commend all the Delicate that the Incas should be the Delicate State of the Oracle of Rimae, and should commend all the Delicate State of the Oracle of Rimae. mand all their People and Subjects to doe the like.

Upon these Terms and Conditions a Peace was concluded between the General Capac Yupangui and the King Curstmancu, to whom he gave a Memorial of all the Laws and Customs which the Inca commanded him to observe; together with these Constitutions, which relate to the Tribute payable to the Sun, and Inca; all which feeming to be just and honest, the King received them with much alacrity. All which matters and things being orderly ordained, and established, and Officers, with a sufficient Guard, being placed for better security of the Country, the General with his Nephew returned to Cozco, to render the beau an Accuse of the second of the sec count of their Successes, and Subjection of the Yuncas. And that the Inca might have the Acquaintance of the Cussmancu, and own him for his Confederate and Allie, rather than his Vaffal, he was invited to accompany the General to Cozco; with which Cussimancu was greatly pleased, having not onely the opportunity here by to satisfie his curiosity in the fight of that famous City, but to receive the honour of kissing the hands of the Inca.

The Inca Pachacutee, who at the beginning of this War, had feated himself in the Province of Rucana, was now upon the news of his Brother's good Success returned back to Corco, from whence he went to meet his Brother, and Son, welcoming them home with all the Joy and Triumph he was able; and having received Cnysmancu with obliging Terms, and encouraging expressions, he commanded that he should take his place in this solemnity amongst the Incus of the Royal Bloud, of which Cnysmancu was not more proud, than envied by his Cnracas

This Triumph being folemnized, the Inca gratified Chyfmancu with many Honours, and diffrached him to his own Countrey laden with his Favours; as he like wifedid to the other Curacas, who accompanied him, and all returned greatly faic fied, proclaiming the Inca for the true Child of the Sun, and to be adored, and ferved in all parts of the Universe. It is very observable: That so soon as the De vil faw, that the Inca was become Master of the Valley of Pachacamac, and that the Temple there was despoiled of all the little Images and Idols, which possessed it, he presently contrived to make it a Habitation for himself, and to be there worshipped for the unknown God; that he might vent his Lies and Deceirs in all Shapes and forms, and fer them to fale with best advantage. To which end he whispered into the Ears of the most eminent Priests from all the corners of the Temple, telling them, that fince the Temple was now freed of the falle Idok which polluted it, he was ready to give answer to all the Questions and Demands which should be enquired of him; not that he would attend to the frivolous and impertinent Oueries of the common People, but onely to fuch as should be put to him by their Incas, and Princes, who were defirous to be refolved in matters of great importance, relating to the Government, and alterations of State and Religion. And that the common People also might not want a Director, he was pleafed to commit the care of those Resolves to his Servant the Oracle Rimae. whom he had infoired with Wifedom to answer all their Enquiries. From which time it became a Custome to consult all matters of State with the Oracle Patharamac, and to make common and vulgar Enquiries at Rimac; which because they were many, and that this Oracle was ever folicited with a multitude of Demands. he was called the prating Oracle; for being obliged to answer all, it was necessary for him to talk much; the which paffage Blas Valera touches briefly in his Hiffory.

And now at length the Inca Pachacutec thought it convenient to defift for some years from farther progress in his Conquests over the new Provinces, by which time of Peace his Armies would be able to recover and refresh themselves, and he having leifure thereby to attend his Civil Government, might also have means to enoble his Kingdoms with magnificent Edifices, Laws, and Rites, and Ceremonies, agreeable to the new Reformation he was making in Religion, that so his Actions might correspond with the fignification of his Name, and his Fame eternized for a great and wife King in Government, for a fanctified High-Priest in Religion, and for a great Captain in War; and indeed the truth is, he gained more Provinces than any of his Fore-fathers, and enriched the Temple more than any particular Inca before him; for he plated all the Walls with Leaves of Gold, both of the Temple, and Chambers and Cloifters about it. In that place where formerly was the Image of the Sun, is now the Altar of the Bleffed Sacrament; and those Cloifters serve now for Processions at the times of Festivals; that Fabrick being now the Convent of St. Dominick: For which happy Alteration may the bleffed Name of the Eternal Majefty be for ever praifed and exalted.

Book VI. Royal Commentaries.

CHAP. XXXII.

Of the Conquest over the King Chimu, and the cruel War against him.

AT the end of fix years the Inca Pachaeutee finding his Kingdoms rich and happy by the advantages of so long a Peace, commanded an Army of thirty thousand Men to be raised to subdue those Vallies which lie along the Coast of Casamarca, and which were the confines of his Empire, on the side, or at the foot of the high Mountain.

The Army being raifed, was commanded by four Major Generals under his Son, the Prince Themagui, for he having been exercifed for fome years under the Instructions and Example of that famous Commander his Uncle, was now become so good a Proficient in War, that he was capable to conduct and lead an Army on the most difficult and hazardous Design. And for Themagui, Brother to the Inca, and whom he justily called his Right hand, he desired to stay, and keep company with him, that so he might rest, and take repose after his many and geat labours; in reward of which, and for his Royal Vertues, he bestowed upon him the Name and Title of his Lieutenant General, and second Person in all matters and causes relating to War and Peace, with absolute Power and Command in all parts of his Empire.

The Army being in a readiness, the Prince marched with a Detachment of about ten thousand Men by way of the Mountain, untill he came to the Province of Yauyu, which lies overagainst the City of the Kings, or Kings-town, where he made some flay, untill the rest of his Army was come up to him; with which being joined. he marched to Rimac, where the prating Oracle had its Temple. To this Prince Tupanqui the Indians attribute the honour of being the first who made Discovery of the South-Sea, and fubdued many Provinces in those parts, as will appear more at large in the Hiftory of his Life. The Prince being in those parts, was met by the Curraca of Pachacamae, called Cunfmancu, and of Runahuanae, named Chaquimancu, who with their Souldiers received him with much Honour, and with intention to ferve him in the War, and the Prince on the other fide gratified them with demonstrations of his usual Favours and Bounty. From the Valley of Rimac they went to visit the Temple of Pachacamac, where they entred with a profound silence, without vocal Prayer or Sacrifice, onely with figns of mental Devotion, as we have before expressed. Thence he made his Visit to the Temple of the Sun, where he offered many Sacrifices, and other gifts both of Gold and Silver. And to please the Yuncas he visited the Idol Rimac, and in compliance with the late Capitulations between the Inca and them, he commanded many Sacrifices to be offered, and enquiry to be made of that Oracle concerning the fuccess of that expedition; to which having received answer that the design should be prosperous, he marched forward to that Valley which the Indians called Huaman, and named now by the Spaniards the Barranca; from whence he fent his usual Summons to a certain Lord called Chimn, who commanded all the Vallies reaching from the Barranca to the City Truxillo, and are many in number; but the chief and most principal of them are five, namely Parmunca, Hualbri, Santa, Huanapu and Chimu, which is the Countrey in which Truxillo is fituated, and are all five most pleafant and fruitfull Vallies, and well peopled; the Prince giving himself the Title of the powerfull Chimu from the name of that Province where he kept his Court. He also took on himself the Title of King, being seared and honoured by all his Neighbours, who bordered on his Countrey, that is to the East, North and South; for to the West he was confined by the Sea.

This great and powerfull Chimu having received these Summons, gave a quick Answer, That he was ready with his Weapons in his Hands to defend his Countrey, Laws and Liberties; that he would not know, nor receive new Gods; and that the Inca (hould take this for a positive Answer, without seeking farther Refolution or Query in the case. Upon this Answer the Prince Tupanqui marched as far as the Valley Parmunca, where he expected to meet and engage with his Fig. my, and had not long attended before they appeared with a Itrong band of Soul diers, who readily made trial of the Force and Valour of the Incas; the Fight was that and long, in defence of a Pass, which, notwithstanding the resistence made by them, the Incas possessed, and lodged themselves in it, many being slain and wounded on both fides.

At length the Prince observing the resolution with which these Tuncas desen. ded themselves, and that this confidence proceeded from a contempt of his small numbers, fent unto his Father an account of all his proceedings, desiring him to fupply him with a recruit of twenty thousand Men, not that he would relieve his Army, as he had formerly done, and thereby give time and breath to the Erienty. but that he might be enabled to fall upon them with a double force.

These Advices being dispatched to the Inca, the Prince closely attended total the advantages of War, in which he found himself much assisted by the two Cha racas of Pachacamae, and Runahuanae, who having formerly been mortal Ehemiss to Chimu on the old Quarrels about their Confines, and Palturage, making one the other Slaves and Vaffals, did with great animofity and malice take this on portunity in conjunction with the Inca, to vent their malice, and fatisfie their revenge, which the Chimu did more fenfibly feel than any other circumstance. and therefore heated with anger and indignation prepared the more oblinger ly to defend themselves.

Thus did the War become most cruel and bloudy being encreased by the ancient animolities between the Tincas, which they exercised one against the other in service of the Inca, and which was so sharp, that in few days the Inca gained the Valley of Parmuna, driving the Natives out, and forcing them to retire into the Valley of Hualimi, where also happened many Skirmishes, and engagements, and being also driven from thence, they fled into the Valley of South. efteemed the most pleasant and delightfull place in those days of any upon the Sea-Coast, though now it remains almost desolate, because the Natives have destroyed both this, and all the other Vallies.

The Inhabitants of Santta appeared more warlike than those of Hualimi and Parmunca, fo that Skirmishes and Battels frequently happened; and sometimes with that equality of Fortune, that they gained the Honour and Reputation of good Souldiers in the esteem of the Incas, and raised the hopes of the great Chinn; for he flattering himself with the valour and courage of his own Souldiers; and entertaining fancies and imaginations to himself, that this Prince, who had been educated in the foftness of his Father's Court, would quickly be tired with the long continued rudeness of War, and so be desirous to enjoy the pleasures of peace and quietness at home; that the natural desire also of his Souldiers to see their Wives and Families, would cool their ardour and heat towards the War; and that the heat of the Countrey would abate their Mettle, and incline them to a lazy Humour, or else cause Diseases and Indispositions amongst them; with which vain imagination the resolute Chimu entertaining his thoughts, refused to hearken to any Propositions which the Inca from time to time offered to them; but rather reinforcing his Army with all the recruits those Vallies could contribute, he renewed the War with fresh vigour and courage, so that many being killed and wounded daily on both sides, twas accounted the most difficult and bloudy War that was ever waged at any time by the lncas. Howfoever the Captains and Curacus of Chimu, who with due confideration weighed the true flate and condition of Affairs, knew well that this opposition could not continue long, but that eight ther fooner or later they must yield unto the Enemy; and therefore inwardly were enclinable to hearken unto Propositions of Peace and Friendship, though in respect to the Will and Pleasure of their Lord, they patiently endured all the labours and dangers of War, not daring to express their opinions to the contrary, untill such time as they faw their Wives and Children seized and carried into slavery.

Of the Miseries and Sufferings of the Great Chimu: and of his Obstinacy therein; and how at length he was forced to vield.

WHilft the War was thus carried on with great resolution, the twenty thoufand Souldiers which the Prince had demanded for a recruit to his Army arrived, which much abated the haughty and confident humour of Chimu, finding, to his great forrow, all his hopes and expectations disappointed; for on one side he perceived the force and strength of the Inca to be doubled, when he suppofed, or imagined it to be decreased; and on the other, he found the spirit and courage of his own people to be dejected and terrified with the appearance of a new Army; being of opinion, that they were now rather to fight in compliance with the humour of their Prince, than in hopes of making defence against the power of the Enemy: Wherefore being much dismayed and terrified, the chief and principal Lords addressed themselves to Chimu, advising him not to contend, or hold out untill the last extremity, but rather accept the offers and propositions made to them by the Inca; there being no reason to persist longer in this obstinaev, which would give opportunity to their inveterate Enemies to enrich themselves with their spoils, carrying away their Wives and Children into slavery: To prevent which, no farther delays ought to be made, left their lafting obstinacy should provoke the Inca beyond all sufferance, and bowels of humane compassion; and that casting away the terms of Mercy, he should entirely extirpate their race with fire and fword.

With this discourse and admonition of his Friends, (which seemed rather like Menaces, than wholfome counsel) the brave Chimu lost his wonted courage, not knowing what to doe, or unto whom to fly for fuccour; all his Neighbours and Allies fainting under the fame dread and fear of the Inca: So that at length not knowing where to turn, he resolved to accept the first offers and propositions which should be made to him by the Inca; for his great Soul could not bear a submission in Person, or that the first proffers should come from him, lest it should betray a meanness of his Spirit, but rather that the Proposals and Articles of Peace should come to him from the Inca. And in the mean time covering this his intention to his own people, he encouraged them to continue the War; telling them, that he had ftill hopes, and did not fear with the help and valour of his people, but to conclude this War with great honour and advantage. And therefore he encouraged them to fland up in the defence of their Countrey, for whose fake and safety they were obliged to dye with Weapons in their hands, and not for every small disaster to faint and yield; it being the manner of War to be doubtfull, and to lose that one day, which they might re-gain the next: If they were troubled to have seen some of their Wives and Children carried into slavery, that they should comfort themselves with the thoughts, that they had the advantage of their Enemy in that particular, having made greater Depredations on their Wives, than they ever did upon theirs. And therefore that they should not shew any Despondency of mind, but rather trust to his judgment and persuasions, who had more care of their fafety than he had of his own.

With these faint encouragements and counsels, rather than with folid hope, the Great Chimu difiniffed his people, amongst whom he was much troubled to find such dejected and disconsolate countenances; howfoever, putting the best face he could on the business, he maintained the War, untill such time as the usual Propositions came from the Inca, offering pardon, peace and friendship according to the accustomed style often and often repeated. Having heard the Proposals pronounced again to him, he seemed to entertain them with the same indistrerency as formerly; howfoever, as if he were become a little more pliable than he had been, he answered, that for his part, he continued in the same resolution never to condescend, unless for the good and quiet of his Subjects, whom he would there fore confult, and act according to their Directions and Resolves; and so having affembled his Relations and Captains, he acquainted them with the Propositions of the Inca, and that they should confider of them, and of their own welfare: for if it were their opinion to submit, and obey, he would prefer their will and fafety, before his own Honour, or Sovereignty.

The Captains were over-joyed to find their Curaca thus to meet their defires and to recede from that principle, which would have been their destruction; and thereupon took the liberty to tell him, that it was reasonable and just to yield unto such a mercifull Prince, as was the Inca, considering that when it was in his to such a mercifull Prince, as was the Inca, considering that when it was in his power to have subdued them by stores, he would rather invite them by the terms of Mercy. This being the general sense of all the people, it was pronounced with a considerate of Free-men, and not with the awe and reverence of Vastals, and therewith the Great Chima being also convinced, and affenting, dispatched his Ambassadours to the Prince Tapangai, supplicating, that he would be pleased to dispense one Ray of that mercy and compassion to him and his Subjects, which like the bright Children of the Sun, they had cast upon all the four quarters of the World, which were subject to them requires the relative to the prince of the Sun, they had cast upon all the four quarters of the World, which were subject to them requires the relative to the prince of the sun, they had cast upon all the four quarters of the World. World, which were subjected to their power: the which he with the more confi World, which were ubjected to their power: the winderne with the more commence implored, having had fuch frequent examples and precedents of Clemency and Juftice, which both his Father the Inca, and others of his Anceftors, had daily and freely imparted to Mankind; and therefore he was no less affured of his indulgence towards his Subjects, who had less fault than himself, having rather continued in their rebellion by his infligation and encouragement, than by any inclination or perversenels in themselves.

The Prince being well fatisfied with this Embaffy, that he might spare the effusion of that blond which he had so long feared, received the Ambassadours according to his accustomed grace and favour, encouraging them to lay aside all apprehensions of distrust; and for better assurance thereof, he advised them to bring their Curaca with them, that he might perfonally hear his Pardon and Absolution pronounced by the mouth of the Inca himself, and receive favours and presents from his own hand.

The brave Chimu having abated the haughtiness of his spirit, with much humility and fubmiffion prefented himself before the Inca, and proftrating with his face in the Duft, often repeated the fame supplications, which he had made by his Ambaffadours: And in this pofture continued, until the Prince, being greatly affected with the fenfe of his afflictions, commanded two of his Captains to raife him from the Earth; and then told him, that he did not onely pardon him whatfoever was past; but affured him, that he could have done much more, in case he had committed greater offences. That he was not come into his Countrey to deprive him of his State, but to improve, and make it better; instructing them in such Laws both of Religion and Civil government, as would greatly advantage their condition and happiness of living: And in evidence hereof, that Chimu might be fensible that he was not to lose his Estate and Government; he did here freely refign it again into his hands, promiting unto him all fecurity in the enjoyment thereof; conditionally, that rejecting and deftroying all their Idob which represented Fish, and other Animals, they should Worship and Adore no other than the Sun.

Chimn being thus cheared up, and comforted with the pleasant countenance, and obliging expressions of the Inca; again bowed himself, and adored him; and told him, that he was forry for nothing to much, as that he had not yielded to his first Summons; and though his Highness was so Gratious as to pardon this fault, yet he could not forgive himself, being resolved to punish himself for this crime by a perpetual penance, and grief, and lamentation for it in his heart; and that as to Religion, or Customs, or Laws, he should impose what he pleased, and they should be readily received.

With these Conditions the Peace was concluded, and the Chimu yielded to Subjection and Vaffalage; and thereupon both he and his Nobles were velted and honoured. After which for the improvement and adormment of their Countries. trey, Orders were given to erect Royal Edifices, and make Aqueducts and Chanels for carrying Water into their Arable Lands; and for enlarging the Grounds for planting and fowing, and all manner of Agriculture. Store-houses also were erected wherein to lay the proportion of those Fruits which belonged to the Sun. and to the Inca; and for receiving such Provisions as were made against the times of famine, or years of fcarcity; all which was agreeable to the ancient and laudable customs and care practifed by the Incas: More particularly in the Valley of Parmunea, the Prince commanded, that a Fortress should be built, and there to remain for a perpetual remembrance and fignal Trophy of their Victory obtained against the King of Chimu, having been the place and seat of a bloudy War. The For was ftrengthened with great Art, and adorned with Paintings, and other curiofities: Howfoever, these rarities could not administer consideration to unconcerned Strangers and Foreigners sufficient to spare them, and free them from being demolified; howfoever, they are not fo totally destroyed, but that still some ruines remain to show the compass and circumference of that Work.

Things being quieted and fetled in Chimu, Garrifons established, and Ministers appointed both for Civil Government and Matters of Religious Worship; the Prince took his farewell of Chimu, who was greatly satisfied to see himself continued in his Power and Rule; and then the Prince returned to Cozco. where he was received with the usual folemnity, and the Festivals of Triumph celebrated for the frace of a Month.

CHAP. XXXIV.

How the Inca improved his Empire, and of his other Actions till the time of his Death.

 $\mathbf{T}^{ ext{HE}}$  Inca Pachacutes being by this time grown aged, began to fludy his quiet and repose, resolving not to engage himself farther in War for the enlargement of his Empire, having already extended the fame 130 Leagues North and South, and in breadth as far as it is from the fnowy Mountain unto the Sea, which is 70 Leagues East and West; and all in order to the propagation of those received principles from their Ancestors, which were to doe benefit to Mankind, reducing them to rules of Morality and good manners.

He planted many Colonies in dry and barren Countries, having by his Chanels of Water made them fruitfull.

He erected many Temples to the Sun, and Monasteries for the Select Virgins, after the form and model of that at Cozco. He also made many Store-houses for Corn and Victuals, and for Arms, wherewith to supply his Army in their march, and maintain his people in the time of scarcity, and also built several Palaces on the great Roads for better accommodation of the Incas in their Travels. In short, he reformed every thing that was amiss in the whole Empire, and added to his Religion many new Rites and Ceremonies, and introduced many laudable Cuftoms, and new Laws, tending to the better regulation of Moral life: He ejected many of the Idols formerly Worthipped by his Subjects out of the Temples, and forbad many barbarous and abominable cuftoms in use amongst them.

And that he might shew himself as great a Captain and Souldier, as he was a king and Priest, he reformed the Militia, instructing them in the Discipline of War; and for encouragement of his Souldiery, he established new favours and honours for those that should deserve them. He also enlarged and beautified the great size of the subject of th great City of Coxco with sumptuous Buildings, and supplied it with new Citizens and Inhabitants; and particularly he erected a Palace for himself near those Schools, which his Great Grandfather Roca had founded: For which Magnificent actions, and for his fweet and gentle disposition, he was beloved and adored like another Jupiter. He reigned fifty years, and, as some say, seventy; during all which time, he lived in great peace and prosperity; at the end of which he dyed, being universally lamented by his Subjects, having his place allotted to him amongst the Kings his Predecessors, and enrolled in the List and Number of their Gods. He was embalmed according to the custome of their Countrey; and his Obsequies performed with cries, and sighs, and sacrifices, and other ceremonies of Funeral, which continued for the space of a whole year.

He left the Universal inheritance of his Empire to his Eldest Son Yupanqui, and his Wife and Sister Coya Anahnarque, besides which he left above three hundred Sons and Daughters; and that in all, with legitimate and natural Children, he made up the number of more than four hundred; and yet the Indians esteem these but few, considering they were the issue of organ, and so good a Father.

but few, confidering they were the ifflie of so great, and so good a Father. The Spanish Historians consound the Names of this Father and Son in one denomination, calling the Father Impanyai, and the Son Inca, whereas Inca was the Royal Title, as Angustus was to the Emperours. The cause of this mistake amongs the Spanisards arises from the Indians themselves, who having occasion to mention these two Kings, say Pachacutec Inca, Impansus; which the Spanisards missunderstanding, take to be one person, and so consound the Father with the Son; though, in reality, the Indians make great difference, distinguishing this Impansus from his Father and others by the sirrame of Tupac, which is as much as to say (resplendent) in like manner they distinguish another Inca Tupanqui, by the Father of Huasna Capac, and another Tupanqui by the Grandsather of Huascar; and so give some distinction to them all, which I denote for better clearing the History to observing and intelligent Readers.

CHAP. XXXV.

Of the Schools which he founded and enlarged, and of the Laws he made for good Government.

"being dead, and placed by the Indians, amongst the number of their Gods, the Grand Tim his Son succeeded in his Throne by the Name of Manca Capas, untill such time as his Father gave him the Name of Pachacutec, which signifies as much, as if they should call him the Reformer of the World: the which Name was verified by the many faunous Actions he performed, and the many wise Sentences and Proverbs which he uttered; the which were so excellent and renowned, that having deserved that August Title, the former Name began to be forgotten. This Inca governed his Empire with that vigilance, prudence and courage both in War and Peace, that he not onely enlarged it rowards all the four quarters of the World, which they called Tavantinson, but strengthened and corroborated it by such excellent Laws and Statutes, as were judged worthy to be consirmed by the Wisedom of our Catholick Kings; those onely excepted, which had respect to the Idolatrous Rites of their Religion, and to the permissions of their Incestuous Marriages. This Inca, above all things, amplified and endowed with Honours and Revenues those Schools which the Inca Recaption of the strength of the capable of the strength of the

" of Officets, 'tis almost lost and forgotten, to the great damage and obstruction of the Gospel. Such Indians as to these days retain that Language, are much better civilized, and more intelligent than those others, who are as gross and corrupt in their Manners, as they are in their Language.

It was this Pachacetee who prohibited all persons, unless they were Princes, " and of the Bloud-Royal, to wear Gold or Silver, or pretious Stones, or Feathers of divers colours, or the fine fort of Goats Wool, which they had learned to Weave with admirable Art. He commanded, that upon the first days of the new Moon, and other days of Festival, they should go decently, but not gaily dreffed; by which means he made moderate cloathing to become a falhion, which to this day is observed by the Indians, who are Tributaries; and hath that good effect upon them, that thereby they are freed from the danger of bad Arts, which oftentimes necessitate Men to exercise unlawfull contrivances for the fake of fine cloathing, and gay apparel. Though indeed at prefent those Indians who are Servants to Spaniards, or live amongst them, are become greatly corrupt in that particular, not valuing their honour or confciences in comparison with the gallantry and finery of their Apparel. This Inca likewise enjoyned great with the gainatry and intery of their Apparer. This mea intervite enjoying greating in Eating, though he gave more liberty to the Commonalty, as well as the Princes, in the excels of Drink. He ordained particular Officers to overfee, and take notice of idle Perfons, and Vagabonds, not fuffering any perfon to want bufinefs, or employment, but to ferve his Father, or his Mafter, to that Children of five or fix years of Age were not excused from some employment and work agreeable to their years. Even the lame, and blind, and dumb had fome fort of work put into their hands; the Old Men and Women were fet to affright away the Crows and Birds from the Corn, and thereby gained their Bread and Cloathing. And left Men, by reason of continual labour and toil, flould become weary, and their lives burthensome, he provided that for their better ease, they should have three Days of repose and divertisement in every Moon, by which they accounted their Month: He appointed three Fairs in every Month, to be held at the end of every nine Days; so that such as lived in the Villages might at the end of the Week find a Market, at which to vend the Commodities they had made and worked: With occasion of which meeting and concourfe of people, they heard and learned those Rules and Ordinances which the Inca and his Counsel published and proclaimed, though afterwards this King, for the better convenience of his people, appointed Markets to be held every day in the City, which they call Catu, and so remain unto this time': onely the Fairs he appointed to be kept on Festival-days for the greater folemnity and divertisement of the people. He made a Law, that every Province and City should affign Limits and Boundaries to their Mountains, Pastures, Woods, Rivers, Lakes, and Arable Lands, which they claimed and challenged, and to to remain for perpetual figuals of their Rights and Inheritance, that fo no Governour, or Curuca, might dare to encroach thereupon, or extend his authority, or jurisdiction, beyond them; but that the Inhabitants might enloy freely their own possessions without any disturbance from Aliens, or people of the Neighbouring Provinces: In like manner the Royal Rents belonging to the Sun, and the Inca, were assigned, which the Indians were to plow and fow, and gather the fruits of them according to those rules and measures which are before prescribed by their Agrarian Law. Hence appears the errour of those who affirm, that the Indians allowed no right or propriety in their Inheritances: For though the proportion of Lands was not fer out by any exact measures of possession, yet every Man's labour gave him a title to that Land which he was able to Manure; for it was an Ancient custome of the Indians to meet together, and Manure not onely the Lands belonging to the publick, but fuch also as were the possessions of particular persons, which every one appropriated to himself by the right of that labour which he had bestowed upon it: For the manner was for the people to meet together, and then in the first place to plow and fow the Lands belonging to particular men, affifting each other with common labour: Then they employed themselves in Manuring the Lands belonging to the Sun and Inca, with common labour, observing the like rule in reaping and gathering in the Fruits in times of Harvest, and lodging them in the Royal Repositories, or Store-houses. By the same help, and almost by the same common consent they built their Houses, the Neighbourhood being appointed and

Of many other Laws introduced by the Inca Pachacutec, and of his Sentences and Wife Sayings.

IN fine, this King, with the affiltence and wifedom of his Counfel, having reviewed and weighed the feveral Laws, Statutes and Customs in use and practice amongst the many Nations and Provinces which he had reduced, confirmed those of them which were good and profitable, and abrogated those which interfered with the common peace, and were repugnant to the Majelly " and Sovereign Dignity of the Inca; to which he added many other Laws against Blasphemers, Paricides, Homicides and Traytors to the Inca, also against Adulbrainferners, Particles, Hollicutes and Haylors of the away Daughters out of the Houfes of their Parents, or by violence committed Rapes on the Bodies of Women, or attempted the Chaftity of the Select Virgins, or robbed, or purloi ned, or burned Houses, or were guilty of Incest in the right line. Besides which, he added many Rites and Ceremonies to be observed in their Sacrifices, and confirmed those ancient Institutions of his Ancestors, relating unto their Temples and Religion. He also confirmed these ancient Laws following: Namely, That Children should obey and serve their Parents untill the Age of twenty five years; and that all contracts of Marriage before that time, without the confent of Parents on both fides, were void and null; and that Children born in that condition were Bastards, and Illegitimate; but if in case, in the " Estate of such Matrimony, the consent and approbation of Parents should after wards be obtained, then were the Children esteemed Legitimate, and restord to the privileges of lawfull Inheritance. He moreover approved and confirmed the Estates which were appropriated to the maintenance of Lordships and Seigniories according to the ancient customs of Kingdoms and Provinces, in which cases the Judges were not to receive Fees or Rewards for Judgment. Many of ther Laws were made by this Inca of less consideration, the particulars of which for brevity fake, we omit; and shall hereafter discourse more fully of those Laws which he made for Regulation of Judges, of Matrimonial Contracts, and of the Testaments of persons deceased, and of what he instituted about Military Discipline, and the account to be observed in the course and circle of the fury Discipline, and the account to be observed in the course and chee of the year. In this Age of ours Don Francisco de Toledo, changed and altered many of those Laws and Statutes which were made by this Duca, in which the Indians of Serving and admiring his absolute and uncontrollable power, gave him the Name of Pachacutee, the Second, which is as much as to say, the Resonre of the Reformers; and so great was that reverence which they bore to that Inch. "that even to this day his Memory is dear and pretious to them. Thus far are the words of Bluv Valera, which I found amongst his loose Papers; all other matters which he wrote concerning Judges and Marriages, with the account of their Militia, and the course of their year were all lost, which was a general damage to the whole World. Howsoever, in a scattered leaf, I found some Sententions Savings of this Inca Pachacutec, which are these which follow.

CHAP. I.

Of the Colonies planted by the Incas, and of the two different Languages in Pcru.

T was a custome amongst the Incas to transplant the people from one Province to another, that is, from barren Lands and Countries, to more fruitfull and pleasant foils, whereby both the government was secured from rebellion, and the condition of the people advantaged by a happy and profitable exchange: In performance of which delign, the Incui had always a respect to the condition and quality of the people, and the temperature of the climate; transplanting those who had been born and bred in hot or cold Regions, into Countries of the same degree, and equal temper of heat and cold. Likewife in Provinces where the people multiplied greatly, and were become too numerous to be contained within the limits and compass of it; then did they subtract from thence such a number as might ease the Province, and supply the wants of other places. The like was practifed in Collao, which is a Province of 120 Leagues in length, containing feveral other Nations under its juridiction: This Countrey being very cold, produced neither Mayz, which is Indian Wheat, nor Ochu, which is Red Pepper, and yet it abounds with Pulse, and all forts of leffer Grane, fuch as that they call Papa and Quirna, which do not grow in hot Countries; and is also rich in Flocks and Herds of Cattel. From all those old Provinces they transplanted great numbers of Indians to the Eastward by the Mountains of Amis, and to the Westward along the Sea-coast, where lyes a vast Countrey, containing many large and fruitfull Vallies, which produced Mayz and Red Pepper in great abundance, and which before the times of the Incis, for want of the Art and Knowledge of making Aqueducts and Channels for watring the Furrows of their Land, lay wholly dispeopled and deserted. The Incan Kings baying well considered the benefit of these improvements, did frequently transplant their people from the barren, to more commodious and happy foils; and for their refreshment in those Plantations, furnished them with a quantity of Water sufficient for their Lands; making it a Law, that they should succour and help one the other, and by bartering their commodities one for the other, what one wanted was supplied by the other. By these means also the Incas secured their own Revenue, which was paid them in Mayz or Indian Wheat, for (as we have faid before) one third of their Fruits which their Lands produced, did belong to the Sun, and another third to the Inca. Moreover Moreover by this course the Inc.ss were supplied with great quantities of Mayz, for maintenance of their Armies in that cold and barren Country; so that the Collar were able to carry great quantities of Quinna and Ching, and great flice of that which they called Charqui, to their Kindred in other Plantations, and in exchange and barter for them, returned home laden with Mayz, and red Pepper and other Fruits which those Countries yielded; which commodious way of trade was of great benefit and confolation to the Indians.

Pedro Cieça de Leon, in the 99th Chapter of his Book, discoursing of this manner of mutual Commerce, saith, "That in fruitfull Years the Inhabitants of Collins lao live with contentment and plenty, but in dry years they suffer great want, and scarcity of all Provisions. The truth is, had not the Incan-King prescribed "excellent Laws for the government of this People, and ordered every thing with a provident and industrious regard, certainly these Countries would have laboured under great penury and wants, and perhaps have relapfed into the fame bestial condition, in which they once were before the times of the Incas. And thus much I affirm, because I know that the Climate under which the Collas in. " habited, is cold, and therefore not so fruitfull as the warmer Regions of more "happy Countries. And in regard the mountains of dudes did border on all fides of those Colonies; it was ordered, that all parts should iffue forth a cetain number of Indians, with their Wives and Children, who being planted as tain number of Indians, with their vives and Children, who being planted according to the direction of their Caciques in fuch places, as were convenient, might improve their Lands, and by Industry and Art supply that which was wanting by nature; which People were called Minimaes, and were so obedient, and observant to their Lords and Captains, that to this day they are Drudge to them, their principal care and business being to manure and cultivate the Cr ca Plantations, which are fo pretious and profitable, that though in all College they neither fow nor reap Mayz, yet neither the Lords, who are Native, nor the Common People, who are industrious, do want fufficient quantities of " Mayz, Honey, and all other Fruits, in exchange for their Coca. Thus far are the Words of Pedro de Cieça, extracted verbatim from his Original Writings.

Moreover they transplanted the people formetimes on other occasions, when he ving subdued some warlike and stubborn Nation, which being remote from Creen might be apt to rebell, then in fuch case of suspicion or jealousie, to prevental danger of Mutinies, their practice was, to transplant the people from their own foil to some other Countrey, nearer, and within the reach of the their own foil to some other Countrey, nearer, and within the reach of the their own foil to some fellows encompassed with loyal Subjects, and friends to the Government, more easily submitted their Necks to the Yoke, and so became faithfull against their own Inclinations. When any of these Exchanges were made of Colonies, they were always accompanied with some of those whom the first line Manco Capac had honoured with the Title of being Incas by privilege; and these were fuch as were appointed to govern and inftruct the others. The title of these Inc. was an honour to all those whom they accompanied, so that they were much more honoured and respected by the neighbouring and adjacent People. The Colonies which were thus transplanted were called by the common Name of Another piece of their policy much conducing to the regular Government of their Empire, was a Command and an Injunction laid upon all their Vaffals, obliging them to learn the Language of the Court, which to this day is called the common or universal Tongue; for the teaching of which, certain Masters, who were Incas by privilege, were appointed and ordained to instruct the People in its befides which the Incas had a Court-language appropriated to themselves, which being esteemed the holy and divine Speech, was not to be prophaned by vulgar Tongues. This, as they write me from Pern, is entirely loft; for the Empire of the Incas being ruined, their Language ran the common fate of their other Regali-The Reasons why the Incan-Kings did command that one common Language flould be used, was for two respects, first to avoid the multitude of Interpreters, which would be necessary for understanding the variety of Language spoken within the Jurisdiction of that great Empire. And in the next place the heas entertained a particular fatisfaction when they could speak their own words unto their Subjects, and not be beholding to the Tongue of another; believing also that their Subjects with much more chearfulness received the gratious Speeches of their Prince from his own mouth, than when they were conveyed to them by the breath of their Officers: but the chief Reason and Ground of this policy was in reference to foreign Nations, who for want of common Speech and Dialect, were subject to misunderstandings, whence Enmitties and cruel Wars and Dialect, were moject to infinite transfer which, and reconciling their Affections, nothing feemed more probably conducing than a communication in speech, whereby all Misunderstandings might be obviated, and the People be induced to love each other, as if they were of the fame Family and Parentage. With this artifice the Incus reconciled different Nations in a strict alliance, who had before been divided in their Idolatry, Customs and Manners of Living, and so effectual bath this Expedient been, that Nations who have hated each other, have thereby been allured into amity and friendship, by it. The which good effect being observed by many Countries, who had not as yet attained the happinels of being Subjects to this Empire, was a means to invite them to the Study of this general Language of Cozco; the which they having learned, and thereby Nations of different Tongues understanding each other, their Affections were reconciled by it, being from mortal Enemies become Confederates and Allies. Howfoever by this new Government of the Spaniards, many of the Nations who affected the Coz-cos Tongue; have now forgotten it, the which Blas Valera confirms in these

It was the Command, fays he, of the Incas, that all Nations should speak "the fame Language, though now in these days, by whose fault I know not, "the same hath been lost and forgotten in many Provinces; the which hath " proved a great interruption to the spreading of the Gospel, which hath much increased in the adjacent parts of Cozco, where that Tongue is used, and where that people are much more civil, and docible than in other parts. These are the words of Blas-Valera, to which he adds in another Chapter, " That the general Language of Peru ought not to be lost, but rather taught and kept up by practice amongst the people, so that the Preachers of the Gospel may have but one Tongue to learn, and not be forced for every Province to study a different Speech, which would be a task and labour not to be overcome.

CHAP. II.

That the Great Lords of Provinces lent their Eldest Sons to be educated in the Court of the Incas, and their Reasons for it.

THE Incan-Kings enjoined all the Lords of their Vaffals to fend their elder Sons to be educated at their Court, that so they might imbibe certain good Principles of Learning and Religion in their tender years, and being accusto med to a conversation and familiarity with the Incas might contract a friendship and an affection for their Persons and Government; and these were called Minne. which is as much as Domesticks, or of the Family. Moreover it shewed the Grandeur of the Court to be frequented by the Presence and Service of all the young Heirs to those Kingdoms, States and Provinces which depended on that Empire; by which means the Language of the Court became more general and common, being learned with ease and pleasure; for it being the custome for the Sons of all Great Men to take their turns of waiting at Court, they could not fail of attaining fome words and finanches of the Court Language; the which when they returned to their respective Countries, they made use of in all companis, being proud to show what Courtiers they were, and how much refined in their Manners and Words, having learned the Tongue of the Divine Family; the which created an Emulation in others to attain that Tongue also for which their Neighbours and Acquaintance were fo much admired: And having also by the help of this Tongue an introduction to the Conversation and Familiarity of the Chief Officers of Justice, and Managers of the Revenue of the Sun and of the Inca; every one did so labour to obtain the advantage of this Tongue, that with out the infruction of Mafters they with great eafe, and almost infensibly attained unto it; by which means it came to be so generally spread in all parts, that for the compass of almost one thousand three hundred Leagues it became the onely Tongue in use and esteem.

Besides the Honour and Grandeur that this Court received by the presence and attendance of fo many noble Heirs, another benefit did thence accrue, by being a means to secure the Empire from Mutinies and Rebellion; for so long as the young Heirs were at the Court, they were like fo many Pledges and Hostages for the good behaviour of their Parents and Countrey-men, divers of whose Provinces being four, five and fix hundred Leagues from the Court, and many of them inhabited by fierce and warlike Nations, were ready and inclined upon every small habited by fierce and warlike Nations, were ready and inclined upon every imail overture to cast off the Yoke of their Servitude; and though these Nations of themselves singly were not able to contend with the Power of the Incan-Empire, yet being united in a League and Confederacy, might put it into some danger and difficulty; all which was prevented by the residence which these Heirs made at the Court, who were there treated with plentiall Entertainment, and honoured according to their several Degrees and qualities; of all which the Sons rendring to their Parents a true Relation, and confirming the same with such presents as the Inca fent to them, being Garments of the same quality which the Inca himself wore; they esteemed themselves so much obliged thereby, that their Servitude feemed a Freedom, and Loyalty to be their dury, and in case any were so sturdy and stupid, as not to be won by such gentle applications and allurements; yet then the thoughts of having Children within the power of the Inca, were considerated the considerations and allurements. tions sufficient to take them off from courses ruinous to their own Bloud.

With these and the like arts of Providence and Industry, accompanied with rectitude of Justice, the Incan-Empire was supported, and secured in such peace, that in all the ages which the Incas reigned, there was scarce heard the least noise or rumour of Rebellion or Mutiny. Joseph de Acosta speaking in the 12th Chap of his 6th Book concerning this Government, faith, "That fuch was the Fide-"lity and loyal Affection which these people bore towards their Princes, that " there never was mention of any Plot or Treason contrived against their Per-" fores for though with rigour and feverity they required Obedience to their fons, for though with rigour and reverty the required obetterle to their Laws, yet fuch was the Rectitude of their Justice, and Impartiality in the Execution, that none could complain of the least violence or oppression: And such order was observed in the subordinate Magistrates, who so exactly regarded the most minute Irregularities in their Lives, that none could be drunk, or steal a bunch of Mayz from his Neighbour without punishment. Thus far are the Words of Acofta.

CHAP. III.

Of the Language used at the Court.

B Law Valera, in the 9th Chapter of his 2d Book, treating of the general Lauguage of Pern, speaks of the usefulness and facility of that Tongue, as is to be found amongst his loose Papers.

" Now as to the common Language fooken by the Natives of Peru, the truth " is every Province used a peculiar Tongue proper to itself, but during the Reign of the Incon-Kings the Language of Oocco was of greatest extent, reaching from Quity to the Kingdoms of Chili and Tunnac, and which is now in use amongst the Caciques, and great Men, and such Officers as the Spaniards employ in their " Service and Affairs. When the Incas Subdued any Countrey, their first business was to enjoin the Inhabitants to learn the Tongue and Custome of Cozco. and to teach them to their Children; for better effecting of which they gave them Masters and Teachers to instruct them; and for encouragement of such Masters, they gave them Lands and Inheritances amongst the Natives, that so they and their Children living and growing up with that people might continue a perpetual fuccession of Masters and Teachers of that people; and for their better encouragement the Governours of Provinces did always prefer fuch Teachers unto Offices before any others, for they were happy infiruments of Quietness to the Incas, and of Peace and mutual Affection to the people. The Race and Off-spring of those Teachers who anciently came from Cozco, live still dispersed in those Countries, which were assigned for Habitations to their Parents, who having now loft that Authority which their Ancestours enjoyed, are not able to teach the Indians, nor compell them to receive their Language. Whence it is that many Provinces which were skilfull in the Cozcan-Tongue, when the first Spaniards entred into Cassamarca, have now wholly lost and forgotten it; for the Empire of the Incas being overthrown, all their Statutes, Laws and Orders perished with them; and indeed the Civil Wars which arose between the Spaniards themselves together with the malice of the Devil, might all contribute to this confusion, and to interrupt the propagation of the Gospel, which might have been much advanced; had the Apostolical Preachers of it had onely one fingle Tongue to have learned: Whereas now all the Confines and Dependencies about the City of Trugillo, and other Provinces belon-"ging to the Juridicities about the City of 1711,110, and to the Provinces belofting of the Common Language of the Collas and Puquinas, relapfing again into their Mothers Gibberish, know no occasion or need for the Coccan Dialect, which allois at present so corrupted, that it seems quite another Speech to what it formerly was; and more divertity of Tongues are of late sprung up, than were known in the time of Huayna Capac, the last Emperour. Hence it is, that that Con-

" cord and reconcilement of Affections, which one common Speech had produced in the World, was loft, so that Men were become perfidious and hatefull to " each other, having no common tie of Words or Customs to unite and cement them in the bonds of Amity. The which inconvenience not being well obleved by the Vice-Kings, who promiscuously reduced greater and lesser National to their Obedience, not regarding the use of a common Language, whereby the Gospel might have had entrance to them, did thereby greatly obstruct the progress of the Christian Faith, unless the Preachers had been endued with an univerfal gift of Tongues, and learned all the different Dialects of those People which was impossible without the Miracle of Divine Inspiration. Some are of opinion, that the Indians ought to have been obliged to learn the Spanish Tongue, fo as to have taken off that difficult Task from the Priefts, and imposed it on the Indians; but this project would not easily take; for if the Indians were so "dull, and ftupid, that the Cozcan Language, which admits little difference from their own, was learned with much difficulty by them; how can we expect that they should ever attain to the Castillian Tongue, which in every word is strange, and withour any affinity with their own. Were it not rather more feafible for the Spaniards, who are Men of quick Wits, and refined Understandings, to learn the general Speech of Cozco, than to put such poor sottish Wretches, who have no help of Letters, to the difficult labour of learning the Castillian "Tongue; and who shall put their Masters to more labour in teaching them one Speech, than a quick witted Priest shall have in learning ten? Whetesore "it were a more expedite way to oblige them to the knowledge of the Cocco
"Tongue, which differs little from their own; and in this Speech preach the Catholick Faith to them: In order unto which if the Vice-kings and Governours would be pleafed to renew the Commands and Rules given in this case nours would be pleased to renew the Commands and these given it this deby the ancient Incas, obliging the Sons descended from the Line of the old Ma"flers, to reassing the Authority formerly given them for teaching and propagating this general Tongue, they would easily reduce them to a knowledge
"thereof. I remember a Priest and Doctor of the Canon-law, a person very pi-"ous, and truly defirous to doe good to the Souls of the Indians, did with great Diligence and Industry learn himself the Coccan Tongue, which having attain ned, he became very importunate with the Indians to learn it also; in compli-" ance with whose defires many of them applying themselves thereunto, did in " little more time than a year become perfect Masters of it, and to speak it as " readily as their Mother-Tongue; whereby this Priest found so facile an in-"troduction into the Ears of this people, that he eafily inftilled the Fundamentals and Principles of the Christian Faith into their Minds and Hearts; and if one fingle person was able by his sole diligence and endeavours to incline the minds of this people to a compliance with his descriptions which may be minds of the Bishops and Vice-Kings be prevalent and successfull amongs them; and how easily might these Indians, by the help of this general Tongue. "be taught and governed with much gentleness and lenity, from the utmost pars of Quity, to the Countrey of the Chiches? to evince which more clearly, its observable, that the Inca dispatched all their judicial Acts by the help of a few Judges, whereas now in the very fame Countries three hundred Spaniards, who are Corregidores, are not able to pass and perform the Causes relating to private Justice; all which difficulty is caused by the loss of the common Language, the which is much to be lamented, confidering it is a Tongue eafily obtained, as may appear by the many Priests, who in a short time have made themselves Masters of it. In Chuquiapu, as I have been informed, there was a certain Prieft, Doc-" tor in Divinity, who had so great a detestation of this Tongue, that he had no patience to hear it spoken, being of opinion, that it was so difficult, as not to be attained by the greatest Industry. It happened that before the time that a College artained by the greatest industry. It happened that before the time that a College of Jesuits was erected in that Countrey, a certain Priest came thither with intention to reside there for some days, to preach unto the Indians publickly in the general Language. The Priest, who so much nauseated that Tongue, resolved notwith standing for curiosity sake to be present at the Sermon, and having observed that he quoted many places of Scripture, and that the Indians heard him, with great attention, took some kind of liking to the Tongue; so that presently after the Sermon, he asked the Priest how it was possible for such divine and mythere is the groups source of the group source of " fterious fayings to be expressed in words so barbarous as those; to which the

" Drieft answered, that the thing was very possible, for that the Language was " fo copious and easie to be learned, that if he would apply his Mind to it; he " might in the space of four or five months attain to a perfect knowledge of it; " by which being encouraged and moved with a defire of doing good to the Souls of the poor Indians, he promifed all diligence and application of Mind in the thudy of that Tongue; in which, after the labour of fix months, he became so great a proficient, that he was able to hear the Consessions of the Indians, and " to preach to them to his own great comfort, and their advantage.

CHAP. IV.

Of the great Vlefulnels of this Language.

Aving thus made appear the facility of this Language, and how eafily our Spaniards, who go from hence, attain unto it, with how much more readiness must the native Indians of Peru arrive at the knowledge of it; for though the peo-" ple be of different Nations, yet their Language hath some affinity and similitude " together, differing onely in some Words, Dialects and Accents; so that we see how the common Indians, who frequent the City de los Reyes, and of Cozco, the City de la Plata, and the Mines of Potocchi, being forced to gain their Bread and Clothing with the fiveat of their Brows, onely by Conversation and Commerce with the other Indians, without any rules or precepts given to them, " have in a few months been perfect Masters of the Cozean-Language; to which they have added this farther advantage, that when they have returned to their own Countries again, they have feemed more polithed, refined and accomplished beyond the rank of the other Indians; and for that reason were greatly esteemed and admired by Neighbours; which when the Jesuits had observed, who lived amongst the People of Sulli, (whose Inhabitants are all Aymaraes, or Philosophers,) they concluded that the learning of this Language was of a particular advantage to the Indians, and an improvement equal with that which the learning of Latin is to us; the which also is confirmed by the opinion of Priefts, Judges and Officers, who have had or entertained any Converse or Communication with this people; for they have found them more just and honest in their dealings, more docible in spiritual matters, more acute and intelligent in their understandings; and in short, more civil and less barbarous, and more like Men and Citizens than the others; witness the Indians of Puquinas, Collas, Urus, Yuncas, and other Nations, who with the change of their Language, have put off all their turpitude of Manners, and elevated their Souls to more fublime thoughts, which before were immerfed in fense, and reached no farther than the mere fagacity of Brutes: But the aptitude and disposition which the Indians gain thereby, towards the receiving the Doctrine of the Catholick Faith, is a confideration above all others; for it is certain that this Speech of Corco is so copious, and full of words fit to express the Mysteries of divine things, that the Preachers are pleafed to exspatiate in their Discourses with excellent Flowers of Rhetorick and Elegancies, which are made intelligible to the Indians by the knowledge of this Tongue, which hath opened a door for entrance of the Gospel with great benefit and efficacy. And though the Miracles of Divine Grace have evidenced themselves by other means amongst the rude Indians of Vriquillus, and the fierce and barbarous Chiribuanas; yet God, who is most commonly pleased to work by ordinary means; hath generally made use of this Tongue to convey the knowledge and instructions of the Go-" spel; for as the Incan-Kings, by the help of this common Language, which " they with great care and diligence inftilled into the Minds of their people, did " propagate the Law, which the light of Nature taught them; fo also onehis we with the same care and diligence endeavour to continue this excellent me. thod, as the most expedite means to inculcate the mysteries of the Gospel; and therefore it is great pity, and much to be lamented, that our Christian Gover. nours, who omit no ways or contrivances to subjugate that people to the bon-"dage of their fecular power, should be more remiss in those Courses, which tend to the advancement of the Catholick Faith, than the Gentiles were of their Idolatrous Worship. Thus far are the Words of Blu Valera, which because they tend to the advancement of Christianity, I have thought fit to insert bere; and then afterwards, like a learned man, and one skilfull in Tongues, he proceeds to compare the Language of Peru with the Latin, and Greek, and Hebrew; and then proceeds to confute the Opinion of those who fansie, that these Indians of the new World were defeended from the Jews, and for proof thereof they produce some Hebrew words which have a similar with the general Language of Peru, though they are not alike in fignification, but onely in the found or accent. And on this occasion, amongst many other Curiofities and Idioms belonging to this general Tongue, he observes that sous, b, d, f, g, i, and x, are all wanting in the Peruvian Speech, and for that reason, had they been Jews, who are so affectionate to their Father Abraham, that his Name is never out of their mouths, they could never have wanted that letter (b) which is necessary to express a true found of that beloved Name: To which we may farther add, that in all their Language they have no word with two Consonants together, such as bra. but allo the fyllable bra, which are necessary for Jews to express the Name of their beloved Patriarch; and though it may be objected, that this Language of Peru hath many fyllables with two Confonants coming together, such as Papil Hugera, Rocro, Poera, Chaera, Llaella, Choello, and the like, yet it is to be underflood, that these Consonants are disjoined in their pronunciation; as for example, Pap-ri, Huac ra, Roc-ro, Llac-lla, and the like, besides which, for want of a true observation, the Spaniards have many corruptions amongst them; as for Pampa, they fay bamba, for Inca Inga, for Roc-ro Loc-ro, and the like; as we shall hereafter make appear, as these words do occasionally occur; and so we shall recur again unto our History.

CHAP. V.

Of the Third Festival, dedicated to the Sun.

THE Incas celebrated four Festivals every Year in their Court; the principal and most solemn was the Feast of the Sun, called Raymi, of which we have formerly given a relation at large. The fecond was the Institution of the Order of Cavaliers, of which also we have already discoursed. We come now to the two last, with which we shall end, and conclude all the particulars relating to their Festivals; for as to their other more ordinary Feasts, which were performed every Moon; and such Feasts as were kept in honour of Victories and Triumphs. we shall not farther enlarge upon, lest they should seem tedious to the Reader, onely we shall say in general. That these Feasts were held in the Temple of the one) we man ay in general, a that there reads were near in the Temple of the Sun, without Proceffions into the open and publick places. And so we proceed to the third Festival, which they call Cusquieraymi, which they celebrated about the time that their Seed and Mayz was sprung up, and first appeared out of the gound; then they sacrificed to the Sun many Lambs, barren Ewes, and male Sheep, praying to him that he would be pleased not to suffer the Frost to destroy their Wheat; by reason that the Vallies of Cozco, and Sacsahuana, and the Counties thereabout, are subject to mighty Frosts, as are likewise all other parts under the same Climate, which is so very cold, that it freezes there almost the whole year, and more particularly at our Midfummer, which is the depth of their Winter, at which time the Nights are commonly clear, but very tharp and freezing; which fo foon as the Indians observe, they put fire to their Dunghills, to make a smoke and a fmother, being of opinion that the ground under that thick covert gains fome warmth; and thereby the sharp keenness of the Frost is much abated. I remember to have feen this in Cozco; but did not much examine, whether it did any good or not; for being then a Youth, I was not so inquisitive into the causes and effects of things, as I was into the matter which was done.

And now confidering that the Mayz was a fort of grane, which was the chief nutriment of the Indians, and which was most damaged by the Frosts, they therefore, to divert that Judgment offered to the Sun many Sacrifices, with Dances and Drink-offerings, supplicating him that he would be pleased to shroud their Plantations from the damage of the Frosts. The Flesh of the Beasts slain at these Sacrifices was distributed amongst those people who came to the Festival; for besides the Lamb which was offered, and entirely burnt to the Sun, together with the Blond and Entrails of all the other Beasts; the Flesh was distributed amongst the people, after the manner used at the Feast of Raymi.

CHAP. VI.

Of the Fourth Festival, and their preparations to it by Fa stings, and cleansing themselves.

THE fourth and ultimate Feast celebrated in the Court of the Incas was called Citu, which was performed with great joy, in regard it was by way of Thankfgiving, when fickness and diseases, or any other Judgments were removed from the City, and refembled the ancient Luftrations, or Purifications, after the foulness and contagion of distempers was removed. The preparation to this Feat was made by Fastings, and forbearing the company of their Wives; being held on the first day of the Moon, after the Equinoctial in the Month of September. they observed two forts of Fasts, one more rigorous than the other; the most severe was kept by eating a fmall quantity of raw Mayz, and drinking Water, which was not to continue above three days; those that observed the other, were permitted to eat their Mayz parched together with raw Herbs and Roots, such as Lettice, and Radishes, &c. as also Red Pepper, which they call Vehn, and Salt, and to drink their usual liquour, but Flesh, and Fish, and boiled Herbs were so bidden; during which Fast called Caci, they might eat but once a day, and their most severe Fast was called Hatun-caci.

Men and Women in general having made this preparation, and their Children also obliged to one day after the severe manner, they kneaded their Bread called Cancu, which on the Evening of the Vigil they made up in Balls, and put them into a dry pot without liquour to bake, for as yet they knew not the use of 0vens; and being half baked, they took them out. They made two forts of Bread, one fort they moistned with the bloud of Children, from five to ten years of Age, which they drew from the veins of their Armes, or between their Eye brows or Nofes; in fuch manner as when they let bloud on occasion of diffempers. I have feen them make both forts of Bread; when they made that which was mixed with bloud, they first assembled together according to their respective Lineages, at a certain place, from whence they went to the Houle of the Elder Brother, there to perform this ceremony; and in case they had no Brother, then it was done at the House of the nearest relation, who was Head of the family. In the night, when this Bread was made, some hours before day, all those who had thus prepared themselves by falling, arose from their beds, and washed their bodies; and then taking a lump of this ill-baked Bread mixed with bloud, they applied it to their head, mouth, breaft, fhoulders, armes and legs, as if they had purified themselves with it, and cleanfed their bodies of all infirmities. This be ing done, the Mafter of the family, who was chief of the Lineage, affixed fome of this pafte on the lintels of the door next the ftreet; in token, that those of that House had performed the ceremony of Purification. The like ceremony the High Priest solemnized in the House and Temple of the Sun, enjoying the o ther Priests to perform the like in the House of the Wives dedicated to the Sun, and in Huanacauri, which was a Temple about a League distant from the City, being a place highly efteemed, and held in great devotion by them, because that Almos Capac made a fhort abode there, when he first came to the City of Coco, as we have formerly related. On the like errant they sent other Priests to all places, which were accounted hallowed and facred, such as those, where the Devil ipoke to them, and made himfelf to be adored as God. In the King's Court the ceremony was performed by the Eldeft Uncle of the King, who was to be an Inca of legitimate descent.

So foon as the Sun arofe, having performed their Acts of Adoration towards him, they prayed unto him, that he would youchfafe to deliver their City from outward calamities, and inward difeases; and then they broke their fast by eating of that Bread which was made without bloud. Having thus eaten their Bread, and adored the Sun, which was performed at a certain hour, that fo the Adoraand adored the out, which was performed at a certain four, that to the Adora-tion might be general at the fame inflant of time; a certain Inca of the Blord-Royal fallied out of the Fortress, richly attired like a Messenger of the Sun. bawing his Garments girt about his wafte, bearing a Lance in his hand, garnithed with a plume of Feathers of divers colours, which hanged dangling down from the point to the end of the Staff; the length of which was of about three quarters of a Yard, fludded with golden Nails, and which in War ferved for an Enters of a Tard, reduced with golden Paans, and which in your level for an En-fien: With this Lance he iffued from the Fort rather than from the Temple, being efteemed a Messenger of War, and not of Peace; for the Fort, as well as the Temple, was Dedicated to the Sun, being the place where matters of War were treated, as the other was, where peace and friendship were entertained. This Officer came running in this manner downwards from the Hill called Suefahuamam, flourishing his Lance until he came to the Market-place of the City, where four other heu of the Bloud, each carrying a Dart in his hand, met him; having likewife their Garments close girt, after the manner of the Indians, when they put themselves in a posture of exercise, or labour. This Messenger meeting the sour memeives in a portate of exercise, of moon 2 in recing the roll mean, touched the head of their Lances with his, and then told them, that the Sun commanded them as his Officers, that they should purifie and cleanse the City of all infirmities and diseases; and that he gave them full power to perform it.

With this commission the four Ineas departed, running through the four great Streets of the City, which led towards the four quarters of the World, called by them Taventinfum; in their way as they ran, Men and Women, young and old, all came to the Doors of their Houses, with great cries and acclamations, baking their cloths, and the garments on their bodies, as if they would beat out the Dust from them; and then stroking their hands over their heads and mouths. ames and legs, and other parts of their bodies, in manner, as if they were washing of them; and as if they would throw out all the fickness and illness of their Houses, to be expelled the City by the power and virtue of those Messengers of the Sun. Nor was this onely done in the Streets, through which these four Meffengers paffed, but likewife in all the other Streets; thefe four Incas having run about a quarter of a League without the City, were met by four other Incas of the privilege, who taking their Lances, ran with them a quarter of a League farther, and at the like diffance were met by others, until they came five or fix Leagues remote from the City; where having fixed their Lances, and driven them into the Earth, they made that the place of banishment to all their Evils; that so being bounded by those Confines, they should not be able to approach nearer to the City.

Of their Nocturnal Feast celebrated at Night for purifying their City from ficknelles, and other calamities.

THE Night following they lighted great Torches of Straw, fo close and hard twifted together, that they were long in burning, and were not unlike our Wisps of oiled Straw; onely they were made round, and about the bigness of a Foot-ball, called by them Pancancu; to each end of these, they tied a cord of 2. bout a Yard in length, with which they ran through the Streets, casting them round untill they came without the City, supposing that by help of the fires, they expelled the nocturnal evils from their City: For as the evils of the day were droven out by the Lances, fo the evils of the night were carried out by the Torches; which being quenched without the City in a brook or current of water into which they were thrown, were believed to carry with them down their streams all the ficknesses and evils of their City; so that if at any time an Indian, of what Age soever, should happen to see one of these wisps of Straw, lodged by any accident or stoppage on the banks of the River, he presently fled from it, searing to be feized by fome of those evils, which were newly expelled and banished the

The Wars being ended, and the City cleanfed and purified of all its evils and difeafes, great joy and mirth was heard in all their dwellings, not onely in publick, but in every private family, which continued for the first quarter of the Moons during which time, they returned thanks to the Sun for cleanfing and freeing them from all their evils; and in demonstration of such thankfulness, they sacrificed Lambs and Sheep to him; the bloud and entrails of which they burnt in the fire; but the flesh they roasted in the common Market-place, and shared it amount those who were present at the Festival.

I remember, when I was young, that I faw fome part of these ceremonies performed; and that a certain Inca fallied out with his Lance, not from the Calle, for that was then destroyed, but from a House belonging to one of the Incas, which was fituated on the fide of that Hill, where the Cattle was formerly built, called Colleanpata: I saw also the four Indians run with their Lances, and the common people shake their Cloaths, with all the other vile and foolish practices, as eating their Bread called Cancu, and burning the Torches called Pancuncu: For my part, I had not the curiofity to fit up so late at night, as to be present at their nocturnal Festival: Howsoever, I remember, that I saw one of their Pancincus lodged in the fream which runs through the Market-place, and near to the House of my Schoolfellow John de Cellorico, I remember to have seen many Indian Boys to have run from it; but I being a Child of fix or feven years old, and not Catechifed in their Religion, nor knowing the cause, remained unconcerned at the bundle of Straw, not thinking it so terrible as did the Indians.

This Torch we now speak of, was thrown into the stream which runs through the City, and carried abroad according to the ancient inflitution; for the Fealt was not now observed with that strictness and veneration, as it was in the times of their Kings; for beginning now to become obfolete, it was rather performed in remembrance of their ancient cuftoms, than out of an opinion of any effect or virtue of fuch a practice; for there remained still some old superstitious sellows, who refused Baptism, and obstinately adhered to their ancient Gentilism. In times of the Incas the Torches were carried out of the City, and there cast into the River: the water with which they washed their bodies, though it were brought from other streams, was yet to be poured into the River which runs from the City, that so the evils which it washed, might be carried far distant, and by sorce of the current be lodged in the Sea. As we have before mentioned.

There was another Feaft, not publickly celebrated, but kept in every private family and that began about the time after they had ended their Harvest and lodged their Fruits in their Store-houses, called Pirva. Their custome was to burn a small quantity of Tallow, or Fat, near the places where they had lodged their Stores, as a facrifice to the Sun: the Nobles, and rich people, offered tame Conies, which they call Coii, giving thanks for the provisions of bread with which they were supplied for the sustenance of the whole year, and praying, that he would be pleafed to belfow this bleffing on those conservatories of their bread. that they might keep them well and fafe for the fupport and maintenance of humane life.

There were other Feasts which the Priests celebrated within the Temple of the Sun, without any publick processions, being the monthly facrifices offered to the Sun: but these were not to be compared with the solemnity of the other sour principal Feafts, which were like our Grand Festivals of Easter and Christmas

CHAP. VIII.

The Description of the Imperial City of Cozco.

THE Inca, Manco Capac, was Founder of this City of Cozco, which the Spaniards have honoured with the continuance of its Name and Title, calling it the great City of Cozco, and Metropolis of all the Kingdoms and Provinces of Peru. And though they once called it the New Toledo, yet the impropriety of it foon caused that Name to be disused. For Cozco is not encompassed by a River, as is Toledo, nor like it in the fituation; the Houses being placed one above the other, on the fide of a Hill so high, that it surveys from all parts a large and spatious Plain beneath it: the Streets are very long and wide, and the publick Market places very great; so that the Spaniards in general, as also the publick Notaries, and other Writers style it by no other Name than by its ancient Title; for Cocco being like another Rome, the Imperial Head of many Kingdoms and Provinces, may equally deserve a title agreeable to its noble and generous Archievements, and likewife in some things be compared with Rome. As first, in that it was originally founded by its Kings. Secondly, in that it was the Head and Chief City of many Nations, subjected to its Empire. Thirdly, in the Excellencies of its Laws, which were many, and wife, and rarely tempered for the government of its people. Fourthly, in the qualities of the Men who were educated in Civil and Military Discipline, and were civilized and freed from all barbarity in their manners. Howfoever we may fay, that Rome had this advantage of Cozco, that the knowledge of Letters had eternized the fame and honour of Rome, and that its people were not more celebrated for the success of their Arms, than they were illustrious and renowned for their Arts and Sciences; when Poor Cozco hath had nothing but Memory and Tradition to deliver its great Actions, and feats of Arms to posterity. But Rome had the help of Historians to record its famous Deeds, and was as much beholding to 'the Pen, as to its Arms; it being doubtfull whether great Heroes are more obliged to Writers, who have transmitted the same of their mighty Actions to all posterity; or Writers are to the Noble Heroes, for opening unto them to large a field of great and various Atchievements. But this was not the fortune of our poor Countrey, which though abounding with Men famous in Arms, and in Intellectuals, and capable of Sciences; did yet for want of knowledge in Letters, leave no other Monuments of their paft actions, but what Tradition hath conferved and transmitted in some few abrupt and scattered sentences from Fathers to their Children; which also are in a great measure lost by the entrance or Invalion of a new people; for where an Empire or Government harb had its period, being overwhelmed by the power of a ftronger Nation, there all fo by natural confequence must the memory of Acts and Customs perith, which have not been recorded by a skilfulness in Letters.

For my own parts being moved with a warm defire and affection to confere the poor remains of Antiquity in my own native Countrey, I have adventured on this laborious Defign of Difcovery, and of tracing the Footsteeps of the lost reliques of its forgotten Customs and Manners, and therefore that this City of Cozeo, which was once the Metropolis of many Kingdoms and Nations may be revived, and yet live in its ancient Fame, I have refolved in this Chapter to make fome Description of it, as I have received it by Tradition, and also as a true born and faithfull Son of that City, to declare what I have feen of it with my own Eves, and in what state and condition it was in the Year 1570, when I departed thence, specifying what ancient Names were still in use belonging to places and divisions of the City, with what alterations were at that time made in the names of Parochial Churches, and Streets which the Spaniards have built fince their coming thither.

The King Manco Capac having confidered all the conveniencies of Cozco, that it was fituated in a pleafant Valley, in the midft of a Plain, encompaffed on all fides with high Mountains, through which ran four delightfull streams, which though they yielded not great plenty of Water, yet were sufficient to refresh and make all those Lands fruitfull. In the middle of this plain was a Fountain of brackish Water, out of which they made quantities of Salt; the Soil was fruitfull and the Air wholfome: with which advantages the first Inca took a resolution of laving the Foundation of his City, and, as the Indians fay, by Order and Appointment of his Father the Sun, fignified by the discovery of a Wedge of Gold, which was the mark and fignal of that place, where the Head and Seat of his Empire was to be founded. The Climate is rather cold than hot, but yet not in that extreme, as to require Fires to keep them warm; the Chambers, or close Rooms, are sufficient to defend the Inhabitants from the rigour of the Weather, yet a pan of Coals may fometimes be usefull; the Air is not so sharp, but that the thin and lighter Clothing of the Summer may be sufficient, nor so hot as to be incommodious with the Winter-garments; the like may be faid of the bedding; for one Blanket may be a fufficient covering, and if there were three, t'were not cumber fome; for 60 constant and equal is the Weather, that there is little difference be tween the Winter and Summer, being here as in all other temperate Climates, the fame moderation in all featons of the Year. The Air of Cozco being rather cold and dry, than hot and moilt, is not subject to corruption; so that Flesh being hanged up in a Room where the Windows are open on all fides, will keep eight, or fifteen, or thirty, nay to a hundred days without being mortified, until it is become dried like Mummy. This I have feen my felf tried and experimented with the Flesh of Cattel of that Countrey; I know not whether the Flesh of Mutton, brought from Spain, will endure in the like manner; for there was no experiment made thereof in my time, by reason that the stock of the Spanish Sheep were not killed in my time, but rather suffered to increase and breed. The Climate of Cozco being in this manner inclining to cold, breeds very few Flies, and for biting and ftinging Gnats there are none, nor any other Infect that is troublefome, or vexations to the people of the City. The first Houses and Habitations were built on the fide of the Hill, called Sacfabuanan, which lies on the North-east fide of the City, on the top of which the Successours of this Inch erected the stately Fortress, which the Spaniards so little esteemed, nay so much fcorned, that they demolished it in a few days after they became Masters of the City. This City was divided into two parts, Hanan-Cozco, and Harin-Cozco, which is the Upper and the Lower Town. The Way or Road to Antifuyu, which leads to the Eastward, divided these two parts of Hanan-Cozco, which lies to the North and Hurin which points to the South. The first and principal Street was called Colleampata, Colleam is a word of no fignification with the Indians, but Pata is as much as the degree or step of a Ladder, or a Bench whereon to fit. On the rifing or turning of this Hill the Inca Manco Capac erected his Palace, which afterwards was the possession of Paullu the Son of Huayna Capac. I remember in my time to have feen a large and fpatious Hall belonging to this Houfe, which still remain ned, defigned in former days, for a place wherein to celebrate their principal Festivals in rainy Weather. That Hall onely remained in being when I departed from Cozes, but all the other Rooms, which were conformable to the greatness of this. were fuffered to decay, and fall into ruines, without any repair. Next in order we come to another Street, called Canturpata, which looks to the Eastward. which fignifies as much as the Gilliflower-walk; for Canur is a Flower not unlike our Gilliflower, but of a different fort; for before the Spaniards came into this Countrey, there were no Gilliflowers; onely this Cantur refembled very much the Brambles of Andalusa, both in the Stalk, Leaf and Shortness, for the Thorns of it are very prickly, which because they did much abound in that Walk, they gave it the name of the Captur-Walk. Next we come to the Street called Pumacures, or the Lion's Post, because in that place many posts or stakes were driven into the Earth, whereunto they tied their Lions which they prefented to the Inco. untill they had made them tame and gentle. The next great Street was called Toe-cach, but I know not any reason for the composition of this word, Toe-fignifying a Window, and Cachi Salt, which are words ill conjoined together, unless they have some other fignification, of which I am ignorant; in this Street the first Convent, dedicated to St. Francis, was built: Turning a little from hence to the Southward, you come to the Street called Munaycencu, Muna fignifies to love. and Cenca the Nose or Nostrils; I know not the reason or sense for this name, but there must certainly be some superstitious meaning or occasion for it. Hence procreding on the same course, we come to the Street called Rimac pampa, or place of Proclamation, because that there all the Laws and Ordinances were published and proclaimed, and thereunto the multitude flocked from all parts and places to hear and understand the Laws which were promulged. Hence we come into the great Road which leads to Collafusu, and croffes Southward on the Street of Pumapchupan. which fignifies the Lion's Tail, because that Street is very strait and narrow towards the end, being bound in by two Streams, which there fall into one, and which being the most remote part of the Town, was called the Lion's Tail, perhaps because they kept their Lions, and other fierce Creatures, at that place. To the Westward, being about a mile from the farthermost Houses of the Town. there was a Village, containing about three hundred Souls, which in the Year 1560, was thus far distant, but now in this Year 1602, the Buildings are so increased, that they reach up and join to this Village. About a mile farther to the Westward there is another Street, called Chaquillchaca, the figuration of which is improper; by which the great Road paffes to Cuntifugu, and near whereunto are two pipes of excellent Water, which pass under ground; but by whom they were laid or brought thither, is unknown to the Indians, for want of Writings or Records to transinit the memory of them to posterity. Those pipes of Water were called Collyucmachae burns, or the Silver Snakes, because the whiteness of the Water refembled Silver, and Windings and the Meanders of the pipe were like the coiles and turnings of Serpents; and they report also, that the Streets of the City are extended as far as to Chaquillehaea. Paffing hence to the Northward, there is another Street called Pichu, which also was without the City; and another beyond that, called Quillipata, and another great Street called Carmenta, which is a proper Name without any fignification; and here paffes the great Road to Chinchafusu, to the Eastward, where the Street is that is called Huacapuncu, or the Door of the Sanctuary, because that Huaca, amongst the many other fignifications which it hath, fignifies a Sanctuary; Puncu is a Gate, because that a stream of Water enters through that Street, as by a gate, to the chief Market-place of Cozco; for though all the Streets and Lanes of the City were dedicated to the Use and Service of the Temple of the Sun, and of the Select Virgins; yet this passage, or chanel, by which this Water entred, was in a particular manner efteemed facred; as also the place at which it ran out, was called the Lion's Tail, fignifying, that this City, as it was holy in its Laws and Religion, fo it refembled a Lion in its valour, and martial Exercises. This Street of Huwa-punen came at length to join with Collem-Pata; fo that we are now come to the place where we first began, having finished the rounds of the City.

Royal Commentaries.

That the City contained the Description of all the Empire.

THese four great Streets did correspond with the four Quarters of the Empire called Tahuantinsuyu, ordained by Manco Capac, the first Incan-King. who intending to reduce those savage, and barbarous Nations under his Sovereignty. did command them to inhabit those Quarters, which lay towards the places from whence they came, so those who came from the East, planted themselves on the East side of the Town, those that came from the West, on the West side, so that at length they all feated themselves within the circle and compass deligned for the City in their different Ranks and Situations. The Curacas built their House as they found room, when they first came to the Court; for when one had finished his House, another built close by him, every one keeping the order and simation of his Province; for if his Province lay to the Right-hand of his Neighbour's Province, then he built to the Right, if to the Left, then to the Left, if the Province lay to the backfide of his Neighbour's dwelling, then he raifed his House there, fronting towards his own Countrey; so that taking a view of all the People and Nations inhabiting that City, with their feveral Ranks and Situations. it feemed like a furvey of all the Empire, or a Map comprehending in a plain Cosmographical Description all the circumference of Pern. Pedro de Cieca Writing of the fituation of Cocco, speaks almost to the same purpose, in the 93d Chapter of his Book in these words. "And whereas this City contained many Nations " of divers Provinces, and strange Countries, such as the Indians of Chile, Palts, "Cannares, Chachapoyas, Guancas, Collus, and many other people before mentioned; they were all disposed within the precincts of this City, in their respective "Quarters, as they were affigned unto them by the order of their Governous; " having liberty to observe the Manners and Customs of their Fathers, and the " habit of their Countrey, so that if a hundred thousand Men of these were as fembled together, every one would be diffinguished by the attire of his Head, " and his Countrey, and Lineage known to which he belonged. Thus far are the Words of Pedro de Cieca.

This Diffinction was made by the different attire on their Heads, either of Feathers, or Sashes wound about their Temples, which every Province framed to its felf, and not by contrivance, or order of the Incas; onely their Kings commanded them to continue their Falhions, to avoid confusion amongst the Nations which reach from Palto to Chile, which, as our Authour aforefaid alledges, was above one thousand three hundred Leagues. In which manner all the Streets of this City were the Habitations of the Subjects onely affembled thither from all parts of the Empire; and not of the Incas, or those of the Bloud Royal; who lived in the Suburbs of the City, the which we shall lay down, and describe in fuch manner, as they were fituated from North to South, with all their Streets and vacant places, and Palaces of their Kings; and how, and in what manner they were afterwards bestowed, when they came to be divided by lor amough the Spiniards. From the Hill Sacfabuamam there runs a shallow stream of Water from North to South, to the farther part of Pumapehupan, where the City is divided from the Suburbs. But more within the City there is a Street which lies North and South, which is now called St. Auftins, descending from the Houses of the first Inca, Manco Capac, to the open square of Rimac-pampu; there are three or four other Streets which crofs from East to West, through the large space which is between the Street and River, where the Incas of the Bloud feated themselves according to their feveral Ayllin, or Lineages; for though they were all of the fame Family, and lineally descended from Manco Capac. Howsoever being branched into feveral Lines, they derived their Pedigrees from divers Kings, faying that these descended from such an Inca, those from another Inca, and so of the reft: of which the Spanish Historians not having conceived a true Notion. delivered to us for a truth, that fuch a Lineage was derived from fuch an Inca. and that Lineage from another, as if they had been of different Stocks and Families, whenas in reality they all proceeded from the fame original Being, honoured with the Title of Capac Aylin, or the illustrious or august Lineage of the Bloud Royal.

The Men of that Family were called by the name of Inca, and the Women of Palla, which implied a descendency from the bloud Royal. In my time those quarters, descending from the upper part of the Street, were inhabited by Rodrigo de Pineda, Joan de Saavedra, Diego Oitiz de Guzman, Peter de los Rios, with his Brother Diego de los Rios, Geronimo Costillas, Gaspar Jura; but now these Houses are turned into the Convent of St. Austin, as also the Habitations of Michel Sanchez, John de Santa Cruz, Alonfo de Soto, Gabriel Carrera, and Diego de Trugillo. who was one of the first Adventurers, and one of those thirteen Companions, who adhered to Don Francisco Piçarro, as we shall relate in its due place. Moreover there were Anton Ruix de Guevara, John de Salas, who was Brother to the Archbishop of Sevil, together with Valdes de Salas, who was Inquisitor-General, besides others, which I cannot call to mind, all which being great Commanders over the Indians. had their shares and lots divided to them amongst those who were the second Adventurers in the conquest of Peru. Besides these there lived many Spaniards in this quarter, who had no power over the Indians. One of which Houses, after my departure from Cozco, was converted into a Monastery of Augustine-Friars. We all those the first Conquerours, who were of the number of those one hundred and fixty, that were Affiftants of Don Francisco de Picarro in the imprisonment of Advanturers in this Conquest. were those who came in with Don Diego de Almagro, and Don Pedro de Alvarado. both which parties were called Conquerours of Pern, and no others; and the fecond party did much honour to the first, though they were fewer in number, and of a meaner quality, yet being the first and most forward in this adventurous Atchievement, were honoured and esteemed by them as Partners in their Enterprises. And now returning by the upper part of the Street of St. Austin, to enter (as we have faid) into the City, where upon the top of all stands the Convent of St. Clare. formerly the Dwelling of Alonso Dias, who married the Daughter of the Governour Pedro Arias de Avila; on the Right-hand of this Convent were many houses inhabited by Spaniards; and amongst the rest Francisco de Barrientos had possessions, which were afterwards alienated to John Alvarez Maldonado. On the Right-hand lived Hernando Bachicao, and after him John Alonso Palomino, over against which, to the South fide, was the Episcopal Palace, formerly the House of John Balla, and after him of Francisco de Villacastin; where now the Cathedral Church is situated, having been once a wide and stately Hall, which served for a Theatre in rainy Weather, where Shows at their chief Festivals were represented: It was anciently a part of the Palace belonging to the Inca Viracocha, the Eighth King; in my time there was no more remaining of it than this wide Hall, which was fo large, that when the Spaniards first entired into the City, they all lodged therein, so as to be near and ready to afford affishence to each other in case of danger. I remember that I once faw it, when it was covered with Thatch, though now changed into Tile. On the North fide of this great Church there is a Street with many Houses fronting towards the Market-place, in which are Shops for Artificers; and on the South fide, are Shops and Ware houses belonging to the most rich and principal Merchants of the Town.

Behind the Church were the Houses of John de Berrio, and of others, whose Names I cannot remember: Behind the chief Shops were the Houses of Diego Maldonado furnamed the rich, because he was the most wealthy Person in all Peru, being one of the first Conquerours of it. In the time of the Incas that place was called Hauncancha, which fignified the great or high Street, having been anciently the Habitation of Inca Tupanqui. On the South fide of these Buildings of Diego Maldonado were the Houles of Francisco Hernandez Giron; before which to the Southward also were the Houses of Antonio Altamirano one of the first Conquerours; joining whereunto on the backfide were the Houses of Francisco de Frias, and Sebastian de Caçalla; the which quarter of the Town was called Puca marca, or the coloured Street, anciently the Houses of the King Tupac Tupanqui. There is another Street beyond this to the South fide, very long and wide, the name of which I cannot call to mind, where lived Alonso de Loaysa, 'Martin de Meneses. 3th de Figueroa. D. Pedro Puerto Carrero, Garcia de Melo, Francisco Delgado, belides mo. ny other Lords and Persons of Quality, whose Names I do not remember. Re yond this place, to the Southward, is the Square of Intipampa, or the Square of the Sun, because it lies just before the Temple, where those who were not of the degree of an Inca, came to offer their Sacrifices, being not lawfull for perform of less quality to enter within the Walls of the Temple; there the Priess me and received them, and prefented them before the Image of the Sun, whom they adored for God. That quarter wherein the Temple of the Sun was fituated, was called Coricancha, or the Street of Gold, Silver and pretious Stones, of which when there was great abundance, (as we have before declared) within the Templa What now remains to speak of, is the Suburbs of the City, called Pumapelulan.

CHAP. X.

Of the Situation of the Schools, of the three Royal Palaces. with the House of the Select Virgins.

Ow to finish our Discourse of the several Streets of the City, we mult to turn again to Huacapunen, or the Gate of the SanQuary, which lies North from the great Market-place; from whence likewife iffues another Street, the name of which I cannot tell, but may properly call it the Schools, because that the King Inca Roca founded certain Schools in that place, as we have already mentioned in his Life: In the Indian Language they are called Yaca Huaci, or the House of Learning, where their Scholars, or learned Men, called Amauras, or Philosophers, and Haravec, which are Poets, had their place of abode, being very much eftermed, and had in honour by the People, because they were Instructour and Teachers of youth, and Tutours to those of the Royal Bloud. Proceeding from these Schools to the Southward, there are two other Streets which lead to the great Market-place, where are two Royal Palaces, of so great a compass, that they took up all the one fide of the Square. One of these places which is to the Eastward of the other, was called Coracora; which is as much as a large Court; the which is confirmed by Pedro de Cieça, who in the 92d Chapter of his Book, faith, That the King Roca ordered his Palace to be built there, for the better convenience of the Schools, whereto he often reforted, to hear the Lectures of the Philosophers. I have not observed any thing to remain of the Coracora, it being all ruined and demolished in my time; though when the City was first divided into shares amongst the Conquerours of it, the Coracora was the Lot of Gargala; Pigarro, Brother of the Marquel's Francisco Pigarro, with whom I was well as quainted at Cozco, after the Battel of Huarina, and before that of Sacfahuana, he was very kind and obliging to me; for being but a Child of eight or nine years of age, he treated me as if I had been his Son. The other Palace to the Eastward of Coracora, was called Cassana, or a thing of admiration; as if it had been such a stupendious work, that every one upon the fight of it must be transported with wonder and aftonishment; it had been the Habitation of the Inca Pachacutec, great Grandson to the Inca Roca, who in favour, and for ornament to the Schools, or dered his Palaces to be adjoining thereunto; for the Schools were on the backfide of those Palaces, and were contiguous, or joining one to the other, without any other space or division between them. The principal Gates and Front of the Schools opened to the Street and River; but the Incas passed thither by the back way, being delighted to hear the Philosophical Lectures; and sometimes the bits Pachnetice would be Reader himself, and with the same occasion, declare and public lift the Laws and Statutes which he had made, being a great Legislator: In my time the Spaniards opened a way between the Schools, and the Palace Callana: of which I have seen a great part of the Walls remaining, being made of excellent polished Stone, which appeared to have been part of the Royal Lodgings, together with a magnificent Hall, being fo spatious, as in the time of rain and wer weather ferved for a Theatre, and place wherein to celebrate their Feaths and Dancings; and which was fo large, that fixty Men might Exercise themselves on Horfe-back in it with their Darts and Lances. This vaft Hall reached as far as to the Convent of St. Francis, which because it was something remote from those quarters where the Spaniards inhabited, they passed a nearer way to it by the Street Tococachi. A great part of this Hall, or Gallery, was taken up for a Church. and divided from the reft, wherein were Cells or Dormitorics refectory, and other Offices for the Convent; and the open places belonging to it ferved for the Cloifters. John de Pancorvo, one of the first Conquerours, gave this Hall, and the Ground about it to the Friars, it being his lot when a divition of Houses was to every Man according to his proportion: And though feveral others had part of this place with him, yet he bought them out at a certain price, which in those days was purchased at an easie rate. Some sew years afterwards this Monastery was transferred to the place, where it now remains, as we thall mention in its due place, when we come to speak of the Charities which the Citizens made to the Friars for bying in the Ground, and building the Church. So that in my time I have feen this great Hall, or Gallery, demolithed; and the Shops built in the Street of Cassana, which serve for Merchants and Artificers to dwell in.

Before these Royal Houses was a great and open Court, being the chief place of the City, called Haucaypata, where the great entertainments and rejoycings at the chief Festivals were held: the length of it, North and South, was about 200 paces, or 400 foot; and the breadth, East and West, about 150 paces, reaching as far as to the stream of water which runs through the City: At the end of this open Court, to the Southward, were two other Royal Palaces, fituated near the stream, and to the Street called Amarucancha, or the quarter of the great Serpents. fronting to the Street Callana, anciently the Houles of Hugyns Capac, bet pents, or converted into a College for the Jesuits. One great Hall, or Gallery, of these Houses, remained in my time, but not so spatious as that of Cassana; as also a handsome round Tower standing in the middle of the Court before the House: But of this Tower, we shall speak more at large hereafter; for that having been the first quarters which the Spaniards took up in this City, they conserved it in good repair, being also a rare sumptuous Building; no other reliques of these Buildings remained in my time, having been all demolished, and suffered to decay without repairs. When the first division of this City was made amongst the Conquerours, the principal quarter of this Royal Palace, being that which fronted towards the Market-place, fell to the lot of Hernando Piçarro, the Brother of the Marquis Francisco Picarro, one of the first Conquerous of that City. In the year 1562, I saw this Gentleman at the Court of Madrid: Another part of this House was the thare of Mancio Serra de Leguiçamo, another was given to Antonio Altamirano, which he having divided into two Houles, I was to have bought one of them: Another part hereof was fet out by the Spaniards for a Prison, and another was given to Alonso Macuela, one of the first Conquerours, and after him to Martin Dolmos; to whom the remaining parts were allotted, I do not well remember. To the East of Amarucancha, which is the Street of the Sun; there is another Lane called Ac-Ilabraci, or the Convent of the Virgins dedicated to the Sun, which we have already mentioned; and of which we have nothing farther to fay, than that one part of it was the portion of Francisco Mexia, having its Wall adjoining to the great Market-place, and now filled with the Shops of Mer-

All the places which have been hitherto mentioned, whether common Streets, or Royal Palaces, were all to the Eastward of the River which runs through the Market-place: Whence we may observe, that the Incas raised those three great Halls, or Galleries, at the front, and on each fide of the Market-place for celebrating their Festivals with greater convenience, in case it should prove rainy weather at fuch certain times of the two Solftices, and at the beginning of fuch and fuch Moons. When the Indians made a general infurrection against the Spaniards, they burnt all the City, excepting onely those three Galleries of the four M m 2 which which we have already mentioned, viz. Colleampata, Cassan and Amaricancha; but the fourth, which was the Head-quarter of the Spaniards, where now is the Cathedral Church, they shot an innumerable number of Arrows into it, and set fire to it, with Straw, in above twenty places: Notwithstanding all which, the sire was quenched, God not suffering it to be burnt that night, as we shall here after declare; and though they attempted it many days and nights afterwards, yet God who designed to introduce the Catholick Faith into those Countries, did by a strange and wonderfull Providence prevent that destruction, that the Spaniards by his mercy might have the greater cause of Triumph. In like manner they preferred the Temple of the Sun, and the House of the Select Virgins; but all the rest was destroyed by fire, supposing therewith to turn the Spaniards into Asses.

CHAP. XI.

Of the Streets and Houses on the West-side of the River.

HI therto we have described the Palaces and Buildings which are to the East-fide of the River, which passes through the middle of the City. On the West-fide is that wide and open place called Cussipata, which is a very pleasant and chearfull situation. In the time of the Incas this Cussipata was all one place with that on the other fide of the water, for then they covered the River over with great beams, and floored it with planks, for the more commodious receiving the great Numbers of principal Lords, and multitudes of Strangers which crouded to the great Festivals of the Sun: This Bridge which the Indians made of planks, because they had not the Art of Building an Arch, was ruined by the 5mmiards, who in the place thereof erected four Bridges at a convenient diffance one from the other, which were likewise of Timber, and remaining in my time; and afterwards built three other Bridges with Arches, which were franding when I departed. Those two open places were not divided in my time, nor were then Houses on both sides of the water, as now they are. In the year 1555, when my Lord Garcilasso de la Vega was Governour, those Houses were then in building, and were appointed for Dwellings for the Natives of the City; for at that time the fad disconsolate Widow, though she had been Empress of that great Empire, had not one farthing of Rent affigned to her; what she may have had since, I cannot tell. The Incas had never built any thing on the West-side of the River, unless t were that circle of Houses which we have already mentioned; because they would keep a space of ground for succeeding Kings to erect and enlarge their Palaces on, as their fancies and greatness should direct; for every King would have a Palace of his own building for conservation of his Name and Memory; which seems a piece of state and grandeur peculiar to these Kings. The Spaniards afterwards built their Houses in the same row, which we shall now describe, taking them from North to South, as we pass along, with the Names of the persons who dwelt in them at the time that I departed from that place.

For descending with the River from the Gate Avacapuncu, the first Houses be longed to Pedro de Orve, next whereunto were those of Juan Pancorvo, with whom lived Monso de Marchena, such being the ancient striendship between them; for though Monso kept Indian Servants, yet Pancorvo would not suffer him to live separate from him. Proceeding forwards, we come about the middle of the Street, to the Houses of the Valiant Hernan de Laguna, which were formerly the possessions of Antonio Navarro, and Lope Martin, both of the first Conquerours: the Houses of Antonio Nevaranto belonged to Spaniards, who not being Lords over the Indians, we pass them by, as we do several other Streets, to avoid tediousness to the Reader. Next to the Houses of Hernan the Brave, were the Houses of Monso

Hinojofa, which afterwards were the Possessian of Doctor Carvajal, Brother to the Factor, or Procurator, for Yllen-Suarez Carvajal, of whom the Histories of Peru

And now we come again to Cuffipata, called Our Lady of Merceds, where the poor Indian Men and Women relieved their miseries by bartering and exchanging of one thing for another; for at that time Money was not as yet current amongst them, nor was it coined in twenty years after; but here they kept their Market, or Fair, called by the Indians Cata. Passing hence to the Southward, you come to the Convent of the Merceds, which takes up the whole compass of four Streets. Behind this Monastery was another Neighbourhood, who were Masters of Indians; which I pass by, because I am not particularly acquainted with their Names:

beyond this, there are no farther Inhabitants.

But returning to the quarter called Carmenca, and vaffing into another Street

of Houses; we take notice, that the nearest Dwellings to Carmenca, were those of Diego de Silva, the Son of the famous Feliciano de Silva, who was my Godfather. when I was confirmed: To the Southward of these, in the middle of a Street. were the Houses of Pedro Lopez de Caçalla, Secretary to the President Gasca, and of Inan Betanças, with many others on one fide, and the other the Masters. which not being Lords of Indians, I was not acquainted particularly with. Paffing forward into another Street, are the Houses of Alonso de Mesa, one of the first Conquerours, which reach to the Square of Our Lady; adjoyning unto which, on each fide, and also behind, are many Houses; of which I shall not particularly make mention. The Houses to the Southward of those belonging to Alonso de Mesa, were the Possessions of my Master Garcilasso de la Vega, over the principal Gate, of which was a long and narrow Gallery, or rather Balcony, where the principal Gentlemen of the City came often to take their feats, and fee the running at the Ring, the Featt of Bulls, ( which is a fort of Baiting of them on Horseback used in Spain) as also the Darting of Canes, and other sports and exercises performed in the open place before the Gate: Before my Father's time these Houses belonged to a certain Noble Person, who was one of the first Conquerours, called Francisco d'Onate, who was slain in the Battel of Chupas. From this Balcony, or Gallery, as also from several other parts of the City, a point of the fnowy Mountain, in form of a Pyramid, appeared; for though it was 25 Leagues distant, and many other Hills in the way, yet so high was this pique, that it fairly shewed it self to the City with a white covering of Snow, which always remained, and never thawed: they called it Villeanuta, or some sacred, wonderfull thing, for this word Villeanuta was attributed to matters of great admiration; for indeed the form of this Pyramid is rare and curious, beyond any description we can make of it; and for confirmation of this truth, I refer my felf to those who have seen it. To the West-side of my Father's Houses, were those of Vasco de Guevara, one of the Conquerours of the second expedition, and were afterwards given to Coya Beatrix, the Daughter of Huayna Capac; on the South-fide of these were the Dwellings of Antonio de Quinones, which also fronted with the Great Place of our Lady; and farther to the Southward of these were the Houses of Thomas Vazquez, one of the first Conquerours, formerly possessed by Alonso de Toro, Lieutenant-General of Gonçalo Picarro, whom Diego Gonçalez his Son-in-law killed, out of a fear and jealoulie he had of him, ariling from some domestick quarrels between them. To the West-side of Thomas Vazquez his Buildings were the Houses of D. Pedro Luis de Cabrera, afterwards in the possession of Rodrigo de Esquivel. On the South-side of Thomas Vazquez his Houses, were those of Antonio Pereira, Son of Lope Martin of Peringal; next unto which adjoyned the dwelling of Pedro Alonso Carasco, one of the first Conquerours; to the South-side of which were others of less consideration, and the last of that quarter, which in the years 1557, and 58, began to be peopled. And now turning on the foot of the Hill Carmenca, to the Westside of the Houses of Diego do Sylva, we come to the Dwellings of Francisco de Villa, a Valiant Man, one of the first Conquerours, and one of the thirteen Com-Panions of D. Franciso Picarro. To the Southward of these on the other side of the Street, was a long and narrow Lane without Houses: Southward from which, was a very pleasant Walk, where now is the Convent of St. Francis, before which is a very wide and large place; and likewife more Southward from hence on the other fide of the Street are the Houses of Juan Julio de Hojeda, one of the first Conquerours, the Fither of Don Gomez de Tordora, who is still living. To the Westward of these Houses of D. Gomez, were those of Martin de Arbieto, he vond which, in the year 1560, were no farther Buildings; for to the Westward of them was a great Plain in my time, convenient for running and breathing of Horses, and at the end of it was erected that rich and famous Hospital of the Indians founded in the year 1555, and 56. Thus far the Buildings reached in those days, what enlargements were made, were added fince. The Gentlemen which we have named in this Treatife, were all Perfons of Quality, and of Noble Blond and famous for their Arms, having vanquilhed and won that most rich Empire, the greatest part of which I knew, and of all those which I have named, there were not ten with whom I had not a personal acquaintance.

CHAP. XII.

Of the two Gifts which the City contributed for Charitable Vles.

m Efore\ I}$  treat of the Foundation of that Hospital, and the Contributions given to it; I shall first mention the charitable Gifts which the Citizens made to the Friars of St. Francis, for buying the ground and body of the Church, which they found already built to their hands, when my Lord Garçilasso de la Foga was Governour of Cozco: the matter was this: These Friars (as we have said) ha ving their Convent in Callana, made a demand (I know not for what reason) upon Juan Rodriguez de Villa Lobos, for this Ground and Church; in pursuance of which, they preferred a Bill in the Chancery, defiring that they might have polfession of this Ground and Church, paying unto this Juan Rodriguez so much Mo ney as the Church and the Land about it should be valued or esteemed at, being 22200 Ducats: The Prior of their Franciscans was then F. Juan Gallegos, a holy Man, and one of a most Exemplary life and conversation; by whose means payment was made of this Money in the House of my Father, who gave possession thereof to the Friars, delivering the price in Bars of Silver. At which the standers by much admiring, being aftonished to see so great a sum paid so readily and punctually at the time by fuch poor Friars; the Prior made them this answer, that they should not wonder at these Works of Heaven, being produced by the mere charity of this City, whose hearts God had touched, and moved with such pious Zeal, that I can affure you (faid he) that on Monday of this Week we had not above 300 Ducats of this fum towards our payment; and now we are but on Thursday morning, when I am present before you with this great sum, raised by the pious contributions of the Inhabitants of this City, as well Gentlemen Souldiers, as Lords of the Indians, who for these two last nights came knocking at our Gates with Alms in their hands, which they defired to bestow secretly, with such frequent and continued course of pious Benefactors, who called to the Porter to receive their Alms and Charity, that we have not been able to take our rest or repose; all which I heard that good Man speak in commendation of the liberality and charity of the City. And now to speak farther of the Foundation of this Hospital, we must know, that this Godly Prior dying, another succeeded in his place, called Antonio de St. Michel, a Person of a Noble Family, (of which Name also there was a great Divine in Salamanca) who for his holy life and doctrine being a true Son, and faithfull Follower of St. Francis, was made Bishop of Chili, where he lived with exemplary piety and godliness, as the Kingdoms of Chili and Peru can testifie. This holy Man, in the second year of the three in which he lived a Bishop, preaching every Sunday, Wednesday and Friday in Lent, according to his usual custome in the Cathedral Church of Cozco, did upon a certain Sunday propose, that an Hospital should be erected in that City for the Indians; and that a Fraternity of Indians, should be Super-intendents, or Supervisors over it, as the Spaniards were over theirs; affuring them, that the Spaniards had obligations to wards the Indians in some manner, which no Man could acquit himself of, whether he were a Conquerour of them, or not, but by some such satisfaction for their debt: And purfuing this discourse with most persuasive Arguments in all the Sermons of that Week, on the Sunday he concluded after fuch a preparation made: That the Governour, and he, would try what operation his Sermons had effected on them, to which end they would go personally from house to house to demand their charitable contributions towards this pious Work; admonishing them to thew themselves as large and open-hearted therein, as they had been valiant and covetous to obtain the Empire. Accordingly the Governour and the Prior took their Walk from house to house to gather the charitable Alms of the City, coming at first to the Dwellings of those onely who were Masters of the Indians: And at night, when my Father Garcilasso returned home, he commanded me to sum up the account of all the Collections; which when I had done, I found it to amount unto 28500 Pieces of Eight, which makes 34200 Ducats: the least that was given by any particular person was 500 Pieces of Eight, which makes 600 Ducats; there were some who gave a 1000 Pieces of Eight. Thus much was the Collection made in one Evening, and in the space of five hours onely; other days they took to go from neighbour to neighbour, every one giving so freely, that in a few months the fum amounted to above a hundred thousand Ducars: the which report being noised about in the Countrey, and that an Holpital was therewith to be founded for the Natives, many other contributions were added in the space of that year, some being given by Last Will and Testament, and some by devout and charitable persons in the time of their Life and Health, so that the Work was chearfully begun, the Native Indians, within the Jurisdiction of the City, concurring thereunto with all ready affiftence, being affured that the use and benefit thereof was intentionally designed for themselves. Under the first Stone of the Foundation, which was laid by my Father Garcileft, he put a * Doblon of Gold, being one of those with two Faces, of Fordinand * A double lass, he put a * Doblon of Gold, being one of those with two fraces, of Ferdinand * A double and Isabel, the King and Queen of Spain: That fort of coin was rare in those days, fhillings Enand especially in that Countrey, and at that time, where, and when no Money eighth. ther in Gold or other Metal was flamped; for the Spanish Merchants did then bring their Commodities, which they bartered or exchanged for Wares of the Countrey, or fold for Silver or Gold, but brought no Money coined into those parts. I believe that the Doblon was brought thither for a curiofity, and prefented to my Father as a Medal; and of the same opinion were all those who saw it: for it paffing from one to another, the whole Corporation of the City, then prefent at this Solemnity of laying the Foundation, did all esteem it for a great curiofity, being the first coined Money that had been seen in that Countrey; and for that reason was worthily employed in that charitable Work. Diego Maldonado, a Native of Salamanoa, firnamed the Rich, for the great Wealth that he had attained, having formerly been Governour of the City, laid under one of the Stones a Plate of Silver with his Arms engraven upon it; and on this poor Foundation was erected this rich Edifice; which was afterwards endowed with many Indulgences and Pardons from the Popes, for all those who should dye in it: the which being made known to a certain Indian Woman of the Bloud-Royal, with whom I was acquainted; the finding her felf fick, defired to be carried into the Holpital; to which her Friends not agreeing in confideration of the abilities she had to maintain her felf; howfoever the still perfitted in her defires, faying, that it was not the cure of her Body that she designed, but to enjoy and partake of those Indulgences which the Princes of the Church had given unto those who should dye in that Hospital; for which reason she being carried thither, resuled to have her Bed laid in the Chambers of the fick, but in a corner of the Church; where the defired, that her Grave might be opened near to her Bed, which she covered with the Habit of St. Francis, and defired to be buried in it 3 then the called for the Wax candles, which the intended to have burnt at her Burial, that they might be in a readiness: And having received the Holy Sacrament and extreme Unction, the lay four days after calling upon God and the Bleffed Virgin, and all the Celeflial Court of Angels, and then expired. This godly end which this poor Indian

Woman had made, being generally known and talked of, the two Corporations of the City, both Spiritual and Temporal, agreed to honour her Obsequies and Enterment with their presence; the which being observed by other Indians, (who esteemed all their Nation and Lineage much favoured therein) it was hoped that this might be a means to animate and encourage them to embrace at their Death the same advantages which the Christian Religion produces. With which we shall conclude this discourse, and pass on to the Life and Actions of this tenth King, in whose Reign we have many particulars of great admiration.

CHAP. XIII.

Of the New Conquest which the Inca Yupanqui designed to make.

THE good Inca Tupanani having bound his Temples with the coloured wreath, and performed the Funeral Rites due to his Father; the first thing he designed was to render himself pleasing and gratefull to his people, by visiting the several Provinces and Kingdoms of his Empire; which (as we have said) was esteemed by the Indians for the greatest grace and savour which the Inca could the stiff towards his Subjects: For being possessing with an opinion, that the Inca were not of humane race, but descended as Gods from their Father the Sun; they could not but conceive and sansie great blessings to accompany so gratious a presence; and we may believe, that the Inca departing with these intentions, waste ceived in all parts by his Subjects with great joy and adoration. The Inca having passed in all parts by his Subjects with great joy and adoration. The Inca having passed three years in this progress and visitation, returned afterwards to the City; where having consulted with his Counsel, he resolved to undertake a brave and hazardous War towards the Insis on the East-side of Cozco; for as yet the Confines of the Empire were bounded by a long ridge of Hills, by which the showy. Mountain extended it self; but being desirous to pass it, and discover what Pople or Nation inhabited on the other side, the way to pass was contrived by solowing the current of Waters, which run through those Hills from West to East, for that the tops and precipices of those Mountains, by reason of the Snows, were esteemed impassable.

The pretence for this War was grounded on the common and plaufible colour of Religion; the defign of withdrawing them from their unhumane and babarous cultoms, and influcting them in the knowledge and religion which the Sun their Father had delivered, and all Nations had received, were always forble arguments, and infallible grounds for making their War just.

This defire, and motives of seeing this Countrey were encreased by an ancient

This defire, and motives of feeing this Countrey were encreased by an ancient relation which the Ancestors of this Inca had received, that the Nations on the other side of this Mountain were populous, and the Lands fruitfull; but that part thereof was inhabitable, being nothing but Mountains, Lakes, Bogs and Marish Grounds.

And as a farther encouragement to this design, there was a report, that among those populous Nations, the greatest and most considerable of them was called Muss, and since by the Spaniards Mosos; to which there is a passage by a great liver, which about the Antis to the East of the City is divided into many rivules, being five in number, every one having its proper Name; but afterwards on the other side of the Antis, they meet together, and falling into one stream, make a great River, called Amarumayn. Where this River empties it self Northward into the Sea, is not discovered; it is probable, that running Eastward, and joyning with many other Rivers, it comes at length to fall into that River which we call the River of Plate; for the Spaniards, when they first discovered that Country demanded of the Natives, whether there was Silver in those parts? they answered that in that Countrey there was none, but that at the Head of that River was great abundance; from whence the Spaniards give the Name of Plate to that River, though there be no Silver Mines arifing in that Countrey; towards the mouth of that River which is effected fo famous, that it hath gained the renown of the fecond great River in the World after the Orellana.

The River of Plate is called in the Indian Tongue Parabuny, though the great River above (if that be it which joins with the River of Plate) is named Amarumoyu, all the other five Streams lofing their proper Names, when they join with this. Mayn fignifies a River, and Amaru are thofe great Serpents which are nourifhed in those Countries, of such bigness as we have before described, forafnuch as these Serpents being compared with lessers and the such exceed them, so doth that River surpass the Brooks and lesser Streams.

CHAP. XIV.

The Successes of the Expedition into Musu, until the end of it.

IT being impossible to find a way into Musu, over the inaccessible Mountains, and through the Lakes and Bogs, the King Tupanqui resolved to follow the course of the River, though as yet not known, or discovered; in pursuance of which, Order was given to cut down Timber, and make Boats, or Floats, for transporting ten thousand Men, with Provision sufficient for them, the which were two years in preparing; all which being built, and made ready, and the Souldiers raised and armed, and the Victuals and Ammunition provided, and the General and Officers named, all which were Incas of the Royal Bloud, they embarked in their Boats, made capable to carry thirty, or forty, or fifty Men a piece. Their Provisions they laid in the middle of the Boats, raised about half a yard from the bottom, to keep them from wet. With this force and preparations, they sculled down the Stream, and in their passage had many difficult Rencounters, and Battails with the Natives of Chinichu, who inhabit on the Banks on one side, and the other of that River, assembled in great numbers both upon the Water, and on the Land, to interrupt their passage. The offensive Arms used by that People of Antir, were Bows and Arrows: Their Faces, and Arms, and Legs were painted over red, and their Bodies with various colours, for the Countrey being hot, they went always naked, with a clout onely before their Privities, with Caps on their Heads, made up with the Feathers of Parrots, and Guacannyas.

In conclusion, after many Skirmishes and Treaties between one and the other Party, the several Nations and Inhabitants on the Banks of this River, were all reduced to the Obedience and Service of the Inca; and in acknowledgment of such submission and Vassalage, sent Presents to the King Tupanqui of Parrots, Monkies, Drills, Honey, Wax, and other Fruits which their Countrey yielded. These Presents were constantly made untill the death of Tupac Amaru, who was the last of the Inca, his Head being cut off by Francisco de Toledo, Vice-king of the Indies, as we shall hereaster more largely declare in the Lives and Successions of those Kings. Many of those Indians who were ordered to bring their Presents to the Inca, did afterwards, by concession from them, plant themselves near unto Tono, a place about twenty six Leagues distant from Cozco, where their Generation hath remained to this day. The Natives on the side of the River, commonly called Chunchu, being thus reduced to the service of the Inca; they proceeded forwards to other Countries and Nations untill they came to the Province of Mnsu, inhabited by a numerous and warlike Nation, having all things plentifull of their own product, and distant about two hundred Leagues from the City of Cozco.

The

The Incas report, that when they came into that Countrey by reason of the ma ny Skirmilhes they had passed, and the Difficulties they had encountred, their A. my was reduced to a very small number; howsoever they attempted to persuade the Musins to submit unto the Inca, to whom the Sun was Father, and who had fent him from Heaven to teach Men the way of a rational and moral Life; that being Men, they should not appear like Beasts, but adoring the Sun for God they should for fake the Worship of Stocks and Stones, and other vile and inani. mate Creatures. The Incas observing that the Mulus gave attention to them, were encouraged to make known their Laws and Cuftons to them, and recount the Provinces had voluntarily, and of their own accord, offered themfelves to the Obedience and Service of the Inc., defiring him to take them under his protection. as this People and Worshippers of his Deity. It is moreover reported, that the Incas particularly declared to them the Dream of Viracocha, and his great Actions At the hearing of all which, it is faid that the Musius were so assonished, that they readily accepted the friendship of the Incas, and embraced their Religion, Laws and Statutes with great Devotion, promifing to be governed by them, and to acknowledge no other than the Sun for their principal God. Howfoever they refufed to be efteemed for Vaffals of the Inca, having not been conquered by him. but were proud to be accounted his Allies, Friends and Confederates. Under pretext of which Friendship, the Musius gave leave to the Incas to live and inhabit in their Countrey; for there not remaining above a thouland of them, they did not apprehend any danger of being subdued or enflaved by them, and therefore freely gave them liberty to take their Daughters and Kindred for their Wives, and having a great Veneration and Efteem for their Perfons and Wifedom, they committed the government of all things into their hands, both of War and Peace. Upon the Poundation of this new Alliance, and at their perfuafion, they fent Ambassadours to Cozco, to adore the Inca as the Off-spring of the Sun, and to confirm that Friendship and Alliance which they had contracted with his Subjects: taking a great compass in their way thither, to avoid the high Mountains, marish grounds and bogs, which were not paffible in the direct line. These Ambassadours being arrived at Cozco, were received by the Inca with all imaginable kindness and favour; commanding that care should be taken to inform and instruct them in the manner of his Courts, his Laws, Statutes and Religion; with which the Mr. fin receiving great fatisfaction, returned again to their own Countrey, with telelution to maintain this Friendship and Confederacy so happily begun, which continued untill the time that the Spaniards invaded and overcame their Country, Particularly it is reported of these Incas, who planted themselves in the Country of the Musiu; that the Children descended from them, desiring to return to Cour in the time of Huayna Capac, for that finding all things quiet in the Countrey of Manjus, and no danger of any revolt, the natural delire of vifiting the Countrey of their Fore-fathers, invited them to carry their Wives and Children unto Cozas; but in their way thither receiving news that Huayna Capac was dead, and that the Spaniards possessed the Land, having subverted and utterly destroyed the Empire of the Incas; they altered their delign, refolving to return again to the Mulm where they were ever afterwards highly esteemed, and held in Veneration, and all matters both of War and Peace committed to their management. It is faid that the River in those parts is fix Leagues broad, and that their Canoes are two days in paffing over it.

CHAP. XV.

Of the Remains which are still apparent of that Expedition.

THE particulars of this Conquest and Discovery made by the Inca Tupanqui, which we have recounted in brief, were asterwards more at large related by the Indians, boasting much of the mighty Acts and Valour of their Ancestours; telling us of Battels which they fought upon the Water, and on the Banks of the River, and of the many Provinces they subdued, and many other Enterprises, which seem incredible to have been performed by a handfull of Men; and because that hitherto the Spaniards have not been able to make themselves Masters of the people about the Antis, how much less can it be pointed out to us, the way and means that these seem incredible, we that design to write a true History, have not thought fit to mix Fables with our true Relations, especially of things which being acted in remote and unknown parts, could not come so distinctly to our cognizance, as those which were acted in the Precincts of our own Countrey. Though the truth is, the Spaniards have in our time found many Evidences and Remains of those matters, as we shall see more distinctly hereaster.

In the Year 1564. a certain Spaniard, called Diego Aleman, born in the Town of St. John in the County of Niebla, Inhabitant of the City of Paz, otherwise called the New Plantation; being made Lord over a few Indians, was persuaded by a Caraca of that place, to take twelve Spaniards more into his company, and with them to make a journey into the Province of Musu, where he assured them was much Gold, offering himself to be their guide; the journey they undertook was a soot, both for privacy, the better to surprise the Natives, and because the way was mountainous, and not passable on horseback; their Design was for that present onely upon discovery, to see and observe how the Land lay, to know the ways, and afterwards return with greater force, to make their Conquest; they entred by Cochapampa, which borders upon Mossa.

They travailed twenty eight days through Mountains and Thickets, and unfrequented places, and at length came to a view of the first Province of that people. The Casique gave them a caution to proceed silently, and enquire of matters from some Indian before they discovered themselves; but the Spaniards not hearkning to the caution he gave, on the close of the Evening, with more boldness than prudence entred the Province, making a noise, as if their numbers had been great, or as if the sound of the Spanish Tongue onely, had been sufficient to affright them. But matters succeeded quite otherwise, for the Indians taking the allarm, and by the shout they made, concluding them to be sew in number, took courage, and falling upon them, killed ten, and took Aleman captive; the other two, by the darkness of the night escaped, and returned to the place where their Guide promised to expect them, being not pleased with the railness of their Countel. One of the two which escaped was called Francisco Moreno, the Son of a Spaniard, by an Indian Woman, born at Cochapampa; this Man got a Cloth made of Cotton, which was hanged in the air for a Hamock or Cradle, to lay a Child in it, having six Bells of Gold tied to the ends of it, woven with several Works in divers colours. So soon as it was day the two Spaniards and the Curaca could from the top of the Hill discover a great number of Indians, with Lances, and Pikes, and Breast-plates, which glittered against the Sun, all which, as the Guide assured them, were made of Gold; and that they had no Silver in their Countrey, but that onely which they procured from Perm in exchange for their Gold. And to describe the greatness of that Countrey, he told them, that as the List was to that

Mantle, so was all Peru in comparison of that Countrey; but to let pass his Conmography, there is no doubt but that this Province was both wide and long.

Afterwards these Indians having every Evening converse and society with those of Pern, had understood from them, that this Diego Aleman had been the Leader and Chief of those few, who attempted this bold and rash Defign; on reputation of which, they so highly esteemed and honoured him, that they chose him the Captain of their Army in that War which they made against their Neighbourson the other fide of the River of Amarumayu 3 judging themselves extremely honou. red, and fecure under the conduct of to renowned a General of the Spanish Na. tion. But Francisco Moreno, his Companion in these Travails, being overwearied in his Journies and Labours, fo foon as he arrived in his own Countrey, dyed having our himself into a Fever in his Travails over the Mountains and Ma rifles, which were not to be paffed on Horfe-back, but on Foot onely: The Moreno recounted many things at large relating to this Discovery, which moved and persuaded many to undertake this Design; the chief whereof was Gomes, a Tordoya, a young and brisk Gentleman, to whom the Count Nicua, Vice-king of Peru communicated all the particulars of Moreno's Journal at large: But in regard great number of people came in to offer their fervice, and lift themselves in the Expedition; the Vice-king fearing a Mutiny, or fome Combustion, gave out that the Defign was laid afide, and that they would disband the Souldiers which they had already raifed.

CHAP. XVI

Of other unhappy Successes which befell the Spaniards in that Province.

TWO Years after, Castro, a Doctor of the Civil Law, Governour of Pers, gave a like Commission to another Gentleman, an Inhabitant of Coco, called Gaspar de Sotelo, who fitted and prepared himself wirh a brave and stone company of Souldiers, who freely and voluntarily offered themselves to accompany ny him in this Expedition: But that which gave most hope and advantage to this Defign was a fecret Correspondence between him and the Inca Tupac Amark, who was retired into Villcapampa, they both having agreed to join their Forces to gether for this Conquest, and that Tupae was to furnish him with flat bottomed Boats to pass the River of Villcapampa, which lies to the Northeast of Cosco, But as in the like occasions there never want malitious Spirits, who, envious of the Enterprises of generous Men, do always endeavour to doe ill Offices; so in this also there appeared those, who derogating from the worth and ability of  $G_{MM}$ . de Sotelo, persuaded the Governour to take away his Commission, and conserit upon Juan Alvarez Maldonado, which being done, he raifed two hundred and fifty Foot, and one hundred Horfe, and embarked them on great flat bottomed Boats, built on the River Amarumays, which lies East from Coxco. Gomes de Tordoso observing that this Conquest which he designed to himself, was by Commission glven to Gaspar de Sotelo, and afterwards to Juan Alvarez Maldonado, in preparing ven to Gaspar de Sotelo, and alterwards to standards. In preparing for which, he had engaged his Friends, and spent his own Estate, he to highly resented; that he would not be diverted, but published abroad, that he also intended to proceed on that Design; for though they had revoked his Authority, yet he still kept his Commission, by virtue of which he went on in raising his Souldiers; and though sew appeared, and that his numbers did not amount to above sixty Men in all, because the Governour had declared his sense and pleasure against six; yet in despight of all opposition resolving to proceed; he entred by the Province of Camata, which is Southeast of Cozco, and having passed insuperable Mountains, and difficult marish and boggy Grounds; he arrived at length at the River Amarumayn, where receiving advice, that Juan Alvarez was not yet passed, he entrenched himself on the banks of the River, with design to hinder his passes. ne entrended infinited on the bailts of the River, with design to finited his par-fage, and to treat him as an Enemy; and though he had but a finall number which adhered to him, yet being all choice Men, and faithfull to him, every one carrying two Carbines well fixed and charged, he promifed to himfelf fuccess and advan-

Juan Alvarez foon following after, descended by the stream untill he came to the place, where Gomez Tordoya expected his coming; they being both emulous each of other, and exasperated with equal gall and anger, without any other treaty or prologue, came to blows. Juan Alvarez Maldonado confiding in his Numbers, was the first Aggressor; Gomes trusting in the courage of his Men, and their double Arms would not give ground, but received his charge with great constancy, fo that they fought that whole day, as also the second and third, with that spight and rage, and with fuch little confideration, that they were almost all killed; and fuch as did escape with their lives, were yet so wounded, that they were disabled. and unfit for fervice. The Indians, who were Natives of that Province of Chini-thi, having observed this advantage, fell in upon those that remained alive, and unterly destroyed them; amongs which Gomes de Tordoja was also slain. I knew all these three Gentlemen, and lest them in Cozco, when I departed thence. The Indians took three Spaniards alive, that is, this Maldonado, Diego Martin a Portugal Friar, and a certain Gun-fmith called Simon Lopez; Maldonado being known by the Indians to have been the Commander in chief of one of those parties, was treated by them with all courtefie and respect; and considering that he was wounded, and a Man in years, they gave him liberty to return unto his Indians in Cozco, giving him convoy to as far as the Province of Callavaya, where the finest Gold is extracted in pieces of four or five Caracts in weight: but the Friar and the Gunfmith they kept above two years afterwards; during which time, they employed the Gun-fmith folely in making them Hatchets and Pick axes of Copper; and the Friar they held in great veneration, because he was a Priest, and a Servant of the God of the Christians: And when at length they gave them liberty to return to Peru, they entreated the Friar to flay amongst them, and teach them the Doctrine of Christianity, but he refused to dwell with them, This and many such occasions have been lost, whereby the Gospel might have been propagated by Preaching, without the force and compulfion of Arms.

Two years afterwards the Chunchus gave licence to these two Spaniards to return unto Perw, guiding and conducting them untill they came to the Valley of Callavaya, so that they told their own Story of this unhappy expedition. They also gave an account of all the Actions and Exploits which the Incas had performed at the lower parts of this River; and how they dwelt and inhabited amongst the Mustas, and that after that time they acknowledged the Inca for their Lord and Sovereign, and that every year they carried him prefents of such Fruits as their foil produced; the which prefents were continued untill the Death of the Inca Tupac Amaru, which was some few years after this unfortunate action and fight between fuan Alvarez Maldonado, and Gomez de Tordoya. The which Story we have fore-stalled and related out of its due place, thereby to attest, and prove the Conquest which the Inca Tupanqui made along the great River Amarumayu; and that the Incas who defigned to make a Conquest of the Musius, did afterwards plant themselves, and inhabit amongst them. All which the Friar Diego Martin, and the Gun-smith Simon did particularly relate and confirm: And the Friar as to himself did say, that nothing did trouble him so much in his life, as that he did not continue his abode amongst the Indian Chunchus, as they desired of him; but that not having the conveniencies there of faying Mass, was a great inducement to recall him thence, for otherwise he would never have removed from thence. He farther faid, that he often purposed to return thither again, being troubled in his confcience for not having farisfied the importunity of those poor Indians, who made that reasonable request to him, which he by his yow and profession was obliged to grant : And farther that Friar alledged, that those Incas who were planted among the Mussus, might be of great use to the Spaniards in the Conquest which they deligned to make of that Countrey. And so let us return again to the Acts and Monuments of the good Inca Tupanqui; the chief and greatest of which, was the Conquest of Chili.

Of the Nation of Chirihuana; of their customs and manner of living.

S coverousness and ambition of government is natural to all Men, so these Incas transported with a defire of new Kingdoms and Conquests, made it their chief business and glory to enlarge their Empire. In pursuance of which four years after that Yapangui had fent his Army down the River, he defigned a nother Conquest over the great Province of Chiri-huana, which is seated in the Antis to the Eastward of the Charcas. But in regard the Country was unknown. and the ways undiscovered, it was thought fit and convenient to fend fives find into those parts, who might see and discover the Situation and Nature of the Countrey, and Manners of the People. The Spies being diffracthed, as was refolved, they returned at a certain time, bringing a report, that the Country was bad, full of high and barren Mountains, Bogs, Lakes, and Marish Grounds; that the Natives were absolutely brutes, and worse than beasts, having no Religion, or Worship of any thing, but lived without law or good manners, wandring in the Mountains and Woods, not affociated in any community or political governments unless it were, when they joined their Forces together to infeft their Neighbous, with intention to eat the flesh of those which they took in War, without respect either of Sex or Age, and that nothing should be lost of all their spoils, they drank the bloud when they cut their throats. Nor did they onely eat the flesh of their Enemies, but of their own people, when they died; onely they lame-ted over their bones; which when they had laid, and disposed orderly according to their joints, they buried them in rocks, or caves, and the hollow of trees. They went naked, and promiscuously used coition without regard either to Sisters, Daughters or Mothers. And this was the common way of living practifed by the Nation of Chiri-buana.

The good Inca Tupanqui (for so was he styled commonly by his own people, as also by Pedro de Cieça) having heard this report, turned to his relations and kindred, who were then present, and told them, that now he esteemed it a duty and obligation incumbent on him to reduce the people of Chiri-huana, that so he might withdraw them from the turpitude of their manners, and from that bestial lie which they did lead, it being the grand design for which his Father the Sun had sent him into the World. Having said these Words, he appointed ten thousand Men to be raised, and made ready, under the Command of Colonels and Captains of the Incan Family, Men experienced both in War and Peace, and instructed in their duty, and the business that they were to perform. This Army being provided, marched into the Province of Chirihuana, where they soon sound the want and misery of the Countrey; to supply which, they gave notice to the Inca, who speedily furnished them with all things necessary. But such were the disficulties of that Countrey, being nothing but Mountains, and Bogs, and Fens, that after the labour of two years, they were not able to effect any matter considerable there in; which being advised to the Inca, he ordered their return, designing after some time of repose to employ them on some more gratefull, and more pleasing Concuess.

The Vice-King D. Francisco de Toledo, who governed those Kingdoms in the year 1572, resolved to conquer those Chiribuanas, as Acosta in the 28th Chapter of his 4th Book doth relate at large; and in order thereunto having appointed a considerable force of Spaniards, provided with all necessaries to undertake that enterprize, he entred into that Province, carrying with him great numbers of Horses and Cows to breed and increase; but he had not marched far before he experienced the insuperable difficulties of that undertaking, which he not believing by any former report, nor yet admonished by the ineffectual attempts which the International Company of the International Company o made upon it, was forced at length to abandon his Defign, and fly shamefully out of the Countrey. The ways were so bad, that the Mules were not able to pass with his Litter, so that he was carried on the Shoulders of Spaniards and Indians; whilst the Chiribmanas cried after them with Curses and Reproaches, saying, Throw down that Old Woman from her Basket, that we may eat her

Royal Commentaries.

For the Chiribuanas (as we have faid) are a fort of people greedy and ravenous after Flesh, because they have none in their own Countrey, either of tame or wild Cattel, the Soil not producing Herbage, or other nourishment for them being over-run with Briers and Bulhes, and not cultivated with the least Art or Indufire. Had they conferred the Cattel which the Vice-king left them, ordering Cow-keepers or Herdsinen to attend them, as was practifed in the Islands of Hifpaniela, and Cuba, they might have had an increase fufficient to have stocked their Countrey. Howsoever that barbarous people, even from that little Conversation and Learning which they had from the Spaniards, during their short abode in their Countrey, reaped fome benefit as to their manners; for they did agver afterward eat the Flesh of their own dead; onely they were thirsty after the Bloud of their Neighbours, and so raving for the Flesh of their Enemies, that they despited their own Lives to gain theirs, being insensible of all Dangers at the fight of their Prey; and fo much did they long for humane Flesh, that when the fight of their Preys and formed that they long for matter Print, that which they furprifed at any time Shepherds keeping their flocks of Sheep, or Herdfinen watching their Cattel, they would forfake and neglect the Herds and Droves, to take and devour the Flesh of the Shepherds. This inhumane barbarity was so dreadfull to all forts of people, and their Neighbours round about, that ten Chiribusiness would chase a thousand others, to whom they were so terrible, that they affighted their Children with their very Name. The Chirchnamas also learned from this short visit of the Spaniards to make Houses not for private Dwellings, but for the publick reception of all comers; the Fashion of which was one wide Gallery, divided into as many Apartments as there were Persons; the Room being no bigger than what was capable to receive one fingle person, for they had no Houshold-stuff, nor Garments to cover them, going always na-ked. And thus much shall serve for what we have to say of the condition and brutish Life of the Chiribuanas, who are so bestial, and inhumane, that nothing less than a Miracle can reclaim them from this gross and irrational course of Life.

Of the Preparations which were made for the Conquest of Chili.

THough the good King Tupangui had had but ill fuccefs against the Chirimana, yet it did not discourage his Design for the Conquest of Chili, or for Archieve. ments of a more noble Nature: For in regard the great Maxime of the hear State was the increase of their Empire, they were ever attempting and designing forme thing towards the enlargement of it; and indeed fuch was the Confliction of it in those days, that they could not well subfift without War, their people in the confliction of it in those days, that they could not well subfift without War, their people in the confliction of it in those days, that they could not well subfift without War, their people is ing numerous, and without Employment, and the Stores of Arms, Cloths and Shoes, which were the Tribute of the Provinces, yearly increafing, there would have been no confumption of them without a War, but would have decayed and perished in the Magazines, or Store-houses, without use; for as to Gold and Silver. (as we have faid) none was exacted, nor were they in use as current Coin but onely were the voluntary Presents which the Vassals gave for adornment of the Royal Palaces, and Temples belonging to the Sun; for these Reasons, and ser the Love and Obedience which his Subjects bore towards him, the King Tunn qui accounted himself to be in a proper and able condition for making a War upon the Kingdom of Chili, to which end having advised with his Council concerning the way and manner of carrying on the War, and having confittude and or dained Officers for administration of common Justice, during his absence, he proceeded on his way to Chili, as far as Atacama, which was the most remote Province that was peopled on that fide, between which and Chili were great Defact. without People or Provisions; and there he intended to pitch his Camp, to give heat and life to the defign.

From Alacama the Inca sent his Spies, and a party like a Forlorn-hope, to discover and observe the ways and Difficulties of the passage; and because the care was great, and the true Discovery of vast importance, the charge of it was committed to Incas onely; the Kings not being willing to entrust the common sater to the faithfulness of any, but such as were of the Royal Lineage. These Incas took with them certain Indians from Alacama and Tuema for their Guides, for so we have said before) these had some knowledge of the way; for the better assurance of which it was ordered, that from two Leagues to two Leagues the Guids should go, and return with a report of the way, and difficulties which they encountred in it; and should by such Advices accordingly contrive with most advantage to lodge, and lay their Provisions for the Army in the most commodion places. With this labour and diffigence they penetrated eighty Leagues through this desart Countrey, which is as far as from Alacama to Copayapu, which is a little but a well peopled Province, environed round with long and wide Desars, for to pass forward, as far as to Cuquimpu, are other eighty Leagues of desarts.

The Spies having made a Discovery as far as Copanapa, and taken as much notice of every thing, as could be done by a survey of their Eyes, they returned with all diligence to render an account to the Inca of what they had seen and observed. The Inca having received their Information, ordered ten thousand Men to be made ready, under the Command of General Sinchiruca, and two other Major Generals, whose Names are not known, the which being dispatched, marched in the best order that the way would permit, having their Provisions carried on the backs of Sheep, whose Flesh also served for Victuals.

This Army being dispeeded away, the Inca Tupanqui commanded that they should be followed by ten thousand more, for the succour and reinforcement of their Companions, which marched before, the which added to the greater terrour and affrightment of the Enemy. The first Army being arrived near to Copagas.

fent their accustomary Summons to the people, requiring them to render and submit themselves to a Child of the Sun, who was sent from his Father to give them a new Religion, and Laws, and Customs, that so they might live like Men, and not like Beasts; nor would it avail them to fly unto their Arms for succour of defence, for that either by soul means or fair, they must obey the *Inca,* who was Sovereign Monarch of the four parts of the World. The Natives of Copayapa, being affighted at these Summons, betook themselves immediately to their Arms, being resolved to defend the Consines of their Countrey; where at first they had some light Skirmishes and Encounters, both parties trying and proving the Courage and force of each other. The *Incas*, in compliance with the command of their King, faintly managed their Arms, being unwilling to use Fire, and Sword, and other Extremities of War, but rather by dallying with them sometimes in Words, and again with Blows, induce them to a submission. The Enemy on the other side remained in great perplexities and doubts what to doe; the terrour and dread which they apprehended in opposing the Deity of the Sun, made them fear that some great Curse or Malediction would be the effect of their Rebellion, yet the desire they had to maintain their Liberty, and the ancient Worship of their Gods, was a most prevalent Argument against all Innovations.

CHAP. XIX.

The Incas possess themselves of the Valley which they call Chili; and of other Summons sent to divers new Nations, with their Answers thereunto.

IN this doubtfull condition and fuspense were the people of Copasapu, when the second Army came to the Succour and Reinforcement of the former; with the sight of which, being now totally discouraged, and out of all hopes of making resistance, they came to a treaty, and accepted all the conditions both of civil manners, and religious Worship, which the power of a prevailing Enemy was pleased to impose upon them. All which being advised to the Inca, he was greatly pleased with the success, conceiving that he had now an open and plain Field before him to the Conquest of Chili, which untill now he very much doubted, apprehending that the distance and difficulties of the way would render the Enterprise almost insuperable. The Province of Copasapu having submitted on composition, rather than subdueed by sorce, the Inca followed the course of his good fortune; commanding ten thousand Men more to be raised, and surnished with Arms and necessary Provisions for their March, and therewith to be dispatched away with all Expedition, for reinforcement of the former Army; which being thus strongly recruited, they marched eighty Leagues farther into the Countrey, where, after many difficulties, and much labour, they arrived at length at another Province, or Valley, called Caquimpu, which they subdued. What particulars occurred in this Enterprise, what Battels were fought, or what Treaties passed, is not certain, for that being a Countrey very remote, the Indians of Pern were not able to render any persect account of particular matters, more than in general, that the Valley of Caquimpu was added to the Dominions of the Empire. Thence they proceeded forwards, conquering all the Nations before them, as far as to the Valley of Chili, from whence that Kingdom takes its denomination. During all the time of this War, which (as some say) lasted six denomination. During all the time of this War, which (as some say) lasted six years, the Inca with great care teinforced his Armies from time to time, furnishing them with Arms, Cloths, Sho ly the Dignity and Honour of his Majesty, that his Souldiers should not loke ground, or retreat one step from the Possessions they had gained, so that at length Chili being made the stat of War, was invaded by the Inca with fifty thousand Men, provided with as much convenience and plenty, as if they had been quartered within the City of Cocco.

Of all matters that succeeded, intelligence was given to the Inca from time to time, and having made necessary provisions for securing the late Conquests, they continued their march to the Southward, Subduing all the Nations before them to the River of Maulli, which is almost fifty Leagues distant from the Valley of Chili What Battels or Skirmillies paffed here is not particularly known, and therefore it is probable that matters were ended by way of Friendship, or Composition, being always the first Trial which the Incus made at the beginning, before they put matters to the extremities of a War. The Incus had now enlarged their Eq. pire above two hundred and fixty Leagues in length, the distance being so great from Atacama to the River Maulli, counting the Defarts as well as the inhabited places; for from Atacama to Copayapu are eighty Leagues, from Copayapu to Cuous on are eighty more, from Cuquimpu to Chili are fifty five, and then from Chil to the River Maulii are almost fifty more; all which was not as yet sufficient to fatisfie the Avarice and Ambition of the Incas: For having given out the necess. ry orders for Government, and fecuring the late Conquests, and made provision against all accidents and contingencies which might happen in War, they proceded farther, passing the River Maulti with twenty thousand Men; where, 2007ding to their custome, they in the first place sent their Summons to the Province of Purimanca, (called by the Spaniards Promancaes) requiring them either to accept the Inca for their King and Lord, or otherwise provide to defend themselves by Arms. The Purumaucans having received intelligence of the approach of the Incas, had put themselves into a posture of Defence, and having made an Alliance with their Neighbours of Antalli, Pincu, and Cauqui, resolved to dve, rather than lofe their ancient Liberty; and on this confidence gave for Answer. That the Conquerours should be Lords over the conquered, and that the Incas should food understand in what manner the Purumaucans were used to obey.

Three or four days after this Answer the Purumancans having joined with the Allies, appeared in a Body, to the number of 18 or 20 thousand Men, pitching their Camp in fight of the Incas, who still continued to repeat their instant obcitations for Peace and Concord, protesting to them, and calling the Sun and Moon to witness, that they came not to deprive or despoil them of their Lands and Estates; but onely with an intention to reduce them to a manner of rational living like Men, and impose nothing more upon them, than the Worship and Adoration of the Sun, whom they required them to accept for their God, and the Incas for their King and Sovereign. The Purumancans replied, That they would not spend their time in parlying, or vain Disputes, but would refer the Controversite to be decided by the Sword, and that the Incas should accordingly provide the next day for a Trial, they being resolved neither to send other Proposals, nor receive

Of the cruel Battel between the Incas and other Nations, and of the first Spaniard who discovered Chili.

Royal Commentaries.

THE day following, both Armies raifing their Camps, put themselves in order of Battel, and began the Fight with great Courage and Resolution, which continued that whole day with such equality of Fortune, that it could not be discred to which part the Victory most inclined; many were slain and wounded on both sides, untill the night divided them, and caused them to retreat to their several Quarters. The second and third days were alike bloudy, one party contending for Liberty, and the other for Honour. The fourth day both sides were drawn up in their Camp, expecting which should make the attempt; and in this order they continued for the space of two days after, and then they both drew off, each side suspecting that the other had sent for more Succours, requiring speedy Recuits. The Purumaucans, and their Allies, thought that they had gained Credit enough, in being able to withstand the invincible Power of the Inc. 18, and with this Reputation they returned to their own Countries, proclaiming Victory and Triumph in all parts where they paffed.

The Incas, after due and mature confideration, thought it not convenient to puriue after the Enemy, but rather give way to their bestial Fury for a time; howfoever the Debates hereupon were divers, fome were for pursuing the Enemy, untill they had entirely fubdued them; but others of a more moderate temper, were for following the mild and gentle Principles of the Incas, not being over forward in the utter destruction of their Enemies. At length it was agreed and concluded, that they should preserve that which they had already gained. making the River Maulti the utmost limit and bound of their Frontiers, untill fuch time as they should receive new Orders and Instructions from the Luca. Of all which the King Tupanqui being advised, gave directions, that they should give a stop to the farther progression of their Conquests, and attend to the improvement and cultivating of the Lands and Poffestions they had gained, with particular respect to the ease and benefit of the new Subjects; that so the neighbouring people being allured by this good treatment might offer themselves to become Vassals to the Inca; and in case the Nature of this people should be so dull and flupid, as not to observe and distinguish between the happiness of an improved Life, and their own Bestialities, that then the loss would be theirs, and redound more to their own hurt, than to the prejudice of the Incas. In compliance with this Command from the King, they defifted from farther profecution of their Conquests in Chili, making the River Maulti the ultimate bounds of their Empire, which they fortified with Caltles, and strong Garifons; so that now their business was to administer Justice, and improve the Incomes of the Sun; all which was performed with great respect to the benefit of the Subjects, who finding themselves obliged by such kind treatment, did with great Zeal and Affection embrace the Government of the brow, and comply with their Laws, Rites and Religion, continuing constant in them, until such time as the Spaniards became Mafters of their Countrey.

The first Spaniard that discovered Chili, was Don Diego de Almagro; but he didbut just see it, and afterwards return to Peru, having sustained innumerable labours, and endured great fatigues both in his journey thicher, and in his return; the which enterprise was the cause of the general Revolt of all Peru, and the original of that Discord and civil Dissertion which happened afterwards between those two Governous, and of the Death of the said Almagro, being taken Prisoner at the Battel of Salinus; and also of the Death of the Marquis D. Francisco de Pieuro, and of D. Diego de Almagro, who was born of Spanish and Indian Bloud, and who commanded in the Fight, called the Battel of Chupus. Of all which we shall (God willing) treat more at large in its due place. The second person that entred into the Kingdom of Chili was the Governour Pedro de Valdivia, who wish a strong party both of Horse and Foot, marched beyond the Dominions of the a fitting party both of Hotel and 1904, inactive beyond the Dolininous of the Incas, making conqueft of all before him; the Colonies which he planted were thriving and proferous, though he himfelf unhappily fell by the hands of his own Subjects of the Province of Aranen, which he having subdued, made choice own Subjects of the Province of Aramen, which he having hudded, made choice of for himfelf, when the Lands were divided amongst the Conquerours. This worthy person planted many Colonies, and founded Cities with Spanis Inhabitants; and amongst the rest, that which after his own Name was called Valdivis. in the Conquest of this Province he performed many and noble Exploits, and afterwards governed it with great prudence and justice, and had not onely been happy in himfelf, but fortunate allo to his people, had not the boldness of an ladian, who adventured to cut the thread of his life, given a period to the expectation of many other bleffings, which his Wifedom and Conduct might have produced to his Subjects. And in regard the Death of this Governour and General was in a manner without Example, and that which was never practifed by the the dians either before or fince the Entrance of the Spaniards into that Countrey 1 and what turned to their greater mischief; I have thought fit to relate it in this place that fo the Reader may be clearly informed of the particulars of that unhappy her. tel, according to the first report which came of it to Peru, soon after the Fight was ended, and likewise what intelligence the second report gave of it; for hence understanding of which, it will be necessary to begin from the original and confe of this whole matter.

CHAP. XXI.

Of the Rebellion of Chili against the Governour Valdivia.

THE possession and inheritance of the Runguotti of Community and lot of this Gentleman, who was worthy of an Empire, his fortune was thousand pieces of Gold: But in regard the third of Gold encreases with the gains of it, and that there is no end proposed to Wealth and Riches, so the more the Governour amassed, the more labour and hard usage he imposed on the history. forcing them beyond their strength and abilities, to which they had not been at cuftomed to labour, and dig in the Mines to fatiate that Avarice of his, which was never to be fatisfied: The people of Aranca (which were the Subjects of Valdivia) not being able to fupport this Yoke of bondage and fervitude, joined themselves with others in confederacy, and put themselves into open rebellion, committing all the outrages and infolencies they were able upon the Spaniards. The Governour Valdivia having intelligence hereof, marched out with a hundred and fifty Horse, despiting the Indians, as the Spaniards have always done, on occasion of the little revolts and mytiging of the needs. fuch-like revolts and mutinies of that people: But this contempt of an enemy cost dear, having been the ruine and destruction of Valdivia, and of those who were with him, who all perished by the hands of those whom before they had despised.

The first news which came of this disasture, was brought to the City de la Plant, which is in Pern, by the hand of an Indian wrote in a fcrip of Paper, without form Lanciers, were fivallowed up by the Earth. This report coming in a ferral of Paper, and by an Indian Meffenger foon gained belief, being quickly fpread through all Pein, to the great amazement of the Spaniards, who could not understand what those Words should mean, of being swallowed up by the Earth; for they could not contain the contains the cont not think it possible for 150 Spanish Horse to be overthrown by the Indians; and there-therefore they were more inclinable to believe, that in regard that Countrev is like Peru, mountainous, and full of precipices and hollow places, and fubiect to Earthquakes, that the Spaniards were unadvifedly fallen, and perifhed in fome unstable, and false grounds and caves, rather than by the force and courage of the Indians, whom after many years of experience, they concluded unable to destroy fuch a number of Spaniards in battel. Whilft they of Pern remained in this doubtfull belief of matters, after 60 days time a more particular and certain relation came of the Death of Valdivia, and all his Souldiers, with all the circumftances of the late battel, which the Indians fought with him: the which I shall relate according to that account which was given of it from Chili; the which having in the first place foecified the Infurrection of the Indians, and the many infolencies and outrages they had committed, proceeded to tell us; That when Valdivia came to the place where these Rebels of Aranca were affembled, he found 13 or 14000 of them in Arms; which he fuddenly affaulting with his Horfe, did in many and divers Skirmishes always beat them, and put them to flight; so that the Indians were fo terrified with fear, and dread of the fury of the Spanish Horse, that they would never adventure into the open Plains; for that ten Spaniards were able to beat a thousand Indians, but kept themselves lurking in the Woods and Mountains, where the Spanish Horse could not come at them; and from thence they often sallied out, doing all the spoils and mitchies that they were able to the spaniards. from whom they would receive no Articles or Propofals of Accommodation, being more willing to dye, than obey, and serve them longer.

Thus the War was continued and carried on for many days, during which time the report was spread in all parts of the Countrey of the Arancans, and coming to the Ears of an old Captain of theirs, who had been famous in War, and of long experience; being one day in his House, he began to consider the reason. how it could be possible for so small a number as 150 Spaniards to subdue and enflave 12 or 13000 Indians; for that either they must be Devils, or otherwise immortal Men, as once the Indians did at the beginning believe them to be. To discover this mystery, and the reason of this great disproportion in War; he one day ascended to the top of a Hill, from whence he could see and survey the two Armies encamped; that of the Indians was large, and far extended with great numbers of Men, that of the Spaniards was little, and contracted within a small compass of ground: Confidering awhile hereupon, and of the situation of the two Camps, and wondering how it was possible for so small a number to be always victorious over a greater; he departed, and went from thence to the Indian Camp, where having called a Council, and made a long and rational discourse upon this subject; he at last made these Queries and Demands in the case:

Whether the Spaniards vvere mortal Men, like them, or vvhether they vvere immortal and incorruptible bodies, like those of the Sun and Moon? Whether they were infentible of hunger and thirst, and stood in need of sleep or repose after toil and labour? and in thort, whether they were made of fleth and bones. or of fteel and iron? The like Oueries he also made concerning their Horses: To all which answer being made, that they were Men like them, and of the same composition and nature; Then, faid he, go your ways, and take your repose, and to morrovy you shall see vyho are most Men, they, or vye. With this the Affembly being diffolved; in the morning, by break of day, they founded to Arms, the Indians giving louder shouts, and making greater noise with their Trumpets and Drums, and fuch-like instruments, than they had formerly done; and in a thort time the Old Captain had divided his Army into thirteen feveral Squadrons. each confifting of a thousand Men, keeping them still in referves one after the

Of the New Method and Way of Fighting, contrived by an Old Indian Captain.

THE Spaniards being allarumed with the noise and shouts of the Indians. Gil. lied forth in their bright and glittering Arms, with long Plumes on their Helmers, and Feathers on the heads of their Horses; and seeing the many Divisi. ons and Squadrons of the Enemy, they imagined that they were more able to break the smaller Battalions, than if they were united into one body. So foon as the Indian Captain faw the Spaniards appear, he encouraged the first Squadron you should overcome them, but that you should perform what you are able in favour and defence of your Countrey; and when you are worsted, and can perform the state of the sta form no more, that then you fave your felves by flight, taking care in your retreat that you break not into the other bodies, so as to disorder them, but that you fly behind all the reft, and there rally, and make up your body again; the like advice and order he gave to all the other Squadrons. With this defign and refolution the Indians engaged with the Spaniards, with whom having fought awhile, and performed what they were able; being routed, they retired into the Rere of the Army, the second, third, fourth and fifth, were easily broken, and routed by the Spaniards, but yet not without some loss on the Spanish side both of Men and

Thus as the first Squadrons were overthrown, still new referves came up, who all fought in their orders one after the other. In the Rere of all was another Catain, who governed in the orderly rallying of the Squadrons, which he caused to eat, and drink, and repose themselves, whilst the others continued the fight, that fo they might be refreshed, when their turn came for the next engagement. The Spaniards having already routed five Squadrons of the Enemy, and feeing still to or twelve more before them coming on; and having fought three long hours, ye encouraging one the other, they affaulted the fixth Squadron, which came in relief of the fifth, which they overthrew, as also the feventh, eighth, ninth and tenth Division. But now having fought seven long hours without intermission, both the Men and Horses began to fail, not being able to charge with that mente and vigour as they did in the beginning; which the Indians observing, would not permit them one moment of repose, but still plied them with new and fresh Squadrons, and after all the Spaniards faw notwithstanding ten Divisions still to be fought with; and though the natural force both of Man and Horfe began now to grow tired, and faint; yet they still roused their invincible spirits, not to shew or evidence any symptoms or appearances of failure to the Indians: Howoever the Indians: beginning fensibly to find the decay of the Spanish vigour and mettle, and that their force was not fo impetuous and irrefiftible as it was at first, still continued to bring up their Squadrons, untill two a clock in the afternoon; which the Governour Pedro de Valdivia observing, and that there were eight or nine Squadrons still to be overcome; and that when those vvere routed, they vvere always rallied, and made up; vvhich nevy vvay and method of Fighting having vvell confidered; and that it being novy late toyvards the Evening, it was probable the Enemy would afford them as little repose in the Night, as they had given them respite in the Day; he resolved to retreat before their Horses were wholly spent, and difabled of farther fervice: According to his Command his Souldiers retrea; ted towards a narrow pass, which if they could reach, being about a League and a half from the place where the Fight was, they imagined themselves secure from any attack of the Enemy; for that two Spaniards on foot were able to defend it from all the Army of the Indians. Having taken this resolution, though late, he gave Command to his Souldiers to retreat, paffing the word still as they retired. that they should make for that narrow pass, still turning upon the Enemy, and making head against them, changing the state of their case from an offensive. ro a defensive Fight.

CHAP. XXIII.

The Indians overcome the Spaniards by the Treachery of an Indian.

Certain Indian, who from a Boy had been bred up in the Family of the Go-Certain Indian, who from a Boy had been bred up in the Family of the Governour Valdivia, whose Christian Name was Philip, but by the Indians called Lautaru, being the Son of a Cacique: This Fellow being more biasted by the natural affection which he bore to his Countrey, than by his love to God, or fidelity to his Mafter; fo foon as he heard the word given to the Spaniard; to retreat, he instantly reported it to the Indians, having the knowledge of both Languages, and called out to them not to content themselves with this slight and advantage, in letting them go free, but to run and possess the narrow passage, and prevent their entrance into it, in the which they did now place all the hopes of their fecurity and protection; wherefore cried he still out, Make use of this advantage, which is now given you for the liberty of your Countrey, and rescue it from destruction by the bloud of these Thieves and Traytors. And having said these words, that he might encourage them by his Example, he took up a Lance from the ground, and placed himself in the front of them to fight against the Spaniards.

The Old Captain, who was the first Projector of this way of Fighting, observing the way which the Spaniards took, soon apprehended their design by the hint which Lantaru had given them; to circumvent which, he dispeeded away two fresh Squadrons of those which had not as yet fought, to hasten with the best order they were able to the narrow paß, and there, at the entrance of it, to keep their flation firm untill the rest came up 3, which having done, he pursued the Spaniards with the other Squadrons, still plying them with fiesh bodies of Souldiers, so that they did not permit them one moment of respite, always killing and purfuing them, untill they came to the very mouth and entrance of the narrow pass, where when they came, and that the Spaniards found it already possessed by the Enemy, they began to despair of all hopes to escape Death; which to avoid, no means appearing, they called on the Name of Christ and the Blessed Virgin, and of such Saints for which they had the greatest devotion.

The Indiana perceiving that both the Men and Horses were wholly spent and tired, came in upon them in an entire body, and 15 or 20 of them together fell on one poor Horse, some catching him by the legs, some by the tail, others by the mane, whilst others with their great clubs knocked both Man and Horse down, killing them with the greatest cruelty and rage imaginable. The Governour Pedro de Valdivia, and a Priest that was with him, they took alive, and tied them to trees, untill they had dispatched all the rest, that they might in cool bloud consider with what Death they might punish them. These particulars came by the second Advice from Chili to Peru, being sent by some Indian friends, who were present in the Battel, three of which made their elcape, having by the darkness of the Night hid themselves in the Thickets of a Wood, until such time as the Indians retiring from that place to celebrate their Victory with joy and triumph, gave them opportunity to ecape; who being Men well acquainted with the ways, and more faithfull to their Mafters than Lautaru, returned again to the Spaniards, bringing the fatal news of the loss of Pedro de Valdivia, and all his companions.

CHAP. XXIV.

How they killed Valdivia, and maintained a War Fifty Years afterwards.

THE manner how they killed Valdivia, was after the coming of this fecond Advice related in different ways by these three Indians, because that none of them were present at his Death: One said, that Lantaru sinding his Master tied to a Tree, reviling and reproaching him first, said, Why is this Traytor suffered to live? and with that killed him with his own hand: Another said, That Valdivia, before he died, desired first to speak with his Servant Lantaru, hoping by his means and intercession to save his life: But the most certain intelligence we have, is this, That an Old Captain beat his brains out with a club, perhaps it might be that Old Captain who managed all this affair; for it is said, that he killed him without any parly, lest his people treating with him, and believing all the promises and vows which this unfortunate Governour might make whill he was tied to a Tree, and in apprehensions of Death, when he might easily Anick on the conditions of life to leave their Countrey, and depart thence with all his People, and Souldiers, and never to return again; not trusting, as I say, to the credulous humour of his people, whom he perceived hearkening to the promise and vows of Valdivia, he resolutely passed through the midst of them, and with a club dashed out his brains, putting an end to the parly which his Souldiers cutent and visits of valdivia, he resolutely passed through the midst of them, and with a club dashed out his brains, putting an end to the parly which his Souldiers cutent and with him; and therewith turned towards them, saying, Are ye so solid will not a Man in his condition promise, and how little will he perform after he hash obtained his liberty?

But the circumstances of his Death were reported in another manner by a Speniard, who was a Native of Truxillo, called Francisco de Rieros, who was a Captain then in Chili, and Master of some Indians in that Kingdom; who coming to Pern sometime after that statal disasture, reported, that the Indians passed the night after this Victory with Dances and Merriment; and at the end of every Dance they cut off a piece of the sless of Videlivia, and another of the Priess, (they being both tied together) which they broiled before their saces, and then eat it during which time, Videvia consessing his Sins to the Priess, they both expired in that condition. It is more probable, that after the Captain had killed him with his club, that the Indians might eat him, not that this fort of Indians delighted in humane sless, but onely to vent their rage and spleen on him, who had been the Authour and Original of all the slavery and mitery they had endured.

From that time the Indians took up a custome of fighting with the Spaniards in feveral Squadrons or Divisions, as D. Alonso de Erzilla in the first Canto of his Araucana reports; and that after this rebellion, they maintained the War 49 year, until the end of the year 1553; at which time D. Sebastian de Custilla began his rebellion in the Villa de la Plata, and Potos; which are in the Kingdom of Peru, and Evancilla themselves the second of th

Framisco Hernandez Giron began his in Cozco.

Thus have I, as clearly as I could, related the particulars of the Fight and Death of the Governour D. Pedro de Valdivia, as it was written and related in Pern, by those who lived in Chili; it being referred to every Man's judgment to believe that report which he esteems most probable: the which Story I have anticipated, and reported out of its due place and time, in regard it is the most memorable and notorious passage that ever happened in the Indies, which I would not omit to describe, left I should have had no other occasion which might lead me to a farther discourse of Chili, or left I might have had time or life to extend this History to that period of years in which the Spaniards became absolute Masters of that Kingdom.

CHAP. XXV.

Royal Commentaries.

Of other unhappy Successes in the Kingdom of Chili.

Thus far had I writ when fresh Advices came of other fatal and unfortunate Successes in Chili, which happened there in the Year 1599, and in Peru in the Year 1600. Amongst other Calamities the Earthquake about Arequipa is recounted as one, which at length ended in such a terrible irruption of fire from a certain Hill, which for the space of twenty days continually threw up such quantities of Ashes and Sand, as in the parts round about covered the Earth two yards thick, and in places farther off at least a yard, and where least, a quarter of a yard deep, for the space of thirty or sourty Leagues round in the Countrey of Arequipa; whereby all their Vines and Corn Lands were spoiled, their Trees and Fruits scorched and blasted, and all their Cattel perished for want of pasture. Their Cows and Oxen lay dead in Droves of five hundred in a place, and thee. Their Cows and Goats, and Hogs lay buried in these Ashes. Many Houses were overwhelmed with the weight of the Earth and Sand, which this irruption thew up, such as remained were preserved by the diligence of those Masters who always cleared and threw them off as they came; all which was accompanied with such dreadfull Flashes of Lightning, and claps of Thunder, as were heard and seen at thirty Leagues distance from the Confines of Arequipa; and to thick were the Clouds of Sand and Asses, which were thrown up, that for many days they so obscured the Sun, that they were forced to light Candles for performance of their necessary occasions. These and the like particulars were advised from that City, and the adjacent parts, the which we have succincily touched, referring our selves for a more full Relation thereof to the Historians of those times, whose business is to describe all the particulars hereof more at large.

Howfoever we shall relate the misfortunes of Chili, as they were advised in writing from thence, because they come pertinent to the foregoing story of the Indian of Aranca, and are consequences of the Insurrection begun in the Year 1953, and which continued untill the beginning of 1603, nor is it known when there will be an end thereof, in regard that after forty nine years since this Rebellion began, (during which time they have endured all the miseries of Fire and Sword, ) yet still those troubles seem rather to increase than abate, as plainly appears by the intelligences which we have extracted from a Letter written from an Inhabitant of the City of Santhiago in Chili, which came at the same time with the relation of the Calamities of Arequepa. These Advices were delivered to me by a Gentleman who was my Friend, and had lived in Penn, and served in quality of a Captan against the Rebels in the Kingdom of Lattu, when they mutined on occasion of the great Taxes which were laid upon them, his Name was Martin Cuaço, a person who hath done great Service to the Crown of Spain. The title of these misfortunes of Chili runs thus:

Advices from Chili: and prefently adds, So foon as an end was put to the writing of the foregoing Intelligence of Arequepa, came other more difinal stories from Chili, full of forow, and greatly to be lamented. The particulars were related in the manner following.

A Relation of the Loss and Destruction of the City of Val. divia in Chili, which happened on Wednesday the 24th of November, 1599.

A Bout break of day five thousand Indians, belonging to the parts adjacent. A "and to the Divisions of the Imperial, Pica and Puren, whereof thre thousand were Horse, and the rest Foot, having (as was said) seventy sire. Arms, and above two hundred Men armed with Coats of Male, affaulted the City, surprising it without the least allarm, by the guidance of treacherous Spies belonging to the same place. They divided themselves into small Bodies of twenty four or twenty five in a Company, for they knew that the Spaniards lay secure, and sleeping in their Houses, and that their Corps of Guard were but four Centinels, and that two onely went the rounds: They considered also that the Spaniards were elevated with the success they had had in the two Incursions lately made, when in the space of twenty days they had the fortune to take and demolish a Fortress which the Indians had erected on the fide of the marish Grounds of Paparlen, with so great a slaughter of them, that the Spaniards believed, that in the compass of eight Leagues round, them, that the Spanards believed, that in the compats of eight Leagues round, there was not an Indian that could appear. Howfoever having bribed the Spies which the Spaniards entertained amongft them, they fucceeded in the most notable Plot that ever was defigned by filly Barbarians; for they with great quiet and silence encompassed every House with people sufficient to deal with those which were within, for they were well advised of the numwith those which were within, for they were well advised or the numbers which dwelt in it; and fetting Guards at the entrance to every Street, they affailed the unhappy City, giving fire to the Houses, and having seized on the Gates, the Inhabitants could neither relieve one the other, nor yet make their escape by flight; so that in the space of two hours, they had destroyed all the people by Fire and Sword, and possessed themselves of the Fort, and Guns in it, there being no people within to defend it. Those that were killed and taken, were about four hundred Spaniards, of Men, Women and Children They facked and plundered to the value of three hundred thousand Pieces of Eight, nor did any thing remain which was not either burnt, or laid desolate. The Ships of Vallan, Villarroet, and of one D. Diego de Roya, were let runa drift down the Stream, to which some people made their escape by the means of Canoes which lay by the water side, otherwise none had remained to have been the Messengers of this fatal News. The Indians had been provoked to this cruelty in revenge of those people whom the Spaniards had slain in two late Incursions; having fold their Wives and Children to Merchants, who " transported them into foreign Countries; and so sensible were they of the "flavery they had endured for fifty years paft, that though they had been bap tized, and entertained Priests to instruct them in the Christian Doctrine, yet " the first thing they did was to burn their Temples, and with sacrilegious hands " to throw the Images of Saints from the Altars.

"Ten days after this unhappy fate the good Colonel Francisco del Campo arrived in the Port of this City with the succour of three hundred Men, which the Governour of Peru had fent thither, for the relief of that, and the other distressed Cities: It was his fortune to recover a Son and a Daughter of his which were both Children, which being committed to the charge of his Sifterin-law, had been taken, and carried away captives, when the City was facked and laid defolate; the miferable State of which, when he faw, he with great Rage and Refolution landed his Men, marching with all expedition to relieve the Cities of Oforno, Villarica, and the unhappy Toperial; from which places they had received no news in the space of a whole year, but that they had endured a Siege of so long a time, and were almost all famished and dead, having no other sustenance than the Flesh of their dead Horses, and when those

" failed of Cats, and Dogs, and the Skins of Beafts, and this was all the Intelligence they had, being brought to them by a Messenger who escaped down the "River, representing with Sighs and Tears the miserable condition of their " neople. Wherefore the first thing that this Colonel defigned after his landing. " was to relieve the City of Oforno, for he was informed that the Enemy foon "after the Destruction of Valdivia, were gone thither with the like intent; his fucces herein was accordingly prosperous, for he raised the Siege, and performance of the state of the stat " med other Actions of happy confequence.

At the infant that I am writing this, news is come, that all the people in "Toperial were starved with hunger after the Siege of a complete Year, excepting twenty Men, who, to avoid Famine, yielded themselves into the hands of "the Enemy, and thereby endured a greater mifery than Death itself. In Angol they killed four Souldiers, but who they were is not yet known. God Al-

" mighty have Mercy upon us.

BOOK VII.

From Santiago in Chili, in the month of March, 1600. .

All which Relation came (as I have faid) in feveral Letters from Peru. and the Kingdom of Chili, which was a great calamity to that Countrev. Moreover Father Diego de Alcobaca, whom I have formerly mentioned, in the Year 1601. amongst many other things relating to the Affairs of that Countrey, writes me these very words concerning the Kingdom of Chili.

" The condition of Chili is now become very unhappy, for there is not an In-" dian but who can mount his Horse, and dare encounter with his Launce the " best Spanish Souldier that is; and though we fend every year Souldiers thither, "yet none of them return; they have destroyed two Plantations of the Spaniards, and having killed all the Men, and destroyed every thing of use, they carried their Wives and Children into Slavery; and lately they killed the Governour " Lopola from an Ambuscade, who married the Daughter of D. Diego Sagratipae, "who was an Inca, and was departed from Villcapampa, before you left these parts. God in his mercy pardon the Sins of the dead, and put an end to these "Afflictions of the living. Thus far are the words of Alcobaça, which he writes me with many other fad flories, which I purposely omit, because they contain nothing but what is tragical, and full of sorrow; amongst which recounting the afflicted Estate of Arequepa, he says that Wheat that Year was worth in that Countrey ten and eleven Ducats a Bushel, and Mayz thirteen.

Moreover, befides all that which we have already delivered concerning Arequepa, they wrote farther, that their calamities still continued, having to contend with the extremities of the four Elements, as appears at large by those Relations which the Jesuits have given to the General of their Order, concerning the most the General of their order, concerning the most remarkable Occurrences of Peru, which happened in the Year 1602. And though those Letters say, that their missortunes were not at an end, yet they farther add, that greater were the Afflictions of the Kingdom of Chili, which happened after the forementioned troubles; the particulars of which were given me by Francisco. de Caffro, who was born at Granada, and in this Year 1604 is Prefect of the Schools of the facred University of Cordova, and Rhetorick Professiour. The Title of which, together with the particulars, is Verbatim in these words.

Of the Rebellion of the Araucans.

F the thirteen Cities which were established in this Kingdom of Chili. the The thirteen Cities which were established in this Kingdom of Chili, the "Indians have destroyed six, namely Valdivia, Timperial, Angol, Santia Crie, "Chillan and Conception. They overthrew, consumed and laid desolate the "Houses and Habitations, dishonoured and prophaned the Temples, obscured the brightness of that Faith and Devotion which shined in those parts, and what is worst this success hath encouraged, and raised the Spirits of the Indian in that manner, that they are grown bold and consident, omitting no opportunity or advantage which may offer to rob and destroy our Cities and Monasteries with Fire and Sword. They have learned also many Arts and "Strategems of War; for that when they besieged the City of Osorio, and compelled the Spaniards to retire within their works, they so that our could receive no suffernance, unless it were some small quantities of the they could receive no fustenance, unless it were some small quantities of the they could receive no fustenance, unless it were some small quantities of the Seeds of Herbs, and Leaves of Turnips, which some sew were sain to sight for, and gain with the point of the Launce. In one of these Sieges of this City they broke the Images of Christ and our Lady, and other Saints, to the great dishonour of God, which none but his infinite Mercy and Patience could have suffered. In the last Siege which the Indians laid to this place, they supprised the Spaniards, and killed the Centinels, and without any opposition entred and possessed themselves of the Town, exercising such cruelty as was agreeable to the barbarity of their Natures; for they butchered the Childen, and chained the Women and Nuns, intending to carry them away into Slavery, but whilst they were thus bussile unpowed in packing up, and dissossing but whilst they were thus bussile to employed in packing up, and dissossing the said of the Women and Nuns, intending to carry them away into Slavery, but whilst they were thus bussile to employed in packing up, and dissossing the said they were thus bussile to the said they were thus bussile to the said to the women and Nuns, intending to carry them away into Slavery. and chained the evolution and rouns, intending to carry them away into savery; but whilft they were thus bufily employed in packing up, and difpoing their Boory, and plundering every where without order; the Spaniards took courge, and with that opportunity fell upon them, and God affifting their endeavour, they refcued their Wives and Nuns from their violent hands, and with the loss "they rescued their Wives and Nuns from their violent hands, and with the loss of some sew forced them to fly, and quit both their Prey and their City. The last Victory which the Indians obtained, was when they took Vilarrica, win great effusion of Spanish bloud; they set fire to the four Quarters of the Tom and killed all the Friars of St. Dominick, St. Francis, and the Merceds, with all the Clergy that were there, carrying all the Women away Captives, many of which were Ladies of Quality, and Condition. And this was the Fate of that City, which was once of Fame and great Renown, and illustrious amongs the neighbouring Cities of that new World. Thus far proceeds the Relation of Chili in the Year 1604. To all which nothing can be farther said, than that the were Judgments of God, which his secret Providence permits for the chastistement of Mankind. And herewith let us return to the good Inca Tupangni, to conclude the remaining Actions of his Reign. the remaining Actions of his Reign.

CHAP. XXVI.

Of the quiet Life of the Inca Yupangui, and of the Actions wherein he employed himself until the time of his Death.

THE King Impangui having established and confirmed the Conquests which The King Impanyan having entablined and confirmed the Conquetts which his Captains had made, under the fecurity of good Laws, and fettled Religion in all parts, having also made provision for his own Royal Revenue, and separated a maintainance for the Priesthood of the Sun, he determined to put an end to his farther Conquests, which are now far extended, reaching no less than a thousand Leagues in length; so that he resolved to spend the remainder of his a thousand Leagues in length; so that he resolved to spend the remainder of his Days in erecting Monuments and Trophies of his greatness, which might ever conserve his Memory in great Renown. To which end he built new Fortresses, and many Temples dedicated to the Sun, with Houses for the Select Virgins, Royal Palaces, and made many Aqueducts, Walks and Gardens. He also endowed the Temple of the Sun in Cozo with greater Riches, of which though it stood in no need, yet he thought it a duty to contribute some thing towards the glory of him whom he honoured, and esteemed for his Father; and more especially he will be a described the Secretary for the second secretary for the second secretary. busied himself in building and completing the Fortress at Cozco, for which his Father had made provision of all materials, and gathered great quantities of Stones and Rocks, of which we shall hereafter have occasion to discourse more at large. He also personally visited all the parts of his Empire, that so he might with his own Eyes see the State of things, hear the Complaints and Aggrievances of his people, and provide a Remedy and Relief for his Subjects; to all which he attended with so much care and compassion, that he worthily deserved to be surnamed The Pions. In these Employments this Prince with great Peace and Tranquillity The Pions. In these Employments this Prince with great Peace and Tranquillity spent his time for several Years, being greatly beloved and obeyed by his Subjects; at the end of which falling sick, and finding within himself his end to be near, he called the Prince, who was his Heir, and his other Sons together, recommending to them by way of Testament the strict observance of their Laws, and religious Rites of their Idolatrous Worship; and above all encharged them to perform and administer Justice to their Subjects in the most equal balance, and therewish he gave them his Blessing of Peace, for that now his time was come to depart this Life, and rest with his Father the Sun, who called and summoned him to his Manssons of Festicity. Mansions of Felicity.

Thus dyed Tupanqui full of Glory and Triumph, having enlarged his Empire above five hundred Leagues in length to the Southward, being as far as from Accama to the River Mauli; and to the Northward one hundred and forty Leagues, along the Coast from Chincha to Chimu. He was lamented with great grief, and having ranked him in the tenth Order of their Gods, who were Children of the Sun, because he was the tenth King, they celebrated his Obsequies with great solemnity, which, according to their Custome, continued for the space of a whole Year, offering unto him many Sacrifices. He less Tupon lica Tuponqui his Heir and added Search Laboratory. and eldest Son, which he begot of his Wife and Sifter, called Coya Chimpu Occlo, to and eitert son, which he begot of his Whie and Silter, called Coya Chimpu Occlo, to fucced him in all his Dominions. The proper Name of this Queen was Chimpu, but the word Occlo was a facred Title amongst them, he lest many legitimate Sons and Daughters of the true Bloud; besides many other natural Children, to the number of about two hundred and fifty, which was no great matter amongst them, considering the many Women, which those Kings maintained in every Province of their Dominions. And because this Inca laid the Foundation of this great Work, it is requisite that we should treat of it immediately after the Life of the Stiffs Foundary because the second excellent Targety of the second excellent Targety of the second excellent. its first Founder, because it is the most excellent Trophy of the Incan Magnificence, and that which may ferve for a matter of Oftentation and Glory, not onely to the Authour himself, and the preceding Kings, but sufficient to derive Honour to all their Posterity in suture Ages.

CHAP. XXVII.

Of the Fortress of Cozco, and the greatness of the Stones with which it was built.

THE Incas, who were Kings of Pern, erected many wonderfull and stately Edifices; their Castles, Temples, and Royal Palaces, their Gardens, Storehouses, and other Fabricks, were Buildings of great Magnificence, as is apparent by the ruines of them; though very obscure conjectures are to be gathered from such remains.

The werk of greatest oftentation, and which evidences most the Power and Majesty of the Incas, was the Fortress of Cozco, whose greatness is incredible to any who hath not feen it, and fuch as have viewed it with great attention cannot but admire it, and believe that fuch a work was erected by Enchantment, or the help of Spirits, being that which surpasses the Art and power of Man. For the Stones are so many and so great, which were laid in the three first rounds, being rather Rocks than Stones, as paffes all understanding, how and in what manner they were hewen from the Quarry, or brought from thence, for they had no instruments of Iron or Steel, wherewith to cut or fashion them: Nor less wonders full is it to think, how they could be carried to the Building; for they had neither Carts nor Oxen to draw them with; and if they had, the weight was fo vast as no Cart could bear, or Oxen draw; then to think that they drew them with great Ropes, over Hills, and Dales, and difficult ways by the mere force of Mens Armes is alike incredible; for many of them were brought ten, twelve and fifteen Leagues off, particularly that Stone, or Rock rather, which the Indian call Septifica, which fignifies tired or weary, because it lies in the way, having new been brought fo far as to the Building; but it is certain that it came fifteen Leagus from the City, and was transported over the River of Tucay, which is almost a broad as the Guadalquiver, which runs by Cordova. The Stones brought from the nearest parts were from Muyna, which is five Leagues distant from Cozco: Butto proceed farther in our imagination of this matter, and confider how it was pollible for this people to fit and join such vast Machins of Stones together, and confider how it was pollible for this people to fit and join such vast Machins of Stones together, and confider how it was pollible for this people to fit and join such vast Machins of Stones together, and confider how it was pollible for this people to fit and join such vast Machins of Stones together. ment them to close; that the point of a Knife can scarce pass between them, is a thing above all admiration, and some of them are so artificially joined, that the crevices are fcarce difcernible between them: Then to confider that to fquate and fit these Stones one to the other, they were to be raised, and lifted up and removed often, untill they were brought to their just fize and proportion; but how this was done by Men, who had no use of the Rule and Square, nor knew how to make Granes, or Pullies, and Cramps, and other Engines, to raife and low them as they had occasion, is beyond our imagination, being of that bigness that Toseph Acosta saith was prodigious: For the bigness and compass of these Stones, I shall rather refer my self to the Authority of this Acosta, than to the report of my School-sellows, of whom I desiring to be informed of the just proportion of these Stones, they fent me the measures of them by Fathoms, and not by Yards and Inches,; which account not being so exact as I defired, it seemed requisite in a work so wonderfull, and in which the yastness of the Stones is the greatest matter of Admiration, to take the more authentick testimony of Notaries. Acost in the 14th Chapter of his 6th Book, saith, "That the Expences which the Intel " made in building Forts, Temples, Houses of Pleasure, and other Edifices was " very great, and the labour excessive, as the Ruins which remain make to appear, and are fall to be feen in Cozco, Tiaguanaco, Timbo, and other places, where the Stones are of that vaft proportion, as paffes understanding how they were hewen, squared, and carried to the places where they are now fixed. It is certain, that for erecting those vast Buildings of Forts and Temples in Cozco, and other parts, by direction of the Inca, there was the affishence and concourse "of great multitudes required from all Provinces, for the forwarding of these Works; the labour was certainly great, and the fashion admirable and unusual, "for they used no Mortar, nor had they Iron or Steel to cut and polish the Stones, nor Instruments or Engines to carry and raise them, and yet they were "fo curiously joined and fitted, that the places where they joined were scarce discernible; and yet the Stones were of that vast bigness, as is incredible, unless in be to those who have seen them. In Tragramaco I measured one my self, which was thirty foot in length, and eighteen in breadth, and fix foot in thickness. In the Wall of the Fortress built at Cosco there are Stones of a far greater bigness, which were laid by hand, and what is most admirable, is, that they were never cut by any Rule, being rough cast, and without equal proportion, and yet are fitted and joined one within the other without any Mortar or Cement, all-which must be done by force of Men, and great toil and labour; for certainly to fit one Stone to the other, which were at first unequal, there must be often removes, which could not be performed easily but by force and strength of the Armes. All which are the Words of Acosta, extracted verbatim, whereby he manifests the difficulty of that labour to Men who had not the use of those Instruments and Engines which are common amongst us.

Perhaps the Jucas in the height of their Glory were defirous to recommend the greatness of their power to the admiration of all Ages; as allo to thew the Art and ingenuity of their Mafter-builders, not onely in polithing their freezed Stone, (which the Spaniards do much admire) but allo in laying their rough Stones, (called by the Italians a la ruftica) in which they did as much excell as in the former; and herein they did not onely shew themselves Artists, but Souldiers also in the contrivances of their Fortresles, which they built in every advantageous Pass and place, where such a Bullwark might be of defence or bar against the Incursions of an Enemy

BOOK VII.

This Castle or Fortress they erected on the top of a high Hill on the North-side of the City, called Sacsabuanam, at the soot of which are the Dwelling-houses of Cozzo, which extend themselves at a great distance on all quarters, the side of this Hill which is towards the City, is exactly perpendicular, so that it is impregnable, and cannot be stormed on that part, nor can it be battered with Cannon, by any level, or upper ground which commands it; though the Indians before the coming of the Spaniards, had no thoughts or imagination of Cannon, nor provided any other desence than a thick Wall of Stone, curiously polithed on all quarters, being about two hundred fathom in compass, every row of Stones was of a different height, and yet laid exactly by the line, and so well fitted and enchased one within the other, that they needed no Lime, or other Mortar to cement them. The truth is, they used no Mortar mixed with Sand, because they knew not how to burn Lime; howsoever they had a kind of a red Farth, of a bituminous matter, which was very binding, and such as served to fill up holes and nicks in the Building. And in this first row they shewed both Industry and Art, for the Wall was thick, and the Workmanship rare on all sides.

CHAP. XXVIII.

Of the three Walls which are most to be admired of all this Work.

N the other fide from the City, the Hill hath an open prospect to the Plains and the afcent to the Fortress is so easie and wide, that an Enemy mayer. filv arrack it in a formed and orderly Body. Wherefore they fortified it on that fide with three Walls, one before the other, each Wall being 200 fathom in length be. ing made in the shape of a half Moon, because they come to join with the single Wall, which is towards the side of the City. In the first Wall which is to from the power and first shock of an Enemy, though they are all of the same Work they have placed the greatest of their Stones, which are of that stupendious bignels, as are admired by all that fee them. For my part I am of opinion that those Scrones were never digged out of any Quarry, but were loofe Rocks found in the Mountains, which they took and fathioned to their purpose, and laid them as they casually came to hand, some being hollow, others rough, and others plain and finooth; fome were pointed at the corners, others without; in the mending and plaining of which they were not very curious, by paring or cutting off the uneven parts of every Stone; but rather filled up the hollow or vacant places with some other Stone, which was as great or greater than the other, and so supplied the inqualities of one Stone by some other which fitted to it; for it seemed to have been their intention to have composed all the work with great Stones, and not to have pieced it up with the adjuncts of less, being a matter of greater State and Magnificence. And this is what Acofta did much admire in the Work, that the Stone of the Wall not being cut, but worked without any Rule or compass, were refo well fitted, as if they had been all polified; and though the outward furth cies of the Stone was rough, and not smooth, but remained in its natural fathion yet the joint, by which it was incorporated with another, was so well worked that nothing could be better fitted; so that considering the rustical outside, and the artificial junctures within, it made in groß a noble and a stately Frontispiece

A certain Prieft, born at Montilla, who remained at Peru after I was come to Spain, and where he also returned in a short time after, speaking of this Forms, and of the prodigious Stones, told me, that before he faw them he could not be lieve the report was made of the mightiness of them, and after he had seen them, the Fame feemed less than they really were; and confidering by what power or at they were laid in that form, he could not conclude or imagine other than that they were fo disposed by some Enchantment or power of the Divel. And really though the Indians had been provided with all the Engines and Arts which are common in our Countries, yet still the difficulty will occur, how the Art of Man was able to arrive to fo great a work, which exceeds all the Seven Wonders of the Universe. We know that to make a Wall so long and broad as that of Babylon, 10 erect a Coloffus at Rhodes, or the Pyramids in Egypt, are easily contrived and completed by the force of multitudes, and quantities of all materials, fuch as Brick and Lime for making the Walls of Babylon, Brafs and Copper for casting the Colfus, Stones and Mortar for raifing a Pyramid; in fine, time, and labour, and numbers of People are able to effect and compass any thing of this nature; but how the Indians without Engines should be able to carry and transport such vast Stones of Rocks from remote places up to the top of a Hill, and without Tools polifh and fit them for a Building, is such a riddle as the wit of Man is not able to resolve but must have recourse to Enchantments, and helps from the Devil; in regard that evil Spirits entertained fuch familiarity with that people.

Every Wall of the Rampire had its Gate about the middle, and every Gate had its Percullis of Stone, of the length and breadth of the Gate which flut it. The first Gate they called Tinpuncu, which signifies the Gate of Grayel, because the Soil thereabouts is gravelly, and full of Sand, which may be mixed with Mortar, for they call Sand and Gravel Tin, and Youncu a Gate. The next Gate of the second Ramnire they called Acabuana, for the Word Acabuana, pronounced with an afoiration in the Throat, was the Name of the Master-workman that made it. The third Gate was called Viracochi Puncu, being confectated to their God Viracochi, which was the Apparition before related, which in a Dream revealed unto the Prince the Rebellion of the Chancas, and for that reason they esteemed him the Defender and new Founder of their City of Cozco, and called that Gate by his Name. imploring the like Protection and Affiftence in defence of that Fortrets which he had formerly thewed in the fafeguard of that City, and of the whole Empire: Between one Wall and the other there was a distance of about twenty five or thirty foot, which was filled up with Earth to the top of the Wall; but it is not certain whether this Earth was cast up by hand, or whether it were from the rife of the Hill, perhaps it might be by both, and that what was wanting by the afcent might be supplied by the hand. Every Rampire had its Breast-work, under which they could fight with better shelter, than if they had exposed themselves to the oven force of the Enemy.

CHAP. XXIX.

Of the three great Towers; of the chief Workmen employed in this Building, and of the great Rock which refled in the way.

Aving passed these three Walls or Rampires, we come to a long, and narrow place, where were three strong Towers built in a Triangle, according to the fituation of the place; the chiefelf of them was placed in the middle, called Mayor Marca, which fignifies the round Fortress, in which springs a plentifull Fountain of excellent Water, which was brought at a far diffance under ground. but where, and from whence the Indians do not know; for fuch Secrets as these were always referved from common knowledge in the Breafts of the Inca, and of his Council. In that Tower the Kings had their Apartments, when at any time they went up to recreate themselves in the Fortress, the Walls of which, instead of Tapeftry, were adorned with Gold and Silver, inlaid with the thapes of Birds and Beafts, which were excellently well counterfeited; it was also furnished with its fervices of Plate and other moveables, properly belonging to it, as had all the other Royal Palaces. The fecond Tower they called Paucas Marca, and the third Sacllac Marca, they were both square, with many Chambers for lodging Souldiers belonging to the Garison; they were often relieved and changed by their turns, and were to be all Incus of privilege, for other Nations were not capable of admission into that Fortress, being effectived a facred place, and confectated to the Sun for exercise of Arms, as the Temple was for Prayers and Sacrifice. The Captain or Commander in Chief was to be of the true and legitimate Royal Bloud, under whom were feveral Lieutenants and Officers ordained, fome for government of the Militia, others were Purveyors, and fuch as had care of the Provisions, others were Armourers to furbith and cleanfe the Arms, and others had the care of the Wardrobe, of keeping the Cloths and Shoes of the Garifon. Under these Towers was as much room as above, and between them were Galleries of Communication. The Quarters under ground were formed with great Art, having Lanes and Paffages with fuch windings and turnings, all of the fame fize, and fathion that they feemed a labyrinth, and so difficult to find out, that none durft enter in without a Guide, or direction of a twine of Thread, which being fastened as the entrance, directed their return through all the Turnings and Meanders of it When I was a Boy I often went up to the Cattle, with others of the fame age with me; and then the upper Rooms were all ruined, and fome of those which were under; into which we durft not adventure farther than we could fee the light which thined in them, for the Indians told us, that if we adventured farther we should lofe our felves, and never find our way out again.

In making their Vaults they were ignorant of the way of arching, but infled thereof they laid Braggets or Corbels of Stone, which ferved in the place of Reams for support of the whole frame of Building, which being equally cut, and shared at all ends reached from one Wall to the other. All the great Fabrick of this Fortress was made in part of polithed, and part of rough Stone, richly embellished according to the best of their Art, whereby the Incas made oftentation both of their Skill and Grandeur, being defirous to advance the Excellency and Magnife. cence of this Work above any other; that fo it might remain for a confimma-tion of all their Trophies; and indeed fo it proved, for the Spaniards, a few years after this was completed, invaded their Empire, and put a ftop to the proceedings of feveral other great Works, which they defigned to have finished.

There were four chief Undertakers in the Building of this Fortres; the principal Perfon, who drew the Draught, and defigned the whole Plot, was Hualiba Rimachi, he was an Inca, and stiled Apu, which fignifies Chief; the second to him was Inca Maricanchi, and the third Acabuana Inca, to whom they afcribe the chief contrivance of the Buildings at Tiahuanacu, which we have formerly mentioned The fourth and laft was Calla Cunchny, in whose time the great Stone which rested in the way was brought thither, and his Name engraved on it, as a monument to conserve his memory; the which Stone (or Rock rather) was of that vast proportion, and so exceeding all the others, that I would gladly insert here the me measure of its height and thickness, but in regard I have not procured an exact and certain account of it, I shall refer my felf to the relation of those who have feen it: It remains in the Plain before the Fortress, to which, as the Indians say, it could never arrive, in regard it tired by the way, and wept bloud, proceeding from the toil and fatigue it had endured in its motion. The stone is rough and unpolithed, in the same manner as it was hewn from its Quarry, a great part of it is buried under ground, and they fay, it is now funk lower than when I faw it for they fanfied that there was great treasure hid under it, and for that reason they digged about it as deep as they were able, that fo they might arrive at this image nary Riches; but in regard that as they digged the Stone funk lower, therefore the greatest part of it is now hidden under the Earth. According to my best remembrance it hath a hole or two upon the upper part of it, or fuch as paffes from one fide to the other; the Indians call the foliables the Eyes of the Stone, our of whichit wept bloud; from the Dust which is lodged in those Holes, and the continual droppings of water upon them, it hath died the Stone in those parts with a reddiff colour, because the soil thereabouts is of the same colour, and which the Indians fay proceeded from the bloud which iffued with the tears of that Stone. This Fable is commonly reported amongst the Indians, and I have heard it often from

But the true Moral of this Fable, recounted by the Inca's Amautas, who were their Philosophers, and people of learning, was this: That this Stone, or Rock, was moved and drawn by twenty thousand Indians, who dragged and drew it with great Cables; the undertaking was great, for it was to pass through cragged, and uneven ways, and over Ascents and Descents; one half of the people drew before, the other half were on each fide to poile the weight, and keep the Stone direct, left it should fall into any precipice, or gravel it self in any place, from whence it could never be recovered. It is said, that for want of due care in those who had the poiting of this weight, it happened to lean too much towards the defcent of a hill, and being over-born by its great burthen, it tumbled down a bank, and killed three or four thouland of those Indians who were the guides to direct and support it; notwithstanding which misfortune they again took courage, and raifed the Stone, carrying it to the Plain where it now refts. The Bloud which it thed, and squeezed from the Veins of these poor Wretches, were the true tears which iffued from the hollow orbs of its Eyes; and because the weight was too valt to be carried up to the place, unto which it was defigned, they faid, that it tired and fainted in its Journey, attributing all the feelings and vaffions of the Men tired and fainted in its Jointey, attributing an extra part of the inanimate and feinfeles Stone. This, and many fuch Fables, the Indiana conferve amongst them, believing that such passages as these are best recommended to Posterity, and conserved under such wonderfull and improbable fictions.

The Spaniards, who in reason ought to maintain, and at their own cost to have kept this Fortrels in repair, for the greater advancement of their own honour, that fo they might give occasion to the World to admire their Atchievements and great Prowefs, in being able to fubdue a people fo potent, and which were able to erect fuch wonderfull and prodigious Fabricks; but on the contrary, as if they had been envious of the great Acts of those they had subdued, they have laid their own hands to the pulling down of this prodigious piece of Art and Industry; and with the Materials thereof have built the private Houses of some particular perfons in Cozco; for to avoid the cost, and time, and labour of the Indians in bringing Stones and Materials from diffant parts, they have brought from the Walls of the Rampire, all the polithed and wrought Stones, that there is fearce a House in all the Town, at least fuch as belongs to the Spaniards, but what is built our of the ruines of that Fortress.

The great Stones which were the supporters of the lower Buildings, were digged up, and brought away for Thresholds and Jambs of their Doors; the lesser Stones served for the Walls; and for Steps to their Stairs, they chose stones of such fize as was convenient, which when they had found, and pitched upon, they cast down all the rows of Stones above them, to ten or twelve degrees above them. untill they came to those which fitted their occasions. In this manner they wholly overturned and destroyed the Majesty of that noble and stately building, unworthy of fuch a Fate, and which will ever remain an object of great compaffion to all Beholders, the Spaniards were so expedite in the destruction of it, that in my time there remained onely fome few ruines which we have formerly mentioned. The three great Rampires of Rock are ftill remaining, because the Stones are so vast and weighty, as cannot be removed; howsoever they have disordered some of them, in hopes of finding that Chain or Cable of Gold, which Hunna Capac made, for they had some intimation that it was buried there.

The good King Inca Yupanqui, who was the tenth of the Incas, was the first Founder of this abused and injured Fortress, though others will have it begun by his Father Pachacutec, because he had left the first draught and model of it, and had made Provisions of great quantities of Stone and Rocks for the Building, befides which there were no other Materials. The whole Work was fifty Years before it was completed, not being finished untill the Reign of Huayna Capac, nor then neither, as the Indians report, for that the great Rock which refted in the way was defigned for additional Buildings to it; but to this and many other Buildings in divers parts of the Empire, a frop and difappointment was given by the Civil Wars which arose not long after between the two Brothers, Huascar Inca, and Atabualpa, in whose time the Spaniards made their Invasion, and then those Destructions and Ruines followed, which are apparent at this Day.

CHAP. I.

The Conquest of the Province Huacrachucu, and whence that Name was derived.

HE Great Tupac Inca Tupanqui (whose Name of Tupac fignishes Brightness and Splendour, and indeed the greatness of his Atchievements deserve no less a Title) so soon as his Father was dead, took upon him the coloured Wreath, and having complied with the Obsequies, Rites, and Funeral Ceremonies and Sacrifices due to the memory of deceased Kings, in which he spent the first Year of his Reign, he took a Progress into the several Kingdoms and Provinces of his Empire; for it was the constant Custome of the young Heir, to soon as he came to his Sovereignty, to shew himself to his Subjects, that they might both know and love his Person, and that both the publick Counsellers in Provinces, and particular Persons might have opportunities to represent their Aggrievances personally to the King, whereby the Judges and Ministers of Justice might with more care persons their Duties, searing to tyranize and oppress the people.

Having in these Journies and Visitations passed four long years, with which his people remained highly satisfied and contented, he decreed that fourty thousand Men should be raised, and put in Arms against the following Year, that so he might proceed forward in the Conquests and Designs which his Ancestours had projected. The great pretence on which the Incar did most avail themselves, and that which best covered the Ambition they conceived for enlargement of the Empire, was a Zeal towards the Welfare of the Indians, whose unhumane and bestial Customs they desired to reform, and improve to a more moral and political way of living, and to a knowledge and worthip of his Father the Sun, whom they owned and proclaimed for their God.

The Army being raifed, and all things put in order for this Defign, and a Governour appointed for Rule of the City, the Inca took his march by way of Cuffamarca, intending to invade the Province of Chachappya; which, as Blux Valera fays, figuifies the Countrey of flour Men; it lies Eaftward from Cuffamarca, the Menseing very valiant, and the Women beautifull. Thele Chachapysas adored Serpents, and worthipped the Bird Cuntur for their principal God; on report of which the Inca Tupaa Tupanqui was greatly moved to reduce this Province to his Empire, being famous in feveral respects, but the approach to it was difficult, the firmation being mountainous and craggy, and the people of it above forty than fand in number.

These Chachapuras bound a Sling about their head for the dress and ornamen of it. being thereby diffinguished from other Nations; the manner and fashion of their Sling was different from other Indians, being the chief Arms which they used in the War, as they were of the Ancient Majorkins.

But before they came to the Province of Chachapuya, they were to pass through another, called Huacrachucu, which is very large and great, but the fituation mountainous, and the people fierce. They wear for a devife and diffinition on their heads, or rather did wear it (for now all those fancies are confounded) a black Binder of Wool, stitched with white slies; and instead of a Feather upon it, they carried the point of a Horn of a Deer, or Stag; whence they had the Name of Huacrachnen, which is the horned Cap; for Chucu fignifies the Salha. bout the head, and Huacra a Horn. This people, before they were fuldued by the Incas, adored Serpents, and in their Temples and Houses set up their sources for Idols to be worthipped. This Province offering it felf in the way to Chachapuya, was first to be subdued and accordingly orders were given to the Army to attack it: the Natives appeared in defence of their Countrey, supposing it impregnable, and not passable for an Army, and therefore at all the difficult paffes opposed the Enemy, in which Skirmishes many were slain on both sides. Which being observed by the horand his Council, they confidered, that in case they proceeded in that rigorous and forcible manner, the consequence would be of great damage to their own people and the total ruine and extirpation of their Enemies: To prevent which has ving gained fome strong and fast places, they sent their Summons and Propofals of Peace and Friendship, as was the custome of the Incas; by which they made known to them, that the intention and defign of the Inca was to doe them good (as had all his Ancestours done to the other Nations they had subdued) and not to tyranize, but to bring them greater benefit than he could expect from them': That they would doe well to cast their eyes for example on other Nations, whose Lands or Possessions they had not taken away, but improved by Aqueducts, and other benefits: That they had permitted the Curacas to oniov the fame Government which they formerly had, having no other design in all their Wars and Actions, than to force Men to Adore the Sun, and reform them from their inhumane and bestial customs. These Propositions as forded great matter of debate to this people; for though many were of opinion that they ought to accept the terms of the Inca, and receive him for their Lords yet the younger fort, who were more in number, and of less experience, oppofed the agreement, and carried it in the Negative, and thereupon profecuted the War with much fury and resolution; for having contradicted the more Aged Men in their opinion, they effeemed themselves engaged in point of reputation to overcome, or dye.

But that the Enemy might not think that the Conditions which the Inca had offered, did proceed from timorousness, or cowardise, but onely from that piety, and compationate difposition, which was inherent in him, and all his family; he commanded that the War should be renewed with heat and violence; and he ving made divers detachments of his Army, affailed them in feveral places at the same time; that so making a diversion of their Forces, he might abate the heat of their courage, and make them understand their own weakness. With this fecond attempt they gained other places, and ftrong paffes, and ftraitened the Enemy in that manner, that they had no other remedy, but to have recomb unto the mercy and elemency of the lnea, who, according to the accustomany goodness of those Kings, received them to pardon, giving order to his Officers and Ministers to treat the Huacrachucus, as if they were Brethren and Allies, to cloath the Curacas with the finest fort of Garments called Compi, and the more ordinary people with the Avascas, which is the more coarse. He also commanded, that they should be supplied with Provisions for their sustenance, for that a year of War had confumed all their Stores; which they took fo kindly, that they esteemed it the greatest evidence they could receive of the favour and forgiveness of the Inca.

BOOK VIII. Royal Commentaries.

Herewith an end was put to the War of this Campagn; for that the Cononeft of a Province so inaccessible in its situation, and so well defended by its Natives, was a fufficient Work for one Summer. And because that Countrev was subject to much rain, he quartered his Army in the Frontiers of it, and recriticed it with twenty thousand Men more, that he might make a more quick dispatch and riddance in his Conquests. But first he took order to have his new Subjects well instructed in the superstitious Rites of his Religion, and in the Laws and Moralities of his Empire: He appointed also, that designs should be laid for Aqueducts and Gardens, and for clearing those Grounds which were fruitfull, and of good Soil, of Bushes and Weeds, making them good and profitable manure, and fit to be fown; for want of which industry, and good husbandry, little or no benefit was made of their Lands: All which, when the Indiana fay, they admired, and acknowledged the infinite goodness of the Inc. to them.

CHAP. II.

Of the Conquest which the Incas made on the Borders of Chachapuyu.

HE recruits being come, and the feafon of the year fit for action, the Irect Tupac commanded his Army out of their Winter-quarters to take the Field, and march towards the Province of Chachapuyu; but in the first place he dispatched a Herald before to offer them terms of War, or Peace; but they flighted all terms of Accommodation, and resolutely answered, That they were ready with Arms in their hands to defend their Liberty, and that the Inca might doc his pleafure, for that they refolved never to be his Vaffals. This Answer being given, both parties prepared for War, which was carried on with that refolution and fury, that many were killed and wounded on both fides: The Incas refolved never to retreat; and the Chachas (for they had that Name also) were obstinately determined rather to dye than yield. Both parties being thus refolved, the War became very bloudy, by reason that the Chachas, whose Countrey may be flyled a Kingdom, being 50 Leagues in length, and 20 in breadth, reaching to Muyupampa, which is 30 Leagues farther; forefeeing the intentions of the Inca, and growing jealous of his Power, had made provition for two years before a-gainst him, having fortified all their strong holds, the ruines of which remain to this day; and having Barracadoed the narrow paffes, which are rocky and mountainous, and fo difficult to climb, that in many places the Indians have made eight or ten several Stories, with steps to descend; and besides these, there is no pasfage forwards by other ways. Notwithstanding all these difficulties, the Incas, with loss of many of their Men, gained several of these strong Holds, which proved of great advantage to them: The first of these was situate on a Mountain, being two Leagues and a half high, called the Hill of Pias, because the peo ple, who live on the other fide, are to called, being the most considerable of that Province. And thus far the Incas having gained with great difficulty, they were now entered eight or ten Leagues within the Countrey, the people retreating before to other places of greater strength.

Howfoever the Old Men and Women, who were not able to climb the Mountains in company with the Young, were taken by the Inca, together with young Children, whom the Parents could not carry with them; all which the Great Tupac committed to the care and kind treatment of his Officers.

Having paffed this people of Pias, the Army proceeded in its march; and be ing come to a certain opening, or breach of the fnowy Mountain, called Chiran calla, which fignifies the dangerous Gate, because it had been fatal to many peo. ble, who passed that way, the Inca made a detachment of 300 Men, which like a forlorn Hope, preceding the Army on defign of difcovery, were on a fudden over-whelmed with the fall of a Mountain of Snow, in which all perifled, no one Man escaping. By reason of this missfortune, the Inca could not pass for 6. one man eccaping. By reason of this mistoriane, the man could not pais torgoveral days, which gave occasion to the Chachapuyar to spread a report through at their Countrey, that the Incas terrified with the late unhappy accident, were resistant. red, and fled to their own Countrey.

The Snows being in a manner thawed, the Inca purfued his Conquest, and with much difficulty gained step by step all the Countrey, as far as Cuntur Mans which a confiderable people inhabits; paffing by others on each hand of the way by reason that the passages to them were obstructed, and difficult, and the Native not worth the labour and charge of a Conquest. But the people of Cuntur Mana made great refiftence, fought valiantly, and continued the War for many days But whereas the power of the Inca was at that time invincible, and that nothing could be opposed fufficient to withstand it, the Chachas being over-powered by the Numbers which affailed them, were forced to yield, and submit themselves at the cretion to the Inca, who, according to his custome, received them to mercy and pardon; and that he might quiet and fatisfie their minds with confidence of his Clemency, and might by their example invite and allure others to the like his iection, he treated them with kind entertainment, bestowing favours, and his

The Inca having fettled his Ministers and Officers necessary for the Establish ment of affairs, he proceeded forward, taking in all the Forts and strong place in the way before him, which now yielded without much bloud or opposition following the example of Cuntur Marca: Eight Leagues from which is another people salled Cassa Marquilla, who defended themselves within their Rocks and Moun tains : For these being naturally warlike and fierce, adventured to try the force of the Incas in many engagements; but at length their Chachas having proved their irrefiftible power, and confidering that the greatest part of their Province had submitted to the Inca, they thought it best for them to follow the same example, and vield also.

Royal Commentaries.

Of the Conquest of other People, and Barbarous Na: tions.

FRom Cassanarquilla the Inca proceeded to another People called Papamarca, from the Papas or Dewlaps, which are great bunches that hang from their throats; the which were subdued by the Inca in the same manner as the others: Thence he marched eight Leagues farther, conquering all before him, untill he came to a confiderable Plantation, called Raympampa, which fignifies the place of Festival, the principal Festival of the Sun being called Raymi 3 of which we have treated at large in a distinct Chapter. And it happening when this people was fibdued, (whose Countrey was all a pleasant and even Plain,) that the grand Festival of Raymi was then come; wherefore the Inca appointed that place for the celebration of it; for, as we have faid, it was not a material point in their Religion, where, or in what place that Feaft was kept by the Inca himfelf, provided that the High Prieft, and the other Incas, observed it at Cozco, with all the formalities and folemn rites of it.

From Raymipampa he marched three Leagues farther to Suta, which he fubdued with like facility; for the Natives feeing the greatest part of their Countrey already in possession of the Inca, yielded themselves with all readiness into his power. From Suta the Army marched to a people called Llavantu, which was the most remote part of the Province of Chachapuya, which also yielded, despairing of power to make relistence against the Inca, who now was become absolute Matter of the whole Province; the most considerable people of which, we have already mentioned, though befides these there were many little Plantations not worth the naming. The Conquett of this Province was very difficult and laborious, by reafon of the Mountains and strong Passes, defended by a stout and sierce people.

From Llavannu the Inca, Tupac Tupanqui, made a detachment of his Army, to subdue the Province of Musupampa; through which the Valiant Ancohualla took his March, when he cast off his subjection to the Inca, as we have related in the Life of Viracocha; this Province is fituated within the Anis, and once acknowledged subjection to the Chacha, but whether it was by force, or by agreement of confederacy, or alliance, the Indians are ignorant; it lyes 30 Leagues Eastward from

The Natives of Muyupampa having received information, that the whole Province of Chachapuya had yielded to the Inca, did also with much readiness receive his Religion, Laws and Cultoms: the like also did the Province called Cascayunca, and divers others of lefs note within that Divifion; all which being received into favour of the Inca, he commanded, that they should be instructed in the Knowledge and Religion of the Sun, and all necessaries provided for their better welfare and subsistence; to which end, he ordered Aqueducts to be made, their Lands to be plowed, and broken up, that so they might yield greater abundance, and increase; and that the Curacus should be vested with the finest Compi, which they efleemed as a high favour; and with these and other benefits the people remained abundantly fatisfied. Herewith the Wars concluded for that year, the Army being drawn into Winter-quarters; and in the interim Orders were issued out for supplying the Souldiery, and the new Conquests with Provisions from the Neighbouring Countries; for the Wars had made destruction, and caused want and famine of all things necessary for the support of life. The Summer being come, the Inca Tupac took the Field with an Army of forty thousand Men, and marched to the Province of Huancapampa, which is a Countrey large and populous, but all of different Nations and Languages; every Nation or Lineage lived apart, or by it felf, without friendthip or alliance, but in a state of War, acknowledging no Lord, or Government, for their Superiour, but like brute beafts, preyed one upon the other: they had no employment or occupation to buffe themselves in for most of them went naked, without cloaths or covering; the prize and reward of their War, were the bodies of the Wives and Daughters of the conquered, of which they enjoyed as many as they could get; and for the Men, they eat and do voured one the other.

Their Religion was as bestial as their Morality; they adored many Gods, eve. ry Lineage, or Family, had one or more proper to it; fome adored Animals, or living Creatures, others Birds, Herbs, Plants, Rivers, Fountains, nay any thing which they liked, or were pleafed with; in which diverfity of Gods, there often arose Disoutes and Arguments concerning their Power and Goodness, which was most commonly decided by War. People living at this rate, without reason or politiques, were eafily subdued; for they could never stand to make any defence but, like wild beafts, were hunted in the Mountains, where in the Thickets, in Caves and Rocks they concealed themselves; but famine, and want of sustenance forced many of them from their retirements, into the power and obedience of the Inca, though many of them, who were obstinate and surly, like brute beasts, pe rished in their places of concealment.

But the Inca Tupac used all diligence to catch, and tame them, committing them into the hands of Masters and Instructors, who might teach them to associate and live in communities, how to cultivate the Grounds, and wear Cloathing, and make Garments of Wool and Cotton: they also shewed them how to bring the nels of water for refreshing their Fields, and so learned them to manure their Lands that it became the most fruitfull foil of all Pern. In some time afterwards, for greater improvement of that Countrey, they ennobled it with a Temple of the Sun, and a House of Select Virgins, with many other Edifices of Honour and Re. nown. They commanded, that all their Gods should be thrown to the Fault and that they should acknowledge and worship no other but onely the Sun, who was the fole God of the Universe: that none should eat Man's sleth on pain of Death, and utter destruction of himself and family; and for other matters they gave them Priests and Men of learning to instruct them in their Laws and Customs: In all which they became so docible, and such proficients, that in a short time they lived orderly and fociably in civil communication, and the two Provinces of Cascayunca, and Huancasampa became the most knowing, and most orderly Citizens in all the Empire of the Inc.u.

CHAP. IV.

The Conquest of three Great and Warlike Provinces.

 $\mathbf{H}^{\mathcal{D}}$ ancapampa being conquered, the Incas proceeded to reduce three other great Provinces, containing many other Nations under their power; but how long this succeeded after the Conquest of Huancapampa, is not certain: But these people were of a different quality to those before mentioned; for they lived in a political manner, had their Towns, and Fortifications, and fome manner of Government a-mongst them; they often assembled, and held Counsels to consider of the publick good and welfare. No person pretended to a Right of Dominion over them, but by common confent they elected their Chief Governour in the time of Peace, and Captain in case of War, serving them with entire obedience, during the time of their Magistracy. These three Provinces were called Cassa, Ayahnaca, and Callna. The Inea, so soon as he approached the Confines of these Countries, sent his Summons to the Inhabitants, requiring them to receive him for their Lord and Sovereign, or otherwise provide to defend themselves by force of Arms; for answer whereunto, they returned a short reply, That they were ready to dye in defence of their Liberties; for as they never had received any Lord that was imposed on them, so now they could not incline their minds to any servile subjection. Herewith a cruel War began, for all the fair offers and pretences of the biea could avail nothing; for their ancient liberty and freedom still presenting it self before vail nothing; for their ancient inderty and freedom titli preferring it left before them, flopped their Ears to all the gentle words of favour the high expressed, faying, That the greatest favour and grace he could doe them, was to leave them to their own liberty. All these three Provinces being affociated together, unanimoully contributed to the affiftence of each other, and made front oppolition, having killed about 8000 Incas; with which flaughter the Incas being enraged perfected the Enemy with fire and fword, and all the miferies of War, which they supported with great patience and equality of mind in contemplation of their liberty, which they disputed and defended with great resolution; for no sooner were they forced from one ftrong Hold, but they posted to another, and thence to another, abandoning their Countrey, and Houses, without care of their Wives and Children, resolving to dye with Arms in their hands, rather than become the Slaves and Vaffals of another.

The Incas still proceeded in the Conquest of this Country, untill they had forced them into a corner of it; where having fortified themselves, they endured all extremities; and though reduced to the ultimate point of periffing by famine. yet ftill continued constant, and resolved not to be subject to the Inca: the which fome of their more fober and intelligent Captains confidering, and finding that upon these principles all of them must necessarily dye and perilh, without knowing any cause or reason for it: And seeing that other Nations, as free as they, had submitted to the Dominion of the Inca, under whom their peace and plenty was augmented, rather than in the least abated or infringed. The Captains and Chiefs having this communication together, agreed to yield themselves and people to the Inca; the which was performed, though not without fome mutiny and fedition amongst the Souldiery; howsoever the generality being led by the example and dictates of their Commanders, did all at last submit, and yield unto due obedi-

The Inca Tupac received them with all expressions of grace and favour, telling them, how much he pitied their folly, which had so unnecessarily betrayed them to the last extremities of want and famine; but now to relieve them in this condition, he ordered, that they should be entertained and treated like his own Children: And that whereas many of them perished in the late War, so that their Lands and Dwellings were void and depopulated; he ordered, that they should be again flocked and supplied by people transplanted from other Provinces. And thus the Inca having provided matters for due administration of that Government, and fettled and established their Doctrine and Religion, he returned again to Cozco, being more troubled and uneafie for the lofs and destruction of those poor Indians, than tired or wearied with the fatigues, and incommodiousness of the War; of which he was fo fentible, that he would often fay, that if he were affured that the other Nations, more remote, had taken example by the obstinacy of these, that he would defer the Conquest of them for the present, and untill such a conjuncture of time, as might render them more pliable, and better disposed to receive the Government of the Incas.

Wherefore the Great Tupac refraining from War, spent several years in visiting his Kingdoms, adorning them with stately Edifices in every Province, and inhabited Countrey, such as Royal Palaces, Fortresses, and Houses for publick Stores, Aqueducts and Temples dedicated to the Sun, with Convents for the Select Virgins, besides many other publick Works, such as making High-ways and open Roads, of which we shall treat more at large in the Second Part; but more especially his care was, to finish the Fortress of Cozco, the Foundation of which was laid, and begun by his Father the Inca Tupanqui.

Having thus spent some years in the exercises and employments of Peace, the Incare affumed his thoughts of conquering the Provinces, which lye Northward, called Chinchafum: The first Quarter he came to, was Huannen, which contains many Northward to the Chinchafum of the Contains many Northward to the Chinchafum of the Contains many Northward to the Cont ny Nations, but all independent each of other, living scattered up and down the Fields, without government or communication, but in perpetual War and Fightings: they had some Fortresses and strong Holds on the tops of Mountains, to which at any time, when they were worsted, they sled for reluge; all which people, by fair terms, according to the accultomary clemency of the Ineas, were with much facility reduced to their command; though at first the Natives of Huannes

thewed themselves surly, obstinate and rude; with which the Officers of the Income being highly provoked, put many of them to the Sword with great feverity and cruelty; but the Inca, to appeale and moderate their fury, put them in mind of the Original Law of the first Inca, Manco Capac, who commanded them to reduce the Indians to his subjection by gentle and fair terms, rather than by Arms, or of

The Indians being on one fide terrified with the fear of punishment, and allo red on the other by the promifes, and kind offers of the Inca, were reduced with out much labour; so that they were persuaded to live in Societies, and receive the Idolatry and Government of the Incas, who, in a short time, so improved this plea. fant Province of Huanney, that by the fruitfulness of the Soil, and good temperature of the Climate, it became the Head and Chief of all the Neighbouring Countries And here, as a principal mark of favour, they erected a Temple dedicated to the And nere, as a principal mark of havour, they decede a tempe deducated to me Sun, with a Houfe for the Select Virgins: In the building of which, twenty thou fand Indians were continually employed, and as some will have it thirty thousand, all which took their turns in the labour, which shews the great numbers of those Inhabitants. Pedro de Cieça in his 8 oth Chapter speaking of the Huannen, halt thele words, which I have extracted Verbatim. "In the Precincts of Guannen, therewa erected a Royal Edifice, rarely built of great Stones, and well polified. This Palace, or Royal Chamber, was the chief place where the Courts of Iudicanne were held for the Neighbouring Provinces, and for the Andes, adjoyning where unto was the Temple of the Sun, with many Virgins and Officers belonging to it; and was so considerable in the time of the Incas, that above 30000 ld. "ans were always employed in the fervice of it. It belonged to the Stewards the Incas to collect in the ordinary Tributes; and the Countrey people were " obliged to afford their attendance and fervice at this Palace. Thus far are the words of Cieca de Leon.

The Conquest being made of Huanucu, as we have in short related; we stall now briefly touch on other matters, unless some remarkable passage occur, for I resolve to hasten to the end of those Conquests which were made by the Incar, that so I may treat of the Wars between Huascar and Atabualpa, who were Ne phews of this Tupaa Tupanqui. To proceed therefore, we fay, that the Inaa Tup commanded an Army of forty thousand Men to be raised, and fitted for the year following, intending to conquer the great Province, called Camari, which wash Chief over divers others, being very populous, and the Inhabitants valiant and warlike; for their diffinction from others, they wore their Hair long, tying p their Locks on the top of their heads with a knot. The Nobles, and those would be fine in their Dress, wore a Cap on their heads of a thin woven thread. like a fine Sieve, scarce above three fingers high, through which some threads were drawn of divers colours: but the common fort, and fuch as were lazy, and ungentile, wore, in the place hereof, the shell of a Goard, or Pumpkin, for their Cap; fo that oftentimes in difference, the Indians would call this Nation of Cannan, by the Name of Matiuma, or Pumpkin-pate. By this, and fuch-like devices on their heads, during all the Reign of the Incas, the Indians were diffinguished, and known of what Countrey and Province they were; in my time also they carried these distinctions; but now, as I am informed, they are neglected, and every one wears what he pleases. These Natives of Camard, before the times of the Inc., went almost naked, both Men and Women, wearing onely a loose Cloth to cover their privities: They had many Lords which ruled over them, some of which made an Alliance one with the other; but these were such as were of the meanest rank, who, to refift the power of the great ones, and their tyrannous oppression, joined together in confederacy and alliance.

CHAP. V.

Of the Conquest of the Province of Cannari; of its Riches and Temple.

Topac Tupanqui marched to the Province Cannari, and in his way conquered all that tract of ground which is named Palra, from whence, and from the low and warm Vallies, they carried unto Cozco, that pleasant Fruit which is called Palta ; the which Countrey, though the people thereof were fierce and warlike, vet the Incas eafily overcame, alluring them with fair words, and kind usage and treatment into a fubmission. The device, or distinction of this Nation, was a certain little Tablet; which so soon as a Child was born, they bound on his forehead, and another on the nape of his neck, which every day they bound harder and harder, keeping it on untill he was three years of Age; by which time taking it off, it had brought the head into a most ugly and deformed shape; they always carried their Children at their backs; fo that when they faw an Indian with a broader and flatter forehead than was usual, and the nape of his neck wide and broad, they would in derifion call him Palta Uma, or Palta Pate. And here the Inca having fettled and established all things necessary for the religious and secular Government, he proceeded with his Army to the borders of Cannaris, from whence he dispatched his accustomary Summons, that either they should submit, and yield, or prepare for War. These offers of Peace being tendered, occasioned some debates amongst the Camarians, but at length, after variety of opinions in the cafe, it was generally, and by the major part agreed to fubmit, concluding themselves unable to make refishence, and thereupon full of joy and feltival, they went to make tender of their fervice and obedience to the Inca; after whose example the Curacas came in, and with much readiness paid their homage and duty. The Inca received them with much commendation and praise, commanding that such Cloths and Vestments should be given them, as were necessary and convenient for them; and that some course should be taken to instruct them in the Doctrine and Religious Worship of the Sun, and in that Political way of Government by Laws, which was practifed by the Incas: For before this time the Cannarians adored the Moon for their principal God, and after that Great Trees and Stones, which were rare, and not common, especially the Jaspar; but having received the Doctrine of the Sun, there was a Temple immediately built, and dedicated to him, and a House of Select Virgins, with many Palaces for the Kings. They erected also Houses to receive the Royal Stores, and the common Provisions of the people; they enlarged also their Arable Grounds and Patturage, they made Aqueducts and Chanels to convey their water; in short, they made the same improvements in this, as in all other Countries which were fubdued by the Inca, and with better fuccess, because the goodness of the Soil was fuch, as produced all manner of Fruit in great abundance; which the Cannarians observing, were much satisfied with the change of their condition and vaffalage, proving ever afterwards very good Subjects, which they teftified by their Loyalty in the time of the Civil Wars between Huafear and Atabualpa: Though afterwards, when the Spaniards came in, one of the Cannarians fled over to their fide, after whose example all his Countreymen affected the Spaniards, and detested the Incas, as we shall hereaster declare in its due place, it being the custome of the World to take part with the strongest side. The Inca Tupac having reduced the Cannarians to his Dominion, took especial care to satisfie and content the several People and Nations which were under that denomination; and to oblige them the more, he resolved to assist by himself in Person, in teaching and instructing them in the Doctrine of his Idolatry, and the Laws of his Government; in the inculcating of which, he spent much time and labours, so that at length they remained well effablished and settled in peace and quietness: Upon report of which, many other Provinces, not as yet subdued, took such a kindness to the Government of the Luca, that voluntarily, and of their own accord, they joyfully received him for their Lord and Master. Amongst these Nations, there is a fort of people called Quillacu, who are so miserable and mean-spirited, that they sear they shall want Earth, and Water, and Air. Whence the Indians had a Proverb amongst them, which the Spaniards afterwards allowed in their Language, calling a Man Quillacu, when they would denote a covetous person, or any of a vile and sordid nature; and these were those on whom the Inca imposed a Tax, or Tribute of Lice, that so they might oblige them thereby to pick and cleanse themselves, not suffering their bodies to be devoured alive by this vermine. Tupan Tupanqui, and after him his Son Huayne Capaa did greatly ennoble these Provinces of the Canmarians, and that also which is called Tumipampa, with these publick Edifices, and Royal Palaces, adorning the Walls of the Chambers with the Figures of Herbs and Plants, and all living creatures represented in Gold and Silver; the Doors of them were plated with Gold, and studded with Emeralds, Torquoises, and other pretious Stones; for those sade on the sufficient of their business to make them Presents of things of great ostentation, and to please and stater their humour, adorned their Temples and Palaces with all the Treasure they were able to procure. Pedro de Gieca in the 44th Chapter of his Book, treating at large of the Richael wherewith their Temples and Royal Chambers were adorned in the Provinces be longing to the Cannarians, as far as Tumipampa, which the Spaniards mifcall Tomebanks by a mistake of letters: he there says, That besides these Riches, there was an immense sum of Treasure laid up in Jars, and Pots, and other Utensils, together with rich Robes and Vestments of Silver, with curious stitches, of which he touchesing many passages of his History; the which was so neat and curious, the Gold he ing stitched, or woven, in less pieces than Seed-pearl, and with such artificial work that the best Silver-siniths in Seville have asked me the manner how they were no ven, or fown so close, that the seam could not be discerned; a small piece of which work I brought into Spain, and it was highly prized and esteemed. Pedra de Cieca having discoursed at large of the Treasure of the Cannarian Provinces, hall these words. "In fhort, whatfoever I can utter or express of the Riches with which the Incas have adorned their Palaces, will fall short of the true value of it; and then speaking in particular of the Chambers and Temple of Tumpampa, he said, "That the Indians report, that the greatest part of those Stones, of which those Chambers and Temple were built, were brought from the great City of Cozobs command of the King Huayna Capac, and his Father Tupac the Great, by force of Men, who drew them with Cables, which if fo, was very wonderfull, confidering the weight of the Stones, and the great number of them, and the diffance of the way. These are the very words of that Historian, who, by reason of the difficulty of that work, feems to doubt the truth of that report which the Indian gave; but for my part, who am also an Indian, and acquainted with the humour of my Countreymen, I do declare my belief to be thus far of it; it being probable,that those Incan Kings, who were always desirous to shew favour to their Subjects, would also oblige them in the transportation of these Stones from Cozco; which coming from thence, were esteemed Sacred: For if it were a favour to have a licence granted for building a Temple to the Sun in any principal Province, because thereby the Inhabitants became Citizens of Cozco; much more must it be to have the very Materials of it brought from the City it felf, by command of the Inca, without o ther charge or labour to the Natives; and not onely to have their Temple referble that at Cozco, but also to be the same with it in the substance. Now the Indian, to enjoy such a piece of grandeur, which they esteemed to be God-like, and Divine, would omit all other Works to employ themselves in the carriage of these Stones, over Rocks and craggy Mountains, and to fuch a far distance as it is from Cozco to Tumipampa, which is no less than 400 Leagues, which none would believe, but those who were employed in the work; But as to the report which Pedro de Cings received from the Indians, who averred, that the greatest part of those Stones, of which the Temple and Palaces of that Countrey were composed, were brought from Cozco, was more to boast of the savour and honour which the Inca did them in giving out fuch a Command, than to raife the glory of fuch a Work by a belief, that the Stones were really brought from fo far a diffance. And so much shall serve for what we have to say concerning the Greatness and Riches of those Royal Palaces and Temples of the Sun, which were built in Tumpampa, and in all parts of Peru.

CHAP. VI.

Of the Conquest of many other and great Provinces, as far as the Consines of Quitu.

HE Inca having fettled and established affairs in Canaris, he returned to Cozco, where he spent several years in the administration of good Government, and other just actions appertaining to the Office of a Great King. But as it is natural to Puissant Princes to be ambitious, and desirous to enlarge their Emplre, so likewise this Inca thought it not fit to lose longer time in a reposed life. but to proceed in his Conquests; to which end he raised a considerable Army, with which he marched to the Confines of Tumipampa; from whence beginning his Conquests, he reduced many Provinces as far as the Borders of the Kingdom of Quitu, which extend little less than 50 Leagues in length; the chief places of which are Chanchan, Moca, Quessa, Pumallatta, which signifies the Countrey of Lions, because they abound more in those parts, than in the places thereabouts, and are adored by the Inhabitants of Ticcampi, Tincass, Cayampi, Orcollass, and others of less note, for their Gods: the which places being very thin of people, were cafily reduced; and moreover, the Lands are very barren, and the people fottifly, without Lords, or Government, or Religion, or Political Communication: every one adored that for God, which they most defined, or rather they worthipped nothing, living like brute beafts, feattered and wandering in the Fields and Woods, whom there was more trouble to infruct and inform with any kind of good manners, than to overcome, or reduce: these they taught to make Cloths, and Shoes, and to Manure the Land; for watering of which, they made Aqueducts and Chanels for them. In all these Provinces the Incas made large Roads, and High-ways, and Store-houses to lay up Provisions for sustenance of the Souldiery, and Chambers for their Kings; but would not honour to vile and tervile a fort of Inhabitants with the beauty of Temples dedicated to the Sun, or with the Houses of Select Virgins; they being capable of little more, than to keep themselves clean from Lice, by obligation of that Tribute they were to pay in them.

Whilft the Inca, Tupac Tupanqui, was thus employed in reducing and instructing the Provinces before mentioned; other Nations which are feated to the Westward of these, bordering on the Confines of that Province which the Spaniards call Puerto Viejo, or the Old Port, fent their Ambassadours to the Inca with Presents, befeeching him to receive them for his Subjects and Vaffals, and that he would be pleafed to fend them Captains and Teachers, who might inftruct them in the way of living in Societies, and how to manure their Lands, that they might live like Men, and not like Beafts, promifing for themselves all loyalty and faithfulness: Those that made the first motion to send this Embassy, were of the Nation of Huancavillea. The Inca gratiously received their Address, commanding that satisfaction should be given them in all their defires; and so Teachers were sent to inthruck them in Religion, and in the Laws and good Customs of the Inca: Enginiers were also fent them to make Aqueducts, and manure their Fields, and reduce them into Societies: But afterwards the ingratitude of this people was fuch, that contemning the favours and promifes which the Inca had made them, they arose up against his people, and barbarously murthered them all. As Pedro de Ciof in his Observations reports, which because it serves to confirm the particulars we have often repeated in this Hiftory, touching the gentleness and good-nature of the Incas, who were always ready to teach and inftruct the Indians, who fubmit ted to their Dominion; we have here inferted the Words of de Cieça, that fo what we have faid concerning the locas, may also be confirmed by the authority of the Spanish Writers: His Words are these which follow.

"To return then to our purpose; I say, that I have heard from Old Indian. " who were Chiefs in the time of the Great Topa Inga Tupanque, that some of " his Captains, with certain Troops, which they had drawn out from those Gar. " rifons, which he maintained in divers Provinces of his Kingdom, had by divers ways of management reduced much people to the friendship and fervice " of the Inca; the principal fort of which went with their Prefents to the Pro. vince of Paltas to pay their refpects of reverence and duty to the Inca, who courteoully received them with all affection, bestowing on several of them rich pieces of Woollen, made at Cozco. And whereas the occasions of the Incare quired his return to his principal Provinces, where he was so much esteemed, that they styled him Father, and honoured him with Titles of Supreme Eminence: And such was his affable disposition towards all, that his Fame was great, and his Memory perpetual. But in regard the occasions of his Kingdom were so pressing, that he could not stay, and in Person visit those Indians: he committed the care of that Government to certain Officers, who were Natives of Cozco, and whose charge it was to instruct them in the manner of living. that they might become rational Creatures, and live with some form and live. But these did not onely shut their Ears to necessary instructions, and disain But thefe did not onely flut their Ears to necessary instructions, and disting the Orders which the Officers of Topa Inga prescribed, for their living under Laws in good fociety, and using laudable customs and ways to live, such a Manuring their Lands, and other matters which contribute to the happines of of life: But in return for such benefits, which they ill understood, they killed their Instructors, not suffering one of them to live and escape; and this villany they acted without any provocation, or any oppression, whereby they might deserve ill from them. It is said, that when the Inga Topa sheard of the officers he dissipate the state of his afficie he dissipated that the lines and seat the said sheard of the officers he dissipated the said seathers. " this Maffacre, temporizing with the prefent state of his affairs, he dissembled "the matter, not having opportunity at that time to revenge the Death of those "Captains and Subjects. Thus far are the Words of Pedro de Cieça, with which he concludes his Chapter: To which we add, that the Inca having finished the Conquest of those Provinces, returned again to Cozco, to take some repose and divertisement after his great labours and cares in War.

CHAR

CHAP. VII.

The Inca conquers Quitu, and lends to his Son the Prince Huayna Capac to come to him.

THE Inca Tupac, after some sew years of ease and peace, re-assumed again the thoughts of War, resolving to turn his Arms against the Kingdom of Quitu, being a Countrey great and samous, of 70 Leagues in length, and 30 in breadth, the Soil fruitfull, and capable, by good Husbandry, of great improvement and benefit to the Inhabitants. Wherefore providing an Army of sorty thouland firong, he marched to Tumipampa, which borders on the Confines of that Kingdom, fending thence the usual Summons to the King of Quiu, who styled himfelf after the Name of his Countrey. This Prince was of a barbarous and rude nature, and confequently fierce and cholerick, feared by his Neighbours for the great Power and Dominion he had over them. Wherefore relying on his own force, he confidently answered, that he was Lord and Sovereign himself, and would acknowledge no other, nor receive Foreign Laws, but gave fuch as he thought fit to his own Vaffals; nor would he forfake the Gods of his Ancestors, which were wild beafts, and great trees, fuch as afforded them flesh and wood, and other benefits necessary for the support of life. The Inca having received this answer, would not immediately break into Acts of Hostility, endeavouring for awhile to try the effects of gentle allurements, and moderate terms, according to the rule and maxime of his Ancestors. But this kind usage operated little on the affections of the people of Quin, who grew more proud and insolent by the condescentions of the Inca; which was the cause, that when the War broke out, it continued many months and years; during which time, many Skirmithes and Battels happened with great flaughter and damage on both fides.

Tupac Inca Tupanqui perceiving that this War was likely to continue long, fent for his Eldest Son and Heir the Prince Huayna Capac, that so he might exercise and practife him in the War, commanding him to bring a recruit of twelve thoufand Men with him; his Mother was called Mama Occlo, Sifter of his Father, according to the cultome of those Kings, who always took the Eldest Sisters for their Wives: The Spanish Historians say, that Huayna Capac, in the vulgar Language of that Family, fignifies a Rich Youth: But it is certain, that those Indians in giving their Names and Sirnames to their Kings, observed (as we have faid) other Elegancies and Phrases in Speech, different from the common Language, having ever fome respect to those symptoms, and appearances of Vertue, which they observed eminent and hopefull in their Princes, adding other August Titles agreeable to the Prowefs, and Illustrious Actions performed in their Manhood. And so, because this Prince demonstrated in his Youth clear evidences of a Royal and Magnanimous Soul, they gave him the Name of Huayna Capac, which fignifies as much as a Youthfull Spirit, invigorated with inclination to heroick and illustrious Atchievements. For when they gave the Title of Capac, which is Rich, to Manco their first Inca, they did not mean the Riches of Fortune, but the Excellencies and Greatness of Mind; they ever after appropriated this Title to the Capac Allu, which is to the Royal Family, and Princes of the Bloud; fo they attributed the Title of Capac, to the Feast of Raymi, which is the principal Festival of the Sun; fo also they called a Subject Capac Runa, which is Subject and Vaffal of the Rich, meaning the Inca, being never given to any other Lord, though he were never fo Rich, or powerfull: And so also this word Capac was given to any other thing, which they would dignifie with relation to Royalty.

BOOK VIII.

Amongst the many other Illustrious Qualities with which this Prince was en dowed, he had one, by which he most particularly obliged his Subjects, giving early Indications of his Vertue, which merited the Name of Capac, during the time he was Prince, and which afterwards he conferved, when he came to be fole Monarch; The which particular quality was this: That he never denied any Woman the grant of her Petition, of whatloever age, quality or condition the were antiwering her according to her years; for if the were elder than he, he would fay, Mather, what you defive, that be done. If the were of equal years with him, he would use the compellation of Sifter; if younger, he would call her Daughter, and fay, What thou askeft, fhall he performed; and to all Women generally he would lay his hand on their left shoulder, in token of his favour and respect to them And this Magnanimity of mind he carried to even and conftant, that in marters of great importance, he would condescend to the diminution of his own Right and Prerogative of his Majesty. As we shall hereafter more at large

This Prince being now about twenty years of Age, purfued his Wars, gaining on the Kingdom by little and little, ever treating with them, and offering tenns of Peace and Friendship. But this barbarous Nation, which went almost nated and was ignorant of Political Government, would never give ear to proposit of Accommodation. Tupac the Father observing the good Conduct of his Son. committed the absolute Government of this War to his management, and h returned to Cozco, the important affairs of his Empire requiring his prefere there.

The Prince in the mean time, with the affiftence of his Captains, fo well mi naged the War, that in the space of three years he became absolute Master of the Kingdom of Quitu, though some I dians of that Countrey say, that he was sive years; but then they count the two years, in which his Father was there in perfon, attributing the Conquest of that Countrey to them both. The gentleness and good-nature of the Father and Son was the cause of this long continuance of the War; for had they vigoroufly proceeded with fire and fword, they might foon have completed their Conquest; but they willing to save the Bloud of the Natives, preffed upon them as they retired, and so won the Country by little and little; though the Indians say, that the War had continued longer, had not the King of Quitu died at that time; they fay also, that his Death was occasioned by grief, for feeing himfelf in an unhappy condition, develted of the greatest part of his Dominion, and unable to defend the remainder; and not daring to trust, or confide in the Clemency of the Inca, whom he believed he had prove ked to that degree, as never to obtain his pardon; he died with the preffire of his great troubles and afflictions; he being dead, his Captains prefently yielded themselves to the mercy of Huapna Capac, who received them with obliging terms, commanding them to be vested with Garments of the finest fort, and prefented them with other gifts, which were most in esteem almongst the Indian; treating also the more common fort of people with great kindness and friendship: In thort, he performed all the generous Actions he was able to them, to render his Clemency the more apparent and perspicuous to that stupid Nation: And to oblige all that whole Countrey in general, fo foon as the War was ended, he not onely made them Aqueducts to refresh, and make fruitfull their Soil; but also built a Temple there for the Sun, and a House for the Select Virgins, adorned with Riches, and other Embellithments agreeable to the quality of those Edifices: In performance of which, those Indian had great advantage, for their Country yielded much Gold, which they had digged for the fervice of their own King, and much more afterwards for the use of the Prince Huayna Capac, because they found that they very much gratified his humour by Prefents of that Metal; his affection and coverousness of which, transported him to such extremities of Oppression, as were never before practifed by Incan Kings, which was the cause of the ruine of their Empire, and occasion of all that misery, which afterwards extinguithed this Royal Family, Huayna Capac leaving Quitu, proceeded to another Province called Quillacence, which fignifies a Note of Iron; because they boared the Bridge which passes bewhich rightless a from a factor of a piece of Gold or Silver, which reached to their Lips: the Inca found these to be a fordid, vile people, almost all naked, and full of Lice; they had no Religion amongst them; for they worshipped nothing, unless it were the Flesh of some Animal; of which they were so ravenous. that wherefoever they found any carrion, flesh of Horse or Mare, or any thing elfe corrupted and flinking, they would eat and devour it with the greatest bleasure and appetite in the World: So that it is very probable, that fuch a fort of Beafts as these, were easily subdued, and reduced to obedience.

From hence the Inca marched to another Nation called Pafeu, as vile and fordid as the former, differing onely from them in this, that they would by no means be perfuaded to eat Flesh, saying, That they were not Dogs. These being easily reduced to the obedience of the Inca, Instructors were appointed for them to teach them the manner of living after the rational manner, imposing on them the Tribute of Lice, that so they might keep themselves clean, and in health.

From Paltu they proceeded to another Province called Oravallu, the Inhabitants whereof were much more Political and Warlike than the others. These having made some little resistence against the Inca, did soon yield, finding that they were not able to defend themselves against that Potent Prince.

And having here made due provision to secure the Countrey, the Inca proceedded to another Province called Caranque, the people of which were most barbarous in their life and manners; they adored Tygers, and Lions, and great Serpents, offering the hearts and bloud of Men in their Sacrifices: Making War upon their Neighbours, onely for the fake of War and Enemies, that they might have fuch as they might kill and eat. At first they made great opposition against the Inca, but being repulsed, they soon discovered their errour, and in a few days furrendred at diffrection. Huanna Capac ordained and conflitted Ma-flers to teach and inftruct them in their Idolatrous Worship, and in the rules of a Moral life, forbidding them to acknowledge any other Idol but the Sun, or facrifice the bloud of Men, or eat humane fleth; which last was the most grievous of any to them, because they were of any thing the most ravenous of that. Thus far the Conquest of those Provinces extended on that side, which bordered on the Kingdom of Quitu.

CAAP. VIII.

Of the three Marriages of Huayna Capac; of the Death of his Father, and his Sayings.

* Upac Inca Yupangui defifting now wholly from Wars, attended to the Govern ment of his Empire, viliting divers parts of it at different times, to the great Joy and comfort of his Vaffals, who were transported with joy, as often as they faw the Inca in their Countries: It was he who effectually laboured about the Fortress of Cozco, his Father having onely begun, and laid the foundation of it; this Work was many years in building, on which twenty thousand Indians were al. ways employed, every Nation and Province taking its turn, with that rule and order, that nothing could be disposed in better and more exact method and distipline. Every two years the Incd visited his Kingdom of Chili, fending every year thither many fine Garments for cloathing of the Curacas, and their Kindred, with more common habit for the ordinary people. In exchange for which, the Cataquet fent much Gold, and plumes of Feathers, and other Commodities of the growth of their Country. And this continued untill the time that Don Diego de Alman invaded that Countrey.

The Prince Huayna Capac having conquered the Kingdom of Quitu, and the Provinces of Quillacenca, Pastu, Oravallu and Caranque, and given instructions for the orderly management of the affairs of those Countries, he returned to Cozo to render an account to his Father of all the Actions he had performed in his Service. being received by him with great triumph and joy for his happy return: And then he married a fecond time with his fecond Sifter, called Rava Occlo, because by his first Wife, and eldest Sister, called Pillen Huaco, he had no Children; ithe ing necessary that the Succession should be supplied by an Heir legitimate on the fide both of the Father and Mother. In like manner he married a third time lawfully, according to their Laws and Customs, with Mana Runtu, the Daughte of his Uncle Auqui Amaru Tupac Inca his Father's fecond Brother. Auqui is a tilk of diffinction, given always to the fecond Sons of the King, and in a courtefie to all those of the Royal Bloud, but not to others, of what quality soever. Amou is a Name given to the greatest Serpents of the Antis. The like Names of living Creatures, of Flowers or Herbs, or any thing supereminent, or excellent in its degree or quality, the Incus would take upon the melves, fignifying, that as those Creatures were famous in their Species, fo the Incas were in the generation of Mankind. The King Inca Tupac, with the confent and advice of his Council, or dered that those two Women, last married to Huayna Capac, should be esteemed and judged as lawfull Wives as the first, and not for Concubines, their Children being made capable to inherit, left a legitimate Heir should fail in the Succession On which confideration the Marriage with his Coulin Germain was efteemed lawfull, because she was the next of kin, Huaym Capac wanting a third Sister, with whom he might match. By his Sifter Rava Occlo, he had a Son firnamed Huapea Capac, a Huafear Inca; the fignification of which Name of Huafear, we will declare in its proper place, because his true and proper Name was Ini Curi Hualipa. Of his Coulin Germain, who was his third Wife, he had Manco Inca, who succeeded him in his Kingdom, that is, in Name onely, for the Inheritance was then in reality fallen into the hands of Strangers, as we shall see in its due place.

Some years of peace and tranquillity being paffed, during the Reign of Tupac Tupanqui, he began at length to feel himfelf crazy, and declining towards his end; wherefore he affembled the Prince Huayna Capac, and all his other Sons and Daughters together, to the number of two hundred, and more: To whom after the cu-ftome of former Kings, and by way of his last Will and Testament, he recommended the practice of Peace and Justice for the good and benefit of their Subjects, which would reader them Ulustrious, and make them to appear true Children of the Sun. In particular and especial manner he encharged to his Eldest Son the care of conquering the Barbarous Nations, with intent that he might reform their manners, and reduce them to the true Religion of the Sun, and teach them to live in Societies, and with Political Government, and that in all things he should innitate the examples of his Ancestors. Lastly, he encharged him to revenue that perfidious treachery, of which the people of Puerto Viejo, and the parts adiacent. and especially those of Humacavilleas had been guilty in killing those Captains and instructors, which at their request he had fent amongst them, lest the impunity and remifness in punishment of that ingratitude should be of ill example to other Subjects; and that after having chaftifed this offence, he should endeavour to reform their bestial way of living, by teaching them to Manure and Sow their Fields, and cover their Bodies. And farther, he encharged them to live in love and amity together, for that he was going to rest, and repose himself with his Father the Sun. Thus the Great Inca Tupac Tupanqui died, leaving to his Subjects a perpetual memory of his Piety, Clemency, and many other benefits beftowed on his Empire. In confideration of which, his people, befides his Titles and Appellations of Honour, common to other Kings, gave him the supereminent denomination of Tupac Taya, which fignifies the glorious and resplendent Father. Befides the Prince, who was his Son and Heir, he left five Sons, which he had by his Silter Mama Occlo; his fecond Son was called Angni Amaru Tupac Inca, after the name of his Father; the third was Quekuar Tupac, the fourth Hualpa Tupac Inca Tupanqui, which was *my Great-Grandfather by the Mothers fide; the fifth was * The Autority of the Mothers fide; the fide was * The Autority of the Mothers fide; the fide was * The Autority of the Mothers fide * The Mothers fid Titu Inca Rimachi; and the fixth was Augui Mayta. His Body was afterwards fo thour. well embalmed, that when I faw it in the year 1559, it feemed to be alive.

Blas Valera speaking of this Inca, hath these words, which I have translated out of Latin. Topac Tupanqui delivered this Philosophical discourse by way of Argument. "Many say that the Sun lives, and that he is the Maker of all things; now it is necessary, that the thing which is the cause of the Being of another. should be affistent and operate in the production thereof; now we know that many things receive their Beings, during the absence of the Sun, and therefore he is not the Maker of all things: And that the Sun bath not life, is evident, for that it always moves in its circle, and yet is never weary; for if it had life, it would require reft, as we do; and were it free, it would vifit other parts of the Heavens, unto which it never inclines out of its own sphere; but as a thing obliged to a particular flation, moves always in the fame circle, and is like an Arrow which is directed by the hand of the Archer. He faid also, that this Inca did often repeat that Saying of Inca Roca, the fixth King, as a politick and wife fentence; which was this: That it was not fit that Sciences, which be-" long to Noble persons, should be communicated to the common and vulgar people, left they grow proud, and contemn the wifedom of those to whom the charge of Government is committed; it is sufficient for them to learn the trade of their Fathers, and follow their profession, not aspiring to those improvements " of mind, which appertain onely to Princes and Rulers of the people. He had this other Saying likewife, That Covetouiness and Ambition render a Man uncapable to govern himself, or others; for Covetouiness diverts the mind of a Man from its true object, that is, from the common welfare, to his own private interest; and Ambition corrupts the understanding, making it uncapable of other counsels, than such as tend to its own exaltation and glory. Thus far are the Words of Blus Falera concerning the fententious Sayings of Tupac Inca Yuрапдні.

And fince we now approach near the time in which the Spaniards obtained this Empire; it will be convenient to declare in the following Chapter, what Provifions were then found in those Countries for the sustenance of humane life. And then next in the life of Huayna Capac, we shall shew what things were wanting, and supplied by the Spaniards, that so one thing may not be consounded with ano-

CHAP. IX.

Of Mayz, Rice, and other Seeds.

THE Fruits of Peru, by which the Indians were sustained before the coming in of the Spaniards, were of divers forts, some being produced above, and others under ground. Of the Fruits which grow above ground, the chief and principal is that Grane which the people of Mexico and Barloventa call Mayz, and those of Peru, Cara, being the onely Bread they use: And this is of two sorts, one is hard, which they call Murnehu; and the other tender and fine, called Ca. water: the hard Mayz is that which they have brought to show in Spain, but not the fine and tender sort. Some parts produce much finer, and tenderer than others, particularly the Countrey of Rucana. At their folemn Sacrifices, as we have faid, they used Bread made of Mayz, which they called Cancu; and at other times, on occasion of a Feast or treatment which they gave, they made that for of Bread which was called Huminta; the which forts of Bread had little diffe. rence in themselves, being onely distinguished by their use, some being made for Recrifice, and others for common fullenance: Their Corn was Ground by the Women on a broad Stone, on which they cast the Grift, and on the top thereof they laid another Stone in the sashion of a Half Moon, not round, but with a point of three fingers broad at each corner. At the corners of the Stone, made Half Moon wife, they laid their hands, rubbing and preffing it hard on the Mayz, until it was broken: This difficulty and troubing and prening it nard on the may, until it was broken: This difficulty and trouble they had in Grinding the Mayz, and all other Grane; for which reason they did not commonly eat Bread. They did never beat their Corn in Mortars, though they had learned the way of it; because it required more labour of the Armes, than the Grinding with a Scope they would be of which a board of the Armes, than the Grinding with a Stone, the weight of which made the work more easie: And then the good Honsewise having ground awhile, with one hand lifts up the upper Stone, and with the other fiveeps up the Corn, gathering it into the midft of the Quen, which for the likeness of it we may call a Falling-Mill, because of the stroke which for the fixeness of it we may can a running that which they gave on it with their hands. They made also a kind of a Hally-which they gave on it with their hands. Pudding, called  $\Delta p_i$ , which was a great Dish amongst them, and which they et with much delight; but this was esteemed high feeding, and not common a every meal. The Flour they divided from the Bran, in this manner, they laid all upon a clean cloth made of Cotton, and then spread it with their hands all over the Cotton-cloth; the finest part of the Flour would stick to the Cotton, but the more groß parts of the Bran would remain loofe from it, and so they easily took it up, and divided it with their hands; then they swept up the Flour which fluck to the cloth into the middle; and having taken that away, they brought more, untill they had cerned and fifted all their Grift; but they chiefly took this pains for the fake of the Spaniards, and not of the Indians, who were not focurious in their diet, but that the courfest fort of this Bran would go down with them; for the Bran of Mayz is not so harsh or choaky, as much to offend the palate. This was their manner of dividing the Bran from the Flour, for as yet the use of Sieves was not brought from Spain, by reason that their Bread was all made of this Mayz, and not of Wheat: All which I can restifie to have seen with my own eyes, having been nourished for nine or ten years with no other thread the spain been sometimes of the production. Bread than that of Cara, which is Mayz; the which is of three forts: Canen is for Sacrifice, Huminta for their Fealts, and great Entertainments; Tanta, with an afpiration on the top of the mouth, is common Bread. Cara, when it is parched, they call Cancha, which being pronounced with an N, Cancha fignifies a Street, or Neighbourhood. The boiled Cara, they called Mani (and the Spaniards Mote) which is boiled Mayz, having two Names for the fame thing.

Flow of Mayz: the Spanish Women made Biskers and Eritters, and other Dithes, both for healthfull, and people that were fick; for the Phylicians in that Countrey forbid Wheaten bread to all those that are fick, and prescribe them no other diet, than what is made of Mayz. Of this Flour, with water, they brew their Drink, which the Indians know how to make sower after a certain manner; that is becomes excellent Vinegar. Of the Canes before the Mayz is ripe, they make rate Honey; and after it is ripe, the Canes being dried, are good feeding for all Cattel. Some Indians, who love to be drunk, lay Cura steeping in the water, untill it be grown, and then they grind it, and boil it in the same water, and afterwards draw it off, and keep it untill it be stale: This is the strongest drink they have, and which presently makes them drunk, they call it Vinnapu, and in other Languages Sora. The Incas forbad it, because it was so violent and strong, though now, they say, it is come in use again amongst some toping fellows. All these uses, as we have said, they have of this Cara, besides many others in Medicines and Physick, and in Plasters, as we have mentioned in the other part.

The next fort of Grane, which is ripe in the Harvest of that Countrey, is that which they call Quinna, or small Rice, because in form and colour it much resembles it. This Plant in the stalk or blade, is very like our Spinage, the leaf being very tender, and much used by the Spaniards and Indians in all their boiled Disses, and is put into all their Broths and Potages. The Indians also in those Countries, which do not produce Mayz, make their Drinks of this Quinna, and the Indian Physicians make use of the Flour of it in all their Medicines for the fick. In the year-1590 they sent me some of the Seeds of this Quinna into Spain, which I sowed at divers times and seasons, but never came up. Besides this Grane, they have three or four forts in Pern of Vetches, the Kidney-beans, which they put into their boiled Meats, called Purnu: they are in Shells or Pods, like our Lupines in Spain, though bigger and whiter, called Tuvi: They have also a fort of these Beans which are not to be eaten, called Chin, of divers colours: they are used for Counters in play by Men in years, and Boys in their common sport; the variety of which, for brevity, we omit

CHAP. X.

Of Pulse and Roots which grow under ground.

There are many other things which are produced under ground, and yet are effected for excellent nourilly part in the barren Countries, which yield no esteemed for excellent nourishment in the barren Countries, which yield no plenty or quantities of Cara: The chief Dith of all is Papa, which being boiled, or baked, ferves them for Bread, and which they put into all their Difhes: To conferve it, they dry and wither it in the Sun, or Frost, and call it (as we have faid) Chanu: There is another fort which they call Oca, of a very pleasant tafte, it is long, and thick as a Man's middle finger; it is very fiveet, being eaten raw; they boil it with their Meat; and to keep it, they dry it in the Sun; and it is fo delicate, that without either Sugar or Honey it feems a Conferve, and then it is called Cavi. There is another fort like this in the shape, but not in the taste, being very bitter, and cannot be eaten unless it be boiled, and then they call it du-The Indians fay that it is an Enemy to procreation: but those who would not lofe their appetite to Courthip, holding in their hands a wand, or ftick, at the time they eat it, can (as they tay) find no hurt or prejudice by it. I have often heard them to talk and discourse to this purpose, and seen them practise it; but I believe it was rather by way of jeft, or merriment, than out of belief of this old Womans story.

Those Roots which the Spaniards call Patatas, and the Indians of Peru Abichu are of four or five feveral colours, some are red, others white, others yellow of thers brown, and are of different taftes, the worlt fort are of those which are brought into Spain. They have also a fort of Goards, called Roman Goards, and in Peru, Capallu, they grow like Melons; they eat them boiled, or baked, but never raw. The fort of Goards of which they make Bottels, or Veffels, for all man. ver raw. The fort of Goards of which they make bottens, or venies, for all manner of uses, are very good, and in great plenty, which they call Mai; but the Goards which are eatable, were not known untill the time of the Spaniards. There is another fort of Root which they dig out of the Earth, which the Indians call The chic, and the Spaniards Mani; all the Names which the Spaniards give to their Fuis and Pulse of Pern, are all taken from the Language used in the Island of Barlanna The Tuchic both in the kernel and tafte is very like Almonds: If it be eaten crude it offends the head; if baked or parched, it is pleafant and wholfome, and with Honey makes admirable Almond cake; they also press Oil out of it for diversition eases. Besides these, there is another fort of Root which grows under ground called by the Indians Chuchuchu, for which, as yet, the Spaniards have coined m proper Name, because they have no fort of that Fruit in the Islands of Bark vento, which are very hot Countries; but this grows in Collag, which is a cold Climate; being eaten raw, it is delicious to the palate, and a great strengthener of the fromach, the Roots of it are much longer, and deeper in the ground that the Anni-feeds: It casts no leaf above ground, but onely a green Fiber, which shews the place where the Chuchuchu is found; and when that greenness wither it is a fign that the Fruit is ripe; and the feafon to gather it: This Fruit, and the Ynchic, are esteemed delicacies, fit for the palate of the rich and curious, rather than for the diet of the common people, who make it their business to gather and present them to the Rich, and persons of Power and Quality.

CHAP. XI.

Of Fruits and Fruit-Trees of the largest sort.

There is another fort of Fruit, excellent and good, which the Spaniard having no name for, call it a Cucumber, because it is something like it in its shap, though not in the taste, nor yet in the quality of it, being of good digestion, and such as they prescribe to persons sick of Calentures, or high Fevers, and of another nature to the Cucumbers of Spain. What name the Indians give them, I must conserve that I have quite forgot; for which I blame my self, and cannot imaginete word they give it, unless it be Cacham; but I hope that the distance I am now from my own Countrey, and my long absence from thence will excuse my ignorance amongst my Countreymen, for whose sides I have undertaken this work, without other hopes or expectation of reward, than onely to please and serve them. These Cucumbers are of three several forts and sizes; the least, which are such are in the form of a Heart, and grow in little buthes, are the best. There is another fort of Fruit called Chiss, which was brought to Cozco in the year 1557. Its very delicious to the palate, and wholsome; it grows on branches which run almost level with the ground, it bears a kind of colour, or grane, like the Arbuten, and is of the same bigness, onely it is not round, but rather long, in fathion of a Heart.

There are many other forts of Fruits, which grow on high Trees, fome of which are produced in hot Countries, fuch as are on the Sea-coaft, about the 40-tis, others in more temperate Climates, fuch as are the warm Vallies of Parts but because these Fruits are common in many places, it will not be necessary suparticularize the several forts of them, but onely to report in what manner these particularity in the several forts of them, but onely to report in what manner these particularities.

Book VIII. Royal Commentaries.

And first as to that Fruit which the Spaniards call Guayavas, and the Indians Stanins; we say, that they are of a round fashion like the common Apple, and with a skin or paring like them: In the meat, or pulp of it, are many little round seeds, less than Grape-stones; some of which are yellow without, and red within, and are of two kinds; some are so sower, that they cannot be eaten, others are sweet, and very pleasant to the palate; some are green without, and white within, and are much better than the red; though in some Countries on the Sea-coast they esteem the red much better than the white. The Spaniards make a Conserve of them, as also of other Fruits, which hath been practised since my departure out of Pens. At Seville I saw some Fruit of the Savintu, which a Passenger, a friend of mine, brought from Nombre de Dios; and because it was a Fruit of my own Countrey, he invited me to the eating of it.

Another Fruit the Indians call Pacay, and the Spaniards Gnavas, which grow in green Pods, of about a quarter of a Yard long, and two fingers broad; within the pod, or shell, there is a kind of hairy substance, like cotton; and so much resembles it, that some New-comers out of Spain have quarrelled with the Indians for giving them Cotton to eat; but when they tasted them, they found them sweet and pleasant; being dried in the Sun, they will keep a long time: within the Pod they have a black Seed, like small Beans, but those are not to be

The Fruit which the Spaniards call Pears, because they resemble them in the greenness of their colour and shape, the Indians call Palta, because they first grew in a Province of that name. They are two or three times bigger than the largest size of Pears in Spain; they have a fine skin, or rine, which covers them, under which is the pulp, or meat, of about a singer thick, within which there is a shell, or stone; they are of the same form as the common Pears with us; there hath been no experiment, whether they be Medicinal, or not; onely its certain, they are pleasant to the taste, and wholsome for the sick; and being eaten with Sugar, they are a rare consect.

They have also another fort of wild Fruit, which the Indians call Rucma, and the Spaniards Lucma; it is in no manner pleasant to the taste, though it be rather sweet, than sharp or bitter; howsoever, it is a gross kind of feeding, the Fruit being about the bigness of a common Orange; in the meat of it, it contains a kernel or seed of a Chestnut-colour, which is so bitter, that it cannot be eaten. Moreover the Indians had a fort of Plums which they called Using, which are red, and sweet; and being eaten, they turn the Urine into a colour like bloud.

CHAP. XII.

Of the Tree Mulli, and of their Red Pepper.

Mongst the other Fruits of this Countrey, we may reckon that which is not A Mongit the other Fruits of this Country, we may be the wind in spin duced by the Mulli Tree; it grows of it felf wild in the Fields; it beat its Fruit within long and flender bunches, with Seeds as finall as Coriander, the leaf is finall, and always green: the Seeds being taken in their due feafon, at fweet, and well tasted at the top, but within are very bitter. Of these Seeds the make a fort of liquour, which preffing gently in their hands in warm water, the fiqueeze out the fiveet julce, which is at the top of the Seed; but are carefulling to prefs it over hard, left they should come to the bitterness of the Seed, and so follows. the brewing. This water being strained, and kept three or four days, untill it has done working, is very wholfome and pleafant Beverage: it is very diuretick and cleanling of the Kidnies and Reins; and being mixed with the drink which is made of Mayz, is much stronger, and more pleasant. The same water being to led up, grows thick, and becomes fiveet like Honey; and the fame water below fer in the Sun, with a certain Ingredient which they put into it, turns to very hip and ftrong Vinegar. The milky juice and rafine which sweats from this Mila Tree, as we have said in another place, is an excellent Balsam for green Wounds. The leaves of it being boiled in water, is a rare Elixivium, and wholfome to hate the body and legs in, for it fcours off the fcurf, and cures old boils and wounds: and little flicks being cut from the tender bows, are excellent Dentifrices for the Teeth. I have known the Valley of Cozco, in my time, over-firead with innume rable Trees of this fort, which were very beneficial, and of great use; and ina few years afterwards they were all cut down, and destroyed: the reason was, because they felled them to make Charcole; for though there was great trouble to kindle them, yet being once lighted, they keep their fire, untill they are out buint out.

Amongst these Fruits, the chief and principal of them all, because it agrees belt with the palate of the Indians, and which they put into all their Diffies and Saucs, whether boiled or roafted, is that which they call Ochn, and we Red Pepper; and the Spiniards Axi, which is the Language of Barlovento, though in Spain they give it the name of Pimiento. The people of my Countrey are fo fond of the Ochn, that they can eat nothing, though but crude Herbs without it; being efteemed for ich and high in the tafte, that they prohibit the use of it, at their times of Fastings and Mortification, as we have formerly mentioned. This Red Pepper is of three or four feveral forts; the most common is thick and long, without any point, called Rocot Ochu, to distinguish it from others; they eat it in its season, when it is green, and before it hath taken its perfect colour: There are other forts which are yellowith, and murry colour, though in Spain there is none but the red. There are other forts of this Pepper, flender and long, as the middle finger, which beig of the beft kind, is used in the Families of the Incas. Another fort is finall and round, about the bigness of a Cherry, the stalk not unlike it, called Chinchi Uchn, but is hotter than any of the others; and being rare, and in no great quantity, is more efteemed; and all these forts of Red Pepper have this quality, that all venemous Infects fly from them, being a great enemy to them. I have heard a Spaniard lay, that came from Mexico, that it is excellent good for the Eyes; and for that reason they always eat two Cods of this Pepper after Meals; generally all the Spaniards, that come from the Indies, make it their common Sauce in all their Diffies, and which favours better with them than all the Spices which come from the East-

CHAP. XIII.

Of the Tree Magucy, and the Virtues of it.

Mongst the Fruits of this Countrey, we may account that which the Spani-And call Maguey, and the Indians Chuchau, which ferves for many uses to them, as we have elsewhere mentioned. Blas Valera reckons up many Virtues of this Chuchau, on which we shall touch in brief. "He says, that it is not pleasant to fight, the Timber being of a pale-coloured Wood, with a bark upon it a that they are commonly about twenty foot long, and not bigger in compass than "a Mm's arme or leg; the Pith within is light and spungy, and such as Painters and Carvers use in their Sculptures. The leaves are thick, and half a Yard along, and grow all towards the bottom of the Tree, like Garden-Carducy: and for that reason the Spaniards give it the name of Cardamum, and may properly be so called, because it bears prickles on its leaf; the juice of them is very bitter, and serves to take spots out of Cloaths, it cures Cancers, assume and cools Inflammations, and cleanses soars of all Worms. The same sap, or " juice, being boiled with the Roots of that Tree in Rain-water, takes away all " weariness from them, who wash themselves with it, and is a most Medicinal " and wholtome Bath. Of these leaves, when they are taken in their season. " and dried at the foot of the Tree, they make Cords as strong as those made with Hemp; hereof likewise they make Soals for their Shoes, Ropes, Halters " and Head-stalls for their Horses, and other forts of strong Work: Those that " they cut, before they expose them to be dried in the Sun, they moisten and " fleep them first in water, that so the viscous humour, which makes them brittle, "may be walhed away. From this leaf also they spin a finer fort of thread than the former, with which they make the Binders for their Heads, which ferves them for Linen, where they have neither Wool nor Cotton, and fomething resembles the course cloth which is brought out of Flunders: And from this they spin likewise a finer thread than all this, wherewith they make their Nets to take finall Birds; for these being laid in certain open places between two Hills, and fastned to Trees on both fides, they drive and frighten the Birds into the Nets; which being dyed green, are not eafily differned by them. These Nets are made very long, of six, eight, twelve, fifteen and twenty Yards long. The leaves of this Magney Tree are hollow, and capable to receive great quantities of Rain-water, which is wholfome for divers dif-"eales. The Indians fave it, and brewing it with Mayz, or Quinna, or with the Seed of the Mulli Tree make a very strong liquour; likewise they make "both Vinegar and Honey of it. The leaves of the Chuchan they grind, and " make little cakes of Soap of it, with which the Indian Women washing their "heads when they ach, it takes away all their pain; it cleanses Spots and Free-"kles from the skin; it makes the Hair to grow, and Dyes them very black. Thus far are the Words of Blus Valera, onely I have added fomething of the largeness of their Nets which he had omitted. Now we shall tell you fomething more of the Virtue of this Maguey, how it makes the Hair grow, and turns it black, being done in an unufual and strange manner.

The Indian Women of Peru do all wear long and deshevelled Hair; which when it is very much and thick, they tye it up in breads about the thickness of a Man's thumb; onely the Colust living in a cold Countrey, cover their heads. The Indian Women do naturally love long and black Hair, which they wear without any covering or dress; and when they would dye it of Chesnut-colour, or when it tangles, or falls, in combing, they boil it in a Pan of water with certain Herbs; one of which fort of Herbs, as Blas Valera saith, was Chuchar, and I think it was so, to my best remembrance; for when I was a Boy, I often saw them use it, though I did not much observe or enquire concerning it. What I remember is, that I saw the Women put their Hair into a Pan of hot water, which boiled with fire under it; they nied a kind of a Screen for their Necks to defend them from the fire; taking care that neither the water thould (cald, nor the fire burn their heads; and those Hairs which could not be put into the Pan of boiling water, they dipped after with the water which had by infusion received virtue, and a deep tineture from the Herbs. In this tormenting posture of holding their heads back, that their Hair might sink in the water, they would continue sometimes for the space of two hours, though I cannot precisely say the time, because that being a Boy then (as I said) I was not so curious as to observe the strict minutes; how. soever, I cannot but wonder at the pains they did take, and the torments they suffained for a non-sensical piece of folly: But then again methinks I could excuse them, when I consider the pains which the Spanish Ladies undergo, and the sime they spend in trimming and curling up their Hair; for they smoak it with Suphur, and wet it with Agaa sortis to make it shine, and then they spread it in the hot Sun, of the Dog-days, making other kinds of Elixiviums to wash it in, which are of such a nature as I know not, which is most permicious to the health either of that which the Indian Women use, or that which is so common with the Ladies in Spain. The Indian Women have also other Waters in which they base and dye their Hair, whereby they become blacker, and with a more shining laster than the Feathers of Ravens, that after moulting are new grown. This and much more can Women contrive and endure, that they may seem beautiful!

CHAP. XIV.

Of the Platane, the Pine-Apple, and other Fruits.

PUT to return again to our discourse about those Fruits which are produced in the Amis of Prom, which are the most hot and most parts of all those Provinces, we shall onely touch upon those which are the most remarkable, and in the first place speak of that Tree and Fruit which the Spaniards called the Planias, which in its height and leaf resembles much the Palm, being very broad and green. These Trees grow wild, and of themselves, and thrive best in a most, rainy Climate, such as the Amis; the bows of which are so large, that Acosta said, that on one branch onely there are those who have counted 300 Platane-Nus; they grow in a shell, which hath neither rine nor bark over it, but something like a husk, that is easily pilled off; it is of about a quarter of a Yard long, and about three singers in thickness.

Blue Valore, allo writing of this Tree, faith, That when the bunches of their Truit come to full growth, that they then cut them off, left the weight of them thould tear them off from the body or trunk; which being of a foft, fpungy kind of fubflance, is neither fit for timber nor fire. These bunches of Fruit they lay in Jars to ripen, strowing them over with a certain Herb, which serves to halten and force them to grow ripe and mellow: the Meat of them is tender, sweet and pleasant; and being laid in the Sun, are like a conserve, or consect: they boil them in their Broth, and serve them for Sauce in their roasted or boiled Meass and in every way they are good, having a sweetness like Honey, or Sugar, and make several Conserves of them: The bunches which hang long upon the Trees are most delicious and delightfull: the Trees are about two Yards high, some more, and some less. There is another fort of Platans which are less, which they call Dominicos, to distinguish them from others; because the shell, when it is young and tender, is white; and when the Fruit is ripe, and in its season, it is white with black spots; but this fort is not half so big as the other, but yet is much better, and therefore is not so common, nor in that plenty, as the other is.

They have another fort of Fruit which the Spaniards call Jinna, because of the likeness it hath with the Pine-nuts in Spain; but these resemble one the other in hape and form onely, being in the substance of a different nature; for these to dian Nuts being opened with a Knife, yield a white and a most pleasant Kernel to the taft, having a little kind of an acidity with it, which is very favoury, and are as big again as the Pine-nuts are in Spain. Likewise in the Anis they have a fort of Fruit which the Spaniards call Manjar blunco, (which is a meat made of the Breatts of Capons beaten up with Rose water and Sugar) and they give it this Name: because that when it is divided in the middle it looks like two foomfulls of this Manjar blanco, or white Meat; within are certain finall black Stones, which are not to be eaten. This Fruit is about the bigness of a small Mellon, the Rine of it is as thick and hard as a dried Goard; within it is contained a most excellent inicy pulp, extremely delicious and pleafant to the taft, having a gratefull sharpness with it. There are many other forts of Iruits in the Antis, which grow wild, and of themselves, such as the Spaniards call Almonds, being Nuts which relemble them in their form and likenels, but are of a different nature and tall: for the Spaniards who came first into Pern, seeing and observing the fruits of that Countrey, and wanting names to give them, called them by fuch names as were given to those Fruits, which most resembled them in Spain; and so they gave the name of Almonds to these Nuts, because they were something like them. And now leaving these Fruits and seeds of no great importance, which are produced in the Antis, let us discourse of those which are of most esteem in other parts.

CHAP. XV.

Of the pretious Leaf called Cuca, and of Tobacco.

B UT above all we must not omit to discourse at large of the Herb which the Indians call Cuca, and the Spaniards Coca, being that which is and hath been a considerable part of the Riches of Perse, and such as hath yielded great benefit to the Merchants. And indeed the Indians did jurly esteem it for the rare Virtues and Qualities of it, which the Spaniards have not onely approved, but have also discovered several other specifick and medicinal Qualities belonging to it. Blue Valera, who was a very curious Person, and one who had resided many Years in Perse, and came from thence thirty years after my departure, hath wrote very largely of the many Virtues of this Herb, and such as he hath sound out by his own experience. His Words are these: "The Cuca is a small tender Tree, or Bind, about the height and bigness of a Vine; it produces not many Branches, but is full of delicate Leaves, of about the breadth and length of a Man's Thumb, it is of an excellent sinell, and very fragrant; the Spaniards and Indians do both give them the name of Cuca; the which is so much esteemed by the Indians, that they prefer it before Gold, or Silver, or pretious Stones. They plant and manure them with great art and diligence, and gather them with great care, pulling them leaf by leaf, and then lay them to dry in the Sun, and so the Indians eat them dry.

"The virtue and benefit of this Cuca is plainly observable in labouring Men,

"The virtue and benefit of this Cuca is plainly observable in labouring Men, who having caten it are much refreshed, and often labour a whole day in the "ftrength of it, without other nourithment. The Cuca moreover preserves the Body from many infirmities; and our Physicians make use of it, being dried and beaten to powder, to ease and assuage the Instanumation, or swelling of any "Wound; it is good to strengthen bones which have been broken, and expell colds from the Body, and to prevent them; it is good also to cleanse great "Wounds of Worms, and heal them; nor is the Virtue of it less being taken inwardly, than it is by outward applications. Besides all which Virtues it yields "a great."

" a great benefit to the Bishop and Canons, and other Dependents on the Ca thedral Church of Cozco, the Tithes of the Leaves of Cuca being their greatest Revenue; it is also a great Commodity amongst the Merchants; norwish flanding all which good Qualities of the Cuca, there are many, who being in norant of its Virtues have wrote against it; for no other reason, than because the Gentiles in ancient times did by their Diviners and Wizards offer this Cure to their Gods in Sacrifice; and therefore having been abused to Idolatry, they conclude that it ought for ever to be effeemed abominable and prophane. This Argument might be available, if it had been the cultome to offer this Heb onely to the Devil, but in regard that both ancient and modern Idolaters have oney to the Devi, but in regard that both ancient and indicent adolaters have made their Corn, and Fruits, and whatfoever grows above or beneath the earth, their Drinks and Water, their Wool and Clothing, their Plocks and Herd, and all things elfe, the matter and subject of their Sacrifices; we may argue from the fame foundation, that all those things are defiled and rendred as abominable "and unclean as the Gueas but to the clean all things being clean, let us read them to abhor and forfake their fuperstitious and idolatrous Worships, and let " us, using our Christian Liberty, receive those Blessings with moderation and thanksgiving. Thus far are the Words of Blus Valera. To which we shall add thus much farther, that this little Tree is about the height of a Man, in the planting of which they cast the feed in its green shell, and when it grows up. they then hoa and open the Earth for it, as they doe for Vines, supporting the tender twigs with stakes; and in planting they take great care that the tender toos be laid streight in the Earth, for with the least doubling they dry and within. they take likewife the leaf of every forig by it felf, and holding it between their fingers, they cut it with great care till they come to the Bud, but do not touch, for then the whole branch will wither; both the outfide and infide of this Leafin the greenness and shape of it, is like the Arbuteus, onely the Leaves are so thin that three or four of them being doubled, are not fo thick as that of the Arbuteus. I am pleased to find any fort of Fruits here in Spain, to which I may compare them; though the difference between them is fo great, that they may eafily be diftinguished one from the other. When they gather the Leaves they dry them in the Sun; but care is to be taken that they be not over-dried, for them they lofe much of their Virtue, and being very thin, foon turn into powder; nor will they bear much moifture; for they foon grow mufty and rotten; but they lay them up in Başkets of flit Caues, of which many fine ones are made in the Antis. With the Leaves of those big Canes, which are about the third of a yard broad, and about half a yard long, they cover the top of the Baskets, to keep moifture from the Leaves, which is very prejudicial to them; and to confeder the great pains and care which is taken to nourish this Cuea, and the provisions of all things which are made for it, we ought rather to render thanks to God for his abundant bleffings in the variety of his Creatures, than to believe or conclude that what we write is fabulous or incredible; if these fruits were to be planted or not rithed in other Countries, the charge and labour of them would be more than the

This Herb is gathered every four months, that is three times a year, and in the manuring of it care is taken to weed it often; for the Countrey being hot and moift, the Weeds grow apace, and the Herb fometimes increases so fast, that the feason for gathering of it advances fifteen days; so that sometimes they have sow Harvests for it in a year; the which a certain covetous Tithe-gatherer observing in my time, farmed the Tithes of all the principal and rich Inheritances and Possessions about Cozco, and taking care to keep them clear and clean from Weeds, he so improved his Revenue, that the year following the Farmer of the Tithes made two thirds more than what had been made in the preceding years; which caused a Law Suit between the Farmer and the Proprietor, but what the Issue was ofit, I, that was then but a Boy, did not much remark.

Amongst many other Virtues of this Cuca, they say it corroborates the Gums, and fortifies the Teeth, and that it gives strength and vigour to any person that labours and toils, onely by carrying it in his mouth. I remember a Story which I heard in my own Countrey. That a certain Gentleman both by Bloud and Verue, called Rodrigo Panoia, journying once from Corco to Rimac, met with a poor spaniard (for there are some poor there as well as here) travelling on foot, carrying a little Girl of about two years of age in his Armes; and being an acquaintance of this Pantoja, he asked him how he came to give himself the trouble of carrying that burthen; to which the person that was on foot replied, that he was poor, and had not money to hire an Indian to carry it: In this discourse with him Panion observed that his mouth was full of the Cuca; and it being at that time that the Supplied that the first shorted all things which the Indians did eat or drink, because they had been abused to Idolatry, and particularly they hated the Cuca, as a base and stinkning Weed, which gave cause to Pantoja to sak him farther, why he, being a Spa-niard, did use those things which the Spaniards hated; for his necessities could never be so great as to compell him to Meats or Customs unlawfull. To which the Souldier replied, that though he abhorred it as much as the Spaniards, yet necessity forced him to imitate the Indians therein; for that without it he could never be able to travell and carry his Burthen, for that holding it in his mouth, he found such resieshment and strength, that he was able to carry his Load, and perform his Journey with chearfulness. Pantoja wondring at this Report, related it to many others, who afterwards making the fame experiment thereof, found that the Indians made use of it rather for their refreshment and necessity, than for any pleafire in the tafte, which in it telf is not very pleafant or agreeable. Hereafter we shall discourse in what manner they carry it to Potos, and how they trade and make Merchandise of it.

As to that Plant which the Spaniards call Tobacco, and the Indians Sayri, we have already discoursed in an other place. Dr. Monardes writes many wonderfull things of it. As to Sarfa Pavilla, we need not speak much, since the Virtues and excellent Operations of it are already known both in the new and the old World, especially in the cure of the Venereal Difease, and other acute Diftempers: There are many other Herbs in Peru of those medicinal Qualities, that as Blus Valera faith, if they were well known, and fearched into by some experienced Botanist, there would be no need of bringing any Herbs or Drugs thither from other parts of the World. But our Spanish Physicians do so little addict themselves to the knowledge of Herbs growing in those Countries; that even the Virtues of those formerly known by the Indians are forgotten; which are so many, that the study of them is difficult and abstruce: the Indians know not their Virtues and Qualities, but distinguish them onely by bitter and fiveet; fometimes eating them raw, as we do Lettrice and Radishes, and fometimes they make pottage of them, and flew them with other things; and which the poorer fort make the best part of their Diet, having no flore or abundance of Fifth, or Flesh, to make their Food. The bitter Herbs, such as are the Leaves which they gather from the Bushes, called Sunchy, and the like, they boil in two or three feveral Waters, and afterwards dry them in the Sun, and keep them for the Winter provisions; for which also they gather all the little Snags and Cockles they can find on the Banks of Rivers, or on the Sea-Coaft.

CHAP. XVI.

Of their tame Cattel, and of the great Caravans, or Droves of them.

THE tame Cattel which God hath given to the Indians of Peru, are of run forts. which, as Blas Valera faith, are of a Disposition as gentle and ease as the Indians are themselves; being so tame, especially those which serve to carry their burthens, that a Child may be able to govern them. These are of two forts, some of a bigger kind, and some of a less; in general the Indians give them the name of Llama, and the Shepherd or Pastor of them, Llama Michee. Indians. flinguishing them one from the other, they call the greater Huanacullama, because it hath a likeness with that brave and fierce Creature, which is called Hanney being of the same shape with it, but different onely in the colour; the same He anacu varies as much in its colours as the Horses do in Spain, but the wild is of a dark Chefnut colour onely. This Creature is about the fize or bigness of the Hart or Stag in Spain, but resembles a Camel most of any other, the bunch upon the back onely excepted, but in proportion is but one third of its bigness; is Neck is long and finooth, the Skin of which being flead, the Indians used to make it gentle and supple, and being dressed after their fashion, served for soak to their Shoes; but because they had not attained to the Skill of Tanning of Leather. they always took off their Shoes when they were to pass wet, or Waters, because the moitture spoiled them, and made them like a Gut, or Tripe. The Spoiled made Reigns of them for their Horses, after the Fashion of those which come from Barbary, as also Girts and Cruppers for their Saddles. This fort of Cattelis ulefull both to the Indians and Spaniards, for carrying their Merchandise from and to what place they please; but commonly they chose such ways where the Comtrey is plain and even, as is between Cozco and Potocchi, being about two hundred Leagues; and likewise from many other parts they go and come to and from those Mines, carrying Provisions, Commodities of the Indians, Merchandizes from Spain, such as Wine, Oil, Conserves, and all other things which are consumed in that Countrey, and especially that Herb which is called Cuca. I remember that in my time they had Droves of that Cattel which carried burthens, formetimes fix a eight hundred, or a thousand in a Caravan; and that a drove of five hundred we esteemed as nothing. The burthen which one of these Beasts will carry is about three or four Aroves, (an Arove in Spain is about twenty five pounds weight) and will travel about three Leagues a day, which is about nine Miles. They are not to be driven beyond their usual pace, for if they are, they will tire, and lie down, and then all that can be done to them, cannot raise them, though they ease them of their Burthen, and take off their Saddles; for when they come to raife them up, they presently eject all they have in their Maw, or Stomach, into the Mouths, whence they cast it, if possible, into the Faces of those who disturb them; which feems to be the onely Revenge and instrument they are able to exercise, having no Horns like the Stag or Hart. Howsoever the Spaniards call them Mutton, or Sheep, though the difference between these and those be as much as we have before mentioned. And that these Creatures, nor any of them, may tire, and hinder the Travels of the whole Caravan, or Drove, they have always forty or fifty of them, which go loofe, and free of burthen in their company, and fo foon as they observe that one begins to tire, they presently each im of his Burthen, and lay it upon another, for if he once lies down, there is no temedy, though you kill him, to raife him again. The Flesh of this fort of Cattel is the best, and most savoury of any in the World, being both tender and who fome. The Physicians prescribe the Flesh of the young ones of four or five months old to their Patients, and prefer it far before Hens or Chickens.

which cause they solemnize a Festival to him every year. Though this fort of Cattel be great and large, (as we have faid) and the Journies long which they travell, yet they put their Masters to no charge, either in their Meat, or Shoeing, or Stable, nor in their Pack-faddles, or Girts, or Cruppers, or Stays, or other Utenfils which our Carriers use; for when they come to the end of their days journey, they onely throw off their burthen, and fend them to feed on the Grass which the Land affords, being at no charge, either of Straw or Corn, though they would gladly eat Corn, if their Mafters would be fo kind as to beltow it upon them. Then as to their floeing there is no need of it, for be-fides that they are cloven footed, they have a kind of a callous, or fpungy matter on their Feet, without a Hoof. Then for their Pack-faddles they have no need of them, because they have so much wood on their Backs as serves in the place of a Saddle, and keeps the burthen fast and close, which the Masters of them take care to lade in fuch manner, as that it may lie even, and well poised, and not touch fo far as to gaul the Withers; nor have they need of a Surcingle which our Carriers use, for the Beast wearing no Pack-saddle, all Girts or Cords may rub off the Flesh; howsoever many of them travelling in a Drove were tied one to the other, having 20 or 25 beafts running loofe, so as to ease and change the Burthens of those which were tired. The Merchants in travelling carried their Tents with them, which they pitched in the Fields, wheresoever they found it convenient to lodge and repose; and there unloaded their Merchandize; so that they never entred into Villages or Towns, because too much time and labour would be loft to put their Cattel to Grass, and then to go and fetch them up. In their Journey

Iourney from Cozco to Potocchi in going and returning they are commonly from months, befides the time that they are detained at the place for trafficks and pade ing up their Merchandize. One of this fort of Sheep, which was of the best kind was worth in Cozco eighteen Ducats, and one of the more ordinary twelve or thirteen. The chief Merchandize brought from that City was Cuca, and Cuc ments for the Indians. All that I have before spoken I have seen and observed with my own Eyes, but how things have been ordered fince my departure, I know not. I have traded with many of them for this commodity, as the Merchants went and came, and I am affured that some of these Travellers have sold a Basker of this Cuea for above thirty Pieces of Eight, weighty Money. And notwithlanding the value of their Commodities, and that these Caravans, or Droves of Shen. returned with thirty, forty, fifty, and an hundred thousand Pieces of Eight, ye fuch was the fecurity of those Countries, and the little danger they had of Thiere or Robbers, that they lodged and flept in the open Fields, without other Guard or Defence than their own. The like fecurity and confidence did Men us in their dealings and Merchandize, as also in payment of their Rents, or Loans of Money, making no Conveyance, or Writing, or Obligation, belides their mess Word; which they kept and observed so punctually, that when a Spaniard had loft Money by Play, he would fay to the Winner, Tell fuch a one, that the Mount which he ows me he should pay to you, in satisfaction of what you won of me at Cards. The Words were esteemed as sufficient as a Bill of Exchange, for such was the Ingo. cence and the simplicity of those Countries, that no scruple was made in giving all belief and credence thereunto; and this was fo common, that whether the Pafon were a Merchant, or a Souldier, or a Lord of Indians, his Word would pak and he was credited in every thing that he uttered; and fuch was the fecurity of the ways, that it feemed the golden Age, wherein was no fraud nor violence amongst Mankind. And as I understand it continues still so in those Countries.

In times of Peace, when all Wars were ceased, many Nobles and Gentlemen having no employment, thought it no diminution to their Honour, rather than to remain idle, to travell frequently to Potocchi, and trade in Cuca, and other Indian Commodities, but then it was not effeemed honourable to fell or buy them by parcek but by the whole sale; nor yet to deal in Spanish Commodities, or to sell by the yard, or open a Shop. Howsoever many of them were pleased to travell with their Commodities, it not being esteemed ignoble for Men of Quality to be Mechants; but then they did not go according to the pace of their Droves, but often went out of the way, and divertised themselves with their Hawks, and Spanies, Greyhounds, and Guns, hunting as their Cattel travelled; and then at night when they came to the place of repose, they would entertain themselves with what they had killed, perhaps with a dozen of Partridges, with a Huanacu, or Vicum, or some other fort of Venison, for the Countrey being wide and large, was full of all forts of Game: And in this manner entertaining themselves in going and w ming, their Journies feemed rather defigned for Pleasure than for Merchandile; which was an employment fo far from diminishing the Honour of the Noble Souldiers, that it was an addition to their Fortune and Reputation. Joseph Acosta in his 4th Book speaks much in praise of this bigger fort of Cattel, and of the profit which they bring. But of the leffer fort, which is of the same species with these called Pacollama, there is not much to be faid; for they are not usefull for Buthens, or in that manner serviceable: howsoever their Flesh is almost as savoury and as good as that of the bigger fort; and their Wooll is excellently good and long, with which they make three forts of Stuffs for clothing, which the Indian die with fuch excellent colours, that they never fade: But the Indians make no use of the Milk either of the bigger or leffer fort of this Cattel for making Cheele, or eating it otherwise; the truth is, they yield little Milk, and no more than suffice for the nourishment of their Young. In my time they brought Cheeses from Majorca to Peru, which were greatly effected. Milk, and the Dug, and Sucking are all called by the fame Word Numa. The Indiant have no Dogs, but fuch is are Curs, and not of that difference of Races, and Kinds, as we have in Europe. The Indian Word for a Dog is Alco.

CHAP. XVII.

Of their wild Cattel, and Vermine.

Before the time that the Spaniards came into Peru, the Indians had no other diffiction or variety of tame Cattel, but onely of the Paco and Huanacu, as we have before specified. Of their wild Cattel they had much more variety, of which they made notwithstanding the same benefit, and use, as they did of the tame, according as we have specified, in the Chapter of their Huntings, which they performed at their certain seasons. One fort of this wild Cattel was tame; the Flesh of which was very excellent and savoury, though not so good as that of the tame; in short, they resemble each other very much, both in Colour, Wool, Shape, and every thing else. The Males of these Creatures always keep watch on high Hills, whilst the Females are feeding in the lower Pastures, which so soon as they espie people coming towards them, they presently make a bleating, (which resembles the neighing of a Horse) to give warning to them to shy and save themselves; and then the Males say untill their Females come up, which they put before them, and remain themselves in the rere. The Wool of this wild Huanacus is short and course; howsoever the Indians made use of it for their clothing; and in my time the Spaniards used to take them with their Grey-hounds.

The Vicuma, which is another fort of wild Cattel, refembles the Paco; and is a neat Creature, but very lean, and yields great abundance of fine Wool. Acofta writes of the many medicinal Virtues which belong to this Creature; and as heferibes the Beafts and Fowl of all the new World, fo in reading of his Writings we ought to diffinguish those of Peru from other parts. The Vicuma is long legged, and higher than the biggeft Goat; the colour of its Wool is of a light Chefnut, or as some call it, Lion-coloured; they are so nimble and swift, that no Grey-hound can take them, and therefore they kill them with Guns, or take them in toils, as they practised in the times of the Incas. They seed commonly in the highest parts of the mountains near the Snows; the Flesh may be eaten, though it be not so shown as the Incas.

They have Fallow Deer and Stags in Peru, though they are much less than those in Spain, the Indians call them Taruca; they were in such numbers, in the times of the Incas, that they were common and tame, and would come into the Villages; and from all these wild Beasts they now take out the Bezar-stone, though in my time it was a thing not imagined, or sought for. They have certain forts of wild or mountain Cats, which they call Ozcolio, being of two or three kinds.

Their Foxes are much less than those in Spain, which they call Atoc; they have

Their Foxes are much less than those in Spain, which they call Atoc; they have also other little Animals, lesser than our House-cats, which the Indians call Annas, and the Spaniard Zorrinas; if their Smell were sweet, as it is stinking, it would surpas the Musk or Amber; but as it is fetulent, it is the most offensive smell in the World, and the stink of it is so strong, that it may be sineli at the distance of a hundred paces, and though the Doors and Windows are shut, yet the sink is so subtrieved that it will find an entrance at the Crevices: It is well that these Creatures are not in great numbers, for if they were, they were able to poison and stench up a whole Countrey. They have both tame and wild Conies, different from each other, both in colour and taste; they call them Co; some tame Conies have been brought from Spain, though the Indians will give little for them; and yet because their Countries do not abound in Flesh, they esteem them for great Delicacies, and eat them with much delight. There is another fort of Coney which they have called Viexacha, it hath a long Tail like a Cat, and is bred in the Mountains where the Snows lie. In the Reign of the Ineas, and many years after, untill the times that I remember they made great use of the Skins of these Conies, fpinning and weaving the Wool into their fine Cloths, for variety of colours; the colour of which is a light grey, and is very gentle and foft in the touch, and so much esteemed amongst the Indians, that they used it onely in clothing for the Nobles.

CHAP. XVIII.

Of their Lions, Bears, Tigers, Apes and Monkies.

THE Lions in Peru are few in number, and neither fo large nor fierce as those in Africa, which they call Pama. They have also some Bears, but not me. ny, because that the Countrey of Peru is not proper for them, not being mountain nous to that degree, as is agreeable to Beafts of that fierce nature; and, as they faid the Incas commanded in their Huntings, that they should be killed, and no quarter given to Beafts of Prev and Slaughter: The Bear is called Veumari. There are no Tigers, but onely in craggy and horrid Mountains of the Anie, where also Sepents are produced of a prodigious bigness, being of about twenty five to thirty foot long, which they call Amaru, and in compass as big as a Man's Thigh, where also are great numbers of Snakes, or lesser Serpents, called Machachuar, and poifonous Servents, and many other venemous Infects; but Peru is free of these ve nemous Creatures. A certain Spaniard, with whom I was acquainted, killeda Lioness of a prodigious bigness within the Antia, on that fide which borders to ward Cozco; which having lodged her felf in a high Tree, he shot her down with four Artóws, and ripping her up, found her with young of two Whelps, which were the Cubs of a Tiger, well known by their Spots. What the Word is for Lion in the general Tongue of Peru, I have forgot; and yet I cannot much reproach my memory, but rather lay the fault on my own neglect, not having in the space of forty two years either spoken or read in that Language, which I think is a very good excuse to any who would blame me for this forgetfulness. I think the Tiger is called Viuruncu, though Acolta calls a Bear Ocoronicos, according to the corrupt manner of the Spanish pronunciation. There is another fort of animal in the Antis, very like a Cow, but without Horns, nor yet so big'; the Hide maker a most strong fort of Leather, and, as some say, resists a Sword better than Buff, or a Coat of Mail. They have wild Boars in shape like our tame Hogs, but there are not many of this kind on that side of the Duis, which borders upon Pars: And as to matters on the other remote parts of the Antis, it is not my delign or purpose to treat. Monkies and Apes there are many, both great and small, some of them with Tails, and others without them. Of the natures of them we might fay much, but because Acosta hath wrote thereof at large, we shall use his own Words, as he fets them down in the 39th Chapter of his 4th Book, being agree able to what both the Spaniards and Indians report, and of what I my felf have been an Eye-witness: His Words follow. "There are great numbers of Man, "which are a fort of Monkies, found in all the Mountains, as well those which are on the Main land, as in the Islands in Anis; they are of the same species with " the Baboons, but differ in the length of their Tails, and in their proportion and fizes come of them being three or four times bigger than others: Some of them are all black, others grey, and others footted. Their activity and motion is fuch, that they feem to have reason, and discourse, leaping from one Tree. to another, in imitation of Birds. In Capita, as I travelled from Nombre de Dia to Panama, I faw one of these Micos spring at one leap from a Tree to another "Tree, which grew on the other fide of a Stream, which to me feemed most strange and wonderfull. Their manner is to sit on their Tails at the end of a Bough, and thence to throw themselves to what place soever they pleases " and when the diffance is so far, that they are not able to reach it, they use this

" contrivance; many of them getting together, one hangs at the Tail of ano-"ther, making a kind of a long Chain, with which fetching a long Swing, the lowermost throws himself with the help of the others, to the bough they aim at, where hanging by his fore feet, firetches out his Tail to the next companion, and so one helps the other, untill all are come over. The tricks and mimical postures which they have, are matters of great divertisement, and the actions which they perform in obedience to their Commanders. feem effects of "humane Understanding, rather than of irrational Creatures. I saw one of these " Monkies at Cartagena, in the House of the Governour, of which they related fuch strange things as to me seemed almost incredible. They faid, that they fent him often to the Tavern for Wine, with Money in one hand, and a Bottel in the other; and that when he was come to the Tavern, he would not deliver his Money untill he had received his Wine; if the Boys met with him by the way, and made a houting, or noise after him, he would set down his Bottel, and throw Stones at them, and having cleared the way, he would take up his Bottel and haften home; and that though he loved Wine exceffively, yet he would not dare to touch it, unless his Master gave him licence. They fay also, that if he saw a Woman at any time fine, and well dressed, he would presently pull her by the Cloths, and ruffle them in a strange manner. Perhaps fomething may be reported of these Creatures more than I have seen: howfoever it is most certain that there is no Animal in the World so fagacious. and so delighted with humane Society as this fort and race of Monkies: and hecause the Reports concerning the understanding of these Creatures are so strange that the Inflances thereof feem incredible to me, and would perhaps appear fabulous to others, I shall therefore omit to mention them, and onely bless and admire the Authour of all Creatures, that amongst all his works made for the use and benefit of Mankind, he hath shaped and fashioned a Creature so ridiculous in its form and postures, as serves to move laughter, and yield matter of Recreation and Divertisement to Man, whom he hath made Lord of this Universe. Some have written that Solomon brought his Monkies from the West-Indies, but I am of another opinion, and believe that they were fetched from the Eastern Parts. Thus far are the Words of Acolta, to which may be farther added, that these Apes and Monkies carry their young ones at their backs, untill they are able to shift for themselves; the young ones taking hold with their fore-feet about their necks, and class their hind legs about their middle; all which, besides their tricks and inventions before recited, ferve to demonstrate their fagacious dexterity, and shifts like experienced Souldiers in time of necessity. And because the noise they make is a Language, by which one understands the other; (as for my part I believe that all Birds and Beafts do by their feveral voices understand the meaning of their own species) therefore the Indians say, that they can speak, and that they disguise their want of speech to the Spaniards, lest they should send them to work in the Mines, and dig for Gold and Silver, and that in initiation of the Indians they carry their young ones at their backs. And thus much shall suffice to have spoken of Apes and Monkies.

CHAP. XIX.

Of their Tame and Wild-fowl both of Water and Land,

THE Indians of Peru have no tame fowl, but onely a fort of Ducks. In called by the Spaniards, because they have some kind of likeness with those in by the opaniaras, because they have some kind of includes with those in Spain: they are of an ordinary fize, neither so big, nor so tall as a Goose, nor we so little as a Duck, but something between both; the Indians call them Name, deriving their Name from Name, which is to suck, because they draw in their meat as if they were sucking; besides which they have no tame fowl in all the Countrey. As to Birds of the Air, and Water-sowl belonging to the Sea, or Rivers, they are of fuch variety, as is not possible for us to declare one one part of them; but we shall mention some of them which are most common There are Eagles of all forts, great and fmall, though not fo large as they are in Spain: They have Hawks of divers kinds, some like those in Spain, and other not; the general word which the Indians have for them is Huaman; the leffer for of Hawks have been brought thence into Spain, and are much effeemed: Those which in my Countrey are called Neblies are mettled Hawks, and long winged with large talons, and are of a blackish colour. At Cozco, in the year 1557, a certain Gentleman of Sevil, who was a great Faulconer, used all his Art to tenth and train up some of this Countrey Hawks for his pastime; in which he so far proceeded, as to make them come to hand, and to the lure readily at a far distance but could never teach them to prey upon any game, fo that he gave over his hope of doing any good with those Hawks. There are other Fowls which we may reckon with those of prey, which are of a large fize, called Cuntur, and by the Spaniards corruptedly Condor. Many of these sowls having been killed by the Spaniards niards, had their proportion taken, and from one point of their Wing to the olm measured fifteen or fixteen Foot, which being reduced to Yards, makes five Yang and a third: Nature, to temper and allay their fierceness, denied them the takes which are given to the Eagle, having their feet tipped with claws like a Hay howfoever their beak is strong enough to tear off the Hide, and rip up the Bowels of an Oxe: Two of them will attempt a Cow or Bull, and devour him; and it hath often happened, that one of them alone hath affaulted Boys of ten or twelve years of Age, and eaten them: Their colour is black and white, like a Magye; it is well that they are but few in number; for if they were many, they would very much destroy the cattel: they have on the fore-part of their heads a comb, no pointed like that of a Cock, but rather even, in the form of a Razor; who they come to alight from the Air, they make fuch a humming noise with the fluttering of their Wings, as is enough to aftonish, or make a Man deaf.

Acofta treating in his fourth Book concerning the Birds of the New World, fpeaks there particularly of the Cuntur; to which I refer those who are desirous to reade and hear of strange and wonderfull things; he there hath these words:

The Fowls which they call Cuntur are of a vast bigness, and so strong, that they are able to prey upon Sheep and Calves, and do often devour them. Acoft treating also of the little Birds which are in Peru, which the Spaniards call Towinsia, and the Indians Quenti, which are of a golden azure colour, finer and brighter than that about the Neck of a Peacock: they feed like Bees, piercing with their long sharp bill into the Flowers, and suck from thence a sweetness, and Honey, with which they are nourished: they are so little, that Acosta spreads in this manner of them: "In Peru there is a fort of Birds so little called Tomineius, that when I have seen them upon the Wing, I have much doubted whether they were Bees, or Butterstyes. And now that we have given a report of two forts of Birds, so different in the extremes, there is no person will wonder at what we shall say of those which are of a moderate proportion. There is a fort of great.

Birds which are black, called by the Indians Fuguetu, and by the *Spaniards Gallins-*243, they are great devourers of Fleft, and fo ravenous, that if they find any carrion dead in the Fields, they gorge themselves with it to such a degree, that they are not able to fly; and when they find themselves in that condition pursued by Men, they run away on their legs, helping their flight with the fluttering of their Wings, vomiting up all their meat as they run; that it is pleasant to observe how they spue up their prey with the same eagerness as that with which they devoured it: Howsoever, if they are hardly pursued, they may be taken and killed; but Men forbear to destroy them, considering that they are not good for meat; and being a filly Bird, doth no hurt, but onely serves to devour carrion, and cleanse the streets and wave from filthings. **Acolla is of an opinion that it is a fort of Crow.

and ways from filthines. Acosta is of an opinion that it is a fort of Crow.

There is a fort of Sea-Birds which resemble these, such as the Spaniards call Aleatrates, (in English Sea-Mews) they are less than Bustards; they live upon Fish, and it is pleasant to see how they take them. At certain hours of the Morning or Evening, when the Fish usually play and rise upon the surface of the waters, which are the times also that these Birds are most hungry; they raise themselves high upon the Wing, from whence observing where the Fish move, they clap their Wings close, and fall with such a soop, like a Hawk, that they never mis of their prey; and sometimes dive with such a solity under water, following the shoals of Fish, that they attie again with their prey crossed in their beak; and then mounting in the Air, devour the Fish, and then try for others. It is very pleasant to see them stoop, and give blows upon the water, and dive into it, others to be at the same time in the Air, watching their opportunity; others having missed their stroke, or ise again: In short, to see at the same time 200 Hawks stooping, and mounting, like the Hammers of an Iron Mill. Besides these, there are slocks of Seabirds of a lesser fort; howsever, some are greater, and some are less; but in such sincedible numbers, that they will sometimes cover the Sea of Zur for two or three Leagues in length, and sly so close together, that for such a compass they even darken the Sky: And hereby we may admire the Providence of the Eternal Majesty, who hath created such a multitude of Creatures, and therewith a sufficient provision of Fish, wherewith to support and maintain them: And thus much for

ANow as to Water-fowl which belong to Rivers and Lakes in Porn, they are in great numbers; fuch as Herons, Wild-ducks, and Bran-geefe, and those which we call Shovelers; besides many others of a different kind, which we cannot exactly describe, by reason that we have not observed their variety with due attention: they have also Swans which live upon Fish, and are very white, without any mixture of black; they have long legs, very beautifull, and go always in couples, or pairs, but are in no great number.

Of Partridges, Doves, and other smaller Birds.

Here are two forts of Partridges in my Countrey; one is like our Henswhid lay Eggs, and these are found in the desarts, which the Indians call Puna. the other is leffer than our Partridge in Spain, but the flesh is excellent good, and more favoury than the greater kind; they are both of a greyish colour, their bill and feet being white; they name them Turn from the found of the call which they make; the leffer fort are of the fame colour with our Quails, onely that their beskin different; to most Birds the Indians give Names according to the inarticulate voice or noise they make, as we shall hereafter declare. I know not whether the Partridges of Spain have been transported to Pern, to make a breed of them in that part of the World: They have Wood-Pigeons, or Ring-Doves of the fame or lour and bigness as they are in Spain, they call them Urpi; House-Pigeons have been brought thither from Spain, which the Indians call Castilla Urvi: They have Turtles of the fame colour and bigness as those in Spain, if not something large, they call them Cocohnay, from the noise they make, which sounds something like it. They have another fort of Turtle about the bigness of a Thrush, or Lark and of the same colour, they breed under the Eves of a House, like our Sparrows, and fome of them in the Fields, but those are few. They have a fort of small Birds of a greyish colour, which the Spaniards for the likeness of their colour, call Spaniards rows, but are different in their note, for these sing sweetly, and chirp not like the ordinary Sparrow: the Indians call them Pariapichin; they breed in the Mulwalls of Houses, or in Walls covered with Bushes, and sometimes also in the Field. They have another fort of finall Bird, which we call a Nightingale, by reason of its reddish colour, but differs in its note as much as white and blad, having that unpleasant found, that the ancient Indians effected it as unlucky as the croaking of a Raven. They have another fort of small Birds of a blackish to lour, which the Spaniards call Swallows, but they are rather Swifts, than Swallows, and come at their certain feafons; they commonly lodge, and make their nefts, in places where people do inhabit; for my part, I never faw either Swallows or Martens in the Hilly Countries of Pern. The Birds of the Plains are the fame with ours, but their Sea-fowl is much different. They have neither Plo ver, Heath-pouts, nor Thrushes in that Countrey, nor Cranes, nor Bustants; howsoever there may be others like them which I cannot remember.

In the Kingdom of Chili, which was within the Dominions and Em pire of the Incas; there were Offridges which the Indians call Suri, but their Teathers were not fo fine and curious as those of Africa; their colours are commonly grey: they take no high flight, but making use of their Wings and feet, flutter along, and run faster than a Horse. The Spaniards run them sometimes down with their Horses, but then two or three Horsemen chase them from one to another, untill they are tired. In Peru they have a fort of Starlings, which it in Flocks, and are of a black and grey colour; the Indians call them Chapma from the noise they make: they have also several other forts of Birds, greater and leffer, of which, for the variety of them, I am not able to give an account. remember that they have a kind of Kestrel, or Wind-hover, but of more spirit and courage than those which we have here, for those will adventure to pict upon small Birds. In the Plains of Tucay I once saw two Kestrels sly at a small Bird, which they had purfued a great way, and at last lodged her in a tall and thick Tree which is in that Plain. I left that Tree flanding when I departed from thence, which the Indians in the time of their Gentilism held, and ofteemed in Sacred, because their Kings did often fit under the shadow of it, to see the divertilements and parltimes which were represented in those Plains. These Kelteb following their natural fagacity, combined against the poor Bird; and one of them entered into the Tree, whilst the other foared alost, being ready to take the Bird fo foon as the adventured out. When the Bird was forced out by the Kestrel in the Tree, the other without stooped at her like a Hawk which the Bird avoiding, returned again to the Tree, to shelter her self; then the Keftrel, which was on the Wing, entered in after her, whilst the other took her place in the Air; and thus they entered and fallied three or four times, untill at laft the poor Bird adventured to fly towards a building, where the sheltered her felf within the hole of a Wall, so little, that the Kestrels could not enter, and so escaped from being made a prey unto them. All this time some Spanjards with great delight and curiofity observed the many shifts of these Creatures, which nature had taught them to maintain and preferve themselves. They have wild Bees in divers manners; but such as are housed and hived at home, they have none, neither have the Spaniards taught the Indians as yet how to manage them. Their wild Bees hive themselves, and make their Honey in clefts, and hollow places of the Rocks, and hollow Trees: the Bees which are in the cold Countries make little Honey, because they want Flowers and odoriferous Herbs out of which to extract it; and that little which they do make is bitter, and the Wax black, and of no use: But in the warmer Countries, and more temperate, where the Climate yields good Herbs, and odoriferous Flowers; the Honey is excellent, and white, clean, and very fweet: This fort of Honey being carried into colder Countries, candies and turns to a Sugar; they highly efteem it, not onely because it is wholsome food, but also because it is medicinal, and very whol-

CHAP. XXI.

Of the divers forts of Parrots; and how talkative they are.

PArrots breed, and are found most commonly in the Mountains of Antis; they are of divers forts and fizes, some being greater, and some less: the little ones are less than Thrushes, and the great bigger than Kestrels; there are some all over of the same colour, others of great variety, being green, yellow, blew and red, especially those of the great kind, which the Spaniards call Ginacanaya, which are of all colours, especially their Tails, which are long, and the Feathers so fine, that the Indians on the days of the Festivals adorn themselves with them; from the beauty of which Feathers so me Bocacio took his subject to frame the pleasant Novel of Friar Cipolla. The Spaniards call these Parrots by divers names, according to the difference of their size and bignes: the least of all they name Periquillo, those that are bigger they call Canthillus, and such as are a size b gger, and which speak best, they name Loro; and the biggest of all, which are dull, and never speak, they call Ginacanayas, and are good for nothing but to look upon, for the beauty of their Feathers: Such as these they carry into Spain in Cages, for the delight they have in hearing them talk; but others, which are not to beautifull, nor diverting, they think not worth the care and charge of transporting so far.

In the Year 1555, and 56, there was a Parrot at Potofi, which was one of those called Loro, which was fo ready in its Tongue, that it would call the Indiana, as they passed along the Streets, by the names of their several Countries, such as Colla, Tunca, Huayrn, Quechua, &c. as if it had been acquainted with the several Sashes they wore on their Heads, to distinguish their Countries.

Upon a certain day there was a beautiful Indian Woman passing the Streets.

Upon a certain day there was a beautifull Indian Woman paffing the Streets very fine, and accompanied with three or four Servant-Maids, as if the had been fome great Lady, or P.ulla of the Bloud-Royal: So foon as the Parrot faw her, he fell into a great laughter, crying out, Huayru, Huayru, Huayru, which is a Nation the most base and contemptible of all the Indian: With which the Indian Woman was greatly ashamed, being laughed at by the people, who is great Numbers were always about the Parrot, hearing him talk; and when se came near he called her Cupay, which is Devil; the Indians which were by, approved the Saying of the Parrot, for they knew that she was an ordinary Woman disguised in the Habit of a Palla, or great Lady.

Some few years paft in Sevil, there was another Parrot of this kind, which did most horribly abuse a certain Physician, though unworthy of that name, being a mere Quack, as he passed the Streets; which he did so scurilously, and so much to the purpose, that the Doctor took it ill, and was really offended: Whereupon the Justice commanded the Master not to set the Parrot any more in the Street, upon penalty of forseiting it to the next person offended at his pass. The general word which the Indians have for Parrots, is Dritus; and when they hear a Man talk much, and obstreperously, with much noise, they call him Vitas, for the noise and chat which the Parrots make when they sly in great flocks is like the prate of a vain talking fellow, who, as the Divine Ariosso says in his twenty fifth Canto. Knows little, and talks much.

These Parrots, at the season of the year, when the Corn is ripe, shy our from the Anis, to seek their food; and being in great slocks, they spoil the Mayz, or Corn, whereseever they alight; they are very strong upon the Wing, and shy high: but the Guacamacas being a dull and heavy sort of Bird, go not out from the Anis: And all these different sorts of Parrots keep to their own kind; to make the Proverb true, that Birds of a Feather slock together.

CHAP. XXII.

Of the four famous Rivers, and of the Fish which is taken in those which belong to Peru.

Had almost forgot to give a Relation of the Fish which the Indians of Part have in their fresh-water Rivers of Peru; the which Rivers are many, and very great, of which, for brevity fake, we shall onely mention four. The full is that great River, which is now called the Madalena, falling into the Sealer tween Cartagena, and Santa Maria; the mouth of which, according to the Sucharts, is eight Leagues wide, having its head, or fource, from the high Mountains of Peru: The fierce swiftness of the current with which it falls into the Seas fuch, that for ten or twelve Leagues the forcible streams are fensibly perceived to reach into the Seas, the fury thereof contending with the Wayes of the Ocean The River Orellana, called fo by us, being diffinct from the Madalena, is, according to the Sea-charts, about fifty four Leagues wide at the mouth of it, though fome Authours onely reckon it for thirty, others forty, others feventy, mking their account with great variety; howfoever, for my part, I shall rather adhee to the opinion of Seamen, who are knowing and learned in Maritime affairs, and those whose business it is to fail over, and measure the Seas, and have made Sea charts and Draughts with great Art: the diversity of the opinions in the measures, is this, because some measuring just at the mouth of the River, from side to side, make it fifty Leagues; but fuch as draw their lines from the extreme points of Land, which extend into the Sea, may measure feventy Leagues, as is well known to the Pilots. The fource or head of those Fountains which make this Rives arises in the division of Cuntifuyu, being to the South-West of Cozco, and distant about eleven Leagues Westward from thence. This River, at the very head of it, is very deep, and not fordable, and is very swift and rapid, the streams there, of being contracted between very high Mountains, which from the bottom to the top, where the Snow is lodged upon them, measure thirteen, fourteen, and fisteen Leagues almost perpendicular. This River is the greatest of any in all Pern, wherefore the Indians call it Apurimac, because Apu signifies Chief, or Principal both in War and Peace: they call it also Capac Mayn. Capac signifying plentiall, rich, abundant, and Mayn a River: For as Capac was an Epithet, or Title given to their Kings, so they attributed that Title or Dignity to the Chief and Prince of all their Rivers. This River keeps its name, whilst it passes through the Countrey of Pern; but whether it loses its name afterwards or not, or that the Nations who live in the Mountains give it any other name, I am not able to

In the year 1555, by reason of the great Rains which fell that Winter, a vast part of the Mountain tumbled into the River, with fuch mighty and prodigious Rocks, as gave a ftop to the current of the water for three whole days; and fo remained till the water overflowing the ruinous Mountain which fell in, came at last to take its naturale course; at which detention, or stoppage of the water, the poor Inhabitants, which lived below, much admiring, and not knowing the reason thereof, concluded that the end of the World was come; and this floppage below caused the water to rise at fourteen Leagues distance above, being sensibly elewated as far as the Bridge, which is in the great and royal High-way leading from Cocco to Cindad Real. This River Apprimac runs North and South at leaft five hundred Leagues from the head and source of it to the Equinoctial; thence takes king a turn to the Eastward, it runs under the Equinoctial, fix hundred and fifty Leagues measured on a strait line, to the place where it falls into the Sea; but being measured by the turnings and windings of it, 'twill make fifteen hundred Leagues, as Francis de Orella reports, who failed down that River, in a Voyage he made in company with Gonçalo Piçarro, who went to make discovery of the Countrey of Canela, as we shall mention in its due place. The Chart of Navigation makes it on a strait line to be fix hundred and fifty Leagues without any doublings of the River. And though Merchants in describing the situation of places do not much meddle with in-land Countries, but those onely which lye on the Sea-coast, and those Rivers which fall into the Ocean: Yet in regard that this River is the greatest in the World, being above seventy Leagues in breadth at the mouth of it, and runs with so creat a stream and torrent, that it makes fresh water for above a hundred Leagues within the Sea; they have thought it worthy of their observation and enquiry: So that according to the Relation of Orellana (as Gomara attests) those five hundred Leagues which we mention in a strait line, will make two thousand Leagues with the turnings, and doublings of this River falling into the Sea directly under the Equinoctial; and it was called Orellana according to the name of this Gentleman, who failed over it in the year 1543.

Howfoever a discovery was made before that time of this River by the Pinco-nu of Sevil, in the year 1500; to which they then gave the name of the River of Amazons, because they observed that the Women sought with as much courage in defence of those parts, as the Men; the like instances whereof we have in our History of Florida. In that River there are many greater and lesser flands, and the tide flows from the Sea above an hundred Leagues up the River: And thus much shall suffice to have said of this River.

Now as to that River which is called Marannon, it falls into the Sea about feventy Leagues to the Southward of Orellana, which is about three degrees of South-latitude, being about twenty Leagues wide at the mouth of it. This River iffues from fome great Lakes on the upper parts of Pern, which are filled by the Snow-waters that diffolve from the high Mountains which are covered with Snow. Now in regard that these two Rivers fall into the Sea, so near one unto the other, I am apt to believe that they make one River of these two, giving the name of Orellana to both these Rivers, so sar as the fresh water rons into the Sea. As to the River which the Spaniards call el rio de la plata, and the Indian Parabuay; we have in our second part given the reason, why this River was so called in Spanish, and copalained the signification of the Indian word; the Fountains of whose waters, like those of Marannon, have their head or source from the prodigious Mountains of the snowy desart, called the Corditlera, which passes through all the Countrey of Pern. This River many times overslows with rapid inundations all the Fields and Villages near the banks, and forces the people for three Months in the year, to he ready with their Boats and Canoes, which they tye to the branches of Trees to fave themselves, untill those Flouds are over, having no other place wherein to secure themselves: It falls into the Sea about the degree of thirty five, being about thirty Leagues wide at the mouth; and yet here below it is narrower than about thirty Leagues above, where it is fifty Leagues broad; fo that joyning the breadth of these four Rivers together at the places where they fall into the Sea, we may say, that they measure one hundred and thirty Leagues in breadth, and may be reckoned amongst the Miracles and Wonders of Peru. Besides these four great Rivers, there are multitudes of other fmaller Rivers, which every-where fall into the Sea, as we may fee described in the Waggoners, and Sea-Mark to which I refer my felf; which if joyned together, would make greater Rivers than any we have hitherto mentioned.

And now in fuch vast Rivers we might rationally conclude, that great plenty of Fish were produced in them; but it is quite otherwise, namely in Peru, which is the Countrey I chiefly treat of; for with other parts I meddle not. Some antibute the cause of this scarcity of Fish in those Rivers to the rapidness of their streams, which are too violent for Fish to remain in; and there are very few places in those Rivers, where the Waters are still, or tolerably quiet. More over it is observable, that the Fish which is bred there, is of another and diffe. rent fort to that in Spain; they feem to be all of one kind, without scales the Head being broad and smooth, in fashion of a Toad, with a wide Mouth: How. foever, it is very favoury, and pleafant to eat; and the skin is fo delicate and fiveet, that it is the best Meat of all: they call them Challua, which signifies Fish Another reason why these Rivers of Pern, which fall into the Sea, are so ill stored with Fifth may be, because the Waters are shallow, as well as rapid; and vering the Winter they are too deep to be waded over.

In the great Lake of Triesca are great quantities of Filh, which though they are of the same quality and form with those in the Rivers, yet the Indians, to diffinguish them from others, give them the name of Suchi: they are so fat, that when they are fived, or flewed, they need no other greafe than their own. There's likewise in this Lake another fort of Fish, which the Spaniards call Bogus, the Isdian word for them I have forgot; it is a little small Fish, of a had taste, and a worse shape; and if I am not greatly mistaken, they have scales, and might well be called Harribuelas, or Sprats, for the smallness of them: both forts of these Fishes breed abundantly in that great Lake, having room enough to spawn in, and have fufficiency of feeding, which is brought down by the Rivers which fall into it. And thus much shall serve to have spoken of Rivers, and of the Fish which the Waters of that Countrey afford.

Of the Emeralds, Torquoises, and Pearls of that Countrev.

THE pretious Stones found in Peru, in the time of the Incas, were Torquoifes. Emeralds, and Crystal of the finest fort, though they were not acquainted with the manner how to work it: the Emeralds grow in the Mountains of the Province of Manta, which is within the Jurisdiction of Puerto Vieio; but yet the Spaniards have not been able, with all their endeavours, to find out the quarry of them, which is the reason that they are so scarce and rare; such of them as are found, are the best of that kind in all Pern: Howsoever from that. and other parts of the West-Indies, they have brought such great quantities of them into Spain, as have made them cheap, and difefteemed: howfoever the Emeralds from other parts are not to be compared with those of Puerro Viejo; the which grow in their Quarries, and take their tincture from the nature of the Soil from whence they are produced, ripening there with time, like fruit in their proper feafons: The Emerald, when it first begins, is of a palish white, partaking of a grey colour mixed with a green; then as it grows ripe, or towards its perfection, it takes at one end a tincture of green, perhaps at that end first which points towards the East, after which that pleasant colour disperses it self over all the Stone : fo that as the Stone is when it comes from its Quarry, fo it remains for ever after. I saw in Cozco, amongst many Emeralds, two especially of singular note, being of a perfect round shape, as big as ordinary Nuts, and bored through the middle; one of these Stones was complete, and in all parts perfect; the other in the middle, and at one of the corners, was perfect, and extremely beautifull; the other two parts, or corners, were not fo pleafing, being not come to their full beauty and perfection, howfoever were not much fhort of the best; but the other which was opposite to it, was foul, and little worth, having received but a faint green, and such as appeared worse, by the beautifull lustre of the others, so that it seemed a piece of green glass joyned to the Emerald. Wherefore the Master of that Stone cut off that part from the other, for which he was much blamed by curious and inquifitive Men; who were of opinion, that for proof and evidence, that the Emerald grows by degrees to perfection in the Quarry; he ought to have permitted them to remain together; and that the curiofity of the thing would have been more valuable than the Stone it felf. I then being a Boy, they gave me that part which was cut off to play with, which I still keep, not being of any value.

The Torquoise is a Stone of a blew colour, some of them of a more deep azure, and finer than the others, but not so much esteemed by the Indians as the Emerald.

Pearls were not much used or worn in Peru, though they had a knowledge of them: the reason was, because the Incas, who were always more tender of the welfare and fafety of their people, than of their improvements in that which we call Riches, forbad them to expose themselves to that danger which is required in fishing for Pearls, which therefore were not in use amongst them. Since that time they are become to common, that Acoffa reports thus of them, which words we shall rehearse verbatim. "Since we have undertaken (saith he) to treat of the principal Riches, which are brought from the Indies, we must not omit Pearls, which the Ancients called Margarites; the value of which were at first so great, that they were esteemed Jewels fit and worthy onely for Princes and Royal Perfons: but now they are become so common, that even Neger Women wear Strings of them. Then afterwards in another part of this Chapter, he proceeds, and lays, That Pearls are found in divers parts of the Indies; but the place, "where they abound most, is in the South-Sea, about Panama, where those Islands are, which are called the Pearl-Islands: but the best and greatest quantity is

" found in the North-Sea, near the River called Hacha, where I understood how they fished for them, and took them; which is done with the great labour and hazard of those poor people, who will dive fix, nine, and sometimes twelve fathoms under water to gather the Oisters, which include the Pearls, and gow close to the fides of the Rocks; and having loaded themselves at the bottom of the Sea, they arife, and buoy up themselves again to the surface of the wa ter, and emptying their shells which they bring up into their Canoes, they then open them, and take out that Treasure, which good fortune hath present ted to them: the coldness of the water at the bottom of the Sea is great, and troublesome to the Divers, but much more laborious to hold their breath for quarter of an hour, and formetimes for a full half hour, during the time the they remain under water; the which cannot be performed by any, but the who have accustomed themselves to it from their infancy, and who use great abstinence, adventuring not to dive, but when they are fasting: Likewike coverousness in this people makes them the more abstemious, though it be the ver fo grievous: they drudge for Pearls in divers manners, and find them in find quantities, that they now string them in Neck-laces. In the year 1587, within my memory, there came from the Indies, for the King's account, 18 Mark weight of Pearl, with three other large Chefts of the fame, belides 1264 Mark weight for account of particular persons, and seven other bags full not weigh "ed: the report of which, at any other time, would have seemed incredible Thus far are the Words of Acosta, with which he concludes that Chapter.

And now hereunto I shall add two Stories about Pearls; one is, that about the vear 1 c64, they brought formany Pearls to Sevil for the King's account, that being heaped up into a hoard like feed, they were fet to fale in grofs to the higheft Bidde Out-cry being made of the fale to him that should give most, and the price agreed one of the King's Officers presently offered to him that had bought them 6000 Ducats for his bargain; and a certain Merchant called Prospero, who was skilled in that commodity, immediately laid down the Money; so the Pearls being to ken up, the first buyer remained contented with the advantage of 6000 Ducas which he had gained for one word speaking; and the other well satisfied with his bargain, hoping to get much more Money and benefit by so considerable a pared of Pearls. The other Story is this: I knew a young Man in Spain of low condition, and in great want; and though he were a Silver-finith by Trade, yet la tion, and in great want; and though he were a Silver limith by Irage, yether ving no Stock to fet up with, he worked as a Journey-man. This person lived in Madrid in the year 1562, and 63, and lodged with me at my Lodgings; and offerving him to play away all that he got by his work, I often chid him, and told him that I believed I should one day see him in very great misery: To which he replied, that his wants and miseries could not be greater than they had been, when * Thirty fix he came on foot, and onely with 14 * Maravedis in his pocket to Madrid. This fellow, to improve and better his fortune, resolved to go to the Indies, and dealing Pearls, for I knew he had fome skill in them: It happened that he was so success full in his Voyage, and in his profit, that he got an Estate of above thirty thou fand Ducats; and then to shew his Gallantry (for I knew both him and his Wife) he made him a large Coat of black Velvet, which he embroidered with fine Pearl before, at least fix fingers broad, and quite round the borders; which was very gallant, and agreeable to the new Mode; this Embroidery being valued at the least in four thousand Ducats. This Relation I have made, to shew the great quantities of Pearl, which have been brought from the Indies; besides those which we have mentioned in the third Book and sisteenth Chapter of our History of Florida, which are found in many parts of that great Kingdom, particularly in that rich Temple of the Province called Cofachiqui; the 18 Mark weight of Pearl, be fides the two Chefts which Acoff mentions to have been brought for the Kings ac. count, were all choice Pearls, and fuch as at feveral times were culled out by the Indians, and fet apart for the King's use and service, to whom a fifth part belonged of all the Pearls which were taken, and accordingly delivered into the Royal Wardrobe; from whence they were given out for adorning a Manto and Petticoat for the Image of our Lady of Guadalage; embroderying a whole Suit, fuch as the drefs of her Head, Frontlets, Surcoat, hanging Sleeves, and hem of her Garments, all with the finelt fort of Pearl fet in Diamond work: the Houle, or Chair of State made for this Image, which were usually of a darkish colour, were now covered with Rubies and Emeralds fet in Gold; by which it was apparent, by whole command, and at whole charge those Artists worked, and to whole fervice the Catholick King did dedicate fo great a Treasure, which was immense. and beyond the abilities and magnificence of any other, than his onely who was Emperous of the Indies,

But to compute, and rightly to calculate the Riches of this Monarch, we ought to reade the fourth Book of Acofta, wherein are fuch strange discoveries of things in the New World, as are almost incredible. Amongst which I have been an evewitness my felf at Sevil, in the year 1579, where I saw a Pearl, which a Gentleman, called Don Diego de Temez, brought from Panama, and defigned for King Philip the Second: the Pearl was about the bigness of a Wallnut, and roundness of a Pigeon's Egg; it was valued in the Indies at twelve thousand Pieces of Eight, which make fourteen thousand four hundred Ducats. Jacomo de Treço of Milan, an excellent Artist and Jeweler to his Catholick Majesty, esteemed it at fourteen, thirty, fifty, and fometimes at a hundred thousand Ducats, that is, that it had no price; for in regard there was none like it in the World, and that there was none with which it might be compared, it was not capable of any estimation: In Sevil many went to see it for a fight, giving it the Name of the Foreigner. A certain Italian Gentleman at that time went about that City, and bought up all the choicest Pearls he could find for account of a Great Lord in Italy; when having purchased a String, or Chain of the best; yet being compared and laid by the Foreigner, they seemed like so many little pebles of the Brook. Those that knew, and were acquainted with Pearls, and pretious Stones, did aver, that it weighed 24 Quilats above any other that was ever known; but what that means, I am not skilfull enough to interpret. The Proprietor of this Pearl faid, that a little Neger Boy, which was not worth above a 100 Ryals, fished the shell, wherein it was contained, out of the water; which was fo cragged, and promifed fo little outwardly, that they were going to cast it again into the Sea; but yielding unexpectedly so great a profit to the Master, he was pleased in reward for the benefit to give liberty to the Slave; and in here, he was pleased in Carlot of the Master on whom sortune had bestowed so great a Treasure, the Inhabitants of Panama were pleased to make him their High Constable: the Pearl was never polified, because the Master would never consent that it should be touched, unless it were to bore a hole through it; for they hever attempt to alter the fathion or thaves of them, but ftring them as they come from the thells; fo that some of them come out very round, others long, others flat, others round of one fide, and flat on the other; but those which are in fashion of a Pear, are most esteemed, because they are not common: When a Merchant hath got one of this shape, he presently enquires, and makes search for another vyhich is like it; for being yvell matched, they rife double in their price; fo that when a Pearl, being fingle, is valued at a hundred Ducats; being afterwards well matched with another, doth prefently double its price, and both give a value to each other, because they are made the more fit for Chains and Neck-laces, for which they are principally defigned. Pearl is of a nature vyhich vyill admit of no polifhing, being composed of a certain shell, or tunicle, which covers it, and which decays with time, losing much of its lustre and brightness which it had at first; hovvsoever, when they take off the upper coat, or tunicle, of the decayed part, that which is under appears as oriental as it did at first, but yet with great damage to the Pearl, being confiderably leffened, at least one third of its bigness: Hovvsoever, the best fort of Pearls do never decay, and may be excepted from this general pence.

CHAP. XXIV.

Of Gold and Silver.

 $\mathbf{S}^{Pain}$  it felf is a fufficient witness of the Gold and Silver which comes from Pvv, considering that for the twenty five years last past<sub>2</sub> (besides what hath been for merly carried) there bath been every year transported twelve or thirteen Millions according to Register, besides that which hath passed without account. There is Gold found in all the parts of Peru, fome more, and fome less generally in every Province. It is found on the top or furface of the Earth, carried by ftreams and province. It is found on the top or furface of the Earth, carried by fifeams and currents, and washed down by great flouds of Rain, which the Indians gather and put into water, separating it from the Earth, as the Silver-smiths do the filing, which fall in their shops. That which is found in this manner, is called Gold in dust, because it is like filings; some of which are indifferently big, and about the falhion of a Mellon-feed, some are round, and others of an oval form; all the Gold of Peru is about eighteen or twenty Quilats, more or less, in goodness, only that which comes from the Mines of Callavaya, or Callabraya, is of the finest fortheine twenty four Quilats and better, as I have been informed by fome Gold-finishs in Spain. In the year 1556, there was digged out of the veins of a Rock in the Mines of Callahuaya, a piece of Gold Ore, of the bigness of a Man's head, in colour like the Lungs of a living creature, and indeed did fomething refemble it in the flane. having certain Perforations through it from one end to the other; in all which holes there appeared little kernels of Gold, as if melted Gold had been dropped in to them, some of them being outwardly in knobs, and others more inward: Those that understood the nature of Mines, were of opinion, that had that piece of Ore been suffered to remain, it would all with time have been turned into perfect Gold. In Cozco the Spaniards looked upon it as strange and unusual, and the Indians called it Huaco, as they did every thing which was wonderfull, and worthy of admiration; the which word also was used by them when any thing was abominable, or detectable in its kind. The Mafter of this piece of Ore determined to carry it with him into Spain, and prefent it to King Philip the Second as a curiofity greatly to be efteemed: But I was informed by those who were in the same Flort with him, that the Ship in which that person embarked was cast away, and that he was drowned, and all his treasure, with much more, perished with him.

The Silver is digged with much more labour than Gold, and refined with much more charge and difficulty: There are many Mines in divers parts of Pern, but 1000 like those of Potosi, the which were discovered in the year 1545, being about sour teen years after the Spaniards first possessed that Countrey, as appears by the Record. The Mountain in which these Mines arise, is called Potosi; but why it is to named, I cannot tell, unless it hath some signification in the proper Language of that Countrey; for in the general Speech of Peru it hath none. It is fituated in the midft of a Plain, in form of a Sugar-loaf, is about the compass of a League at the bottom, and a quarter of a League towards the top, it is round, and very pla-fant to behold, flanding alone, and fingle in a Plain; which Nature hath adomed and beautified, having added comeline's to that fame, which its Riches hath made renowned, and efteemed in the World. Some Mornings it appears with a cap of Snow, the Climate thereabouts being fomething cold. That Mountain in the division which was first made fell to the share of Goncalo Picarro, and afterwards to Pedro Hinogofa, as we shall hereafter declare, in case we may be so fice, as to bring to light some hidden and secret practices contrived in the times of War, which Historians do often omit; fearing to disparage the Actions of great Men, and thereby create enmity and displeasure to themselves.

Acofia in his fourth Book writes at large of Gold, and Silver, and Quick-filver, of which every day there are Mines discovered in that Empire, to that I shall not need to write of them; onely I shall mention some sew remarkable things concerning those Metals, and how the Indians melted, and sounded them before the Spe niards found out the use of Quick-filver; and refer the Reader, to satisfie his curiofity to that History of Acosta, in which he writes of all these Metals, and particularly of the Nature of Quick-filver, at large. 'Tis observable that the Mines of the Mountain Potofi were first discovered by certain Indians, who were Servants to Spaniards, called in their Language Yanacana; who under the feal of friendship, and promile of fecrecy, kept it concealed for fome time, enjoying to themselves the benefit of the first discovery; but finding the Riches immense, and difficult to be hidden, they could not, or would not, conceal the intimation thereof from their Mafters, who opening the first vein of Ore, found passage to a greater Treasure. Amongst those Spaniards, to whom this booty and fortunate lot happened, there was one called Gonçalo Bernal, who was afterwards Steward to Pedro de Hinojofa; this Man discoursing some short time after the discovery of this Mine, with Diego Centenes, a Gentleman of Quality, and other Noble persons, concerning the rich and foreading veins of this Mountain, declared it to be his opinion, that in case this Mine were digged, and the Silver melted, which it would produce, that Silver would become more common, and less valuable than Iron.

The which affertion I have feen made good in the years 1554, and 55, when in the War of Francisco Hernander Giron, an Iron Horse-shoe was worth five Pieces of Eight, or six Ducats, and a Shoe for a Mule rated at four Pieces of Eight, and two Nails for shoing vaand a Since for a system state Maravedis. I have seen a pair of Buskins, or Spatter- * About ten lahes, fold at thirty fix Ducars; a Quire of Paper for four Ducars; an Ell of Valer-pence. the Cloths made of Sigovia Wool, their Silks, Linen, and other Merchandifes of Spain, were estimated: but the War was the cause of this dearness, because in the space of two years, that it continued, there arrived no Ships in Peru with the Commodities of Spain. Moreover, the great abundance of Silver which those Mines yielded, caused it to be cheap, and of no esteem; that a Basket of Cuea cante to be worth thirty fix Ducats, and a Bushel of Wheat valued at twenty four or twenty five Ducats; at like rates they fold their Mayz, and all their commodities for Shoes and Cloathing; and their Wine also was sold at excessive prizes, untill such time as it came to be imported in greater quantities: And though this Countrey be rich, and abounding with Gold, Silver, and pretious Stones, yet the Natives are the most poor and miserable people in all the World.

CHAP. XXV.

Of Quick-filver; and how they melted their Ore before they discovered that Mineral.

WE have in the foregoing part of this Hiltory fignified, that the Incan Kings had a knowledge of Quick-filver, but were unacquainted with the Nature, or Ule of it, and onely admired the lively and quick motions of it; howfoever, having observed some certain noxious qualities and effects it produced, such as stupesactions, palsies, and tremblings of the Nerves, the Kings, whose chief care was the safety of their people, (for which reason one of their Titles was, Lovers of the Poor) did absolutely sorbid their Subjects to use or meddle with it; and they being possessed with an apprehension of its noxious qualities, abhorred it to that degree, as not to think it worthy of their thought or word; so that they had no name for Quick-silver, unless they have coined one for it since the Spaniards in the year 1567, made a discovery of it; and if they had any before, they had certainly sorgot it, as Men are liable to doe, who have no knowledge or practice of letters. That which the Incas used and permitted to their Subjects, was a fort of Earth of a pure Vermilion-colour beyond expression, found in dust within the Mines of Quick-silver.

Ouick-filver; the Indians call it Tehma; that which Acofta calls Llimpi is of a Put ple-colour, and extracted from other Mines; for in those Countries they have Farth of all colours, which ferve us for Painting: But as to this curious Crimos with which the Indians are fo much affected, it is also forbidden to be extratal without licence. lest the people venturing themselves far into the Caverns of the Earth in the fearch of it, should prejudice their healths, and endanger their lives, and therefore the use of it is forbidden to the common people, and onely permit. ted to Ladies of the Royal Bloud; Men never use it, nor Women in years, he fuch onely as are young and handsome; who do not lay it upon their Checks our Women do in Spain, but onely draw it in streaks about the breadth of a flaw from the corners of their Eyes to their Temples; and in this manner it fermal very becoming. Other Fucus, or Painting, than this with Ychma, the Pallas of Piers Ladies did not use, nor was it their adornment of every days dress, but onely the when they would appear fine and well dreffed upon the days of the principal Feek when they always washed their Faces very clean, as also did all the common me ole. But the truth is, those Women who did much avail themselves of the beauty, and clearness of their skin, would for conservation thereof, lay a fond white stuff like Milk upon it, (of what they made it, for my part I cannot reliable but there they let it stick, and remain for the space of nine days, at the end of which being well dried, like a fourf on the skin, they would then take it off, and the complexion would remain much more bright and clear than before: But as in the Tehma, the Prohibition that was made against extracting of it, caused it tolk scarce, and of little use. And whereas a certain Authour says, that the helm did usually paint their faces in the Wars, and at their Festivals, it is a groß mistake, though perhaps some Nations might doe it, which were esteemed the mil falvage and barbarous. And now we are to declare how they melted their Silver, before they found the use of Quick-filver: the manner was this. Near to the Mountain Porachia Potocli, (which is all one) there is another Mountain in the same form and share. but not fo great, nor fo high, called by the Indians Huayna Potocii, or the Potocii the Junior, as if they were Father and Son. The Silver, for the most part, is extraded from Hattin Potocsi, or the Elder Potocsi; in melting of which, they at first sond great difficulty, for not being able to make it run, it burnt away, or evaporated fmoak; of which the Indians could not penetrate the cause, nor discover a rend. But as necessity and coverousness make Men ingenious and contriving, so part cularly the Indians were infinitely industrious to find out some way to Meltiki Gold and Silver; at length, after many experiments, they happened to try the netting of a baser fort of Metal, which the lesser Porocli produced, consisting, for the most part, of Lead mixed with Silver; the which yielding more easily, melted, and run; and this being put into the Melting pots, together with the fine Shire and Gold, would immediately cause them to melt and dissolve; for which reson the Indians gave it the Name of Curuchec, which fignifies any thing that difform In the melting of which Metals, they observed a certain proportion of this corfer fort, for to fo much Silver they put fuch a quantity of this Curuchec, according as time and experience had informed their judgments; for all forts of Silverner not of the same fineness, though digged and extracted from the same vein; so the according to the quality and richness of the Metal, the quantity of Correction waste be applied. The Silver being thus mixed with more fulible Metal, they melted down in Earthen or Clay-pots, or Cryfobles, which they carried from place place: But in regard they had no use of Bellows to make the heat of their fix more intense, nor yet used Copper Pipes, which we have formerly mentioned wherewith to blow the fire; it often happened, that they could not possibly call their Silver to melt; of which the Indians not being able to comprehend there fon, did at length conclude, that it must be a natural blast of Wind which must doe this work: But then if the Wind were too firong, it would blow away the Coles, and cool the Metal, so that a temperate and easie gale was requisite: To procure which, their custome was to go upon the Hills by night, observing has the Winds fate, and there placed their Melting pots at such a height, highest lower, according as they perceived the force of the Wind. It was a pleafant in in those days to see eight, ten, twelve or fifteen thousand of these Fires burning at the same time, upon the sides of these Mountains ranged in order one by the ther. The first Melting of the Ore was made in this manner on the Mountains but then the fecond time they founded it again in their Houses, blowing the fire as we have faid, with the Pipes of Copper, when they made separation of their Lead from their Silver. For in regard the Indians had not the knowledge of all those inventions, which the Spaniards have attained in the Art of separating Gold. and Silver, and Lead, performed by Aqua fortis, and other Ingredients; their way was by often Melting, to burn out the Lead, and to refine: By which we may observe, that the Indians had some knowledge of refining the Silver of Potosi, before the discovery of Quick filver; and still conserve that Art, though not so commonly or frequently known amongst them as formerly.

BOOK VIII.

The Mafters and Owners of the Mines, perceiving that by this way of Melting by natural Winds, their Goods and Riches were divided, and much embezelled by being dispersed into several hands; wherefore to remedy this inconvenience, they employed Day-labourers, who were Indians, to dig and extract the Metal; and then the Spaniards themselves melted down their own Silver; whereas before the Indians having extracted the Ore, for every hundred weight thereof agreed and flipulated with their Masters to return them such a quantity of Silver. By this good husbandry, and by the improvements they had made in the Art of Melting, they made great Bellows, which being placed at a diffance, would blow their fires into an extremity of flame. But this neither proving a ready way, they made an Engine with Wheels, carried about with Sails like a Wind-mill, or turned by Horses; which fanned and blowed the fire with great violence. Nor did this neither doe the work, fo that the Spaniards despairing of the success of their inventions. made use of those which the Indians had framed and contrived; and so things continued for 22 years, untill the year 1567, when by the wit and industry of a certain Portugal, named Henrique Garces, a great plenty of Quick-filver was discovered in the Province of Huanca, furnamed Villea, which fignifies Greatness.or Eminence: I know not for what reason, unless it be for the great abundance of Quick-filver which that Countrey yielded; which is so necessary in the founding of Merals. that without it there is great waste and consumption; and which hath been so usefull, that eight thousand Quintals of it have every year been spent in the service of his Majelty; and yet notwithstanding this great plenty of Quick-filver which was discovered, the Spaniards were for some time ignorant of the use which might be made thereof in the more easie extracting of their Silver; nor had they for the space of sour years after any good Assay-Master, until the year 1571, when a certain Spaniard named Fernandes, de Velasco, who had lived at Mexico, and learned the manner of extracting the Silver with Quick-filver, came to Peru, and taught the use of it to them there. As Acosta more largely and curiously relates, to whom I refer the Reader, who defires to be informed of many rarities and matters of this nature worthy to be known.

CHAP. I.

Huayna Capac caused a Chain of Gold to be made as big as a Cable; and his Reasons for it.

HE puissant and powerfull Haayna Capae being absolute Lord of his Empire, employed the first year of his Reign in performing the Funeral Solemnities of his deceased Father; and then afterwards, to the great joy and satisfaction of his people, made his progress in visiting divers parts of his Empire; and everywhere as he passed, the Curaeas came forth to meet and receive him, and the people strowed their ways with Flowers, and made Triumphal Arches with Canes and Rushes, covered with Roses and Flowers, and odoriferous Herbs; all places resounded with loud Acclamations of the people, repeating the August Titles of the Inca, especially the Name of Huayna Capae, Huayna Capae, which they often echoed, as that which contained most of Grandeur and Renown; the which he having deserved from his insancy, did now, as they believed, merit a greater advance of Adoration, being placed in degree of a God. Acosta writing in the 24th Chapter of his fixth Book in commendation of this Prince, hath these words: "This Huayna Capae was adored by his people in his life-time for a "God, and with that divine Worship which was never before used towards his "Ancestours, as ancient Men still living do remember, and relate of their own "knowledge. As this Huayna Capae had newly begun to make his Journey into divers parts of his Empire, news was brought him, that he had a Son and Heir born, who was afterwards called Huasser. This Child being greatly desired, filled all the Court with joy; and was so pleasing to his Father; that he returned to Cocco, to be present at the Entertainments which were made for celebrating the Festivals of his Son's Nativity, and was there received with all the evidences of joy, and cordial welcome, as could be possibly expressed. This Solemnity being past, which lasted for twenty days; the Inca, out of the abundance of joy, which he conceived for the Birth of an Heir, began to entertain thoughts of doing and contriving something extraordinary, and never fore invented against the time that his Son was to be weaned who was Heir. Amongst divers other particulars of Greatness, in an extraodinary part instituted for celebration of this Festival, one was a Chain of Gold of that wonderfull bigness, as made it famous by report through the whole World, and yet was never feen by Foreigners, whose Avarice was as strong as their curiofity to fee a piece of fuch magnificence; the defign which the least had to make it, was this: In the Countries of Pern every Province or Nation had Dances properly belonging to their Countrey, different from others, by which they were diffinguished one from the other, as much as by the Dress mon their Heads; and these Dances were always constant, and the same, without any change or alteration of new Modes. The Incas had a fort of Dance which was grave and decent, without jumping, or capring, as others uled. Their Custome was for the Men to dance without admitting the Women into the Ring, and to class hands one with the other, reaching them out to the fore. most, until all were entred in, and chained as it were one to the other so that fometimes two or three hundred Men were concerned in the Dance according to the number of those present at the Festival; the which they be gan at some distance from the King, before whom they presented it. Their manner was to begin all at the fame time, and to make three fleps by rule, the first was back, and then two others forward, like the Chases and Coupes that we use in our Spanish Dances; so that giving but one step backward, and two forward, they ftill gained ground, untill they came to the middle of the place, where the Inca fate: as they danced they fang by turns, not to the themselves, so much as they would do, in case they all sang together; their Tunes were according to the measure of their Dances, and the subjects of their Songs were in praife of the prefent Inca, and his Ancestours, and those of the Bloud Royal, and of their Actions and Exploits performed in the time of Peace and War. The Incas also there prefent, and standing about the King. bore their part in the Confort, as those who were equally concerned in the merriment, and the King himfelf danced fometimes, to render the Fellival more folemn.

From this manner of clasping and linking hands one within another, the less Huayna Capac took his invention of making his Chain of Gold, esteeming that it would be much more stately and majestical to have these Dancers linked and fastened one to the other by this Chain, rather than by their hands. The purticulars of this Chain I did not hear from common report, but from my Old Uncle, whom I mentioned at the beginning of this Hiltory, who being a Perfon much pleafed with the remembrance of old Stories, told me that this Chain was so long, as would reach the length and breadth of the chief Market-place of Cozco, where they danced at the time of all their principal Fealts; and though it was not necessary to have it so long in respect to the Dance, only the Inca was pleafed to order it of that length, for greater State, and in honor to the Festival of his Son and Heir, in which nothing was to be deficient which might render it great and folemn. I shall not need to inform and trouble those who have feen and measured that Market-place, with an account of the length and breadth of it; howfoever to fatisfie the curiofity of fuch as have not been there, I dare to affirm, that that place North and South is two hundred common Paces in length, allowing two Foot for every Pace, and an hundred and fifty Paces East and West in breadth, taking in those Houses which the spuriands in the Year 1556, when my Master Garcitallo de la Vega was Chief Julito, had built on the side of the River; so that this Chain must have been three hundred and fifty Paces long, which make feven hundred Foot; and what I asked the fame Indian of the compass of this Chain, he held up his Hand. pointing to his Wrift, fignifying that every Link was of that bigness. The Accountant General Augustine Carate, in the 14th Chapter of his first Book having at any time occasion to speak of the Riches of the Royal Palaces belonging to the Incas, reckons up valt Treasures, and almost incredible, but I shall onely repeat what he fays particularly of this Golden Chain, which I have extracted verbatim.

"Gnayanawa, when he had a Son born, caused a Golden Chain of that weight to be made, (as many Indians still alive can testifie) that being fastened to the Ears or Luggs of two hundred Indians, it could scarcely be raised by them; and in memory of this remarkable Fabrick of Gold; the Child's Name was called Guasca, which in their Language signifies a Rope, or Cable, with the additional Title of Inca. And thus far are the Words of that noble Historian of Peru.

This rich and magnificent piece of Gold, together with other vast Treasures, This rich and magnificent piece of Goid, together with other variations, the Indians made away with, or concealed, so soon as the Spaniards invaded their Countrey, and so consounded them beyond all recovery, that no knowledge or intimation remains where any part of them is to be found: And in regard this rich and stately piece of Gold was compounded and framed onely for that time when the Prince an Heir was to have his Lock cut, and his Name imposed; they furnamed him Huascar, adding it to his other Names of Inti Cusi Hualpa; and because Hussea signifies a Rope or Cable, (for in the Language of Peru they have no Word for a Chain,) they, for better Grace of the Word, added R. the which took so much with his Subjects, that they for the most part called him Hualear, omitting Toti Cust Hualpa, which Word Hualpa signifies the Sun of Chearfulness. For whereas in those days the Incar became very potent, and that power for the most part raises in Men a Spirit of Pride and Vanity; so they began to be weary of those ordinary Titles, which anciently expressed their Grandeur and Majesty; and expected other Hyperbolies and Exaltations of Divine Attributes, which might raife them to the Heavens, and make their adoration equal to that of their might rate them to the Fleavels, and make their adotation equal to that in the God the Sun. So they called him Tini, which fignifies the Sun, or Phiening, Cufi Chearfulnefs, Pleafure, Contentiunent or Rejoycing. And thus much shall serve in Explanation of the Names and Titles of the Inca Huasear. Let us now return to his Father Huayna Capac, who having given order for the making of this Chain, and left sufficient directions for the fallion and fize thereof, (that so it might be ready against the time that his Child was to be weaned,) he prosecuted the Defign he had already began, of making a Visit to the remote parts of his Empire: the which having finished in the space of two Years, being about the time that his Child was to be weared, he returned to Cozco, where all things were prepared that could be contrived to make this Feast folemn, and joyfull, and full of divertilement; and then the Child received the Name of Hualcar.

CHAP. II.

Ten Vallies of the Coast are reduced, one after the other, as they lay in order; and Tumpiz surrenders of it felf.

Year being past after this Solemnity, Huayna Capac ordered that an Army of forty thousand Men should be raised, with which he marched into the Kingdom of Quitn, taking the Eldest Daughter of the King of that Country which he had Conquered, to be his Concubine, during the time of that Expedit which he had Conquered, to be in Solicuonic, during the time of that expedition; but first to prepare and hallow her, she was fent to remain some days in the House of the Select Virgins. By this Woman he had Atabualpa, and his Bothers, as we shall see by the sequel of this History. From Quity the brea descended into the Plains by the Sea-coast, and in prosecution of his Conquests he came to the Valley called Chimu, now Trugillo, which was the ultimate bounds to which his Grandfather the good Inca Tupanqui had proceeded, as we have already mentoned. From thence he fent his Heralds with the accustomary Summons and Offers of Peace and War to the Inhabitants of the Valley of Chacma, and Pascalman. These people having long been Borderers and Neighbours to the Subjects of the Inca. had from them been informed of the gentleness of their Kings, and the advantage of their Government, and therefore from a quick fense of so much selicity, returned answer, That they defired nothing more than to be Subjects to the Inca, to obey his Laws, and be ruled by him. All the other eight Vallies followed the Example of these two adjoining Provinces, being situate between Pr casmayu, and Tumpiz, and are these which follow, namely Canna, Collque, Ciul, Tucmi, Sayanca, Mutupi, Puchiu and Sullana; in the settlement of which Courties, and in the improvement of them with good Husbandry, and in making Acueducts to water their Glebe-lands and Pasturage, two years were spent, as ther than in the Conquest or Subjection of them, for they chearfully, and with free Will furrendred themselves to the Inca. During which time the Inca relieved his Forces three or four times, for in regard the Air of that Countrey was by and moift, and confequently unwholfome, he judged it fit for the better health of his Subjects, to change his Guards frequently, that fo the Difeases of the Countrey might not enter the Camp, before they were again relieved by an exchange of fresh Men.

The Inca having subjected these Vallies, returned to the Kingdom of Quite, where he remained for the space of two Years, that so he might adorn that Countrey with fumptuous Edifices, and flately Aqueducts, wherewith he advantaged and obliged that people. After which he commanded a levy to be made of fify thousand Souldiers, which being raised and armed, he marched with themalong the Sea-coast, untill they came to the Valley of Sullana, which is the nearest Sta to Tumpiz; from whence he fent his usual Summons, and Offers of Peace and War. The Inhabitants of Tumpiz were a fort of people more luxurious in their Diet and Habit, than all those who live on that Coast, and had already submitted to Obedience of the Incas; their manner was to wear a Garland on their Heads by way of diffinction, which they called Pillu. Their Caciques or Lords maintained Buffoons, Jefters, Dancers, and Singers, for their Pattime and Divertifement; but their Religion yet was vile and bafe, for they adored Tigers and Lions, and offered the Bloud and Hearts of Men in Sacrifice; they were lerved and obeyed with great Fear and Awe by their own Subjects, and feared by Strate gers; howfoever being poffeffed with dreadfull Apprehensions of the Inca, they had no heart nor courage to make opposition against him, and therefore return ned Answer to his Heralds, that they were with all willing obedience ready to receive him for their Lord and Emperour: The like Answer was made by the Inhabitants of the Vallies upon the Coaft, and other In-land Nations called Chinana, Chintu, and Collonche, Jaquall, and others, seated on the neighbouring parts.

CHAP. III.

Of the punishment inflicted on those who killed the Officers of Tupac Inca Yupanqui.

THE Inca being entred into Tumpiz, raifed a strong Fortress, and put a con-siderable Carrifon into its backuit also a Tarrita Branch fiderable Garrifon into it; he built also a Temple for the Sun, to which he adjoined a House for the Select Virgins; the which Work being finished, he passed forward into the Countrey of those who had slain the Captains, Instructors, and Doctors of Religion, which his Father Tupac Tupanqui had formerly feated in that Countrey, for the better Government and Erudition of that people, as we have formerly mentioned. In memory of which treacherous Villany Huapra Capac fent his Messengers to them, commanding them immediately to repair to his Court, to render an Account of the wickedness they had perpetrated; and though they were conscious of the Fact, and trembled with the thoughts of the punishment they had deserved, yet they durst not refuse, or neglect the Summons, and therefore in due fense of their demerit they humbly approached the Inca, cafling themselves with all submission at his Feet. The Inca hereupon assembled all the Curacas, Ambaffadours, Counfellours, and Nobles, who were prefent at that Meeting, when his Father, at their request, sent his Officers and Instructors amongst them, the which they had treacherously murthered; and all of them appearing before him, a certain Colonel of the Army stood up, and made a Speech to them in behalf of the Inca; and in the first place upbraiding them with trea-chery, breach of their Faith, and cruelty, he accused them of Ingratitude, and want of Understanding; for that whereas they ought to have adored the Inca and his Officers, for withdrawing them from their brutish and bestial Life, to live like Men, with all the Comforts and Enjoyments of a rational Being; they on the contrary had barbaroufly and cruelly murthered the Authours and Instruments of their Felicity, to the great dithonour of the Sun his Father; for which offence they had deserved so severe a punishment, that if their whole Nation of both Sexes, and all ages were extirpated, and their Race extinguished, they were not able with the effusion of all their Bloud, to make expiation for this heinous crime. But in regard that Huayna Capac was an Inca to whose Nature Mercy and Clemeny were most agreeable, and whose Title it was to be a Lover of the Poor, he did freely forgive all the common people; and as to those Authours and Contrivers of this Murther, though they had all deferved Death, yet he was contented to decimate them, and every tenth Man to die, as his Lot should fall upon him, that so it might be evident, that the Inca had no Spleen or Harred to any in particular, but onely to punish Offenders, as Truth and Justice required. And farther, that a Mark and Tellimony of this Treachery might remain in the Memory of future Ages, the Inca commanded that the Curacas, and principal Personages of the Nation, Huancavillea, should have two of their Teeth drawn from above, and two from beneath, and for ever to be fo continued to them, and their Poflerity, and to remain as a Mark whereby to reproach the fallity of the Words pronounced with their Mouths, and the breach of the Promite of Fidelity and Vaffalage made to his Father Topac Yup.inqui.

BOOK IX:

These Nations received the Sentence and Execution of Justice with great Ho mility and Refignation; efteeming themselves very happy that the Institution of their punishment was no greater, fearing that it might have extended to a general Maffacre of them all who were concerned in this Treachery; for fince the time that the Empire of the Incas began to be dilated, nothing was punished with 6 much severity as Rebellion; which Crime being complicated with the vile for of Ingratitude, made the punishment inflicted seem easie, and not bear an equality with what the offence deferved; fo that when the whole Nation of Huangarith. With What the offence deterved, to that which are whose punished for all the reft, they supported the Sentence with Patience and Moderation; and their Curacus and Captains, willingly consented to have their Teeth drawn; and to shew their readiness herein, they made it the Badge and Diffinction of their Nation, drawing out the upper and nether Teeth of their Children, so soon as having shed them, they were grown again; whereby it is observable, that rude and barbarous People are as well pleased with Move ration in the Execution of Punishment, as others are in the Excesses of Re nefits.

I was once acquainted with an Indian Woman of Huaneavillea in Cozeo, who re counted unto me at large all this Story; the Men and Women, (as she said of that Countrey, did ufually boar their Noftrils, for carrying Jewels of Gold and Silver in them; and I remember when I was a Child, that a Neighbour of our called Coca, had a Horse of a Chesnut colour, which being broken winded, so his more easie breathing they flit his Nostrils, with which Novelty the Indian be ing much pleased, they called the Horse Huancavillea, in similar of one of the Nation.

CHAP. IV.

The Inca visits his Empire, consults the Oracles, and gains the Island of Puna.

THE Inca Huayna Capac having reduced those Provinces, punished the 0 fenders, and placed sufficient Guards and Garrisons for subjecting the prople, and keeping them in obedience, he returned to the Kingdom of Quinu, and thence taking a compass to the Southward, he proceeded to the Charcas by way of Cozco, being a Journey of above seven hundred Leagues in length. Health fent visitors to the Kingdom of Chili, from whence they brought much Gold to himfelf, as they had done to his Father; in which Travels he spent four Yeas and then resided two Years in Coeco. After which he raised fifty thousand Sol diers out of the Division of Chinchasigu, which is to the North of Cozco, commanders out of the Division of Chinchasigu, ding them to make their Rendezvous on the Frontiers of Tumpiz, whilst hein Person descended into the Plains, to visit the Temples of the Sun, of which that were many of great Devotion in those parts. In the first place he went to the rich Temple of Pachacamac, whom they adored for the unknown God; and there commanding the Priefts to confult the Oracle, who was the Devil, concerning the happiness of his Successes, answer was made, that he should proceed in his Pater prifes, for he should be prosperous in them, and in all others that he should un dertake; for that he was chosen for supreme Lord of all the four Quarters of the World. Hence he passed to the Valley of Rimac, where that famous prating Idol was feated, the which he confulted in compliance with the Capitulations which his Great-grandfather had made with the Tuncas, of which one was, that that idd should be always conferved by him in great veneration, and having received his Answer, which was full of Ambiguities and Flatteries, he proceeded forward to the Vallies which border upon Tumpie; where being arrived, he diffratched his accustomary Summons of Peace and War to the Inhabitants of the Island of Puna: not far diffant from the Main Land is a fruitfull foil abounding with all things nereffary for humane Life. This Ifle contains about twelve Leagues in compassion the Lord of which was by Name Tumpalla, one of a proud and haughty Spirits for having neither by himself nor Ancestours acknowledged any Superiour, they domineered over their Neighbours, and thereby being at discord amongst themfelves, were the less able to make head or relistence against the Inca. Moreover this Tumpalla was vitious and luxurious in his Manners, and Way of living, for he kept many Wives, and Boys used after the fashion of Sodomites: they farefificed the Bloud and Hearts of Men to their Gods; which were Tigers and Lions, and the Fish of that Coast, which, because they yielded them Food in great abundance, were by them, as well as by the common Indians, adored for Deities. These People, when they heard the Summons of the Incu, were greatly furnised and troubled; to which, that they might return their Answer, Tumpalla affembled the principal Persons of his Island, and then with great sorrow declared unto them, faving, Here now appears at the Gates of our Honfes a certain Tyrant, who threatens to take from us all our Goods and Estates, and to destroy us all, unless we readily receive him for our Lord and Mafter; and now in case we should admit him, we must renounce our ancient Liberty, our Command and Principality, which for many Ages hath defeended to us from our Ancestours. Nor is this all, for this Foreigner not trusting to our Words and Fidelity, will compell us to labour, and creek Towers and Fortreffes, and having out Garrisons into them will force us to maintain the Charge and Expence, that so we may were he in any capacity of recovering our Liberty. He will moreover feize upon the best dour Pollellions, and take from us our Wives and Children, and the most beautifull of our Daughters; and what is most grievous, he will abolish our Laws, and ancient Customs, and in the place thereof impose new ones upon us, making us worship strange Gods, and throw down our own, with which we have been acquainted; and in short, live after their manner and pleasure, which is the worst of servitudes. Which being certainly our Case, Ileave it to you to consider, whether we had not better die, than be enslaved, desiring you to consult and advise me what course is best to be taken in this exigence.

The Indians hereupon debating the matter amongst themselves, did greatly bewail their own weakness and inability to relift so powerfull a Tyrant; and that the correspondence between them and their Neighbours being very ill, there was no hopes of making a firm and faithfull Confederacy with them; in confideration of which having no prospect of defending themselves, and that their resistence would produce nothing but Ruine and Destruction, they concluded at last, that the less evil was to be chosen, which was to submit to the Inca; and to make a Vertue of Necessity, to differable a ready Obedience until opportunity presented. which might acquit them of their fervitude. On this Resolution Tumpalla did not onely render a very favourable and gentle Answer to the Messengers fent by the Inca, but also dispeeded Ambassadours in his own Name, and in behalf of all his Dominions, to him with prefents, humbly offering himfelf, and all his People, to his Obedience; befeeching him to grace that Ifland, and his new Vaffals, with the favour of his Royal Prefence, which would be the greatest felicity that they could expect or imagine.

The Inca grationfly receiving this Address of Tumpalla, ordered conveniences to he provided for paffing his Army into the Island, that he might take possession of the Countrey; all which being prepared with great punctuality, and in such manner as the thortness of the time would permit, though not with such Pomp and Oftentation as Tumpalla did defire, the Inca passed into the Island, where he was received with Featting, and Dancing, and new Songs, purposely composed in Praise and Honour of Huayna Capac, and his mighty Actions. His Lodgings were provided in a new Palace, lately built, for the Inca was not to fleep in such a provided in a new Palace, lately built, for the loca was not to neep in men a Chamber where any other Person had reposed. The loca remaining here for some days, employed himself in giving out necessary Orders for the Government, by Laws, and the Institution of his Religion, commanding the Inhabitants thereof, and all the Neighbours of the Main Land, bordering thereabouts, which consisted of divers Nations and Languages, that leaving the Worthip of their former Gods, they should forbear to facrifice the Bloud or Flesh of Men, nor eat it, nor commit any other wickedness of this nature; but that they should adore the Sun for their universal God, and live amongst Mankind with Justice and Reson. All which the Inca, whose Father was the Sun, pronounced, as Legislaw of that great Empire, from whose Words nothing was to be subtracted a diminished upon pain of Death. To which Tumpalla and his People answered, that they would comply with whatsoever the Inca should please to enjoin them.

The Solemnity of the Festival being past, which was provided for the more decent reception of the Inca, the Curacas had time to think upon what they led done, and considering more maturely of the rigour of the new Laws imposed upon them, and how contrary they were to their ancient Customs, and restrictive of those Pastimes and Divertisements they formerly enjoyed, they began already effects a foreign Subjection grievous unto them; and so being desirous to their old bestrality, the Islanders and their Neighbours conspired together to kill the Inca, and all his Army, in a treacherous manner, when the first occasion should occur. To which end they consulted their Gods, privately restorated the late aftions offered them for their Revolt and Desertion, they sacrificed to them, demanding their Counsel and Advice, whether the Enterprise they had now designed should be successfull and prosperous, or not: To this demander Devil gave them this Answer, That they should go on and be prosperous. Which these Salvages became so proud and consident, that they had immediately proceeded to the Execution of it, had they not been distinated by their Magician and Diviners, who advised them to have patience for a while, for that the Gods were willing to desert the Execution untill a better and more fecure opportunity.

CHAP. V.

The Islanders of Puna Massacre the People and Captains of Huaina Capac.

Hilft Huayna Capac was ordering and disposing Affairs for the better government of this People, and reducing them to a more political way of being, in the mean time the Guracas were meditating the manner how to execut their Treachery; an occasion for which seemed to offer it self, at the time when the Incas sending his Captains and Ministers with Commission and Instructions, to inform and teach the Nations of the Main-land the Laws, Doctrines, Outlons and Religion of the Incas, for he then withdrew his Forces from the Island, the Natives readily supplying Boats and Ferries to transport them into those parts which they were designed; which being performed, the Incas also returned to Tumpix, on other important occasions; for whereas these Princes employed the whole time to business for the better government of their People, they omitted nothing which might tend to their good, and to the happiness of their living, and their People.

So foon as the Inca was departed, his Captains and Officers prepared allo for their passage, ordering Boats and Ferries for their transportations, the which were provided by the Natives, in so simal a number, as were not sufficient to carry above half the People at a time, the which they purposely contrived, that had being on the Water, they might be able to mafter that Party, and execute their Defign, which was to kill them all: Wherefore one half being embarked together with their Luggage, or Baggage, which was great, for it appertained for the most part to Inoge of the Bloud, who were near the Person of the King, and therefore carried many changes of Apparel with them, which were very fine: These Traitors which conducted the Boats being come to such a place of the Sea, where they had designed to execute their Treachery, cut the Cords and Ropes which bound the Timbers and Planks of the Boats together, which carried the beca, with which all the Captains and Souldiers being plunged in the Sea, the Affaffmares took up the Oars, and the Arms belonging to them, and therewith knocked them on the Head, not fuffering one of them to escape with his Life. And though some of them endeavoured to save themselves by swimming, for most of the Indians are very expert in that Art, yet it availed them little, for they were not suffered to come ashore by the People of the Coast, who preyed upon them in fuch manner, as the Maritime Creatures do upon those of the Land. In this manner these Islanders having gained their Victory, and made themselves Masters of the Spoils, which were very great, they with much Joy and Triumbh falued one the other from Boat to Boat, applauding the contrivance and fuccess of their Design, with which they were so elevated, being an ignorant and sottlish People, that they believed they had now not onely fecured their Liberty, but were able also to make themselves Masters of the Empire. With this vain opinion they returned to the Island, and with like Dissimulation and Wickedness of Intention, took aboard the refidue of the Captains and Souldiers, which remained for the fecond adventure, whom having brought to the fame place where the former Villany was perpetrated, they acted the like on them; and then returning home, they completed their Villany, by putting all the Governours and Mini-flers to death, whom the 1964 had left to doe Justice, and to oversee the Revenue belonging to the Sun, and to the Inca, the which they acted with incomparable Cruelty and Disdain of the Royal Person of the Inca, placing the Heads of the murthered at the Gates of their Temples, and facrificing their Hearts and Bloud to their Idols, complying hereby with the Vows they had made to their Spirits and Devils, in case they would favour and prosper their Attempt.

CHAP. VI.

Of the Punishment which was inflicted upon these faithless Rebels."

THE fad news of this unhappy fuccess being made known to Huayna Capac, he received it with as deep a sense of trouble, as the loss of so many Incas of the Bloud Royal, and of Men experienced in War and Peace did require, condoling much that their Bodies should be cast into the Sea, to be the Food and Prey of Fish; for which being sull of sorrow, he put himself into mourning Weeds, which amongst them is a Clothing of a greyish colour, called Vellori. But the Anger and Indignation of the Incas soon overcame his sorrow, for having affembled his People together, and provided all things necessary, he with the greatest Expedition imaginable passed into the rebellious Provinces upon the Main-land, and with great facility subjected the Inhabitants, who were a silly people, without Counsel, Policy, or Military Art, whereby to defend themicleyes,

From the Subjection of these people on the Main, the Inca passed into the Island. in his way whereunto he encountred a flight resistence on the Sea, but 6 filland, in his way whereunto he encountred a right reintence on the Sea, but so inconsiderable and weak, that the Enemy was immediately overcome, and yielded to Mercy. Whereupon the hote commanded all the principal Authours and Comfellours of this Design, together with the Captains, and Souldiers of chiefest note, who were in any wise concerned in this Treason, to be seized, and brought before his Tribunal of Justice; to whom one of the Generals made a gave Speech, representing to them the deformity of their Wickedness, aggravant with all the black circumstances that were possible; for that whilst the Inca wa studying their good, and endeavouring to reclaim them from their bestial and brutish Life, that they might enjoy a condition more agreeable to a rational Reorutin Life, that they might enjoy a condition more agreeador to a rational Being; that then they were contriving to disappoint his good Intentions by the worst and soulest Cruelties: Wherefore since Justice was to be performed, and that the Inca could not exercise that Clemency and Compassion which was natural to his Temper, they were to prepare themselves to receive a punishment agreeable to their demerit; upon which Sentence being passed, it was executed with divers forts of Death, according as the Inca directed; that it might have some conformity to that kind of Cruelty which they acted on the people of the Inca. they threw some into the Sea, with great weights to fink them to the bottom; other they ran through the Body with their Lances, and pitched them on Spears before the Gates of their Temples; others were quartered after their Throats were cut others they killed with their own Weapons, and others were hanged. Pedro be Cieça having at large described the particulars of this Rebellion, and the Revenue of it, writes afterwards these Words. "In this manner many thousands of his were killed and destroyed with different forts of death; the principal Ledit ders of which Councils were either drowned or empaled. And after Hungai Capute had done Justice upon these Offenders, he commanded that this diffinal from should be made the Subject of those Songs which were to be recited on their days, and times of Calamity, which they in dolefull Ditties composed in their Language and Proprieties of their Countrey. After which the hea at: tempted to make a Causey over the River Guayaquile, which certainly wasa great and magnificent work, according to those remains which to this day appear of it; but it was never finished according to the manner that he designed, being called to this day the Pass of Guayna Capa; all which being performed, " commands were given to obey the Governour who refided in the Fortreß of "Tumbez, with other matters relating to Government; and so the Inca departed from those Quarters. Thus far are the Words of Pedro de Cieça.

CHAP. VII.

Of the Mutiny which arose amongst the Chachapuyas, and the Valour of Huayna Capac.

WHilft the King Huayna Capac was preparing for his return to Cozco, and to vifit feveral Kingdoms in his way, many Caciques, or Lords of those Provinces adjoining to the Goast, which were reduced to the Obedience of the Empire, presented themselves with such Gifts and Offerings as their Countries afforded; amongst which they brought a Lion and a Tyger, both Creatures most fierce in their Nature, and which the Inca very much esteeming, gave order that they should be kept and nourished with singular care; by which Creatures God was pleased to work so great a Miracle in favour of the Christians, (as we shall hereafter relate) that they were adored by the Indians for it, and esteemed like their Incas for Children of the Sun.

The Inca Huayna Capac having provided all things necessary for government of Affairs both in War and Peace, departed from Tumpiz, intending in his Journey to visit one half of his Kingdom in length, as far as the Chicas, which is the ultimate Confines of Peru, and then taking a compals to visit the other half, which lies to the Eastward. And being in the Country of the Chichas, he employed and substituted certain Visitors to survey the Kingdom of Tucma, called by the Spaniards Tucuman, and others to visit Chile; and with them he sent many Vestments, of fuch fort as the Inca himself wore, and other Curiofities for the Goverments, of the forms the mean influent wore, and other Chronites for the Governours, Captains, and other Ministers of the King; as also for the Chrones, who were Natives of those Countries, that to they might in the Name of the mean oblige them with those Presents which were highly esteemed. In his Journey from Caeco, and his return thicher, he visited the Fortress, which was then almost finished, and the better to give Life and Encouragement to the chief Architects, and Labourers in the Work, he himself would lay his own hand to some part of the Edifice. This Visitation or Progress being made, in which four Years were spent, he commanded Souldiers to be levied, for the farther Conquest of Tumpie to the Northward, where it stretches it self along the Sea-Coast; and whilst he resided in the Province of the Cannaris, which was the way, as he thought, that did lead to Quin, that he might the better descend for Conquest of that Coast, News was brought to him, that the Inhabitants of the great Province of Chachapyar, feeing him engaged in Wars and Conquelts of great importance, took that opportunity to make a Rebellion; and confiding in the fathness of their craggy and mountainous Countrey, and in the numbers of their People, which were sturdy and flout, had made a general Massacre of all the Governours and Captains, and many of the Souldiery, which the Inca had appointed to prefide over them; and fuch of the Souldiers, whom they had spared, they made Slaves to serve them in the basest Drudgeries, and meanest Offices. So soon as this Intelligence was brought to the ears of Huayna Capac, with great anger and disdain, he countermanded all his Troops from their march on the Sea-coast, and appointed them to bend their course towards the Chachapuyas, resolving to punish them with the extremity of fevere Justice; and he in person went to the place which he had appointed for the general Rendezvous; and whilft his Army was gathering into a Body; he fent his Summons to the Chachapayas, requiring them to return to their Obedience, and declaring pardon to all such as thould voluntarily submit themselves: but these brutish people instead of returning a submissive and penitent Antiver, treated the Messengers with indignities and opprobrious words, threatning them with Death, if they did not immediately depart; the which rude treatment the Inca highly refenting, made all the speed imaginable to unite his Forces, and having affembled and fitted his Army, he marched to a great River, where they found many Boats made of a fort of light and boyant Timber, which in the common Language of Peru are called Chuchau.

The Inca confidering that it was neither honourable, nor decent for his Person nor People, to pass over the water in companies of five or fix in a Boat, comman ded that all these Boats should be joined together, and linked one to one, by which means the Army might march over them in a more compact and conjoined Body as over a Bridge, the which was ordered with fo much Art and industry, that the Inca and his Army vaffed the Water in one days time; and then with all expedi tion marched in Battalia towards Cassa Marquilla, which is the principal Province of that people, intending to destroy and consume all before him; for as this Prince availed himself much in being esteemed gentle, and gratious towards his good and Joyal Subjects, so he defired no less to render himself terrible to Rebel Traitors, and Falfifiers of their Word.

These Rebels being sensible of the just Anger of the Inca, and the power of his Army, and the punishment of their crime, which they too late repented; and all fo confidering the rude and brutish terms and treatment they had used towards the Messengers, which brought the late Summons from the Inca, with which do Dwellings, and with their Wives and Children, and fuch as were able to fee unto the Mountains. Howfoever the old people and infirm remaining behind, and being of more experience, and more confiderate than the others, recalled to mind the late generofity of this Huayna Capac, and the affurances they had, that he would never refuse the Instances and Requests made him by a Woman, did there fore address themselves to a certain Matron, named Chachapuya, a Native of Cali Marquilla, who had formerly been the Wife of Tupac Inca Yupangui the Great, be feeching her that the would with all the Prayers and Tears the was able, enderyour to divert the prefent danger, and appeale the Wrath of the Inca, perfunding him notwithfranding the late provocations, to receive the people to pardon and mercy, without which there could be no hopes, or other expectation than a total ruine and defolation of that Province.

This Matron confidering her felf involved with the her family in fame Define tion, readily inclined to this good Office, and fo with Women of all Ages, with out admitting one man into their company, the went forth to meet the Inca, whom finding about two Leagues distant from Cassa Marquilla, she boldly prostrated by felf at his Feet, and with great presence of mind, expostulated in this manner with him: Sir, faid the, where is it you are going? Do not you confider, that full of Rage and ledignation you are going to destroy that Province which your good Father gained, and added to be Empire? Consider I befeech you, that you are proceeding against the Rules of that Cleman and Piety which are natural to you, and that you are going to execute that Defolation and Destruction in your anger, which you will repent with much remorfe, so soon as you return to your fober and natural temper. Reflect I befeech you on your Title of Huacchacuyac, while is a Lover of the Poor, and a Deliverer of the Distressed; the which generous Quality ya cannot exercise at a more scassonable time, when you may manifestly evidence to all the Wall the compassion you have for humane frailty. Remember, Sir, that your Father conqueredits People, which, though unworthy such a Patron, are yet your own, and therefore let not year Fury fo far transport you in the punishment of this People, and in the unprofitable effusion & their Blond, which may blemish your ancient Praises, and eclipse the bright character you have of being descended from the Sun your Father. Consider that how much the greater the crime is which you pardon, fo much the more will your Clemency and Piety bee exalted and admired, and the memory of your Ancestours be rendred more Pretious and glorious by the proof and exercise of this Vertue, which they have derived unto you. It herefore my Petitus is, that you would vouchfafe to receive this People unto pardon; and if not, that at last fince I am a Native of this Province, you would went your Anger and Revenge first upon mi, and thereby doe me that grace and favour, that I may not live to behold the entire Defired tion of my People. The Matron having uttered these Words, was filent, and then all the other Women, that were with her, lifted up their Voices and Cries, repeating often the Titles of the Inca, faying, O thou Child of the Sun, thou Lover of the Diffressed, thou Great Huaina Capac, have pity on us, and pardon our Fathers, our Husbands, our Brothers and our Children.

The Inca herewith was ftruck dumb for a while, confidering the Reafons which Mamacuna had given him, which being feconded by the Cries, and Tears, and Sighs of the Indian Women, the Anger of the Inca began to moderate and affuage, with which going towards his Mother-in-law, he raifed her from the ground : and then faid to her. Well dost thou deserve to be called Mamanchic, or the common Mother (he would have faid the Mother of me, and thy people) fince thou haft been to provident, as to forefee the Mileries which were coming, and to provide that remedy against them, which was agreeable to my Honour, and the Glory of my Father's Memory : For which I most heartily thank thee, being assured, that in case I had given way to my rage. I had to morrow repeated the actions of this day. Well half thou performed the office of a Mother towards the people, in redeeming their lives from destruction; in which, since thou half been to faccessfull, whatfoever thou half defired of me, thall be accomplished; and consider, if there be any thing elle which thou wouldst require of me, return therefore with happiness to thy people; pardon them in my name, and offer them what other grace and favour thou feelt convenient : And for the better assurance of this my pardon, take with thee the four Incas, who are your Sons, and my Brothers, without other attendance than their own Menial Servants, to whom I shall give no other Commission, than onely to settle them in peace under a good and wholsome Government. Which being said, the Inca returned with his whole Army, commanding them to march along the Coast in profecution of his

The Chachapuyas by this grations Act of Clemency being convinced of their errour, became afterwards most loyal Subjects to the Inca; and in remembrance and gratitude for fuch high and fublime generofity, they hallowed and effective that place Sacred where this discourse had passed between the Inca and his Motherin-law, fencing it about, that for ever after, neither Man, nor Beaft, nor vet the Fowls of the Air, should fet their foot, or tread that Sacred place: For fecurity of which they encompassed it about with three Walls; the first was of Stone rarely polified, with all its Cornifies; the fecond was of rough and ruffick Stone, for better fecurity of that within; and the third was of Clay, or Sun-burnt Bricks, for defence of the other two, being more exposed to the weather: Of which fome Reliques and Ruines still remain, and might have endured for many Ages, had not the Covetoulness of the New-come Guests overthrown those

Of the Gods, and Customs of the Nation of Manta; of their Subjestion; together with many other Barbarous Nations.

H Dayma Capac having fitted and prepared his Camp in order to the Conquest he had formerly defigned along the Sea-coast, he arrived at the Confines of that Province, which was called Manta, within the jurisdiction of which lyes that Harbour, which the Spaniards do now call Puerto Viejo, or the Old Haven: the rea-fon of which Name, we have already given, at the beginning of this Hiftory. The Natives of this Countrey, and all the Inhabitants for many the gues on the Sea-fule Northward, observed the same Customs, and the same Idolatrous Religion; Worthipping the Sea and Fifh, of which there was great abundance, ferving them both for food, and for Gods: They also adored Lions, and Tygers, and Serients of incredible bigness, and other creeping creatures, as they best fansied: But above all in the Valley of Manta, which was the Metropolis, or chief place of all that Country; they Worshipped an Emerald of a prodigious bigness, being not much less than the Egg of an Oftrich.

At their principal Festivals they exposed it to publick view, so that the Indians came far and near to Worthip it, and offer Sacrifices to it, bringing Prefents of leffer Emeralds; the Priests and the Cacique of Manta telling the people, that the Offerings of the leffer Emeralds, which were the Children and Off-fpring of this great One, were the most pleasing and acceptable Sacrifice that they could make to this Goddess; the which doctrine being inculcated into the people by the m verousness of the Priests, was the occasion that vast numbers of Emeralds were amaffed together in this place, where they were afterwards found by Don Pedra Ja Alvarado, and his Companions, of which Garcilafo de la Vega, my Mafter, was one when they were employed in the Conquelt of Peru: but they being unkilling Lapidaries, were of opinion, that these Stones, if they were true, and not Glife could never be broken; and therefore in the trial of them broke the greateff me of them with Hammers upon an Anvil: But the great one, which was their God defs, was conveyed away by the Indians in fuch manner, to foon as they under flood that the Spaniards had invaded their Countrey, that with all the diligence and menaces which could be used, it could never be recovered; as also other use and immense treasures which have been lost and embezled in that Countrey

Royal Commentaries.

The Natives of Manta, and the parts adjacent, and especially those that he along the Coast (though we must exempt the Serranos, who inhabit within the Land) did use and profess openly, and without shame, that abominable vice of Sodomy, and were more addicted to it than all the other Nations we have be fore mentioned, as guilty of this fin. Their Marriages were contracted one dition that the Parents and Friends of the Bridegroom should first enjoy the Bride before the Husband. Those which they took in the War they flead, and filling their Skins with Ashes, they hanged them up at the Gates of their Temples in fignal of Victory, or in the publick places where they danced.

To this people the Inca fent his accustomary Summons, requiring them either to submit themselves to his Empire, or prepare to defend themselves by Ams: But this people of Mana had a long time fince been well affured, that their force was not sufficient to result the power of the Inca, though they had been able to have made an Alliance with the neighbouring Nations; for confidering that the were a brutish fort of people, without Government, Ulnion, or Law, there was no possibility of reducing them within any terms of confederacy; and therefore they all with much facility submitted themselves to Huayna Capac. The Inca to ceived them very gratioufly, treating them with kindness and rewards; and he ving placed Officers and Governours over them, and Instructours to teach them their Religion, Laws and Customs, he proceeded afterwards in his Conquelt to another great Province called Caranque. In the parts adjacent there were many other Nations, all brutish, living without Law, Religion or Government. The Conquest of them was performed without any difficulty, for they never attempt ted to defend themselves; and if they had, it would have been to little purpole, being all of them, though united together, an unequal match for the power of the Inca. In the Subjection and disposal of these people, the same rules and methods were used, as with the former, over whom Governours and Instructours were less to prefide, that they might rule and teach them. Proceeding forward in the Conquests, they came at length to other Provinces more barbarous and fortilh that any as yet inhabiting along that Coast; for the Men and Women cut and stalks their faces with tharp flints, and moulded their Childrens heads into a deformed shape, different to what nature had given them: For so soon as their Infantsura born, they clapt a finooth Plate upon their foreheads, and another on the hink parts of the head; the which was straitned every day harder and harder, until they came to the Age of four or five years; by which time the head was grown broad on each fide, and confequently the forehead low, and the face contracted in the length. And to make themselves yet more deformed, they cut of the lit behind, and the the crown of the head, leaving onely locks on each fide; normed these locks of hair combed, or pleated, but frisled and frowted, to make this countenances yet more monftrous and deformed: their food was for the most part Fifh, (for Fifhery was their chief employment) likewife they are Herbs, and Roots, and fuch wild Fruits as the Woods produced; they went naked, and we hipped the Gods which their Neighbours adored. These Nations were called Apichiqui, Pichiqui, Sava, Pecllansimiqui, Pampabnaci, and the like. These peoples ing reduced, the Inca proceeded to another Nation, called Suramifu, and thento another named Pallan, which is fituated directly under the Equinoctial line; and these were yet more barbarous than the rest, for they owned no Gods, nor ed the thoughts of a God ever enter into their confideration; for they were not all ciated in any political communion, nor had they Houtes, but lived in hollow

Trees, which are very capacious in those Mountains; they had no propriety in Wives, nor Children, but mixed together as they cafually met, and uted Sodomy in an open manner: they knew not how to cultivate the Land, or doe any other thing which is conducing to humane life. Their Bodies were naked without any habit; their Lips they cut and flashed both within and without; their Faces they painted in four quarters, with divers colours; one part was yellow, another blew; another red, and another black, changing the colours as they thought fit: They never combed their heads, but fuffered their hairs to grow long and matted, being full of straw, or dust, or any thing that fell upon them; in short, they were worse than beafts. In the year 1560, when I went for Spain, I remember I faw some of these people at a place where we touched to take fresh water, and remained there for three or four days; and there these people came out to us in their Boats made of Rushes to trade with us, and fell us their great Fish, which they struck with their Fisgigs; which they performed with such dexterity, that the Spaniards took great pleasure to see them, and would bargain for them before they struck them: their price was made for Bisket and Fleft, for they had no value for Silver: their Privities they covered with leaves, or barks of Trees, not for the shame they had of them in the way of common modelty, but out of respect to the Spaniards in short, they were falvage and barbarous above imagination.

Royal Commentaries.

It is faid, when Huayna Capac observed the barrenness of those Countries, being nothing but Mountains; and the bestiality of that nasty people, which was so stupid, that he despaired of ever reducing them to a tolerable Oeconomy; that then he should say to his people, Come, and let us return again, for these descrive not the Honour of our Dominion. At which words the whole Army saced about, and returned, leaving the people of Passau in their ancient filthiness and brutality.

Of the Giants which were in that Countrey, and the de-Aruction of them.

BEfore we conclude our Hiftory relating to the affairs of this Countrey, we cannot omit one notable particular, which the Natives by tradition from their Forefathers have received, telling us of certain Giants which came to that Countrey by Sea, and landed at that Point, or Cape, which the Spaniards call St. Helen's, because they first discovered it upon that day; and though the Spanish Writers mention Giants, yet there is none who treats of them fo much at large as Pedro de Cieça doth, who took his information from the people of that Countrey, where these Giants resided, we shall make use of his Relation, and rehearse his words verbatim, as he fets them down; for though Joseph Acosta, and the Accountant-General Angultine de Carate touch those particulars; yet none describe them so much at large as Pedro de Cicçus, whose Words are these, in the 52d Chapter of his Book: "Seeing that there are many reports of Giants in Peru, which, according to common fame, landed at the Cape of St. Helen, which lyes near to Puerto Viejo; I have thought fit to declare my opinion in the case, without regard to the variety of common report, which often magnifies things above the truth. The Natives of this Countrey having received it by tradition from their Fathers, tell us, that many Ages paft, there was a fort of Men of an extraordinary fize, which arrived at that Countrey in great Junks; they were so large, that a Man of our ordinary flature reached but to their knees; and that their bodies being proportionable thereunto, (as we may measure the body of Heren-"les by his foot) were strange monsters to behold: their Heads were great, covered with long hair hanging to their shoulders; their Eyes were as big as Sau-Aaaa cers; they had no Beards; some of them were cloathed with the Skins of Beafts, others were naked, and without other covering than long hair, which nature had given them. They brought no Women with them, but being actived at this Point, they landed, and seated themselves in the manner of people under Government, of which there remain some Ruines to this day: But integrared they sound no water, they set themselves to make Wells, which they die ged out of the hard living Rock, so that they may continue for many lags, and which speak the great and mighty strength of those robustious Men; and being very deep, they yield a most sweet and pleasant water, very cool, and wholsome to drink.

These great Giants, or over-grown Men, having seated themselves, and pro. vided Cifterns for their Drink, the next thing was to make a fufficient provi fion for their Victuals; for they had already almost consumed the whole Colle. trev; for one of these great Men was able to eat as much as fifty of those ordi nary people, that were Natives of the place; fo that food beginning to want they supplied themselves from the great quantities of Fish, which they took from the Sea, which yielded to them in great abundance. They lived with great abhorrence, and in ill correspondence with the people of the Countrey, for their Women, they could not use without killing them; and the Native, so " that and other causes, as much detested them; but being weaker than they, the " Indians durst not attempt, or affault them, though they often entertained Con-"fultations in what manner to take advantages upon them. Some years being passed, since these Giants resided in those parts, and having no Women firm them, with whom to couple for propagation of their race, their numbers began to diminish; and wanting the natural use of Women, by the motion and instigation of the Devil, they burned in Lust one towards the other, and used Sodomy publickly in the face of God, and the Sun, without shame or research one to the other. The which abomination being detelfable in the fight of "God, as the Natives report, it pleased his Divine and pure Majesty to punish " this unnatural Sin, with a Judgment extraordinary, and agreeable to the enomity of it: For being one day all together conjoined in this deteftable Act, there iffued a dreadfull Fire from Heaven, with great noise and thunder; and imme diately an Angel proceeded from this flame with a glittering and flaming Sword, with which, at one blow, he killed them all; and then the Fire confumed them, leaving no more than their bones and skulls, which it pleafed God to fuffer a " reliques to remain for an everlasting Memorial of this Judgment. Thus much is the Relation of the Giants; the which we have ground to believe, because the bones of Men are found there of an incredible bigness; and I have heard spain ards fay, that they have feen the piece of one hollow Tooth to weigh above half a pound of the Butcher's weight; and that they had feen one of the Shankboos of an incredible length and bigness: besides which evidences, their Wells and Cisterns are clear testimonies of the places of their habitation. But as to the parts from whence they came, I am not able to render any account.

In the year 1550, being in the City de los Reyes, when Don Antonio de Mendaça was Vice-king, and Governour of New Spain, there were certain bones of Mendigged up, which were of Giants, or Men of an extraordinary proportion; and I have heard also that at Mexico there were bones digged out of a Sepulchre, which for being of an extraordinary fize, might be the bones of Giants: By which testimony of so many persons, it plainly appears, that there were Giants, and those bones might be the reliques of those mighty Men, of which we have already stocken.

At this Cape of St. Helena, (which as I have faid is upon the Coaft of Pen, and bordering near to Puerto Viejo) there is one thing very confiderable, and that is a Mine, or Spring of Tar, of fuch excellent quality, and which iffues in that plenty, as may ferve to Tar a whole Fleet of Ships. Thus far are the Words of Pedro de Cieça, which we have faithfully transcribed out of his History, to shew the Tradition which the Indians have of these Giants; and the Spring of Tar which ifsues out about that place, which is a matter also very observable.

Of the Words which Huayna Capac uttered relating to the Sun.

THE King Huayna Capac (as we have faid) commanded his Army to return from the Province called Paffau, the which he made his extreme and frontier Countrey to the Northward; which having done, he returned again to Cozco, vifiting his Provinces in the way, doing them all the favours he was able, and administring Justice to those which did demand it of him.

Returning at length to Cozco, after this long Journey of some years, he arrived there about the time that the principal Feast of the Sun was to be celebrated, called Raymi. And the Indians tell us a story, that upon one day of the nine, that this Festival continued, the Inca took a liberty to fix his eyes upon the Sun, which was a freedom yet unknown, and esteemed a prophanation so to doe, or to behold the circle wherein he moved; on which object, whilst for sometime he continued his sight, the High Priest, who was one of his Uncles, and stood next to him, said, Inca, what is it you doe? know you not that this is not lawful?

Hereat the King withdrew his Eyes for awhile, but prefently after lifting them up again, fixed them upon the Sun; which the High Priest observing, reproved him for it, and told him, Sir, confider what it is you doe, for you not onely doe an action which is unlawfull in it felf, but you give ill example and scandal to all your Court. and the people of your Dominions, who are here present to perform that venerable adoration which they owe to your Father, as their sole and supreme Lord. Hereupon Huayna Capae turning to the High Prieft, told him, that he would ask him two Questions, which he required him to make answer unto: I being (faid he) your King and universal Lord; is there any of you so bold as to command me for your pleasure to arise from my feat, and take a fourney to those parts whereunto you shall direct me? How, replied the High Priest. can any person be so impudent and daring? Is there any Curaca ( said the Inca) the most rich and powerfull of all my Subjects, who will adventure to disober my Commands, in case I should dispeed him post from hence into the most remote parts of Chili? No, replied the High Priest, there cannot certainly be any who dares to disobey you, or refuse your commands even to death. Then (faid the King) if it be fo, there must be some other whom Our Father the Sun takes and esteems for a more supreme, and more powerfull Lord than himself; by whose Commands he every day measures the compass of the Heavens, without any intermission, or hour of repose; for if he were absolute, and at his own disposal, he would certainly allot himself some time of cessation, though it were onely to please his own humour and fancy, without other consideration than that of liberty and change. For this Speech and others of the like nature, which the Indians reported of this Prince, the Spaniards conceived fo great an opinion of his judgment and understanding, that they believed the fubtility of his wir would very eafily have comprehended, and given admission to the Doctrines of the Catholick Faith. A certain Spanish Captain, who might have heard this Story of Huayna Capae, for it was commonly discoursed in Pern, did make himself the Authour of this Saying, and recounted it to Acosta for his own. This Acofta, in the fifth Book of his History of the New World, mentions this particular Saying, which is attributed to Huayna Capac, but names not the person by whom it was uttered: but reports, "That there was a certain Inca, a person of a subtile wit, and refined understanding, who observing how his Ancestours had always adored the Sun for a God, seemed to wonder at it, and faid, that it was impossible for the Sun to be God. For God was certainly a great Lord, who formed and acted all his matters with quiet and fettlement; but that the Sun was a thing always in motion, which was contrary to the unalterable Being of God: His reason was admirably good and sound; and such as being well explained to the Indians, might effectually have convinced them of their errours and follies. Thus far are the Words of Acofta; with which he concludes that Chapter. The Indians, who were very fuperfittious and ferupulous in their Idolatry, interpreted this unpractifed liberty which Huayna Capac took in beholding the Sun, to be an ill Omen of Iome unhappy fuccefs. But this conceit concerning the Nature of the Sun, was not (as I hear) primarily to be attributed to Huayna Capac, but that he received it first from his Pather Tupac Inca Tupangui, who uttered fomething of the like nature.

CHAP. XI.

Of the Rebellion of the Caranques, and their Punishment for it.

THE Inca Huayna Capac taking his Circuit through the feveral Provinces of his Empire, which was the laft Journey he made; news was brought him, that the Province of Caranque, which was one (as we have faid) that was the latest conquered in the utmost Confines of Peru, was risen into rebellion; for being a fort of barbarous and cruel people, fuch as offered the bloud, and heads, and hearts of Men, whom they had killed, in facrifice to their Gods, and ate Man's fleil ; for not being able to bear the Laws of reason and good manners, which were given them, especially that which forbad the eating of Humane flesh, they had joined with the neighbouring Countries in Alliance and League, intending to make a general Infurrection: For this reason they held many secret Meetings, and gathered people to surprize and kill the Governours and Ministers of the Inca, together with the Souldiers and Garrisons which were set over them: And whilst matters were thus preparing for execution of their delign at the time appointed, they diffembled their submiffion and treachery with the greatest demonstrations of fidelity and kindness imaginable, that the Incus being thereby become more confifidelity and kindnefs imaginable, that the Incas being thereby become more condent of their Loyalty, they might with the more facility, and lefs danger, find an opportunity to cut their throats. The Plot being laid, and the time come for the execution of it, they without any remorfe killed all the Incas, and others which prefided over them, offering their heads, hearts and bloud to their Gods in factifice, by way of acknowledgment for being freed from their fibjection to the Incas. They then devoured their flesh, and drank their bloud with much greedinefs, for being debarred for fome time from that food, they longed for it; and partly in revenge, and partly from a voracious appetite thereunto, they are with fpight, fatisfying both their palate and their anger. The advice of which being come to Huayna Capac, he was greatly troubled, and immediately diffeeded away his Captains with an Army to execute justice for this great offence, whilst he in person kept at some distance, observing the success of this affair: The Captains perion kept at tone diffrance, concluding the tector of the accordingly invefted the Caranques; but first, according to their usual cultome, they fent Propositions of Peace and Amnetty, in case they would return to obedience and submission of the Inca. But these barbarous Rebels were so far from accepting these terms, that they impudently rejected, and scorned them; and so ill treated the Messengers, that they hardly escaped from their hands. Of which Huayna Capae being informed, he refolved personally to assail them with his whole Army, putting all to fire and fword before him. The Rebels fought with great obfinacy, and the Incas honourably acquitted themselves to revenge the affiont to their King; fo that on one fide and the other many thousands were flain: But whereas the power of the Inca was, as to that people, invincible; they in a short time began to abate in their courage and hopes; so that not daring to fight in the open Plains, they betook themselves to the Woods and Mountains, and to defend themselves in difficult passes. But such was the Power and Military Discipline of the Incas, that they entirely defeated the Enemy, taking many thousands of then Prifoners; the most culpable of which, and the most active in this Rebellion, to the number of two thousand, part of which were Carangues, and part Allies with them, were put to death, having their throats cut within a Lake, and their bodies sunk into the deep; the waters of which being stained with the bloud, the Lake was for ever afterwards called Tabuarcecha, or the bloudy Sea, in a perpetual Memorial of this rebellious crime, and the punishment of it. Pedro de Cicca mentioning this particular, reports, that twenty thousand of them suffered this punishment; perhaps he means, that so many might be killed in this War on both sides.

Royal Commentaries.

The Inca Huspina Capac having executed this justice in the punishment of Rebels, departed for Lairu, being much troubled, that during his Reign, such enormous wickednesses should arise, which should require his extreme severity and rigour in the just punishment; being an action as much contrary to his natural inclination, as it was to the custome and practice of his Ancestours, who most availed themselves on the Titles of Pious and Mercifull: He was moreover much concerned, that these unhappy accidents should concur in his time, and not in the Reign of his Predecessor; having no example, or precedent of so much cruelty, unless it were in the case of the Charcas, which happened in the Reign of the Inca Virace-that. Perhaps the matter being well considered, it might be a fore-runner of that grand rebellion and desection, which was the destruction of the Empire, and ruine of the Bloud-Royal, as we shall now see in the sequel of this History.

CHAP. XII.

Huayna Capac makes his Son Atahualpa King of Quitu.

THE Inca Huayna Capac (as we have before noted) had by the Daughter of the King of Quitu, who was Heir to that Kingdom, a Son named Atahuby, who was a person of great understanding, and of a quick wit and apprehenfion; he was also of a subtile, jealous, and cautious temper, naturally courageous, and addicted to War, of a good shape, and gentile body, with a pleasant Air in his mouth, as have commonly all the Incas and Pallas, which are Ladies. These Endowments of mind and body were so pleasing to his Father, that he loved him entirely, and would have him always in company with him; and would have made him his fole Heir and Succeffour to his Empire, but that he could not difinherit his Eldest Son Huascar, who claimed by Right of Primogeniture a title to all the Estate and Empire of his Father: Howsoever, as to the Kingdom of Quiwhere feemed fome colour of justice to dissember it from the Empire, and confer it in right of his Mother on her Son Atabuaha, the which being the define and intention of Huayna Capac, he sent for the Prince Huasear, then at Cozco, to come to him, and in a sull Assembly of his Captains and Curacas, spake to his Empire Capacital Capaci legitimate Son and Heir in this manner: It is well known, Prince, that according to the ancient Custome and Canon of our Ancestours derived to us from our first Father Manco Capac, this Kingdom of Quitu belongs to your Crown and Inheritance; having ever been maintained for a rule unto this day, that whatfoever Kingdoms or Provinces have been conquered, have ever been annexed to the Imperial Crown, of which Cozco is the chief Cuy and Metropolis: But in regard I bear fo tender an affection towards your Brother Atahualpa, that it would grieve me much to fee him poor ; I could therefore with you would confent to part with the Kingdom of Quitu, that fo I might bellow it upon him; for though the Inheritance in right be yours, yet confidering that that Kingdom was the Patrimony of Conquest of many other Countries, which are adjacent to your Frantiers, and pay you for the release of this Kingdom by the acquisition of many more; which if you think fit to grant, I shall then depart with contentment out of this World, when I go to rest with our Father the Sun.

The Prince Hunsear answered his Father with a chearfull frankness, telling him that he was over-joyed of this opportunity, wherein he might demonstrate his readines to obey his Father the Inca, in any thing which he might esteem for his service; and that if it were necessary for the better accommodation of his Brother Androdya, that he should release other Provinces, provided it may be to give his Father satisfaction he would, esteeming nothing so dear and valuable as his pleasure and contentment.

Hungha Capac having received this obliging Answer from his Son Hunghar, gave him leave to return to Cozco, and then contrived the ways in what manner to lettle his Son Arabunipa in the Kingdom of Quitu, adding other Provinces to his Crovn and Dignity; he also bestowed upon him several of his Captains of best experience, and furnished him with part of his Army; and, in short, omitted nothing to render him great, though it were to the prejudice of the Prince, to whole right the whole Succession and Inheritance appertained: And being a most tender and indulgent Father; and passionate in the love of this Son, he designed to be an Assistant to him in the Administration of all the affairs of his Kingdom, during the time of his life: the which resolution was taken both out of care and favour to his Son, that so he might hay a good soundation to his Kingdom, and also that he might the better keep the new Conquests lately made upon the Sea-coast, and last and Countries, in subjection; for the people there being warlike, barbarous, and bestial, were ready upon all occassons to rebell, and rise in Arms against the Government of the Inca: For securing of which Peace, it was the custome and practice of the Inca: to transplant the people from one Province to another, which was an approved course to make them quiet and peaceable, and much more observant and submissive to their Kings, as we have at large discoursed in those places where we have treated of Colonies, called by them Mitmae.

Of the two famous and great Roads in Peru.

TT were but justice to the Life and Memory of Huayna Capac, if we mention those two great Roads which run North and South through the whole Kingdom of Peru, because the making of them is attributed unto him: One of them passes along by the Sea-coast, and the other over the Mountains to the Inland Countries, which Historians describe with high Enlargements, though, in reality, the work exceeds the common fame: And in regard I cannot pretend to lay them down with fuch exactness as some have done, I shall therefore refer my self to their Relations, and begin with Angustin Carate, who in the 13th Chapter of his first Book speaking of the Original of the Incar, hath these words: "In a due and orderly fuccession of these Incas, there was one called Guarnacava (which "fignifies a rich young Man) who came to the Government, and encreased, and greatly enlarged his Dominions; his butinets being chiefly to advance Juftice and Reafon, he fo far prevailed on the uncultivated understandings of that bar-" barous people, that he feemed to have worked Miracles in political converfa-"tion, having reduced them without the help of letters to Obedience and Rule. " and gained fo far on the affection of his Vaffals, that for his fervice they readily "applied their hands, and their hearts, to make and open a large Road in Peru, "which was fo famous, that we cannot in justice omit to mention, and describe "it, in regard that amongst the seven Wonders of the World, there was none "made at greater expense and labour than this. When this Guaynacava marched "with his Army from Cozeo to conquer the Province of Quin, which are about "five hundred Leagues diffant one from the other; he fuffered many difficulties " in his paffage, by reason of the inaccessible ways over Rocks and Mountains, "which he was to overcome: Howfoever, having paffed and subdued that "Countrey, and being now to return again victorious and triumphant, the Indians broke a convenient way through the Mountains, which they made both plain and wide, breaking the Rocks, and levelling the Ground which was ruff and uneven; so that sometimes they were forced to raise it sisteen or twenty fathom in height, and in other places to fink it as far; and in this manner they continued their work for five hundred Leagues in length. And it is reported, that when this work was finished, the way was so plain, that a Cart or "Coach might be driven over it; yet afterwards, in the time of the Wars, all this workmanship and labour was demolished by the Indians, to make the ways and paffes more difficult to the Christians. Now if we compare this work "with the short cut onely of two Leagues of Mountain, which is between Efpinar, Segovia, and Guadarrama in Spain, and confider what charge and labour hath been there employed, onely to make that way tolerably paffable for the "Kings of Caffile, when at any time they passed with their Equipage and Court from Andaluzia, or Toledo, and travelled into parts beyond those Mountains; which, as I fav. if it were confidered, what an immense and incredible work must this seem to have been? Nay farther, the Incas were not content with this, for this Guaynacava intending again to visit the Province of Quitu, for variety in his Travels, he refolved to take his paffage through the Plains, which the Indians, though with no less difficulty, made as convenient as that of the "Mountains; for in all those Vallies which were watered with Rivers and Fountains, and were planted with Trees, which (as we have faid elfewhere) did commonly continue for a full League, they made a way almost forty foot wide, with click Mud-walls on each fide, being four or five Frames, or Pannels, of this Mud in height. And then entring out of these Plains into the fandy ways, they drove in great Stakes into the ground on one fide and the other,

" that fo Travellers might not miftake their way, or wander either on one hand or the other; and in this manner all was ordered for the space of five hundred "Leagues, being the fame diffance as over the Mountains. But now the Stakes fixed in the fandy Grounds are in many parts broken, or plucked up by the Spaniards, who in the times, as well of War as Peace, made use of them for fuel; yet the Walls which are made in the Vallies remain entire unto this "day, by which we may conjecture and judge of the greatness of this work,
"And thus did this Guaynacava go by one way, and return by another, being al-" ways covered with Boughs of Trees, and entertained with the fragrant finells "of fiveet Flowers. Thus far are the Words of Angustin de Curate, Likewise Pedro de Cieça de Leon discoursing of this matter, and of the Road through the Mountains, bath these words in the 37th Chapter of his Book: From Thisles you travel to a small Province called Guaca, and in the way this ther you pass that famous Road which the Incas made in those parts, and may be compared to that which Hannibal made over the Alpes, when he marched in. " to Italy; and indeed, confidering the great Chambers and Store-houses which " were made in that way, it feems a more difficult, and a more admirable view

Of which Pedro de Cieça enlarges no farther; howfoever in the 60th Chapter of his Book, speaking of the Road over the Plains; he hath these words: That I may proceed in my History with due method, I have thought it re-" quifite, before I conclude, to mention fomething relating to the Road over the " Plains, which, as I have touched in other places, is a work of fingular remark "and importance: And therefore I must here denote something of that high Road over the Plains, half of which, at leaft, is a way made by order of the Ingus; the which, though now it is in many places broken down, and demolifted, yet the Ruines of it are durable evidences of the power of those who first commanded the same to be made. The Indians attribute this work to Guaymacapa, and Topa Tupa Tupanque his Father, who descended by these Vallies to the lower Provinces; though some report, that Inga Tupangue, the Grandfather of Guanacapa, and Father of Topa Toga, was the first who discovered that Coast, and passed those Plains unto it; and that the Caciques, or chief Governours of those parts, made the Road fifteen Foot broad by command and direction of that Inga: on each fide a very strong Wall was built, adjoyning to which, were fine groves of Trees planted; the Boughs of which did fometimes " reach over the way, being laden with Fruit; and the floor, or the way under " foot, was smooth and easie; the Woods and Forests all along were inhabited " by Singing-birds, Parrots, and Fowls of all forts.

And farther, this de Cieça treating of the Store-houses, and places of entertainment and provision, faith, "That these Walls reach all along the way, excepting onely those fandy defarts which could not bear a foundation: Howsoever, as proofs of the greatness of the Founders, and as figns and marks to direct Travellers, great Timbers, in the manner of Piles, were driven into the ground at fuch a space and distance as were easily seen front one to the other. And as they were very carefull to keep the ways in the Vallies clear, and the Walls in good repair; so also the like diligence was used to keep up the Posts or Stakes, in case any of them should be blown down by the Wind, or over-"turned by any other accident: So that this Road was certainly a great piece of Workmanship, though not so laborious in the making, as that of the Mountains. In these Vallies also there were some Fortresses and Temples of the "Sun, which we shall specifie in their due places. Thus far are the Words of Pearo de Cieça, which we have extracted verbatim.

Likewife John Botero Benes makes mention of these two Roads, and in his Obfervations denotes them for miraculous Works; and, in thort, fays thus much of them: " From the City of Cozco there are two great Roads, or King's High-" ways, running at least two thousand Miles in length, one of which goes by the " way of the Plains, and the other leads by the Mountains: And in making " these ways in the manner they now are, being twenty five Foot broad, it was " necessary to raise the Vallies, level the Mountains, and cut through the solid " and living Rocks; which is a Work fo great, as exceeds above any com-" parison, the Pyramids of Egypt, or the Roman Editices. All which is exmaded out of the Words of the three preceding Authours, who treat of these tracted one of which exalts their praises to fuch a degree, as molt pleases his fancy, though they all come short of that praise and admiration, mon please the defeathers of fo mighty a Work: For were there nothing which is the matter, than onely a continued distance of five hundred Leagues in length, it were much to be admired; but when we confider that this Road paffes over alcents on the Mountains of two, three, and four Leagues high; it is then fo france, that nothing feems to be comparable to it. Befides all which, we must note, that on the highest tops of the Hills, from whence was the best prospect, there were erected certain Lodges, or Houses of Pleasure, which were seated on each fide of the way, with Stone-stairs to go up to them, where the Chair-men which carried the Sedans did usually rest, and where the Incas did sit for some time taking the Air, and furveying in a most pleasant prospect all the high and lower parts of the Mountains, which wore their coverings of Snow, or on which the Snow was falling, which certainly was a most pleasant view; for from the the snow was failing, which certainly was a more predicting view; for nonly the tops of fome very high Mountains one might fee fixty, feventy, eighty, or an hundred Leagues round; in which variety of profpect the piques of fome very high Mountains were to be seen, that seemed to touch the Heavens, and other Chassins and Precipices so low and deep, as seemed to extend unto the centre of the Harth. Of all which Works, there is nothing remains but Ruines, and fuch as War and time have not been able to destroy. Onely in the Road by the Plains, and in the defarts of Sand, which are wide and vast, and where also are some Hills and Dales, there they have droven in their Piles, or Posts of Wood; which being placed in fight one of another, do serve for Marks to direct Travellers in their way, where there is no path, or beaten road, because it being all Sand, the track and footsteps are covered by the Sand so often as it is moved by the Wind: And therefore these Posts are so necessary to Travellers, as the Needle of the Compass is to direct a Ship through the floating Waves.

That Huayna Capac received News how the Spaniards failed along the Coast of Peru.

H Vayna Capac being bussed and employed in the forementioned affairs, and testiding in the Royal Palaces of Tunnipampa, which are the most Magnificant of any in Peru, advices were brought him, that some stranger Nations, never before seen in those Countries, sailed along that shore to make a discovery of the Land; upon which intelligence Huayna Capac was much surprized, entertaining new fears and jealoufies of an unknown people, of whom no account of their Nation, or the parts from whence they came could be given. But we are to note, that this Ship was Commanded by Basco Nunnez of Bilbo, who was the first that discovered the South-Sea, and the Seamen were Spaniards, who (as we have faid before) were the first that gave the Name of Peru unto this Empire, which happened in the year 1515, the discovery of which Countrey being two years before. There is an Hiltorian, who reports, that the Ship and Spaniards belonged to Don Francisco de Picarro, and his thirteen Companions, who were the first Discoverers of Peru; in which there was a militake between the first Discoverers, and the first Conquerours: There was also some errour as to the time, for there was filteen or fixteen years difference between one and the other; for the first discovery of Pern, and the Name given to it, happened in the year 1515; and the year when Francisco Picarro, and his four Brothers, with Don Diego de Almagro in-Vaded that Countrey was 1531, and Hanyon Capac died eight years before, being B b b 2 in the year 1523, after he had reigned forty two years, as is recorded by Rin V. lera, and found in his loofe and scattered Papers, wherein he writes as a curious Antiquary of the Original and Antiquity of those Kings.

Huavia Capac lived eight years after the News was brought him that the fire Discoverers of those Countries coasted along his shore; during which time he kept an extraordinary watch on the Coaft, and attended with greater care to prehere a restriction with the restriction of the rest thre and condition of that people, who in a Ship frequented and vilited his Ports ture and condition of that people, who in a Ship frequented and vitiged his Ports. And herein he was the more troubled upon remembrance of the Prophecy of an articient Oracle, which forefold them, that after fitch a Number of years, and after the Regin of 10 many Kings, there should arrive strange Nations, never before stern in those parts, who should take their Kingdom from them, and destroy their Government and Idolatrous Religion: the which Prophecy was fulfilled in this

Inca, as we shall see in the sequel of this History. And as a preparative hereunto, it happened out three years before this Ship was feen on the Coalt of Pern, that a prodigious and ominous fight appeared at Cocco, which greatly affected Hungna Capac, and aftonished all the Empire: the occasion was this: That whilst they were celebrating the solemn Festival, which was yearly dedicated to their God the Sun, a Royal Eagle (which they call Anca) was seen foaring in the Air, and purfued by five or fix Keltrels, and other Hobbies, and simaller Hawks; of which some, for the rarity of them, have been brought into imager Hawks; or which ione, for therathy of them, have been brought into Spain, where they are called Aleros, and in Peru Huaman; the which exchanging their blows and strokes on the Eagle, would not suffer him to escape in his slight, but killed him with the stutters of their wings. The Eagle not being able longer to defend it self; fell down in the middle of the Market place amongst the Incas, as if the had implored their defence and succour; and they willingly received her, and finding her body covered over with fourf, as with a feab, and plumed of all her finaller Feathers, nourished her with all the care imaginable; but nothing availing to doe her good, the died in a few days, not being able to raife her felf from the ground. The Inca and his Ministers judged this to be a bad Omen of what was to fucceed; and the Aftrologers and Diviners interpreted the matter to prefage no less than the destruction, and total ruine of their Empire and Religion; which also being followed by great Earthquakes in divers places, and such as were fo extraordinary and violent, as to overturn many high Mountains; the Prodigies feemed terrible, and fuch as were the certain fore-runners of difmal Judgments. The Indians also, who inhabited the Sea-coast, observed that the tides in their ebbines and flowings did not keep their usual course, nor did the waters contain themselves within their due bounds: Comets also, and strange Apparitions were feen in the Air; and to encrease this terrour, the Moon was observed in a clear and bright night to be encompassed with three large Haloes, or Circles; the first was of a bloudy colour; the fecond of a blackish, inclining to green; and the third was like a mift, or finoak. A certain Magician (whom the Indians call Llayer) having feen and confidered these prodigious Circles about the Moon, entred with a still and weeping countenance into the presence of Huayna Capac, and with tears in his eyes told him, and faid, To you alone, Sir, it appertains to know, that the Moon your Mother, as a pions and tender Parent, makes known unto you, that the Pachacamac, who is the Creatour and Sustainer of all things, doth threaten your Royal Family and Empire with grievous Judgments, which he designs to send upon your people: For the first blondy Circle propossioners; that after you are gone to rest with your Father the San, that them noss terms the design so you wan Line and Family, which will open so large an effusion of Royal Blond, as will be sufficient in a few years to extinguish your whole Race and Propens. Which having said, he let sall such a floud of tears, that he was careful or the said of tears, that he was not able farther to utter his words: But at length having a little recovered himfelf, he proceeded, and faid, The fecond Circle, which is black, threatens is your Subjetts with a total destruction and subversion of our Religion and Government, caused by the Wars and Diffentions of your own Family; and that then your Empire shall be alienated and translated to another people, and all your Greatness vanquish into smooth and vapour, which it the signification of the third Circle. The Inca was greatly assonished with this difinal Prediction; howfoever, not to show fear, and meanness of spirit, he bid the Magician begone, for thefe are (faid he) but your last nights Dreams, which thou declarest to me for Revelations and Advices from my Mother the Moon. No, faid the Magician, for that you may give better credence to my words, you may be pleased to come forth, and see the truth hereof testi-sied by your own Eyes; and then if you think sit, you may be pleased to take farther informaned by your own Lies, and then if you canned it, you may be presented to take survey information from the other Diviners, or Magicians, concerning these prodigious Apparitions. The tion from the other Diothers, or Pragatiums, concerning these productions Apparations. The Inca accordingly came forth from his Chamber, and having beheld these Signs in the Heavens, he called for all the Diviners and Prognosticators which he maintain ned in his Court; amongst which there being one of the Nation of Tauyu, who ned in its court, among twitter there being one of the Fadion of Panya, who was much effeemed above the reft, and that having beheld and confidered these Circles, gave the fame judgment thereupon as the former had done. Howfoever Hugga Capac, though he entertained fad apprehenfions and fears hereof within his own Breath, yet not to discourage his People, he seemed to make small account of own preatty yet not to uncourage in Feoples, he recentled to make than account of these affrighting Stories, telling the Magicians, that unless the Puchacamac himself should reveal the same to him by his own Words, he would not give credit to such Sayings, For is it possible, said he, that my Father the Sun should abhor and detest nuch ornings; for some populate, taked the, time my rather the own Blonds, and so far abandon them, as to yield them up to a total destruction? And so dishifted his Prognosticators. How so ever reflecting within hufflest upon what they had faid, and confidering how it agreed with the Prophecies of an ancient Oracle. and comparing past things with the prodigious Novelties of the present times, which appeared and shewed themselves in every Element; as also the Ship which filed along the Goaft, with a fort of People never before feen in those Seas; all there things being taken together, did greatly move and diffurb the Mind of Huand Capac with inward fear and apprehention; for which reason he always kept an Army in a readiness, composed of his most experienced Souldiers and Officers, which he drew out from the Garrifons of those Provinces. He ordained also that many Sacrifices should be offered to the Sun, and that all the Diviners and Magicians in their respective Provinces should consult their familiar Demons, and particularly the great Pachacamac, and the prating Devil of Rimac, who always gave answers to all demands; and to enquire and know of them whether those strange and new Apparitions in the Heavens, and in the Sea, did portend either good or evil to the Empire. The Answers from Rimac were so dubious and obscure, that they could not promife themselves any great good, nor yet did they seem to prognoflicate any affrighting evil. Howfoever all the Diviners prefaging nothing but ill, the whole Empire remained in terrour and fear of some approaching mischief and calamity, yet in regard no confiderable misfortune befell that people for the face of three or four Years, the remembrance thereof began to wear out, every one returning to his usual quietness, and setled way of living, in which they continued for several Years, untill the death of Huayna Capac. The relations of these Prognoflications which we have mentioned, were, besides the common report, delivered particularly by two Captains, who had formerly been of the Guard to Huanna Capac, and being each of them of the age of eighty years, were both baptized; the eldest of them was called John Pechuta, his own Name remaining for a funame after Baptifin, as was common to the Indians; the other was called Chau-ca Rimachi, but his Christian Name I have forgot: These Captains, when they related the stories of these unhappy presages, with the successes of those times, they would always burst into Tears; so that it was necessary to divert them with fome other Discourse, before they would cease their Tears and Lamentations. The Testament and Death of Huayna Capac, with many other particulars which afterwards succeeded, were delivered to us by an old Inca, whose Name was Cust Huallya; but the cruelties which Atahualpa exercised upon all those of the Blond Royal, I received from the relation of my own Mother, and her Brother, who was called Don Fernando Hualipa Tupac Inca Tupanqui, who were in those days, both of them Children of ten Years of age, and lived in the fury and rage of all those troubles which continued for the space of two years and a half, untill such time as the Spamiards invaded that Countrey, as we shall relate in its due place, together with the manner how they, with fome few others of the Royal Bloud, escaped from death, which Atabualpa had defigned for them, which turned greatly to the advantage of the Enemy.

CHAP. XV.

Of the Testament and Death of Huayna Capac; and the Prophecy concerning the Invasion made by the Spaniards.

Lagra Capac residing in his Kingdom of Quitu, an humour took him in one of the last they sof his Life, to wash and bath himself in a certain Lake, onely to please and recreate himself: so soon as he came out from the Water he was taken with a cold, and shivering, (which the Indians call Chucen.) which was followed by a hot sit of a Fever; after which finding himself every day to grow worse and worse, he apprehended he should die; the which he strongly sansed from a remembrance of certain Prognosticks, which had some years before been delivered in reference thereunto; in which the Indians are very superstitious, especially in those which relate to the Royal Person of the King, which the Indians can be caused the reputation of their Idolatry call Revelations from their Father the Sun.

the reputation of their Idolatry call Revelations from their Father the Sun. Befides these various Prognosticks and Sayings delivered by their Oracles, many affrighting Comets appeared in the Air, and amongst the rest one with extraordinary Rays, of a greenish colour, very terrible to behold; and moreover a Thunderbolt sell in the Palace of the Inca himself; all which strange and ominous matters being put together, did greatly trouble and puzle the Wisedom and Art of their Magicians and Philosophers, called Inauma, who were the Sages and Priest of that Religion, who being also conversant with familiar Spirits, presaged the death of Islama Capac, with the destruction of the Royal Family, and the total Ruine and Downsall of the Empire, with many other dismal Calamities and Missortunes, which their Nations in general, and every one in particular was to sustain; howsoever these statal Stories were not vulgarly published, less they should dismay and terrifie their people with utmost despair, who were naturally supersitions, and of a melancholy tempers, ant to receive impressions of this nature.

fummoned all his Sons and Relations, with the Governours and Captains of the neighbouring parts to come to him, and declared to them, That he was then going to Heaven, to rest with his Father the Sun, who had some time since revealed to him, that he would shortly call him from a certain Lake, or Fountain, or River. Now in regard that I am seized, said he, with this Distemper by the chilness of the Water in which I bathed, it seems to me a certain token that I am called by my Father, and that this is the time of my Dissolution. So soon as I am dead, I would have my Body opened, as is the Custome of Kings; my Heart and Bowels I would have carried and interred in Quitu, as a Testament of my love to that Kingdom, but my Corps I would have carried to Cozco, there to be buried with my Kindred and Ancestours. In a particular manner I recommend my Son Atahualpa, whom I love with a tender Affection, bequeathing unto him my Kingdom of Quitu, with what seever additions he shall gain and acquire thereunto by his own Arms; commanding and enjoining you that are my Captains to ferve him with all Fidelity and Allegiance, as your true and natural Prince, requiring you to perform all Obedience towards him in every thing; for I (hall illuminate him with Revelations from my Father the Sun. I farther recommend unto you, and defire you to use Moderation, and exercife Justice towards our Subjects and Vassals, that so we may deservedly continue the Tule cife Inflice towards our Subjetts and Vaffalt, that so we may deservedly continue the Inte of being Lovers of the Poor, and that in every thing you behave your setues as Incas, who are the true Osft-spring of the Som. Having ended this Discourse to his Children and Kindred, he summoned all the Captains and Curnaus, who were not of the Bloud Royal, recommending to them faithfull and dutifull Allegiance to their Kings, and in the last place he told them, That there was an old Prophecy, derived by Revelation from his Father the Sun, That after the Reign of twelve Kings there should come a new Nation, never before known in those parts, that should gain and subject all those Kingdoms and Provinces, with many others, told them. Dominions, which leaves to such the state to the two they are not the true of the support of the parts. their own Dominion: which I greatly suspect to be those who now sail upon our Coust, big a valuat People, much surpassing ours in all points of Excellency. Likewise you are no observe, that in me the number of twelve Kings is completed, and I surface made known to you, that in a sew Years after my departure out of this Life, that this new Nation will to you, that in a sew Nation will be accomplished that which our Father the San hath revealed, that they shall become your Lords and Masters. Wherefore Lencharge you to serve them as Men, for they is every thing have the advantage of you; their Law is better than yours, their Arms and military Discipline more warlike, and more inviscible than yours; and lastly, I have my Peace with you, for I am summoned by my Father the Sun to rest and repose with

m. Pedro de Cieça in the 44th Chapter of his Book, touches upon this Prophecy which Hugan Capae had delivered, concerning the Invation of the Spaniards, and which ringing coupar had derivered, concerning the invation of the Spandwar, and that after his Reign the Empire would be translated to a stranger people, which was like those that stated in the Ship. All which the Inea told his people in Trawas the those that affect in the comp. The which the open told its people in Thimpionph, which is a Countrey not far from Quith, where, it is faid, the news was first brought of the Sp. miards, who were the Discoverers of Peru. Francisco Was mit orought of the 115th Chap, of his Book, relating the Difcourfe which intervened between Huafcar and Hernando de Soto, (who was afterwards Governour of the Florida,) and Pedro del Barco, faith, that when they two travelled alone from Callanarea to Cozeo, (as we shall relate in its due place,) Huasear being then a Prifquer, amongft other Difcourfes which he recounts of him, reports farther of a Pritoner, amongit other Discourses which he recounts of min, reports farther of lim in thee Words which follow, "And laftly he affured them, that he was "the true and lawfull Lord and Heir of these Kingdoms, and that Atabaliba was "a Tyrant and Ulfurper; and that he would fee the Captain of the Christians, and inform him to much, that to be might revenge his Injuries, and reftore him to his Liberty and Kingdoms; for that his Father Gusyna Capse had at the time of his Death commanded him to be a friend to the people who were white and fair, wearing Beards, for they were to be Lords of those Countries, &c. So that this Prophecy was commonly known in all Pern, as all Historians write.

All the preceding particulars delivered by Huanna Capae, were effeemed to be his last Will and Testament, and held by the Indians in high estimation, and therefore they complied most punctually with his Gommands. I remember that one day the old Inea formerly spoken of, discoursing before my Mother, and relating thele particular matters, and of the coming in of the Spaniards, and how they gained the Countrey, 1 took an occasion to ask him, how it came to pass that this Countrey, being fo rocky and mountainous as it is, and the people warlike, fo that they could make Conquests of many Provinces, and form a mighty Empire, how, I fay, it came to pals that they fhould fubmit, and render themselves to so. fitall and fo inferiour a number as the Spaniards were? In answer unto which he repeated the old Prophecy concerning the Spaniards, telling me, that the Inca had commanded them to obey and ferve them, as a people endued with many more Exellencies than they; and having faid this, he turned to me, and with anger in his face, reproved me for having termed them Cowards, and unwife; and in answer to my demand he told me, That the last Words which our Inea uttered, whereby he commanded us to refign our Empire, and subject our selves to a stranger Nation, were much more powerfull and available than all the Force and Arms which your Father and his Companions brought into this Countrey, but this he , faid to shew the validity which the Commands of their own Kings had with them ; and how much more the Sayings and Injunctions of Huayna Capac, delivered at the hour of his Death, who was the dearest and most beloved Prince to them of Hugus Capue being dead, his Servants, in compliance with his Commands, emboweled and embalmed his Body, which they carried to Cozco, but his Heart they buried in Quin. In all parts through which his Corple were carried they celebrated his Francials with extraordinary Sorrow, crying and lamenting for the lore and affection which all forts of people bore towards him; being arrived at the hoperial City, his Coscquies were celebrated in the most folemn manner, which according to the cultome of those Kings continued for the space of a whole Year. He left a numerous Race behind him of above two hundred Children, and as some lay, three hundred, which serves to aggravate the Cruelty of Arthudpa, who marthered the most part of them. And now because our design is to they what Animals were not found in Pern, until they were brought thither. We shall make it the Subject of this following Chapter.

CHAP.

CHAP. XVI.

Of the Mares and Horses; and how they were bred at the beginning; and of the great price and value of them

FOR the better Information and Satisfaction, as well of the present as of fin. ture Ages, it will be necessary to know what things were not in Peru at the time when the Spaniards first entred into Peru; and therefore I have thought fit to make a particular Chapter thereof, to enumerate how many things these people wanted, which we efteem necessary for the wellsare and convenient living of Mankind, and yet notwithstanding they lived happily, and contented without them. In the first place we must know that they neither had Horses nor Mares for their fervice in War, or for their delight and divertisement, they had no Cows, nor had they Oxen to plow their Lands, and prepare them for the feed: neither had they Camels, nor Affes, nor Mules for their Carriages or Burthens; nor had they Sheep, as we have in Spain, which yield us both Food and Clothing: nor had they Hogs, which yield us Salt-fleft, and Bacon, and Leather to make our Bottels; nor had they Dogs of any good race, fuch as Grey-hounds, Beagles, Spannels, Water-dogs and Tumblers; nor had they Maftiffs to keep their Flocks. or Lap-dogs for pleasure of the Ladies, but onely a company of Curs of all fores and fizes, which were good for nothing.

Nor had they Wheat, or Barly, or Wine, or Oil, nor Fruit, nor Pulle, as we have in Spain; of all which things we shall treat distinctly, and of the manner how, and when they were brought out of Spain into those parts. As to the Horses and Mares, the Spaniards brought them over with themselves, having been very ferviceable and ufefull to them in making their Conquests in the new World, of which the Indians had no great necessity; for being born and bred in the craggy and steep Mountains, they became naturally hardy, and nimble of foot, being very active in climbing afcents, and descending again down the steepest Precipies. All those Horses and Mares which are in the Kingdoms and Provinces of those broken dies which have been discovered by the Spaniards lince the Year 1492, untill this time, are of the race of those which were brought from Spain, and particularly from Andaluxia. The first were landed in the Isle of Cubu, and St. Domingo, and the other Islands of Barvolento, as they were discovered and subdued; where they increased, and multiplied abundantly, and thence they were transported to Mexico and Peru, for their service and use in those Conquests. At first, for want of care in the Mafters, who put their Horfes out to pafture loofe, and into places without fences they could not eafily be catched again; and fo roving in the Mountains, they became wild, flying like Deer, at the fight of a Man, and not being feized or preyed upon by any fierce Creature, they increased and multiplied in great abundance.

The Spaniards who inhabited the Islands, observing how necessary Horses were for the Conquests; and their Countries produced such as were very good, enhanted the prices of them to a considerable rate. There were certain Men who kept thirty, forty, fifty Horses in their Stables, as we have mentioned in our History of the Florida. The way of taking the Colts was in a certain Park, which they had encompassed with Pales, raised at some convenient Avenues of the Mountains, where are Coves, called Cavanu; of three or four Leagues wide, where the Horses and Colts descending towards the Evening to feed, some persons who keep watch in Trees give notice thereof; and then fourteen or fifteen Men on Horfeback, riding in amongst them, drive them within the pale, which then they enclose, and casting Halters about the Necks of those Colts which are about three or four Years old, they tie them to trees, letting the Marcs go and escape as they please; the Colts remain tied in this manner for three or four days, jumping and leaping untill being weakned with weariness, and Hunger, they yield themselves to the Saddle and Bridle; but many, before they are thus broken, throttle themfollows with the Halter; but then on fuch as become tame, they fet Boys on their backs, leading them with the Bridle; in this manner they accustome them mornations, reating their wall the Distance in the action in the morning and evening, for fifteen or twenty days, untill fuch time as they are thoroughly broken, and then they become very gentle, and lerviceable to their Mafters; and in a few days are fo well managed, that they can throw the Dart upon them, and prove most excellent Horses. After all parts of the West-Indies were subdued there was no fuch occasion for Horses as before, nor encouragement given for breethere was no tuch occanion for Fronce as octore, flor encouragement given for breeding and managing of them, as formerly; for that the Inhabitants of those Illands turned their Traffick another way, and began to trade and deal in Hides, as we shall declare in its due place. Considering often with my self at how great a price good Horses are held in Spain, and what an excellent race these Islands yield, both for their fize, shapes and colour. I have much wondred at the reason why they have not been transported thence into Spain, though it were onely in ac-thonwledgment of those which Spain did first send thither, and which were the Sies and Dams of that new Race, especially fince they may be transported with on much facility and ease from the Island of Cuba, which is one great part of the way, and many Ships come empty thus far. The Horses of Pena are much more way, an interpretable in Spain; for the first time that I darted on Horseback in Cocco, was upon a Horse newly broken, and which had scarce arrived to three years of

When the Spaniards were first employed in the Conquest of Peru, no Man would spare his Horse, or set any price upon him; but in case it happened by the would pare in Fronte, or let any price upon min; out in each chappened by the Master's Death, or his departure for Spain, that a Horse was set to fale, the price was sour, sive or fix thousand pieces of Eight. In the Year 1554, when the Mateshall Dop Alons of Alvarado went in pursuit of Francisco Hermandez de Giron, which was before the Battel of Chaquinca. A Negro Boy leading a very hantome Horse in his Hand, well managed, a certain rich Gentleman casting his Eyes upon him, and being much taken with him, faid to the Owner of him, Sir, for the Boy and Hofe, as they now are, I will give you ten thousand pieces of Eight, which is as much as twelve thousand Ducats; but the Owner refused the Offer, telling him that he had occasion for the Horse to charge upon in the next Battel, which was shortly expected; the iffue of which was, that the Horse was killed, and the Master mortally vounded: But that which is observable herein is this, that he who would have bought the Horse vvas rich, having a considerable Colony of Indians in the Countrey of the Charcas; and the Oyyner vvas a famous Souldier, vvho, to fignalize himself in that day of Battel, refused to sell his Horse at any rate, though never so advantageous; I knevy them both to be Gentlemen, and Persons of Noble Quality: But fince that time the price of Florfes is much abated in Peru, because the breed is much increased; so that a good Horse may be worth three or four hundred Pieces of Eight, and an ordinary Jade may be fold at twenty or thirty. The Indians are very commonly fearfull of an Horse, for when they see him gallop, or run in any Street where they chance to meet him, they are so affighted, that they think they can never croud near enough to the Wall to avoid him, fearing let he should run over them, and trample them under foot; wherefore when they meet a Horse in the Streets, they will cross the Street three or four times from one fide to the other, and being to scared (as it were) out of their Wits, they have run blindly (as I have teen) into the very way of the Horse, whom they have endeavoured to avoid, and have never thought themselves out of danger, unless they could get a Spaniard to stand before them, nor would that guard neither acquit them from all fear; and though now by custome and converfation the dread of them is not fo great, yet never could any Indian be perfua-ded to take upon him the Trade of a Blackfmith, because he would not be concerned in shooing Horses, though in all works of Metal they are excellent Artists. And though the Spaniards have bred up some Indian Boys, and taught them to drefs and curry Horfes, yet I never knew or faw an Indian that durft adventure to mount upon their Backs; if any of them were fo bold as to lead a Horfe by the Bridle, it was some tame, gentle Jade, as quiet as a Mule; for indeed that which feared the Indians most, was to find most of the Florses wanton and skittish; for as yet the Spaniard did neither use them to the Martingale, nor to covers, or, as they are called. Spectacles, for their Eyes, which was a great neglect, and was the cause of much more labour and trouble to the Master in the breaking and ma-nagery of them: for these Horses are of that docible and tractable Nature, that nagery of them; for there riones and that doctors and that are ratine; that with good dreffing and management they will in every thing incline to the will with good drelling and management they will in every thing incline to the will and pleafure of the Mafter. At the beginning when the Conqueft was first made in Peru, the Indians believed that the Man and the Horse were all of one piece, or the same Creature, fansying, like the Poets, that they were Contaures. They tell me now, that some Indians have adventured to thoe Horses, but that there are very sew so hardy. And having said thus much concerning Horses, let us now proceed to give an account of what other things were not found in my Countrev.

Of their Cows and Oxen.

T is believed that Cows were brought into Peru prefently after the Conquest, which from increased, and multiplied in the Conquest. which foon increased, and multiplied in those numbers, that they supplied all the Kingdom; the same also is probable of the Hogs and Goats, for I remember to have seen numbers of them in Cozeo when I was a Child.

It cannot be expected that a price should be set for a Cow in the first beginning when the Spaniards planted themselves, they being brought over onely for breed; but afterwards by increasing they became common, and were sold at moderate rates. The first Man in Cozco that was Master of Cows, was Antonio de Altamirano, the Father of two Sons, Peter and Francis, which he had by an Indian Woman, and were my School-fellows, and both dyed young, to the great forrow of the whole City, by reason of the great hopes and expectation was of their Understanding and Vertue.

The first Oxen that I ever saw at plough were in the Valley of Cozco, about the Year 1550, belonging to John Rodriguez de Villalobos; they were in all but three, one they called Chaparro another Naranco, and the third Castillo: I was carried to fee this fight, with great numbers of Indians, who flocked from all parts, with aftonishment and wonder, to fee this prodigious Novelty, which I amongst the rest did much admire. They said that the Spaniards who were drones, and would not work themselves, had made these great Animals labour, and doe that work not work themselves, had made there great Animais iabour, and doe man work which they ought to have performed themselves. I have reason to remember these particulars; for when I was a Boy, and plaid the Truant to see the Oxen Plough, it cost me two dozen of good stripes, one half of which I received from my Father, and the other dozen from my Schoolmaster; the piece of land which they ploughed was a very pleasant field, which is fituated a little higher than that ground where now the Convent of St. Francis is built; the which part of the Convent where the Body of the Church stands was excelled at the charge and Convent, where the Body of the Church stands, was erected at the charge and cost of the asorelaid John Rodriguez de Villatobos, and dedicated by him to St. Last. rus, to whom he was greatly devoted; the remainder of the Church the Franciscan Friars purchased with the two pieces of Land some years after; for when the Oxen ploughed there was no Houle or Buildings there, either belonging to Spaniard or Indiana, as we have at large declared in that part where we make a defcription of the City and fituation of Cozco. The Ploughmen that tilled the Land were Indiana, and the Oxen were taught and broken to the Yoke in a certain Incloftine without the City, and then when they had learned their work, they were brought to Cozes, where they had as many Spectators and Admirers that day, as had the Triumphs at Rome in its mightieft graudeur. When Cows were first brought to the Market, one might be worth two hundred Pieces of Eight, but afterwards, as they increased, and became more common, they sell by degrees to that price at which they are now valued. In the beginning of the Year 1554, a Gentleman of my acquaintance, called Rodrigo d'Esquivel, an Inhabitant of Cozco, but born at Seville, bought at Cindud de los Reyes ten Cows for a thousand Pieces of Eight, which makes one thousand two hundred Ducats; then in the Year 1559. I have seen them fold at seventeen Pieces of Eight a head; according to the same proportion them total at revenied I recess of Figure 2 hears according to the faith proportion the price of Goats and Hogs abated, as we shall mention hereafter, by which we may observe, how fruitfull this Countrey is: Since the Year 1590, they write me, that a Bullock bought fingly in the Market is not worth above fix or feven Ducats, and being bought in a Drove together, may be had cheaper.

The Cows in the Isle of Barlovento running in the Mountains. became all wild. as also the Horses and Mares, excepting onely such Cows as they kept up in their Inclosures, for the conveniences and benefit of Milk, Butter and Cheefe, which they made of them; but fuch as ran wild in the Mountains, multiplied and increafed to fuch a number, as would be incredible, did not the Hides of them, which are yearly prought thence into Spain, give us clear and demonstrative proofs thereof, as Aossa verifies in the 33d Chap. of his 4th Book, wherein he reports, That in the Year 1587, there was then brought in the Fleet from St. Domingo, onely 3444 Hides, and in the same Year, from New Spain, 64350 Cow Hides, making in all 99794. are yearly brought thence into Spain, give us clear and demonstrative proofs there-

BOOK IX.

In St. Domingo, Cuba, and the other Islands, their increase would have been much more, had they not been worried and destroyed by Greyhounds and Mafiffs, with which at first they did usually take them, which also living in the Mountains, became wild as the Cows, and so fierce, that unless ten or a dozen Men went together, there was no fecurity 3 and those that killed those Dogs received the same reward as for killing a Wolf. The manner of killing these Cows was this: They watched when they came down into the low Lands to feed, and was units they are upon them with their Horfes, and having an Iron with fharp prongs, in form of a half Moon, with which they flruck them, and then with a Cord they enfoared them about the Horns; but the Horseman who uses this sport, had need take care in what manner he goes to work; for if the Beaft be before him, he must take the right fide of him, and wound him on that fide, or else, if he be on the lest, to wound him on the lest, but not to meet just before him, but turn as beturns, left he burn and wound the Rider with his Horns, and give him no time to avoid his blow. There are fome Men fo dextrous in this Art, that in one canice of their Horfe, and twice difcharging their Gun, they will kill and knock down twenty, thirty or fourty Beafts; and therefore in these Islands which yield wherey, there of fourty bearts, and interior in the spaniffs Fleet with fufficient provisions thereof for their Voyages, unless by reason of the heat and moissure of the Countrey, which are the causes of corruption, the flesh will not easily receive the salt and pickle which are to preserve it. I hear now in these times that there are Cows in Pern, which wander about in the dispeopled Countries, and that the Bulls are so fierce, that they will assault Men as they travel in the way, and that there are almost as many wild Cattel there on the Continent, as in the Islands; which in gratefull remembrance to Spain, for the behefit they received by the Stock of Cattel fent from thence, do now, by the great numbers of Hides which yearly they fend, make their due acknowledgments and returns for

The first As that I ever favy vyithin the Dominions of Cozco vvas in the Year 1557, he was fold in the City of Huamanca for four hundred and eighty Ducats. and bought by my Mafter Gargiaffo de la Vega, with intention to get Mules by any many pulsary upon his Mares. In Spain fuch an Ass would not have yielded fix Ducats, for he was lean and little; but afterwards Gasper de Sotelo, with whom I had acquaintance, bought another, which cost him eight hundred and fourty Ducats; but after that time many Mules of both Sexes have been bred there, which have been spoiled

At what price the Goats were valued, when they were first brought thither, I cannot tell, yet some years afterwards I remember they were sold for an hundred and an hundred and ten Ducats a Goat; but these were not commonly brought to market, but sold by one friend to another at their instance, and desire to oblige them therewith; and then they would tie ten or twelve of them in couples to gether, that they might not stray from each other. That which I speak of now was in Cozco, in the Year 1544 and --45. but since that time they have so increased, as to become of small value, unless for their Skins; for the She-goats did often bring forth three or sour Kids at a time, as I have seen; and a certain Gentleman, who lived in Huanacu, did affure me, that he had seen several that brought forth five Kids at one yearing. forth five Kids at one yeaning.

Royal Commentaries.

Of the Hogs, and their great Increase.

AT the beginning Hogs were much dearer than Goats, though there was no fet price made for them. Peter de Cieça in his 26th Chapter of the Remarks or Observations of the Provinces of Peru, saith, That the Mareshal Don Googte Rokleds bought amongst the Goods of Christopher de Ayala, a Sow and a Pig at the price of one thousand six hundred Pieces of Eight. And farther he saith, That this Sow was eaten some sew days after in the City of Cali, and was the chief Entertainment at a great Feast; and that it was ordinary to buy Pigs in the belly of the Sow at a hundred Pieces of Eight a Pig, and sometimes more.

He that is destrous to know the excessive prices which the Spaniards gave for things in those days amongst themselves, let him reade the fore-mentioned Chapter, and then he will see at how mean a rate Gold and Silver were esteemed in ter, and then he will fee at how mean a rate Gold and Silver were efteemed in comparison with the Commodities of Spain which proceeded from the great affection which the Spaniards bore to their Native Soil, when first they planted them felves in the New World; for then they never ferupled the giving any price for the things which came from Spain, that they might eat them, or breed them, as if they had been so necessary to humane life, that no substitute could be without

In the year 1560, a good Hog was worth ten Pieces of Eight at Cozco, and now may be had for fix or feven; and were it not for the Lard, which, they fay, is good to cure the Scab, or Murrain, to which the Cattel in that Countrey are much fubject, they would be much cheaper: And also the Spaniards, for want of Olin those Countries, have licence to dress their Meat with it on Fridays, and in

The Sows in Pern are ftrangely fruitfull; for in the year 1558, I remember to lave feen in the Market of Pern two Sows, with thirty two Pigs, each of them having brought forth fixteen Pigs at one farrowing; and when I faw them, they might be of a Month old; and yet they were fo fat and flick, that one would wonder how it were possible for the Dams to maintain and suckle so many of them in fuch good plight and condition.

Of Sheep, and Tame Cats.

THE Sheep of Caffile, which we call so, to distinguish them from those of Pern, to which the Spaniards improperly give the Name of Sheep, fince they are neither like them in shape, nor colour, nor any thing else, as we have shewn in its due place: These Sheep, I say, of Castile, I know not when they were first imported into Pern, nor by whom 3 the first that I ever saw were in the Fields about Cozco, in the year 1566, and were then sold, one with another, at the rate of forty Pieces of Eight a head, and some of the prime fort at fifty; and were bought then both for love and money, as the Goats at first were.

In the year 1560, when I departed from Cozco, Mutton was not as yet sold in the Shambles by weight: but since by Letters from thence dated, in the year 1590, they write me that a Sheep was then sold in the Market for eight Ryals of Eight, or ten at most 3 and in eight years time since, Sheep are fallen to four Ducats a head, and under 3 and now at present are so common, and in such numbers, that head, and under; and now at prefent are so common, and in such numbers, that they are worth very little; for an Ewe commonly brings forth two at a time, and often three: their Wool also is produced in that quantity, that it is of little value, and is not worth above three or four Ryals a quarter of a hundred; I know not if they have learned as yet to make Weathers of them. There are no Wolves in those Countries, one ever were; nor will they be thought worthy to be transported thither, unless they were more profitable, and better conditioned.

Nor had the Indians House-Cats before the coming in of the Spaniards, though now they have them, and call them Micion, which is a word they have framed from the Spaniards, whom they have heard to call them Miz, Miz. This, I say, to rectifie the mistake of some Spaniards, who were of opinion, that the Indians had Cats before the time that the Spaniards came amongst them, because they had in their Language a proper Name for them: And in like manner a certain Historian rian argues, that they had Hens before the time of the Spaniards, because they gave them the Name of Gualpa: And this would feem a most convincing Argument to fuch who know not the deduction, or occasion, on which this Name of Gualpa was given, which indeed is not Gualpa, but Atahualpa; and hereon depends a most pleasant Story, which we shall recount, when we come to treat of Tame Fowl, which were not in Peru before the time of the Spaniards.

Of Conies, and Dogs of Game.

NOR had they Wild, or Tame Rabbets, as we have in Spain, for they have been brought thither fince I departed from Pern: The first that brought them to Creeq, was one of the Clergy called Andrew Lopez, born in the Effremadura, them to Cocco, was one of the Glergy caned America Lopez, both in the Effremation, but in what Village or Town I know not. This Prieft brought over a Buck and a Doe in a Cage, and in paffing over a ftream, which is about fixteen Leagues a Docana Care, and runs through the Countrey of Chinchappy, where the 13fate of my Lord and Father Garçilasso de la Vega lyes; it happened out, that whilst the Indian which carried them, had set down the Cage to rest himself, and eat a bit of bread, that the Doe escaped out through a hole of the Cage, where one of the Rods was broken, and ran out amongst the Rocks and Mountains, and amongst the Willows and Offiers which grow by the banks of the River; the Doe being then big with Young, brought forth a great many, which being conferved afterwards by the care of the Indians, have increased to that degree, that they have made a Warren, and now cover the ground with their Numbers. From thence they have flocked other Grounds in many parts; the Land being barren, and the Graß short, they have thriven so well, as to become of a larger size than ours; as have also other Conies which have been brought from Spain into other parts.

It was the fortune of that Coney to get loole in a temperate Climate, which was neither over hot, nor very cold; but as they spread farther up the River, the Countrey gows cooler, untill at length they come to places of perpetual Snows: Such as took their downwards as the stream runs, those were subject to greater heats, until they came to the River Apprimac, which is the hottest Climate of all Peru. This Story of the Conies was told me by an Indian of my Countrey, who knowing that I was writing the Hiftory of Pern, gave me this information; for the multiply which, I refer my felf to the banks of that River; which if they be to well flocked with Conies, as he relates, it may ferve for an undeniable proof. In the Kingdom of Quitu there are Conies like those in Spain, onely they are lels, and of a darker colour, having a black streak along the top of their backs, in eveny thing else they are like the Rabbets we have in Spain: they have no Hares, nor 60 I know whether they have brought any thither as yet.

The Dogs of game, or of good race, fuch as we have formerly mentioned, were not in Perm, until the Spaniards brought them thither. Mastiffs were the last of any transported to those parts, by reason, that having no Wolves, nor other bass of prey which might hunt their Cattel, they had no need of such Dogs for their delence, or guard. Howsoever, when they were come thirther, such as were Masters of great Flocks and Herds, would not want, or be without them, not that they had any need, or occasion for them, but onely because they would have their Flocks and Herds be like those in Spain: And so passionately was their fancy at the beginning inclined hereunto, that in every thing they affected the Manners and Cultoms of Spain; for which reason, and not for any need, a Spaniard carried a Malliff Whelp, that was not above a Month and a half old, in a Wallet, which he hanged at his Saddle-bow, from Coxeo to Los Reyes, which is a hundred and twenty Leagues through a mountainous and craggy Countrey, being every day troubled to find Milk for this Whelp; the which I faw, and can tellifie, having been a Companion with that Spaniard in the Journey; who told me, that he cartied that Whelp for a prefent to his Father-in-law, who was a Grafier, being Mafler of great Flocks of Cattel, and lived fifty or fixty Leagues on this fide of Cindadde los Reyes, by whom he would be esteemed as a Jewel of mighty value. These and greater pains have the Spaniards taken at the beginning to procure such Creatures as are used in Spain, which afterwards they have neglected and conserved in

Of Rats, and to what Multitudes they have increased.

WE must speak something of the Rats which came over with the Spaniards, for before their time there were none in the Countrey. Francis Lopes de Gomara in his General History of the Indics, (which was not very faithfully wrote) fays, that untill the time of Blaseo Namnes Vela, Rats were not known in Peru; but now they are in great numbers, and of so great a proportion and size, that Cat dares to contend or deal with them: Howsoever they are not as yet come so high as to the Hilly Countries, by reason of the cold, and Snows, nor can they find covert, or shelter, under which they may convey themselves thither.

Howfoever, they have great numbers of Mice, which they call $\mathcal{Ucnchat}$. In Nombre de Dios, Panama, and other Cities on the Coast of Pern, they have fuch an infinite number of Rats, that they are forced to deftroy them with Poison of Rats-bane, which they lay for them at a certain time of the year by agreement of all the Neighbourhood; when proclamation is made that every House should lay its Arsnick for destruction of the Rats, that so at this notice every person should be warned to cover their Provisions of meat and drink from the Rats, and especially the water, for so so as the Rat hath taken his dose, he presently runs to the water, and therewith bursts and dyes; and then every House lays its baits of Fruits, of such things as Rats commonly eat, which being empoisoned with Associated the such that the suc

When I arrived at Panama from Spain, prefently after the time that the poison had been laid, I remember that one Evening as I walked by the Sea-side, I found just at the brink of the water such quantities of dead Rats, that they covered the ground for above a hundred Paces in length, and above three or four in breadth.

And now upon occasion of this discourse, concerning the infinite numbers of Rats, I shall adventure to tell a strange Story of this kind, upon the credit of a Noble Gentleman, call'd Herman Bravo de Laguna, one who, was Lord of Indians in Cozco, and had the honour to be mentioned in the History of Peru : the relation he made, which he attests to have seen, was this: A Ship sailing from Pamama to Los Repes, touched in the way upon the Coast at a Port called Tropillo, where the whole Ships company agreed one day to go associated and be merry, leaving onely one sick Man aboard, who, by reason of his indisposition, was not able to walk so far as from the Sea side to the City, which was two Leagues. Nor need we here to wonder, that they should leave their Ship so ill provided for in those Seas storms and tempests do seldom arise, nor was there any fear of Pyrates, or Enemies, for as yet Sir Francis Drake had not opened the Navigation into those Seas. Now so soon as the Rats perceived that the Ship was freed of its company, they all fallied out to partake freely of the spoil, where finding the sick Man upon the Deck, they all joined to give him battel, that they might kill and eat him: the which hath oftentimes happened in these Voyages, in which lick Men have over night been alive, and next morning have been found dead in their beds, with the stell of their Faces, Armes, Legs and Thighs, gnawn and torn from the bones. In this manner this hungry crew would have deal with our fick Man, against whom they formed their Army, and came to combat him, who finding himself so hardly befer, got up, and taking a Spit from the Cook-room, returned to his bed, not to sleep, but to watch, and stand upon his guard; which he did that whole day, and the night following, and the day after, untill late in the Evening, when his Companions returned to the Ship; voho having heard the Story, gave credit to it, vohen they found behind his Bed, had killed with his Spit, bendes others which had been wounded. The fick Man, either out of fear, or joy of his victory, recovered his health, being much pleafed afterwards to recount the particulars of this fuccefs. In divers places upon the Coaft of Peru, and in divers years, untill 1572, and 73, there were places upon the Coaft of Peru, and in divers years, untill 1572, and 73, there were great Defructions, and even Plagues, caufed by the incredible multitudes of were great Defructions, and even Plagues, caufed by the incredible multitudes of their shown into the ground, as allo the Fruit-trees, which they pilled of their bark from the roots, to the very buds and fprouts; to that the Trees dying, the Inhafton were forced to make new Plantations in their places; and feared that they should have been forced to abandon their Dwellings, had not God in mercy caused that Plague to cease on a sudden, when it was just at the extremity of destruction. The particulars of which incredible damages, we shall, for brevity sake, omit.

CHAP. XXIII.

Of their Hens and Pigeons.

WE come now, In the next place, to speak of Fowls, of which sew others have been transported into Peru, unless Poultry, such as Cocks, and Hens, and tame Pigeons, or House-doves. As for Stock-doves, or Wood-Pigeons, I know not whether any have been as yet brought thither. As to Hens, there is a certain Authour, who writes, that they were found in Peru, before the time that the Spaniards conquered it; and for proof thereof he alledges, that the time that the spaniards conquered it; and for proof thereof he alledges, that the sum have a proper Name for a Hen in their own Language, which is Gnalpa 5 and for an Egg, which is Ronto; and that the Indians have the same propriety in their speech for a Coward, whom they call a Hen, or Hen-hearted, as the Spaniards have: To which Argument we shall give this satisfactory answer.

We shall leave the Name of Gualpa until the end of this Chapter, and shall begin with the word Ronto, or Runtu; which signifies an Egg., not of a Hen in particular, but in general of any Fowl, whether tame or vivid; and when they mention an Egg. they add the Fowl or Bird from which it is produced, as of a mention and Egg.

Hen, Partridge, or Dove, cre. And so much for Runtu, or the Egg.

As to the expression of Gualpa, or Hen, to signifie a Covvard, the Indians may have deduced, or taken it up, from the Spaniards, as is ordinary for people vyho have entertained a familiarity and conversation vyith another to borrovy their have entertained a familiarity and conversation view in another to borrovy their have entertained a familiarity and conversation vyith another to borrovy their have entertained a familiarity and conversation of feen, how our Spaniphase and, that travel into Indy, France, Flanders and Germany, do frequently make use of the Proverbs and Expressions vulich they have learned from stranger Nations 5 to she Indians have taken this voord from the Spaniards to denote a Covvard, for otherwise, in their ovvn Tongue, they want not vvords more significant than this Spanify Saying; for they sometime call him Huarmi, vvhich is Woman 5 and this Spanify Saying; for they sometime call him Huarmi, vvhich is Woman 5 and this Spanify Saying; for they sometime call him Huarmi, vvhich is Woman 5 and this Spanify Saying; for they sometime call him Huarmi, vvhich is Woman 5 and this Spanify Saying; for they sometime call him Huarmi, vvhich is Woman 5 and this Spanify Saying; for they sometime call him Huarmi, vvhich is Woman 5 and this Spanify Saying; for they sometime call him Huarmi, vvhich I may be credited, considering that I my self am an Indian.

The word Gualpa is corrupted by contraction of the Syllables, and is inftead of Atabualpa, which doth not fignific a Hen, but was the Name of the laft Inca of Atabualpa, which doth not fignific as Hen, but was the Name of the laft Inca that reigned in Peru, whose Life was so bloudy, as we shall relate in its due place, that reigned in Peru, whose Life was so bloudy, as we shall relate in its due place, that reigned in Peru, whose Life was so bloudy, as we shall relate in its due place, that reigned in request and Basilisks in the World's for he being a Bastard by subtile artifices and contrivances, Murthered his World's for he being a Bastard by subtile artifices and contrivances, Murthered his Kingdom; and so Elder Brother Huasear, who was lawfull Heir, and Usurped his Kingdom; and so Elder Brother Huasear, who was lawfull Heir, and Usurped his Kingdom; and so Elder Brother Huasear, who was lawfull Heir, and Life was the destroyed the whole with cruel torments, never before known or invented, he destroyed the Whole Bloud.

Bloud-Royal, both Men, Women and Children, over which more tender Sex. that phonomy, or men, yrong and comment, we will be seen to be most exquisite tornens that his cruelty might triumph, he shipected them to the most exquisite tornens that his tyramical malice could invent; and not satisfy himself sufficiently with his own fleth and bloud, his unhumane rage proceeded to a destruction of all the Servants and Dependants on the Royal Court, which (as we have faid) were very numerous; for Offices were not confined to fingle persons, but to Villages and Towns, which were obliged to serve in their turns, such as Porters at the Gare Sweepers, Water-bearers, Gardiners, and the like; all which by their Villages and Communities being employed in these services, had their Habitations for the space of five, fix and seven Leagues round Cocco, whom he totally destroyed; and not being contented with a Maffacre of the Inhabitants, he demolished their Dwel lings, and put all to a miferable devastation; and yet his cruelties had proceeded farther, had not the Spaniards, who in the furious progress of his Tyrannies, entred that Country, given a ftop to his farther executions.

Now whereas the Spaniards in a short time after their coming took this Tyrant Atabraha, and in the publick Market-place putting him to the Wrack, executed manacapa, and in the publick transceptance parting into the Vitaci, executed him before the people in the most exemplary manner of punithment; which when the Indians observed, they praised their God the Sun, who had sent the Spaniards to perform justice, and revenge himself of the Tyrant, who had destroyed his Children, and all thole of his Bloud and Family: For which reason the Indians looking upon the Spaniards, as those who were sent from their God, did yield entire obedience to them, furrendring themselves absolutely to their disposal, which was a means to facilitate their Conquests; for they adored them as the Progenv which was descended from their God Viracosha, who appeared in a dream to one of their Kings, and therefore they gave the Name of Viracosha to the Spaniards.

On this false supposition they conceived this simple fancy, that when they heard the Cocks crow, which the Spaniards brought in, and were the first that were ever feen in Peru, they imagined that the Cocks pronounced the word Atahualpa in abhorrence of his deteftable tyrannies; whence contracting the word, they called Cocks and Hens by the Name of Gualpa: And whereas the Indians recounted these Fables to their Children, whereby they descended by way of tradition to after A. ges; the Boys, when they heard the Cocks crow, would answer in the same tone, crowing out, Atabaajas; and I must confess, when I was a Boy, that I uted, a mongst the other young Indians, to imitate the same tune when I ran about the Streets.

And thus we Children quavered out Atahnalpa, imitating, as near as we could the voice of the Cock: Nor did we onely tune his Name to our Song, but we brought the Names of his principal Captains into the Air of our Mulick, as Challcuchima Quillifeacha: And Ruminavi, which fignifies the Eye of a Stone, because he had a Pearl (as we call it) on one of his Eyes. Blas Valera having in his look and scattered Papers given an account of the sudden Death of Atabuaha, sather faith, that though he had been cruel to his Relations, and those of his Bloud, yet in the Government of his own people he was endued with incomparable Excelin the Government of his own people he was endued with incomparable Excelencies, endearing them to him by many obliging circumftances, and at laft in Elegant Latin uses these words: "Hence it was, that io soon as his Death was divulged amongst his Subjects, they would comfort themselves in saying, that the very Cocks which the Spaniards had brought over would not suffer the Name of fo great a Person to perish, or be forgotten, lamenting in their dolefull tone the Name of Atabuaspa; and therefore they gave the Name of Atabuaspa to all Cocks, which word the Indians of all Nations vulgarly received, as did also the "Spaniards and Preachers take up that word, when they would express the Name of a Cock to the Indians. Thus far are the Words of Blus Valera, who received this Relation in the Kingdom of Paints, from the Subjects of Atabuaspa, who were this Relation in the Kingdom of Quint, from the Subjects of Atabualpa, who were as well inclined to him, as good Subjects are to their natural King: And on the contrary, fuch as lived in Cozco, and were of a different faction, interpreted the crowing of the Cock with Atahualpa in his voice, to be by way of abhorrence and deteflation of the many cruelties and tyrannies of which he was guilty. By which I fuppole, that I have fufficiently now confuted the three former Conjectures; and that I have clearly proved, that there were no Cocks or Hens in Peru, before the Conquest which the Spaniards made of it.

As the Spaniards brought Hens and Pigeons first into Peru, so also they brought Peacocks thither from Mexico, for before that time none of that kind had been feen in my Countrey. It is a thing very remarkable, that Hens did not hatch their Chickens in Cozeo, nor yet in the Vallies neighbouring to it, though they fed them with the best nourithment they could contrive to give them; which defect they want me bert nonlimited they could contrive to give them; within detect they attributed to the chilness of the Air. Such as have mentioned this particular, have given for a reason hereof, that Hens were strangers in that Countrey, and their given for a reason factor, that Trens were transfers in that Commey, and their confliction and temperament not agreeable to the Climate; because in parts more continuition and temperament not agreeable to the Chimae; because in parts more warn, as Tucay and Muyna, which are not above four Leagues diffant from the City, the Hens hatch their Chickens as in other places; but in Cocco for above thirry years the Eggs proved all addle, and fo continued in the year 1560, when I denarted from that City: but some years afterwards, amongst other advices, which a certain Gentleman called Garci Sanches wrote me, I was informed that the Hens certain Generican cancer Garci Santzee, whose the, I was miornied that the Hens began to batch Chickens in Cozco, as freely and plentifully as in other places. In the year 1556, a Géntleman Native of Salamanca, call'd Don Martin de Guzman, who had been in Peru; returning from Spain a fecond time thither, carried very who had been in rern; returning from span a recond time timer, tarried very fine furniture for Horfes with him, and other curiofities, amongst which he had a little Canary-bird in a Cage, which sang to admiration, and was the wonder of all, how so little a creature should be able to endure the long Voyage over two great Seas, and the Travels by Land both in Spain, and in Peru, from the Sea to Green. Thus we mention small and inconfiderable Birds, that so it may be an inducement to transport Birds and Fowl of greater benefit and use, such as Partridges, and other tame Fowl, which we breed up in our Yards, and feed at our Barn-doors.

CHAP. XXIV.

Of their Wheat.

From the Relation of Birds and Fowl, we are next to pass to Corn, Plants, Lentis, and such other things as were wanting in Pern: And as to this point we must note, that the first person that imported Wheat into my Countrey (for to I all the whole Empire of the Incas) was a certain noble Lady, called Mary of Escobar, who was married to Diego de Chaves, both Natives of Truxillo; I was well acquainted with her, when I lived at my own Plantation, but many years after the came to Peru, the removed to Cocco; but her Husband I did not know, for he dy-

This Lady, worthy of all good fortune, was the first that imported Wheat to the City of Rimac in Peru; for which great benefit the received no thankfull returns from my Countrey, though for a less valuable consideration the Gentiles adored Coru for a Goddess: I know not the year precisely in which it was brought; but this lam sure, the quantity was so small, not exceeding half a Bushel, that they sowed the Corn three years for its increase, dividing it into small parcels of thirty and forty Granes to a neighbour; which was given also for friendship sake, that so every one might enjoy formething of the new Harvest. For this great benefit which this worthy Woman did to Peru, and for the many fervices performed by her Husband, who was one of the first Conquerours, a Planwheaten benormed by her Fluschild, who was one of the lift Conquerous, a Plattation of Indians was bestowed upon her in the City de los Rejes. In the year 1547, Wheaten bread was not as yet eaten in Cozco, though there was some Wheat sound in the Countrey: And I speak it upon this ground, because I do remember, that when Don Frayfolumo Dominico, Bishop of that City, sled from the Battel of Having, bequartered in my Father's house with Source or fifteen of his Companions, and my Mother extreminal them with Bread of Many, and the Source of the Companions. my Mother entertained them with Bread of Mayz; and the Spaniards were then fo familied with hunger, that they had not the patience to stay untill the Dinner was made ready, but taking whole handfulls of the raw Mayz, devoured them as if they had been sugred Almonds. It is not certainly known who was the first that important the state of the ted Barley, it is probable that some Granes of it being mixed with the Wheat, might Brow up with it, for we observe that they are never purely and entirely separated. Of the Vine, and of him who first planted Graves

HE who had the honour to be the first Importer of Nonh's Plant was Francis de Caravantes, a Nobleman of Toledo, and one of the first Conquerours of Peru, This Gentleman confidering the Countrey to be in some tolerable state of onier and repose, sent for Vines to the Camaries, as being the nearest place; from whence they brought the black fort of Grape, which produces a red Wine, but not of the deepest red, or Tent-colour; and though they have since planted several forts of Vines, such as Muscatel, and others, yet there is none of a pale or whitish co-

Bacchus was adored by the Gentiles, and worshipped for a God in reward of a lesser piece of service than this Gentleman had done for the Indians; for though Wine be now plentifull in Peru, yet the Natives thereof have so ungentile a palate. that they know not how to relift it, contenting themselves with their ancient Beverage made of Cara and Water. Moreover, I have heard in Peru, from the report of a Gentleman of good repute, that a certain Spaniard, who was very curious, and a great Virtuolo, had extracted a fort of Wine called Almacigo from Raifins which he had brought from Spain; and that having fowed fome of the Raifinftones, they produced a kind of Vines, but were to tender, that he was forced to conferve them three or four years in Almaeigo, untill fluch time as they were flrong enough to be planted; and that from thence the Grapes have taken so high a colour, that all the Wine in Peru became like the Tent-wine in Spain, though not altogether of fo deep a colour. It is probable that the Grapes of Peru have had their Original from both of these ways; for the Spainards, who were always passionate for their Countrey, and desirous to see the same Fruits growing in the Indies, as were in Spain, did omit no experiments or trials to bring the fame to their defined intent. Captain Bartholomen de Terraxas, who was one of the first Conquerours of Peru, and one of those who entred Chili under the Admiral Don Diego de Almagro, was the first that planted Grapes in his own Vineyard in the City of Cozco ; I was well acquainted with this Gentleman, and effectived him for a most generous perfon, and well accomplished in all points of most vertuous Endowments. He planted a Vineyard in his Lands, fituated in the Province of Cuntifuyu, which he manured by Indians, being called Achanquillo; from whence in the year 1555, as an evidence and proof of his good Husbandry, and greatness of his liberal Soul, he fent thirty Indians laden with fair and goodly Grapes to his intimate and familiar friend Garcilasso de la Vega, my honoured Lord, with order that he should divide amongst the Gentlemen of that City an equal share and proportion, that every one might enjoy the fruit of his labours. It was indeed at that time a great curiofity to have the Fruit of Spain growing in that Countrey, and a clear evidence of his munificent and liberal Soul; for if he would have made merchandise of those Grapes, he might have fold them for four or five thousand Ducats. For my part, I did partake of those Grapes, for my Father having made me the Messenger to carry them, attended with two Pages, I delivered to every principal House two large bunches of them.

Royal Commentaries.

Of Wine; and of the first Man that made it in Cozco: and of the value of it.

ON the 21st of January, 1570, being upon my departure for Spain, I passed through the Plantation of Peter Lopez de Caçalla, a Native of Llerena, a place not far distant from Cozco, he had been Secretary to the President of Gasca, otherwise called Marcahnasi, about nine Leagues from the City, and there I met with a Portugal, called Allonfo Vacz, who was a great Husbandman, and skilfull in Agricolore, and a very honest Man; he shewed me all his Ground and Plantations, which were full of most rare and excellent Grapes, but would not suffer me to gather one bunch of them, which would have been very acceptable to a Traveller, as I was, and to one who loved them so well, but he was not pleased to hew me so much kindness; which when he perceived that I took notice of, to new me to maker attaches, which whether piece of discourtefie, for that his Master had encharged him not to meddle with so much as one Grape, because he intended to make Wine of them, as he afterwards did, pressing them in a trough, because he had no other convenience wherewith to tread or press them out; and as a School-fellow of mine told me afterwards in Spain, that this Peter Lopez de Caracalla, resolved to gain the Jewel which Charles the 5th commanded to be given to the full Sp. miard, who from any of the Spanish Plantations should produce, or be able to shew a certain quantity of Wheat, Barley, Wine or Oil, the which this great Emperour, and other Princes of glorious memory, were pleafed to hold forth, as an encouragement to those who should well manure their Land, that it might produce the Fruits of Spain, which did not originally belong to that

The quantity of Wheat or Barley which was required, was about a Seame, and of Wine, and Oil, about a hundred Weight of each, which is four Arrobas of Spanish Measure; and the Reward was to be of two pieces of Plate to the value of three hundred Ducats a piece; the gain and lucre of which was not the chief motive, that induced Pedro de Lopez de Gaçalla to be thus industrious in his Plan-tations, but rather the Glory and Honour he conceived of being renowned to poflerity, for being the first who made Wine from his own Vineyards near Cozco: and thus much shall serve as to the first Wines which were made in my Countrey, for other Cities of Peru, fuch as Huamanca and Arequepa, had them long before, but they were a fiveet fort of Haloca, or Muscatel Wines. Discoursing once in Cordova with a Canon or Prebend of Peru, concerning these matters which we now relate, he told me that he was acquainted in the Kingdom of Quitu, with a cettain Spaniard, who was a very curious Person, and one very skilfull in Husbandry, especially in the manuring of Vineyards; for he was the first that brought Vines from Rimac to Quitt, and had planted a spatious Vineyard along the Banks and from tomac to zentu, and had planted a spatious that it is extremely hot; This story is and for the River Mirst, which being under the Equinoctial Line, is extremely hot; This story is and for the greater curiofity he shewed me twelve several Apartments, one of very question-which he pruned every month in the year, and by that means had always fresh and risk frown. which he primed every month in the year, and by that means had always fresh and the grapes through all the months of the year. In all parts of Pent they water their Vines, because the Countrey is very hor, and the Weather always of the the Equinoc-fame temperature; so that when they would have their Vines produce their Fruit, that under they afford them Water, and vyhen not, and that they vyould have the Sap fall of the root, they vyith-hold the Water, and aftervyards having cast their Leaves, fall, and conference, they spring, and bud, and produce their Fruit: In the same manner Fruit be prostifully the spring, and bud, and produce their Fruit: In the same manner Fruit be prostifully spring, and bud, and produce their spring. In the same manner Fruit be prostifully spring, and bud, and produce their spring in the ear, and ready to be reaped; all vyhich is effected by the natural situation of the Climate, vyhich makes makes no difference of Seasons, and is indeed the effect of Nature, rather than of Curiofity, or any other good Husbandry.

In the Year 1560, which was about the time that I departed from Cozco, and one while after, it was not the cultome to afford Wine at the Table upon any invitation of the Neighbours, who vvere fuch as yvere Mafters of Indiana, and common Guelts, unless one, or so, might require it for the sake of his Health being accounted a point of Luxury and Vice for any one to drink it for other cannot than for necessity. For when the Spaniard, laid their first foundations of this Em pire, they acted it with great fobriety, and having began with hardthip and temperance, they eafily continued a moderate and frugal Table; fo that their Gueffe when invited, yould refuse Wine, though it were offered them; for they knew the price to be very dear, being worth, when cheapeft, at least thirty Ducare the Arrove. (vyhich is but tyventy five pounds vyeight) and continued at the fame price until after the Wars of Francisco Hernandez Giron. In the time of Gonçalo Piçarro, and before, it was vvorth from three hundred to five hundred Ducats the Arrove; and in the Years 1554, and 55, the Vintage so generally sailed through the vyhole Kingdom; and such scarcity there vyas of it in the City of los Royes, that there evas fearce fufficient for the Sacrament vehich is celebrated in the Maß; veherefore the Archbishop D. feronino de Loussa, ordered that half a Butt of Wine vehich years found in a House should be conserved for the use and service of the Maffes. In such scarcity and want of Wine they remained for several Days and Months, untill a thip arrived in that Port, belonging to two Merchants of my acquaintance, (whom, out of respect to their Noble Families, I forbear to name.) importing two thousand Barrels of Wine, part of which they fold at first for three hundred and fixty Ducats the Barrel, and the latter parcel for no less than two hundred. This account I received from a Mafter of one of the Vessels on which I embarked in my Voyage from lot Royes to Panama; for which realons Wine is not commonly drank. On a certain day a Gentleman who was Master of Indians invited another to dine with him, who was Master of none, and being in cheerfull conversation with five or fix Spaniards more, he defired a cup of Water to drink; upon which the Mafter of the House sent him Wine, but he refufing it, faid that he drank no Wine; whereupon the Mafter replied, that if it were fo, he should defire his company to eat with him every day; intimating that the charge of Victuals was inconsiderable, provided that the reckoning were not inflamed with Wine, which yet was not refused so much for the dearness of it, as for the total want there was fometimes of it, being brought from fo remote parts

CHAP. XXVII.

Of the Olive Plants, and who brought them first to Peru.

In the same Year of 1560. Don Antonio de Ribera; an Inhabitant of the City of los. Roya, who had been Procurator General of Peru, and lived some time there; and going afterwards into Spain, and returning back again, he brought with him ston Swille several Olive Plants, which he carefully saved, and put up in two great Jars, and of above a hundred which he had brought, there were but there sins onely that were alive, the which he planted in a fruitfull Soil and Valley, wherein he having also other Fruits; such as Grapes, Figgs, Pomegranats and Oranges, Limes, and the like, with Pulse, and Seeds of Spain, he sold them publickly in the Market-place of that City, which being new Fruit, were bought up at any prices, and as I am informed for certain, that he made above two hundred thousand Pieces of Eight thereos. Don Antonio de Ribera having planted these Olive Trees in his own Land, would not afford so much as one Leaf of them to be planted in any other Ground than his own; and so frecurity of them he guarded them with at least one hundred Negroes, and thirty Dogs, which watched his rich Plantations both by day and night; but it happening out that some persons, more watchfull than his Dogs, and perhaps by the connivance or consent of the Negroes, (as is to be suspected) stole away in the night time one of the three Olive Plants, the which, in some time after, was seen to flourish and grow in Chili, being above sat hundred Leagues from the City of Los Royes; and there for the space of three Years afforded many sprouts for divers Plantations, increasing with that prosperous shout me became a fair Olive Tree.

Dow Antonio de Ribera, for recovery of his Plants, having procured many Excommunications againft the Authours of this Theft; at the end of three years it came to pafs, that the fame Tree was again reftored, and replanted in the very fame place from whence it had been taken, with that fecrecy, and with that dexterity returned, that the Mafter could never detect the Perfon who had robbed him of it. The Olive-plantations have thrived better in Chili, than they have done in Pern; the reafon whereof may be, because the Climate of Chili may be more agreeable to them, being situate from thirty to forty degrees, being almost of the same temperature with Spain; and in Pern they thrive better in the Hills than inthe Plains. At first three or four Olives were a great Treat for a Stranger, but now at this time they bring Oil from Chili to Pern. And thus much shall serve to have spoken concerning the first plantations of Olives in my Countrey; let us proceed to other Plants, Pulse and Seeds, which were not originally in my Countrey.

CHAP. XXVIII.

Of other Fruits of Spain, and Sugar Canes.

T is most certain, that anciently in Peru there were neither Figs nor Pomegranates, nor Orangee, nor Guest or Guest Language and Artists and Artists and Peru there were neither Figs nor Pomegranates. nates, nor Oranges, nor sweet or sower Lemons, nor Apples, nor Pears, nor Quinces, nor Nectarines, nor Peaches, nor Apricocks, nor Plumbs of any fort, like those in Spain; onely they have one fort of Plumb different from ours, which the Spaniards call Melas, and the Indians Usium, nor had they Melons, or Cucumbers, nor Goards, which we drefs and flew in our Dishes. Of all these Fruits which I have named, and many others which I cannot call to mind, there was not any fort found in Perin, when the Spaniards at first entred the Countrey, and yet now the abundance of them is so great, that they are not esteemed; and like the Cattel, the number is so increased, that the Spaniards themselves have admired

When Pomegranates were first produced in the City of los Reyes, they carried one of them, of a prodigious greatness, in procession, laying it upon the Pageant of the most holy Sacrament, when that was carried in triumph on the Festival day of Corpus Christi. I dare not describe the bigness of it, lest I should be thought to tell a Traveller's Story, and offend the incredulity of ignorant People, who conceive the perfection of all worldly things to be contained within the compass of their own Village. How foever it would feem an imprudent caution, and to much nicety for a Man to forbear to relate the great Wonders of Nature, for fear of offending the ignorant fort of Mankind; and therefore I shall take the boldness or orienting the ignorant fort of Manking, and inference I mail take the boloness to report with confidence, that the Pomegranate, of which I speak, was as big as the Vessel in which they ordinarily carried Oil from Seville into the Indies; and crany bunches of Grapes have weighed eight or ten pound weight, and Citrons half a hundred, and Quinces as big as a Man's Head. And thus much for the Fruit. Now as to other Trees and Plants, we shall deliver that which is as strange and wonderfull as the former.

I should gladly know the Names and Conditions of those Persons who were fo curious and industrious as to import them into these parts, that so I might specifie and record them in this Hiftory, as worthy of due Praise and Honour. In the Year 1580. a Spaniard called Gaspar de Alcoger, who was a rich Merchant in the City of los Reyes, and had there a very fair Plantation, was the first that brought Cherries, and Mazards, into that Countrey, which, as they tell me, are all dead, by reason of the over great care they had of them, and the many experinents they tried to make them grow. Nor were there anciently Sugar-Cares in Peru, though now by the induftry of the Spaniard, and the fertility of the foil, they are increased to a loathsome plenty; that whereas formerly they were highly they efterned, are now become of no value or estimation.

The first Sugar Works of Peru were made in Huanacu by the contrivance of a Gentleman, with whom I was well acquainted; a Servant of his who was a fubtile and ingenious Person, observing the great quantities of Sugar which were imported from Mexico, by reason of which the Sugar of that Country would not ported from Mexico, by reaton of which the Sugar of that Countrey would not fell to any Account, advifed his Mafter to fend one Ship's lading of his Sugar into New Spain, that they feeing thereby the plenty of that Commodity in Peru, might forbear to fend any more thither; the project fucceseded according to expectation, and now Sugar-works are erected in many places of that Countrey.

I have been told, that fome Spaniards, who have been curious in Husbandry, have engrafted the Fruits of Spain, upon the wild Stocks of Peru, to the great admiration of the Indians, who have been aftonished to fee one of their own Trees to hear two three and four forts of Fruit in one were which before a varieties because of the control of the Indians.

bear two, three, and four forts of Fruit in one year, which being a curiofity beyond the feantling of their Understanding, they have contented themselves with the admiration of it, without farther search into the cause. I am of opinion that Olives might be engrafted on those Trees which the Indians call Quisbuar, for both the Wood and the Leaf is much like an Olive; and I remember when I was a the Wood and the Leat is much like an Olive; and I remember when I was a Boy, that I have often heard the Spaniards fay, that Olives and Oil did proced from Trees like them; but the truth is, that Tree is barren, for though it cafts one a Leaf like the Olive, yet it foon withers and falls: for want of Canes we did usually in Cozco make our Darts of that Wood; for Canes will not grow in fo cold a Countrey as that.

CHAP. XXIX.

Of their Garden-Herbs, and other Herbs, and of the greatnels of them.

OF all the common Herbs, and Plants, and Roots, which are eaten in Spain, there was none in Peru; that is to fay, Lettuce, Radillies, Turnips, Garlick, Onions, Beets, Spinage, Goards, Garden-Carduus, Asparagus, and the like, which grow in Spain, onely there was Pursion and Pennyroyal; nor of Seeds had they Peafe, or Beans, or Lentils, or Annifeed, or Mustard-feed, or Carroways, or Rice, or Lavander, nor many other Herbs and Plants, nor had they Roses, or Gillyflowers of various forts, as we have in Spain, nor Jasmines, nor other odoriferous Flowers.

BOOK IX.

Of all these Herbs and Flowers which we have already named, and many others, which I cannot now call to mind, there are now fuch great quantities, and which do now abound to that degree, that they are cumberfore and pernitious one ground, having to forcad and rooted themselves in some Vallies, that they cannot be eradicated and destroyed by the Art and Industry of Mankind; and having so over-run some Vallies, that they have rooted out the ancient name, and called them to take that of the prevailing Weed, witness that of Rucma, which is now called the Valley of good Herbs upon the Coaft. In the City of los Roos the first Spinage and Endive which they sowed grew to that prodigious height, that a Man could not reach the top of it with his Hand, and so thick, that a Horse could not pass through them; and all other Herbs grew to the like rankness and asseness at the beginning; in like manner Wheat in many parts yields three hun-

In the Valley of Huaren, lately peopled by a Colony which the Vice-king Don Hursado de Mendoça sent thither, the like abundance was observable; for in the Year 1560, being upon my Voyage into Spain, one of the Inhabitants of that Colony, called Garci Vazquez, who had been a Servant to my Father, carried me to his House, where at Supper he gave me some Bread, and told me, that it was of that Corn which had yielded him three hundred for one; and so much I tell you, faid he, that you may report it of a truth in Spain; which when I feemed to admire, Garci Vazquez affured me that I might believe it, for that upon the Faith of a Christian he had sowed no more than two Bushels and a half of Wheat, and that they had produced 680 Bulhels, which were heaped in his Granary, and that he thought he had loft as much more for want of people to gather it in.

Once I remember, that telling this story to Gonçalo Silvestre, of whom we have made mention in our History of Florida, and shall have farther occasion to name him, when we shall have deduced our matter to his time, he confirmed the fame, and farther affured me, that in the Province of Chaquifaca, which is near to the River of Pilleumayu, and where he hath some Lands, that the first Year he sowed Wheat, it yielded him four hundred Bushels for one. In the Year 1556, when Don Garçia de Mendoça went Governour into Chili, and taking the Port of Arics in his way, it was told him, that in a certain Valley, near to that place, called Cucapa, there was a Turnip to be feen of that prodigious bigness, that five Horses might be tied to the top branches of it, and that if he pleased, they would cany thin to fee it. Garçia willingly accepted the profer, and went thither purposely that he might say he had seen such a tight, which when he saw, he found the report true, for the Turnip was so big, that a Man could scarce encompass it with both his Armes; and fo tender, that being brought to Don Garçia's quarters, many people are of it. In the valley which is called the Vale of good Herbs, there are some Herbs of two Yards and a half long, for I keep the measures of some of them, and upon that affurance I give this Relation.

In the Year 1595, and in the Month of May, being in the Cathedral Church of Cordova, and there discoursing with Don Martin de Contreras, and telling him. that being now to write these particulars in my History, I was a little scrupplone to deliver the truth of the strange increases of Corn, and the prodigious growth of Herbs in my Countrey, lest to many, who had never gone out of their own. it should seem incredible, or that I took the privilege of a Traveller, which is to lve; but he defired me not to forbear to give a true account on fuch confiderations, leaving to them to believe what they pleased; for my part, I can testifie that I was an Eye-witness of the great Turnip in the Valley of Cucapa, where I was that day with Don Garcia de Mendoza, and upon the Faith of a Gentleman I faw the five Horfes tied to the tops of the Turnip, and that afterwards I are fome of it with feveral others; and farther I can add, that the fame day I faw in the Valley of  $x_0$  a Melon which weighed an hundred and three pounds weight, the truth of which was attefted before a publick Notary; and in the Valley of Tues I atte of one Root of Lettuce, which weighed seven pounds and an half. Many other things of the like kind concerning Corn, Fruit and Herbs, this Gentleman related to me, which I omit to mention, that I may not feem tedious to the Acofta, in the 19th Chapter of his 4th Book, where he treats of the Greens. Herbs and Fruits of Peru, hath these very Words, which I have extracted verba-tim: "I have never heard, said he, that the Indians ever had Gardens for Herbs, "Onely that they disease for herbs," "onely that they digged fome little pieces of ground to fow Herbs, Peafe, Beans and Fitches, nor have I learned, that ever any kind of these several forts of Pulse which grow in Europe were found in Pern, until they were first imported by the Spaniard, which since have grown and increased in a wonderfull manner; for the fertility of those Countries far exceeds the foil of Spain, as we have given an example of the Melons which grow in the Valley of Tea in Peru, which are not fown every year like ours, but take a root which produces Melons for many Years, and are cut and pruned at the Seasons like a Tree, which is a thing "that never happened in any part of Spain, &c. Thus far are the World Acofta, upon whose Authority I adventure with much confidence to report the great fruitfulness of this Countrey; and how wonderfully at the beginning the Fruits of Spain thrived and increased to an incredible greatness; to which also I shall add another Excellency which Acofta mentions, which is, that the Melons did all prove good, provided that time were given them to ripen, which gives a farther indication of the fertility of this Soil. And in regard the first Melons which were feen in the parts adjacent to los Reyes, gave occasion to a pleasant story which we shall not omit in this place, because it is a farther evidence of the ancient simplicity of the Indians, which is this: A certain Inhabitant of the City of los Reyes, who was one of the first Conquerours, and a Person of Noble Bloud, named Antonio Solar, having a Plantation in Pachacamac, about four Leagues diflant from the City, maintained a Spaniard for his Baily, to overfee and manue his land; who fent two Indians, laden with five Melons apiece, being ten in all, to his Master, that he might taste the fruit of his ground; and therewith sent a Letter in one of the Baskets, telling them, that in case they are any of them, that Paper would discover it. With this charge they departed, and being half a days Journey on their way, they fate down to rest, and repose themselves; during which stay, one said to the other, Let us taste of this Fruit which we carry to our Masser, but the other made some scruple, saying, The Paper will discover all, as our Steward tast ms; but the other replied, that if they threw the Paper behind the Hedge, it could be the made since the theory against the stay and the stay against the stay a out the out replied that it they dried the which the recige, it could not fee them, nor arife up in witness against them; which contrivance pleased the Companion, and the Paper being laid aside, they cut the Melon, and devoured it. For the Indians at first not understanding the Mystery of Letters, imagined that Papers were Meffengers, to whom the Spaniards had declared their minds, that rapers were interioringers, to which were delivered to them, and that they were as and fpoken those words which were delivered to them, and that they were as and more than the way where they travelled; and therefore when they fell to their treat, they laid the Paper behind a bank, that it might not fee them. As they travelled on their Journey, he that carried the five Melors faid to him that had the four, if we go with this odd number, our Mafter will fuspect that we have eaten one, and therefore let us eat another, to make them equal; this witty Counfel pleafed well, and fo by agreement they fate down and ate the other: And being now come to their Mafter, they presented down and are the other. That being how come to then whater, they prefented him with eight Melons onely, who reading the Letter, asked them what was become of the other two Mellons, for that the Letter specified ten. No Sir, said they, the Steward gave us but eight. Why do you lie, faid Antonio Solar, for the Paper freaks of ten: Wherewith the poor Fellows became fo affrighted and confuted, that they knew not what to reply, but onely to confess the truth, saying, that that they knew not what to reply, out onely to comes the thuth, laying, that with great reason the Spaniards were called Viracocha, fince they were able to penetre into such hidden Secrets. A Story of the like nature Gomara relates to have happened in the Island of Cuba, when it was at first possessed by the Spaniards: and indeed it is no wonder that the fame ignorance should be common in all parts of the new World; for the simplicity of the Indians was such, as that what soever was new, and not feen to them before, could never enter into their capacities. and onely ferved to fill them with wonder and admiration; for whatfoever they observed to be extraordinary in the Spaniards, such as running on Horseback. breaking Oxen to the Yoke, and ploughing the ground with them, making Mills. and building Arches for Bridges, shooting with Guns, and killing at an hundred and two hundred paces, and the like, were all fuch miracles to them, as could not be effected by other means, than some Divine Power; and for that reason they called the Spaniards Gods, as they did in the evidence which the Paper gave against them.

Of Flax, Asparagus, Visnagas, with which they cleanse Teeth; and Anniseeds.

NOR was there Flax in Peru at first, but Donna Catalina de Retes, who was a Native of St. Lucar, and Mother-in-law to Francis de Villasuerte, a noble and religious Lady, and one of the first Nuns of the Convent of St. Clare in Coco, expected in the Year 1560. to receive some Flax Seed from Spain, to sow in that Countrey, together with Looms and Instruments to spin and weave Linen for their Houses; but in the Year that I departed from Pern, I cannot say that those things were as yet brought; but fince I came from thence, I have heard that confiderable quantities of Linen are made there, though I cannot avouch how great Spinfters the Spaniffy Women have been, nor how good Hufwives my Countrey Women are, for I did never fee them fpin Linen, though I have feen them fow, and weave Cotton and fine Wool, which the Indian Women fipan with the spinfter or the spinfter of the spinft great curiofity, though they combed it with their Fingers, for want of Cards wherewith to card it, and therefore they may be excused, if they be not as yet become fuch excellent Spinsters of Linen as our Spanish Houswives are.

But to return to our former Discourse, relating to the great esteem which the Fruits and Commodities of Spain had gained in the Indies at first, when the Spa-Eee 2

niards had newly planted themselves in Peru; I remember that in the Year 1500 or --- 56 Garcia de Melo, who was then Treasurer for his Majesty in Cozco, fent m my Lord Garcitaffo de la Vega a prefent of three Asparagus, where he had then, or where they grew, is not known; onely he defired him to accept and eat that curiofity of Spanish Fruit; the Alparagus were very fair ones, two of which were as big as a middle Finger, and the third of a yard long; the other was thicker, but shorter, but all of them so tender, that they were easily broken. My Father. that he might doe the greater honour to this Spanish Plant, ordered that the Asia ragus should be boiled on a Pan of Coals in his own Chamber, in presence of ragus mond be solded on a ran of Coas in his own Chainber, in prefere of feven or eight Gentlemen, who were at Supper with him. When the Afparagus were boiled, and a fauce for them made with Oil and Vinegar, Garcitaff divided the two largest among the Guests at his Table, and the third he took wholly to himself, desiring them to pardon him for that time, if he carved himself the largest portion of the Spanish Fruits. In this manner the Asparagus were eaten with great chear and mirth, as if the Phenix had been to be divided amongstthem; and though I ferved then at the Table, yet nothing thereof fell to my fhare

About that time also Captain Bartholomen of Ferrazas sent my Father three Visnaga stalks, (which grow like our Fennel Seeds, and are for picking the Teeth.) the which being brought from Spain, were accepted with much thankfulness, and were ferved at the Table to a Stranger after Dinner, one of the Straws being given him with much Ceremony.

About this time also Anniseeds were produced in Cozco, and strewed in all their Bread, which was of greater efteem than all the Nectar or Ambrofia which the Poets mention; at this rate the inconsiderable things of Spain were esteemed in Peru at the first, which may serve to please the curiosity of after Ages, when they reade the History of the first actions and humours of their Forefathers. Howfoever I do not find that either Afparagus have thrived, or that Vifnagas have been produced in that Countrey, though other Plants, Corn, Herbs and Cattel have multiplied in exceeding abundance.

In like manner they have planted Mulberry Trees, and brought over Silk-Worms, which before that time were not in Peru; but the Silk which they produce will not hold Winding, or Spinning, by reason of some great defect

m IIT}}$  the best and most to be esteemed of all those things which were transported into the Indies, were the Spaniards themselves, and the Negros which are their Slaves and Servants. From these two Nations others have been derived, which are a compound of these, and different mixtures which are distinguished by divers Names. And though in our Hiftory of Florida we have mentioned this particular, vet it being to our prefent purpole, it may be convenient to repeat it pantinar, yet it being to our prefent purpose, it may be convenient to repeat it again in this place: the matter is this: A Spanish Man, or Woman, born in Spain, again in this place: the matter is this: A spampa is tail, or vy ofinan, born in spam, and come into that Countrey, is there called a Spaniard, or a Castilian; but the Children born in the Indies from Spaniards, are called Criollos, which fignifies one born in that Countrey; which word was made by the Negros, for so also they call their own Children born in those parts, and thereby diftinguish them from those of Guin, who are of more efteem for having been born free in the Countrey of their Fathers, than those who were born in the land of Bondage; so that the Name of Criollos is common to the race of the Spaniards, and of the Negros: the bloud of a Negro, and an Indian, being mixed together, is called a Muluta, or Mo-lata: To the Children of this kind of mixture they give the Name of Cholo, which is a word framed in the Isles of Barlovento, which is as much as a Dog, and not a Dog neither of the best kind or race, but of a Cur, or Mongril, giving them the most detestable, and most villanous Name they could invent; but the Children between a Spaniard and an Indian they call Mestizos, which fignifies such as come of Spanish and Indian bloud, which is a word formed and framed by our Foresattes the Spaniards, who first conquered this Countrey; and for this reason I am not ashamed to own that honourable denomination, and with a full mouth pronounce my felf to be one of them; though in the Indies they take it for a great disparagement for any Man to say to one of them, Thou art a Messizo, or he is a Melio, and for that reason they take it to be a more honourable Name to be called a Mountanier, which at first was given them for an affront or disparagement, in regard that Mountanier is one born and bred in the Mountains: But afterwards in confideration that those who live in the Mountains of Biscay and Asturia, do under the Title of Mountainers affirme to themselves great Honours and Privileges, the Meftizor were pleased with that Appellation, though indeed it is onely honourable to those who are Natives of those Provinces of Spain, and not to those who are born in the Mountains of Peru; as Antonio de Lebrixa attests, to whom Spain owes much for the Eloquence of his Latine Tongue. In the vulgar Language of Pern, Sacharuna fignifies a Mountainer, and which more properly is a Salvage; and so when they called them Mountainers, it implied that they were a kind of Beafts, or wild Men; though our filly Parents not understanding the true Ropriety of the word, were pleafed, and gloried in their own ignominy: the Children of Meflizor they call Quarraluos, which is to fay, that they are three parts Paulls, and but one Indian; but the Children of a Meflizo, with an Indian Woman they call Tieffich with its three parts Indian and but one Children of the Meflizor, with an Indian Woman they call Tieffich with its three parts Indian and but one Smith. man they call Tresatorus, which is three parts Indian, and but one Spanish. All thefe Names, and many others, which for brevity fake I omit, were framed in my Countrey for diffinction of the feveral generations, and mixtures of bloud, which have been compounded fince the time of the Spaniards, and who were the Authours of them, as they were of many other particulars which we have formenly noted. And so let us return again to our History of the Incas, who were descended from Huayna Capac the Great, whose memorable Actions require our

CHAP. XXXII.

Huafcar Inca requires his Brother Atahualpa to doe him Homage.

H Cama Capac being dead, the two Brothers reigned peaceably together for four or five years in quiet possession of their respective Jurisdictions, with out invading the Rights, or Limits, of each other, or attempting new Conquests. For the King Huafear had his Territories bounded to the North with the Kingdom of Quita, which belonged to his Brother; and all the other three quarters were already subjected to his Dominion, as far as from the losty Mountains of the Antis, to the Sea-coast, which extend East, West and South, comprehending the Anis, to the Sea-coait, which extend rait, we it and South, comprehending therein the Kingdom of Chili. The Inca Arabnalpa on the other fide lived peaceably, not affiring to new Conquefts, but onely inclined to enjoy himfelf, and confult the good and benefit of his people, but Dominion and Rule can admit no Rival or Equal; so this Tranquillity continued not for above five years before that Huascar repenting, of his easie assent to the desire of his Father, imagined that he had, to his own great damage quitted his Right to the Kingdom of 2010 unto his Brother Atabualpa; for befides the prejudice he fuffered by having to confiderable a branch lopped off from his Empire, he also found himself dienacontideration a branch lopped on from his Empire, he allo found himself difena-bled from farther progress in his Conquests, or making additions to his Domini-ons, being shut up on that side by his Brother, where onely there was way to say ther Conquests; the glory of which were now onely belonging to the fortune of Atabualya: And in regard, that as by such acquisitions he was in a possibility of making his Empire greater than his, so it was probable he might become equal, if not superjour to him: And seeing that this his Brother was of an ambitious, and an apparatus Spirit. Be had just could not see the facility of the second an unquier Spirit, he had just cause to suspect, that finding himself strong and powerfully he would attempt to take the Diadem from his own Head.

These melancholy Considerations increasing daily in the breast of Hunser, he grew so sad and pensive, that not being able to support longer the burthen of his jealousie, he dispatched a Messenger to his Brother Atahusha; giving him to unjealoutie, the dispatched a vienenger to ins distinct annuture; giving mill to understand, that, according to the ancient Constitution and Canon of the First beat Manco Capec, which had been observed by all generations descended from him, the Kingdom of Lyin, and all the dependencies belonging to it, were properly, and of right inherent in the Crown, and Imperial Seat of Cozco. And though he had quitted his claim, thereunto, in respect to that forced obedience he owed to had quitted his claim thereunto, in respect to that rorced openience ne owed to his Father, yet by the first Rules of Justice he was not obliged thereinto, nor was any such Resignation lawfull, being to the damage of his Crown, and to the right of his Successor, which his Father had neither power to enjoin, nor he to perform: But in regard his Father had so commanded it, and he assented, he was willing to confirm the fame Grant to him on two Conditions: First, that he do not add one Foot of Land to his prefent Dominions, for that all his Conquels do of right belong to the Empire; and, fecondly, that as a Feudatory he perform towards him Homage and Vaffalage.

This Meffage Arahualpa received with all the submission and humility imaginable; and having taken three days time to return his Answer, he with all the feigned affection, and fubrile diffirmulation, he could contrive, made this Reply: That he had always in his heart entertained obedient thoughts towards his Lord and Sovereign the Capac Inca; and that as an evidence thereof, he would never attempt to encrease, and enlarge his Dominions of Quim, but by the order, and with the consent of his Majesty, to whose pleasure he was so entirely devoted. that in case he should think sit to dispose otherwise of his Kingdom, he would willingly refign all to his command, and live as privately in his Court, as any of his Uncles and Kindred, ferving him both in Peace and War with faithfulness and diligence.

diligence. This joyfull Answer from Atahnalpa, the Messenger returned with all diligence. This joyuun Amwer from Attanuapa, the interneger returned with all expedition by the Poft, remaining still at the Court of Atahuapa in expectation of Instructions from the Inca of what farther to act and negotiate therein. The Inca teceiving this foft Answer with great joy and satisfaction, replied again, That he did not in the least repine at the Possessions which his Father had bestowed on he did not in the least repine at the Possessinon which his Father had bestowed on he didnot in the least repine at the Possessinon which his Father had bestowed on he didnot in the least repair constantly to $Cozco$, and perform the Homage he had agreed. 'To which Atabuasa returned answer, That he was very happy to know the Will and Pleasure of his Lord the Inca, but much more to perform it; which that he might doe, he would speedily repair to the place appointed, to take the Oath of Allegiance; and for the doing thereof in the most clemm manner, he desired his Majesties licence and permission, that all the Provinces of his State might attend him thither, to join with him in the solemn celebration of the suneral Obsequies of his Father Huapna Capaa, according to the custome observed by the Kingdom of $2aiia, and the Provinces depending on it; and that having accomplished that ceremony, both he, and all his Subjects, would take the Oath of Allegiance and Fealty. Huasar Inca easily consented to this gratefull Proposition, which his Brother had made to him, giving him to understand, that he might take his time of coming to Cozeo, when it seemed most congratefull Proposition, which his Brother had made to him, giving him to under-land, that he might take his time of coming to Cozco, when it feemed most con-venient, and that he gave him leave to celebrate the rites of his Father's Fune-ral according to the custome of his Countrey: And so both the Brothers ap-peared fatisfied; the one rejoycing at the good correspondence he had with his Brother, little suspecting the malitious design that lay concealed under it of be-reaving him of his Life and Empire; and the other pleased himself with the thoughts and contrivance of his damnable Plot, which he had laid to make himfelf Master both of one and the other.

CHAP. XXXIII.

The Subtilties which Atahualpa used to take suspicion from the mind of his Brother.

Things being thus prepared, the King Atahualpa published a Decree through all his Kingdom and Provinces, that all people who were able to travel unto Cocco, should within the space of so many days prepare themselves to take a Journey thither, that they might according to the ancient custome of their Nation celebrate the Funeral Rites of the Great Huayna Capac his Father, and take the Oaths of Homage and Allegiance to their Supreme Monarch Huasear Inca; and that for the greater glory and splendour, every one should appear in his best Onaments and Garments bestitting such a Solemnity; but secretly he intimated his instructions to his Captains, that in their respective Divisions they should take care to chuse such select Men as were Souldiers, and better armed for War, than accounted for performance of the Obsequies; and that they should march in discounted for performance of the Obsequies; vers Divisions of five and six hundred in a Squadron, and so disguise the matter as to appear in the outward shew, rather like Servants and Attendants, than like Souldiers; and that every Division should march at two or three Leagues distance each from the other.

And moreover, he gave Orders to the Captains, who led the Van, that when they were come within ten or twelve days March of Cozco, that then they should shorten their pace, that the Rere might come up to them, who were commanded to double their March, that so they might overtake those in the Van. In this order the Troops of Atabualpa, confifting of above thirty thousand select Men, most being old veterane Souldiers, proceeded in their March; who also were Commanded by those famous and experienced Captains which his Father had left, and recommended to him 5 two of which Officers were especially famous above the rest, one of which was called Challebneima, and the other Quagna, and Atahualpa gave out, that he would himself in Person bring up the Rerc.

Huafar placing great confidence in the words of his Brother, and much more in that untainted Loyalty which the hadam had ever been to their huas; a tellimony of which faithfulness is given by Acofa, in these words, taken out of the twelfth Chapter of his fixth Book: "Without doubt, faid he, great was the "reverence and affection which this people thewed to their huas, it having new to been known that any one of them was ever guilty of High-Treason, &c. For which reason Hanfar inspecting nothing lefs than such a faithless and treatonable design, did with all freedom and generous liberty give order, that they should be supplied with all Provisions in their way, and all kind treatment shewed them, as befitted Boothers, who were travelling to perform the Funeral Rites of their Futher, and to take the Oaths of Fealty and Allegiance. Thus both Parties moved on different considerations, that of Huasam with all the simplicity and sincerity imaginable, and the other of Andmatps, with all the supplicity and sunning that could be contrived and learned in the Schools of Malice.

For Arabaalpa being inferiour in Power and Strength to his Brother Hualcar, durft not adventure on an open War; but covertly managing his deligns, made fure of his game, which he had certainly loft, had he professed an open enmity.

CHAP. XXXIV.

Huascar being advised of the Treason, assembles his Forces.

In this order the people of Quitn marched for the space of sour hundred Leagues, untill they came within a hundred Leagues of Cozco: In which March, several experienced Governours of Provinces through which they passed, bosserving that the order which these people kept, looked more like the Dissipation of an Army, than the Rule of Mourners going to a Funeral, or of Vasses going to take the Oaths of Fealty and Allegiance; for that on either of these occasions sive or six thousand Men were sufficient; and that for giving Fealty, the intercourse of Captains and great Men was onely requisite and necessary, the than such a croud and multitude of common Souldiers: And farther reflecting on the turbulent and unquiet temper of Atabuaspa, which was always false, and his humour Martial, they could not but suspect, that there was something more intended by this warlike Preparation, than what tended to Peace, and the professions of a Brother and a Subject; on which suspicion and jealousse they dispatched secret intelligence to Hunsear, beseching him not to trust to his Brother Atabuaspa, who certainly came with other designs than what he outwardly pretended.

Upon this information Huafear awakening himself from that dream of security in which he slept, dispatched Messengers with all diligence possible to the Governours of the Provinces of Antifina and Collaspan, commanding them immediately to march to Cozco with what Forces they were able to levy: But to the Division of Chinchessian, which was of the greatest extent, and which was the most war-like Nation of all the others, he omitted to send his Orders, because they were already joined with the Enemies Army as they passed through their Country. The people of Anahuaspa growing consident, and emboldned by this negligence and security of Huasear, and his Subjects, arrived within forty Leagues of Cozco; and then those in the Van shortning their days Marches, as the others enlarged them, they came at length, in a few days, to make a body of twenty thousand Men, and to pitch their Camp at the bank of the River Appurimac, which they passed without any opposition; and thence began to proceed like declared Enemies, with open Arms in their hands, and their Colours stying: And thus they marched fair and fostly in two Divisions or Squadrons, being the Vanguard of the Army, untill the Rere guard over-took them, consisting of ten thousand Men more, and then proceeded in a body untill they came to the top of the Hill of Villa camea, being but six Leagues distant from the City; but Atabualpa kept himself within the Confines of his own Kingdom, not daring to adventure his Person sarther, untill he had proved the success of the first Battel, in which he had placed all his hopes, availing himself much on the security and negligence of his Enemies, and on the Provess and good Conduct of his experienced Captains.

Prowes and good Conduct of his experienced Capitalis.

The Enemy being thus near approached, Huascar made all the Levies of Souldiers, which the shortness of the time would admit; but the greatest number of his Army being to be setched from the remote parts of Collassyn, which was at least two hundred Leagues distant, could not possibly be brought together in time to make any resistence; and those of Antisyn were but sew in number, by reason that that Countrey being mountainous, is very ill peopled; but Cuntisyn being a Province more compact, was very populous, so that the Curacas came in in great numbers, forming a Body of thirty thousand Men: But these being all new raised Men, and by reason of the long Peace unexperienced in War, they were timorous, and unable to fight and contend with an Army of veterane Souldiers. The Inca Huascar, with his Brethren and Relations, and as many as he could assemble, consisting in all of about ten thousand Men, marched forth to join the other Body of his Army, which came from parts lying Westward from the City; and having met them, they staid together in expectation of farther recruits.

CHAP. XXXV.

Of the Battel fought between the Incas, the Victory of Atahualpa, and his Cruelties.

THE Atabuahians, who were the best Souldiers, considering that delays were dangerous, and might hazard the fuccess which quick execution would seare, marched with resolution to meet Huascar, and give him battel before his other Troops were joined with him; and finding him encamped in an open Plain, about two or three Leagues to the Westward of Cozco, they assailed him with all their power; against which he on the other side made such stout resistence, that fortune seemed doubtfull unto which she should give the victory; the Atahualpian excited with the glory of taking Huascar Prisoner, fought with spight and malice; and his own Subjects being great Lovers of their King, contended with equal courage to defend and preferve him, fo that the Battel continued that whole day with great flaughter on both fides: Howfoever, at length for want of the Colla, and by reason that the people of Huascar were a raw Militia, and unexperienced in War, so that one Souldier of Arahualpa's was worth more than ten of those of the other party; it came to pass that the Atahualpians gained the victory: In the pursuit of which, aiming above all things to take Huascar, for that their victory would fignifie little, in case his Person escaped their hands, they attacked his Lifeguard of about a thousand Men, which surrounded his Person, and fighting in defence thereof, were all cut to pieces in his presence, most being slain by the Enemy, and others feeing their Inca Prisoner, killed themselves: besides whom, many other Curacas and Sovereign Lords were taken with great numbers of Captains and Orlicers; the multitudes of common people which remained alive, fled, and flrayed abroad like fleep without a thepherd; and many of them wandring about, and not knowing where to go, intrendred themfelves to the Enemy, not being willing to enjoy their freedom when their beau was a Prifoner.

being willing to enjoy their freedom when their Inea was a Prifoner.

With this victory and fuccefs, and with fo great a Trophy of it, as the Perfon of Haafear, the Andmalpians were highly exalted; and for fecurity of the prize, they committed him to the cuftody and charge of four Captains, and other Souldiers of great fidelity, who so narrowly watched him, left he thould make an escape, that he never was out of their light either by night or day.

And now Haafear being in their bands, it was thought necessary to publish and blaze his Imprisonment through the whole Empire, that so in case any People or Armies should be coming to his affistence, or succour, they might upon such advices be diverted from their proceedings; but principally the news hereof was dispatched with all diligence to the King Atabustpa.

This was the sum of the most material pallaces of this War between the sum unpatteried with an emigence to the King anomalya.

This was the fum of the most material passages of this War between the two Brothers, who were the last Kings of Peru; as to other Battels which the Spanish Historians relate, they were but Skirmishes which passed on the Confines of one Kingdom and the other, on occasion of Incursions, which the Captains and Go. Kingdom and the other, on occasion of incurrious, which the Captains and Governours of Garrifons made: And as to the Imprifonment of Arahualpa, it was a sham, or a falle report, which he bimfelf had given out to amule his Brother Hugler and his Subjects, as was also that which he had divulged in saying, that when he was in Prison, his Father the Sun had turned him into a Serpent, that 6. when he was an eration, his rather the sun had under thin into a sergent, that to he might escape by creeping through a hole, which was in the Chamber: which was onely the Story of a Miracle broached and framed to introduce his Father the Sun for an Authour and Favourer of his Tyrannies; the which report easily gained belief in the simple minds of that people, who were credulous of any thing which was mentioned in favour of that concernment which the Sun had towards his own Off-spring. The use which Arabualpa made of this victory, was with all the cruelty and treachery imaginable; for publishing in all places, that his intentions were to restore Huascar again to the Government of his Empire; but yet under certain cautions and restrictions, which were to be agreed and capitulated between them he funmoned all the Ineas of the whole Empire, together with the Governous, Major-Generals, Captains and Souldiers, to appear at Cozco at fuch a certain time, that so they might be Witnesses to those Articles which should be conserved. with these fair pretences and allurements all the Incar of the Bloud-Royal being with thete fair pretences and allumements all the Incat of the Blouch (oyal being deceived, failed not to make their appearance; which they performed with that readiness of mind, that neither fickness, nor old age, nor far distance did debar, or hinder their coming; nay, even those who might have excused themselves by reason of the remoteness of their Countrey, and which might have retarded their Journey by slow and dilatory Travels; and which were suspicious and jealous of what afterwards succeeded; yet even these against their own sears and inclinations. fuffered themselves to be taken in the open and appearing snare: For so soon as Atabasha had gotten them into his power, he commanded, that they should all be put to death; which Sentence was executed by various forts of cruelty, which feved to fecure his Empire from all Infurrections, or Plots against him.

The Causes which moved Atahualpa to exercise all his Cruelities, and the satal essets of them.

But he fore we proceed farther; we are first to enquire into the Reason which his own Bloud and Family. To understand which, we must know, that according to the ancient Laws and Statutes of that Kingdom, observed from the time of the First hich Manto Capac, untill the end of the Reign of Huagna Capac the Great; Andropa his Son was as uncapable of inheriting the Kingdom of Quita, which, like all the other Conquests, appertained to the Imperial Crown, as he was of the Kingdom of Cozco; for that the Inheritance of both indispensably appertained to such an Heir, as was descended from a lawfull Wise, who was to be Sister to the King; for that the Title to that Kingdom came as well by the Woman, as the Man's side: And if in case this strictness were not observed; yet to gain him some tolerable pretension, he ought at least to have been the Son of a Succession; but those who had any mixtures of Foreign Bloud, could never, without prophanation of all their holy Sanctions, be entitled to any share, or part, of the Entitle

the Empire.

Now Atamatpa being confcious to himfelf, that he wanted all the qualifications which might render him truly and legitimately an Inca; for he was neither the Son of a Copa, which fignifies a Queen, nor yet of a Palla, which is a Lady of the Royal Bloud; but the Son onely of a Whore, that was a Native of Quint; the which Kingdom neither, could not of right be difficulties, and that though at prefet the were victorious, yet when with time that things were quieted and appeafed, matters would return again to their ancient courfe, and the people fet up one of the legitimate Line and Race in delpight of him, or his pofferity: For the opinion of legal Succeffion being fixed in the minds of the Indians, by their ancient Idolatry, and vain Religion, and taught and preached to them by that Dottine which the Inca Mance Capae first instituted, and had ever since, to all Ags, been maintained; he concluded impossible to be unriverted from them, but by an utter extingation of that whole Race; which therefore he resolved upon, and not onely to destroy and extinguish the true and legitimate Issue, but even those of Bastard Families, less they standing in the same capacity of Inheritance with him, should be induced by his example to become Rivals with him for the Impire.

To prevent which, no other remedy appeared, than that onely which Tyrants and Ulurpers have commonly used, which is to cut off all such who can have a Title, or lawfull Pretention, to the Crown; so that neither the People can cast their eyes upon any other Prince, nor yet the Usurper himself have obligations in conscience or justice to make resitutions: With many examples and testimonies of which, in the like nature, both ancient and modern Histories surnish us, which, to avoid testiousness, we omit; it being sufficient to use that single instance of the Ottoma Family, whose common custome it is to secure the Empire to themselves and their posterity, by the Death of their Brothers, and their other near Relations.

But greater, and more thirfty of the Bloud of his own Family, than any exercifed by the Ottomar Kings, was the cruelty of Atabualpa, who not being fufficiently fatiated with the Bloud of two hundred of his Brethren, who were the Sons of the Great Iluapus Capue, he proceeded to wade through deeper ftreams of all the Bloud, thed from the Veins of his Uncles, Coulins, Parents and Relations, who were descended by the direct, or indirect, Lines, even to the fourth degree; fo that not one, whether Legitimate, or Bastard, escaped the cruelty of his Executioners; for he killed and destroyed them by various kinds of Deaths: of some he cut the Throats, others he Hanged, others he threw into Rivers and Lakes with weights about their Necks, that they might not save themselves by swimning, others were thrown down Rocks and Precipices; all which was acted with the greatest dispatch and diligence imaginable by the Executioners; for this Tyrant could never think himself secure, untill he had seen them all destroyed, or heard that they were dead; for notwithstanding all his Victory, he durst not untill then pass beyond Saussa, which the Spaniards call Xauswa, being ninery Leagues distant from Cozco: But as to the poor Huascar, they kept him still alive, reserving him for the suppression of insurrections, or tumults, which might arise against that hundry, if or they well knew that the Word and Command of Huascar was so prevalent, and of that authority with his Subjects, that it was able to quell and calm any mutinies, or disturbances, amongst them: Howsoever, for his greater mortification, they would often bring this unfortunate Prince from his confinement, to be a Spectatour of the slughter and massacre of his Kindred, which afflicting sight was a more sensible torment to him than Death it self.

Nor did his Cruelty contain it felf within these bounds, but extended to all the Prisoners, lest they being Curacas, and Men of interest in the Empire, and assectionate to the cause of Huaseas, should contrive means for his delivery: Wherefore bringing them all forth with their hands tied into an open Plain in the Valley of Sacfahhanna (where the Battel was afterwards sought between the President Gasea and Gonçalo Piçarro) they were ranged in order on each side, and the poor Huaseas cloathed in Mourning with his hands tied behind him, was made to pass between them, with a Rope about his Neck; which when the miserable Captives saw, and their Prince in that despicable condition, they listed up their cries to Heaven, and prosserate their bodies on the Earth, adored and worshipped him, which was all the honour they could estifice, or help they could give him in that unhappy state: In punishment for which respect they killed them all, either with Pole-axes, or short Clubs, which they call Champi; for a bigger for of Clubs and Pole-axes they use in Fight, which they wield with both hands. In this manner they killed all the Curacas and Captains in presence of the King, that scarce any Noble Person escaped their Tyranny and Cruelty.

Of the Cruelty which Atahualpa used towards the Women and Children of the Bloud-Royal.

A Tabualpa having destroyed all the Men of the Royal Family, together with all the Curacas, Commanders and Subjects, of any note belonging to Hudler; his Cruelties, which were never fatiated with humane flesh and bloud, proceeded with new thirst and appetite to devour the Children and Women, being the unhappy Relicts of the Royal Race; and though the tenderness of their Sex and Age was sufficient to move compassion, and plead in their behalf; yet so obdurate were the Bowels of this Tyrant; that he made search in all places for the Women and Children of the Royal Race, (excepting onely the Wives of the Sun, which conserved themselves within the Walls of their Convent) and having gathered them together without the City, they practised such torments upon them, that they died with lingring deaths. After which these damnable Ministers of Gruelty made the strictest search they could through all the Dominions, for those of the Royal Bloud, that so not any of them might escape their hands; so that in all parts they had collected great numbers both of Men and Women, as well illegisimate, as legitimate; for that the Ineas having a greater liberty and licence granted them in the free use of Women, than any others, their Family became the most numerous and extensive of any in the whole Empire. And having thus collected these people, they ranged them in a Plain, which lyes about a League distant to the Northward of the City; which Field hath been called Tahnarpampa, or the liveld of Bloud, ever since the Fight which happened in that place between the Chameas, and the people of Cozeo, as we have declared formerly in its due place.

These poor wretches being in this manner Prisoners in the Field, they encompalled them with three Files; the first was of Souldiers, who were to be a guard about them, and to oppose any Insurrection in case the City of Cozco should attempt it, and ferve to bridle and fubject their Enemies, and then the other two Files were Sentinels and Guards, left any should escape, or any others enter in amongst them to bring them relief. Upon these fad wretches they practised their Cuelties in several manners; to some they gave onely a little raw Mayz to eat, and a few crude Herbs, making them to continue the strictness of such a Fast as their Religion enjoyned them for a few days; the Wives, Sifters, Aunts, Coufin-Germans, and Mothers in-law of Atabualpa they hanged upon Trees, the tallest and most lofty that they could find; some they hanged up by the hairs of the head, others under the armes, and others in that unhandsome manner, as becomes not our modesty to report; to some of them they delivered their Infants to hold in their armes, which when they fell from them, they knocked them on the head with Clubs; fome they hanged by one arme, fome by both, and others by the wafte, that fo they might be long in dying, for to kill them at once, feemed too much mercy, and which these poor wretches implored with their last cries and groans. The Boys and Girls they killed by degrees, bringing our a number to death at every quarter of the Moon, using them with no less cruelty than they had exercised towards their Parents; and amongst their other torments, starving was one way of killing. Diego Fernandez in his Hiftory of Porn, touching briefly on the Cruelties which Atabathpa, there happened a great dispute and controlling, and his Brother Atabathpa, there happened a great dispute and controlling, and his Brother Atabathpa, there happened a great dispute and controlling the Government, and him who was to be the Supreme Wingston Conference. "Monarch. Guafear Inga refiding in Cozco, and his Brother Atabalipa in Caxa Malca. Atabalipa dispeeded two of his principal Captains, called Chalcuchinan, "and Quizquiz, who being valiant and flour Men, raifed a great Army, and therewith marched againft Guafcar, with defign, that having overcome and ta"ken him Prifoner, Atabalipa should be declared King. In this March they subdued many Caciques and Indians, reducing them all to the obedience of Atabalipa; of which, when Guafear received intelligence, and of what they had acted, he prefently put himself into a posture of desence, and with what sorce he could assemble in so short a time, he marched from Cozco to Quipappan, which is about a League distant from thence, where joyning Battel with Atabalipa, Guasear was overthrown, and taken Prisoner. The Fight (as is said) was so bloudy, that a hundred and fifty thousand Indians were slain in the Battel; and bloudy, that a nuncred and fifty thousand majors were train in the Battel; and afterwards Arabalipa entring victorious into Cozeo, they killed Man, Woman, and Child, figaring none who declared themselves for Guafear, and most especially made search for the Children of Guafear, and his Wives and Women, who were with Child by him: Howfoever one of his Wives called Mana Vaccay made an escape with her Daughter Copa Caxi Vaccay, who is now Married to Xigre Topa luga, of whom we have made mention in this History, &c. Thus far are Words of this Authour; and then afterwards in the fequel of this Story. he recounts the cruel treatment and hard usage of poor Huascar, during the time of his imprisonment, together with the dolefull complaints he uttered, which we This Coya Cuci Varcay, which he fays, was the Wife of Xoya Top, was called Cufi Huarque, of whom we shall discourse hereaf. ter. The Field where this Battel was fought was called Quipoppa by corruption, though properly it had the Name of Quepappa, which fignifies a Trumpet, as if from thence the Triumph of Atabualpa was trumpeted, and fent its found into all parts of the Empire. I remember, that when I was a Boy, I went three or four times into those Fields with other Boys, who were my School-fellows, where we enjoyed the recreation of Hawking with some Hawks, which the Indian Faulco. ners managed for us.

Royal Commentaries.

In this manner, as we have related, was all the Bloud-Royal, and Family of the Inc.11, extinguished and extirpated in the space of two years and a half; and though they might in a much shorter time have exhausted the veins of Royal Bloud vet to prolong their pleafure in Cruelty, they referved some on which their appetites might feed, and still be delighted in new exercises of torment. The Indians say that the Field where the great effusion of this Bloud was made, was called Tahuarpampa, or the Field of Bloud; and that it rather took its denomination from the Bloud of the Incas, than from that of the Chancas; for though the quantity of the Bloud of the Chinese was greater, yet the quality of the heas made theirs much more estimable; and the death of Women and Children being of tender sex and age, rendered the many Murthers more tragical and execrable.

CHAP. XXXVIII.

How some of the Bloud-Royal escaped the Cruelty of Atahualpa.

 $S^{Ome, notwithstanding}$  all this, escaped out of the City, some came not within their power, and others by the connivance of the people of Arabualpa. who being fatiated with this flaughter, and touched with fome remorfe to fee that bloud to plentifully shed, which they once adored for Divine, connived at the ehave which fome of them made out of the circle in which they were encompassed; and not onely so, but some gave them opportunity to change their Apparel, which was the badge and diffinction of an Inca, for difguifes after the Habit of common Indians: For, as we have faid before, the Incas were diffinguified by their Garments; but those whom they permitted to make an escape were Infants, and Children under the Age of ten or eleven years, amongst which my Mother was one, together with her Brother Don Francisco Hualipa Tupaa Inca Yupanqui, with whom I was acquainted, and who, fince my abode in Spain, hath wrote me several Let-I was acquanted, and who, fince my about in Spann, hard whole the level Level ters: befides which I knew very few who escaped from this miserable Outrage, from whom I received the Relation of all that I report concerning this exectable laughter. I knew also two Anguis who were Princes, being Sons of Huayan Caput, the one called Paullu, who was one of those who escaped, as we have mentioned; the other was called Titu, and being a Child then, was afterwards baptized, whose Christian Name we have formerly fignified. Paullu lest a Son which descended from Spanish Bloud, whose Name was Don Carlos Inca, he was my Shool fellow, and afterwards Married with a Noble Lady born in that Countrey, and from Spanish Parents, by whom he had Don Melchior Carlos Inca, who in the last year, which was 1602, came into Spain to see that Court, but chiefly by the advice of some friends, who persuaded him, that he should receive great rewards for the Services which his Grandfather had performed towards the Conquest and Seulement of Peru, and afterwards for the refiftence he made against those Usurpers and Tyrants, of whom we shall speak in our History of the Empire: but a more especial respect was due to him, for being the Great Nephew of Huanna Guest, and descended by the Male line, so that he is the Head, and chief Family of thole few which remain of the Bloud-Royal. He now at prefent refides at Valladid in expectation of rewards; which though they may be great and confiderable, yet can scarce be such as may equal his merit.

I know not whether Tim had any Issue is but I remember two Nustas, or Princelles, which were the lawfull Daughters of Huana Capac, one of which was called not be the control of the contr led Beatrie Coya, and was afterwards Married to Martin de Mustincia, a Noble Perlon, who was Accountant of the Revenue of the Emperour Charles the Fifth in Pens; they had three Sons which were called the Bustineius, and another called John Sierra de Leguizano, who was a fellow Student with me at School; the other Neffa was called Donna Leonor Coya; the first time she Married was with a Spaniand called John Balfa, with whom I was not acquainted, being then young; they had a Son of the fame Name, who went also to School with me: But her second Marriage was with Francis de Villacastin, who was one of the first Conquerours of Peru, as also of Panama, and other Countries. There is a Story which goes of him, worthy to be noted, which I found in the Hiltory of Francis Lopez de Gomara, which is, "That this Villacastin was the first that planted Colonies in Pedrarias," Nombre de Dios and Panama; that he opened a pallage, and made a Road from one Town to another, with great pains and charge, through Rocks and Mountains, in which were infinite numbers of Lions, and Tygers, and Bears; and such multitudes of Monkies of all forts and sizes, that being disturbed, they " would make fuch a hideous noile, as was fufficient to make Travellers deaf, and "would climb up Trees with great Stones, to let them fall on the heads of fuch

"as came within their reach. Thus far are the Words of Gomara. But I have feen fome Marginal Notes in a Book wrote by one of the Conquerours of Perus; in which is this passage: "That a Monky threw a stone at a person armed "with a Cross-bow, named Villacassim, and beat out two of his Teeth; he was a strewards one of the Conquerours of Peru, and Lord of a great Countrey, called Japavin; but being taken Prisoner, he dyed in Cozco; he was one who took part with Piparo in Xaquixaguana, where one that owed him a displeassure gave him a cut over the face after he yielded to quarter: He was an honest Man, and did good to all, though he dyed poor, after he was despoiled of his had."

"ans, and of his Estate. This Villacassim killed the Monky with his Cross-bow, he chancing to shoot at the same time that the Monky threv his stone. Thus star are the Remarks of the Conquerour; the which I can in part confirm, because I knew the person, and save that he voanted two Teeth in the upper row of his Mouth; and it was the common report in Peru, that they were beaten out by a Monky. I have thought fit to insert this Story as I do others of like nature, for the truth of which I refer my self to divers Witnesses. Other Incas and Pallas I knew, to the number of two hundred, which were all of the Royal Bloud, but of less note than those which I formerly mentioned, who were the immediate Sons of Huayan Capac. My Mother was his Brothers Daughter, whose Name was Hualba Tupac Inca Tupanagui.

I was acquainted with one Son and two Daughters of King Atahualaa, one of them yvas called Angelina, of vyhom the Marquis Don Francisco Picarro begat a Son. called Francisco, vyho vyhen vve vvere of the Age of eight or nine years, vvasa great Antagonist and Competitor with me for running and leaving, his Uncle yvas Goncalo Picarro. This Marquis had also a Daughter called Francisca, vividi vyas very beautifull, and Married aftervyards to his Uncle Hernando Picarro; her Father begat her upon a Daughter of Huayna Gapac, called Thes Huallas Nusta, vyho yuas afterwards Married to Martin de Ampuero, an Inhabitant of the City of los Reges. The Son of the Marquis, and another of Gonçalo Picarro, coming into Spain, dyed young, to the great grief of those who knew them, being the hope full Off-spring of such renovened Fathers: But as to the other Daughter of dishualpa, I may mistake her Name, vvhich vvas either Beariz or Isabel, she Married vyith a Spaniard called Blus Gomera; and Wedded a second time vyith a Gentleman, who was of Spanish and Edian Bloud, called Sanco de Rojas, but his on was called Francisco Arabuaspa, he was a very handsome Youth, well shaped, and of a lovely countenance, as were all the other Incas and Pallas, but he dved vount. We shall shortly mention him on occasion of a Story which my old Uncle, the Brother of my Mother, told me, when he related the Cruelties of Atahualpa, There was another Son of Huana Capac remaining, with whom I was not acquainted, he was called Manco Inca, and was the lawfull Heir to the Empire, for Husley dved without Issue Male, of whom we shall make mention hereaster.

CHAP. XXXIX.

Of what farther Cruelty was used towards the Servants of the Court.

But to return to the Cruelties of Atahualpa, who not content with the death and flaughter of all the Royal Family, together with the Lords, Captains and Nobility, proceeded to Maffacre all the Servants of the Court, who were Domelicks within the Houle; of whose Function and several Ministeries we have given a particular in its place, for these were not particular persons, but whole Villags, to whose care it belonged to provide Servants for the Court, and to change and after them according to their times of waiting; with these also Atahualpa had and are them according to their times of watting; with their and Ziaomapa had a quariel for the Relation they had to the Court, as also because they bore the Name of Inca, which was conferred on them by that privilege and favour which the first Inca Manco Capac conferred on them. Upon these Atabualpa vented his Cruelties, but with more exquisite torment on such who were more near Attendants on the Person of the King, such as Porters, Keepers of the Wardrobe, and lewels, Butlers, Cooks, and the like; with whose lives not contenting himself, together with the bloud of their Wives and Children, he proceeded to burn and defroy their Houses and Villages which they inhabited; but such as were Servants at a farther distance, such as Cleavers of Wood, and Drawers of Water, were more gently treated; for some of those they decimated, killing every tenth or fifth Man, in some places every third Man; so that all the Villages within fix or feven Leagues of Cozco suffered a particular and extraordinary Persecution, befides the general calamity in which the whole Empire was involved, being filled in all places with Slaughter, Fire, Robberies, Rapes and Violences, with what other mileries and devaltation the licence of an unbridled Souldiery can exercise upon a Nation. Nor were the Cities and Towns which were remote from Cozco exempt from the like calamities; for fo foon as Arahualpa heard of the Imprisonment of Huascar, he entred all the Countries which were bordering on his Fronment or thagear, he chited an the Countries which is called Cannaria, because its with Fire and Sword, and particularly that which is called Cannaria, because at the beginning they refused to yield him Obedience: In revenge for which, so some as he gained power he treated them with all the severity imaginable; which deputin Carate in the 15th Chapter of his Book, expresses in these Words: "Coming into the Province of Cannaris he affassinated fixty thousand Men, being "they had made opposition against him, and putting all to Fire and Sword, he lid wholly waste the Plantation of Timibamba, which is situate in a Plain, and "watered with three streams; and thence proceeding in his Conquests, left not one Man alive of all those who defended themselves, &c. the like Francisco Lofre reports almost in the same Words. But Peter de Cieça is more large in his Relation, faying that the want of Men, and the abundance of Women in his time soun, laying that the want of then, and the abundance or votinen in his time belonging to the Province of Comparis, was the cause, that in the Wars of the Spatiards, the Writers thereof mentioned Indian Men for Indian Women, for to them they gave Commands in the Army. And in giving the reason for it, he useth these Words in the 44th Chapter of his Book. "Some Indians tell us, saith he, "that by reason of the great numbers of Women which remained, after that altabuling had deferoyed all the Men of this Province, whom he unhumanely "buckered and deservated butchered; and after he had routed and destroyed in the Countrey of Ambaro, the Brother of Gusters, called Above, who was the Captain General of that people; and had put to death all the Menand Children of that Province, coming with green Boughs and Palms in their hands to implore his Mercy; yet not being moved with fuch a spectacle of compassion, he with a cruel and severe countenance commanded his Caprains and Souldiers to fall upon them, and flay them "all, by which a miferable flaughter was made of multitudes of Males, as we have related in the third Part of this Hiftory; fo those who are now living

" fay, that there are fifteen Women in that Countrey to one Man. Thus far are the Words of Peter de Cieça; with which we shall end this unpleasing Story of the Cruelties of Atabaalpa for the prefent, and reaffume the particulars again in their proper places. And now occasionally upon these Cruelties, I was put in their proper places. And now occanonary upon their Cauchies, I was put in mind of a Story of Don Francisco, the Son of Atabualpa, who dyed some Months before I went for Spain, which is this: The day after his Death, very early in the Morning before his Burial, those few Incas, who were remaining, made a vibr to my Mother; and amongst the rest came the Old Inca, whom I have formerly mentioned; who inflead of condoling and faying, I am forry for your loss, because the party deceased was my Mothers Brothers Son; he said to my Mother, I am glad that the party acceased was my evolucies protected out in the late of the Oriverse, hath conserved you unto this day, in which you have seen the end and destruction of all your Enemies; adding many other expreffions full of joy and contentment on this occasion: But I not well understanding the meaning of this Drollery, replied to him, and faid, Uncle, why should we revoice for the Death of Don Francisco, since he was our Kinsman and Acquaintance? With which turning towards me with great anger and passion, and taking the end of his Mantle, and biting it with his Teeth, as the manner is amongst the Indiana. when they are in a rage, retorted upon me, and faid, What, you have a mind to be a Kinsman to an Auca, the Son of another Auca (which signifies a Tyrant and Trastour) who destroyed our Empire, and killed our Inca; who exhausted our Blond, and extirpated our Family; who committed so many outrages unnatural to our Kindred, unknown and abborred by our Forefathers : Give me but this dead Rascal into my hand, and you shall see me eat him raw without Pepper or Salt. Oh that Traytor his Father was furely no Son of Hu. ayna Capac our Inca, but some mean Bastard of an Indian of Quitu, with whom his Mother plaid the Whore, and abused our King; for if he had been an Inca, he could never have been guilty of those horrid Crucities and Abominations he committed, nor could such execusble designs have entred into his imagination; for considering that it was a fundamental Dectrine of our Ancestours never to doe hurt or damage unto any, no not so much as to their Eucmies : What Monster then of iniquity must this Man be, who violating all the Rules of Humanity, hath imbrued his hands in the bloud of all his Relations? Then do not far, that this person can be descended from our Lineage, whose disposition was unnatural, and dissern to the temper and constitution of our Foresathers. Consider what an injury you doe to them, to 14. nay to your felf, in styling 14 the Kinsmen of a most cruel Tyrant, who from the degree of Kings reduced those few of us, who escaped his outrageous hands to the condition of servinde and flavery. All this and much more this Inca uttered with fuch rage, moved by a fensible remembrance of those detestable cruelties which Atabualpa had committed, that the fatisfaction they received by the Death of Don Francisco was changed into woe and lamentations. And indeed this Francisco, during the time of his Life, was fo fensible of the commentated of Mankind towards him, which avoided his conversation, flying from him, as from the Pestilence, that he with shame abfconded himfelf, and lived retired within his own doors: the like also did his two Sifters, who hearing all places refound with Auca, which properly fignifies Cruelties, Tyrannies, and Misfortunes, were filled with shame and confusion.

What remains survived of the Incan Family.

A Long time after I had finished this ninth Book, I received Advices from Pers (out of which I have framed this Chapter) concerning the Reliques of the Incan Bloud, which being greater than I thought, I have added as pertinent to this Hiltory. For in the year 1603, they all joined in a Letter directed to Don Melchior Carlos Inca, Son of Don Alonso de Mesa, who lived near Cozco, and likewife to my felf, defiring us that we would intercede in their behalf with his Maielly, that he would be pleased to exempt them from Tribute, and from those grievous Exactions with which they were charged in common with other Indians; for performance of which, they delegated all and every of us with full Power and Authority from them particularly named, descended from such and such a King: and for better proof of their Lineage, they fent a Royal Tree of their Pedigree, drawn out upon a Yard and half of white Taffity, made of the Bark of the China Tree, descending from Manco Capac to Huayna Capac, and his Son Pauliu; the Chief Incar being all curiously painted in their ancient Habits; upon their Heads they wore the coloured Twist or Wreath, in their Ears their great Earings with Parteans in their hands in the place of Sceptres, being painted from their Breafts upwards. The Papers were directed to me, which I addressed to Don Melchior Car-In Inca, and Don Alonfo de Mefa, then reliding in the Court at Valladolid, because my other affairs would not permit me to attend this cause, in which I should o-therwise have gladly employed both my time and life. This Letter which was infibrribed by the Incas, was wrote by one of them in a very fair Character; the plusie, or flyle, was partly Indian, and in part Castillian, they being all now much conformed to the Spanish Mode, and it was dated the 16th of April 1603. I did not think fit to infert a Copy thereof here, because it is too sad and tragical, recounting the dolefull effate into which they were fallen. The Address is penn'd with fuch affurance of his Majesty's favour, that (as we all believe) when foever his Catholick Majesty shall be informed, and made sensible thereof, he will not onely ease them of their burthens, but bestow such privileges on them as are de-tent and becoming the Royal Off-spring of Kings.

The Scheme vyhich they drevy of their Pedigree vvas exactly framed, for the Kings who vvere Incas vvere painted in their several Figures, denoting on each fee the descendencies from them, vith this Inscription, Capac Influt, vithich is the Royal Off-spring, and is the Title in common to all, signifying thereby, how all of them vvere derived from the first Inca Manco Capac; then the Pedigree of every King hath its particular distinction vith different Names; by which appears, how every one descended from such and such a King. The Issue, or Progray, of Manco Capac they call Chima Panaca, from vwhich forty Incas are successively descended. That of Sinchi Rocca they call Raurava Panaca, from vwhence proceeded fixty four Incas. That of Lloque Tupanqui the third Inca, they call Habrawita Aplus, from whence are fifty three Incas. That of Capac Tupanqui they call Apu Mana, from whence are fifty ix. That of Mana Capac the fifth King, they call Use Mana, from whence are fifty five. That of Inca Roca they call Vicaquitan, from whence are fifty. That of Tabuar Haacac the seventh King, they call Apu Mana, because the fifth. That of Tabuar Haacac, and his Son Inca Tupanqui, being joined together, are called Inca Panaca, and make up a double number of ninety nine. The Off-spring descended from Tupace Inca Tupanqui, they call Capac Milu, which signifies no more than the Royal Progeny, which confirms what we have declared before concerning that Title; and of this banch there are onely eighteen. The Off-spring of Huana Capac they call Tumipana, in remembrance of that solemn Festival which he instituted in honour of the Sun, and celebrated, in that wide and open Field, which is situate in the Province of Camavir, where he erected Royal Palaces, and Store-houses, for support and accommodation of the Souldiery, together with a Monastery for the Select Virgins, and a Temple of the Sun; all which were so magnificent and stately, and fo full of Riches, and replenished with Provisions, that Pedro de Cicça in the 44th Chapter of his Book, commends them above the Skies; and searing left he should short in his commendations, concludes, that it was impossible for him to express the wonderfull Riches, which were contained within these Royal Palaces of the Incat.

In memory of the aforefaid Feftival, Huayna Capac determined to flyle his Off. In memory of the Name of Tumipampa, that to that Solemnity might give a Name to spring with the Name of Tumipampa, that to that Solemnity might give a Name to shis Off-spring, of which there were no more remaining than twenty two. And whereas Huayna Capac, and his Father Tupac Inca Tupanqui were nearest allied in the whereas Huayna Capac, and his Father Tupac Inca Tupanqui were nearest allied in the others; by which means very sew of them escapate and destroy them than the others; by which means very sew of them escapate and destroy them than the others; by which means very sew of them escapate and self-top them than the others; by which means very sew of them escapate his malitious cruelty, as appears by the List of such as survived; all which being summed up together, make the number of 567 persons; and it is observable, that they were all descended by the Male, and not by the Female line; for, as we have said before, the Ineas made little esteem of the Female race, unless they were ennobled by the Bloud of the Spaniards, who had been the first Conquever ennobled by the Bloud of the Spaniards, who had been the first Conquever ennobled by the Bloud of the Spaniards, who had been the first Conquever ennobled by the Bloud of the Spaniards, who had been the first Conquever ennobled by the Bloud of the Spaniards, who had been the single sole summers of their himself, and those of his Lineage, by their Christian Names and Surnames of their himself, and those of his Lineage, by their Christian Names and Surnames of their himself, and those of his Lineage, by their Christian Names and Surnames of their himself, and those of his Lineage, by their Christian Names and Surnames of their himself, and those of his Lineage, by their Christian Names and Surnames of their himself, and those of his himself the search of the Menal Menal Menal Menal Menal Menal Report of the Menal Menal of the three Spaniards of Noble Quality, who undertook the Conquest of Peru.

N the 9th Book of the first part of these our Royal Commentaries, we have shewed how the resolute Atahnalpa pleased himself with the thoughts of having by Tyranny and Cruelty secured to himself the Empire, little dreaming that a strange and an unknown Nation (who were the Spaniard) should in the most calm and prosperous time of his Enjoyments knock at his Gate, and by the same methods of cruelty cast him from his Throne, and deprive him of his Life and Empire. That we may prosecute this History with the most even thread; it is necessary for us to look some years back, and take our matters from their suff source and beginning.

The Spaniards therefore, after they had discovered this new World, were still they had already notified were rich and prosperous the net being contented with

Thus far are the Words of de Cieça. He was also in company with the famous Captain Rafeo Novoce, when discovery was made of the South Sea, and when Nowore de Dior and Panamas were subclued, he was then with the Governour Peter-Aria de Avila, as Gomara reports in his History of the Indies.

But neither Picarro nor Almagro being fatiated with their former Glories, this The fill after greater Actions, and incited with the report they had received of the simple and mean condition of the People of Pern; these two great Heros made an agreement together for the Conquest of it; joining with them Hernando de Luque, a Schoolmaster in Panama, who was Lord of Taboga. These three so. lemnly fwore in publick, and entred into Articles under Hand and Seal, never to forfishe each other in any Dahgers or Difocuragements whatfoever, that should happen untill they had made an entire Conquest of fern; and that what Riches or Booty they should gain, should be friendly and amicably divided between them. It was agreed, that Hernando de Luque should remain, and be their Agent at Panama, to order and provide for their Affairs, so as to yield them succoursthat Picarro should be employed in the Discovery, and that Almagro should go and come with supplies of Men, and Horse, and Ammunition, for relief of their Companions, who were immediately employed in the Conquest. This School-Master they called Hernando the Fool, or Coxcomb, and the same might be said of all the three; for who cannot but blame fuch Men as these, who having enduor an the three; for who cannot out plante fuch them as there, who having endured great Travails and Labours in the World, and already entred into years, to that the youngeft of them taffed fifty, and all of them tich and commodious in the World, yet that Men under these circumstances should engage themselves in new Adventures, full of uncertainty, without knowledge of the Country, when ther it were rich or poor, and without confideration of the hazards and difficulties of it, feems the Work and Defign of rash and adventurous Fools. But the good fortune of those who now enjoy the Benefit of their Labours, was that which called them to this Enterprise; or rather the Mercy and Providence of God to wards those Gentiles, who was pleased to make use of those means for propaga-tion of the Gospel in those parts, which he confirmed by such figns and Wonders, as very much conduced to the easiness of the Conquest.

Of the excellent Fruit and Advantages which have resulted from the Union and Agreement of these three Spanish Canalies.

This triple accord which these three Spaniards made at Panama, puts me in mind of that consederacy which the three Roman Emperours made at Las-1 mind of that confederacy which the three Roman Emperours made at Layma, a place near Bologna; but yet in comparing them one with the other, they are fo different in their feveral circumftances, that they feem to hold no agreeable comparison or similitude; for on the one side those were Emperours, and these but private and poor Persons; those treated of the Division of the old World, which had been the Prize and Conquest of their Roman Ancestours, and which they defired to enjoy with peace and plenty; but these engosed themselves into Toils and Labours, to gain the Empire of a new World, which was so unknown to them, that they were ignorant both of the difficulties they were to sustain in the Conquests, and of the value of their Victories when acquired. If also we consider the intentions and effects of one and the other, we shall find the same divestive, for that Triumvirate. Composed of three Turants, was concluded and confider the intentions and effects of one and the other, we mail find the fame diverfity, for that Triumvirate, composed of three Tyrants, was concluded and established on no other ground, than to exercise a tyrannical Power over all the World, and to afflict and destroy; but this was a design of three generous Gentlemen, each of which deserved an Imperial Crown, having no other end than to nemen, each of which deterved an imperial Crown, naving no other end than to earich the World with unknown Treafures, as every days experience proves, and as will be made manifest in the following Chapters. Moreover the intention of that Triumvirate was to betray their Allies, Friends and Parents into the hands of their Enemies, but this was to facrifice themselves for the advantage of others, that they might acquire a benefit equally profitable to Enemies, as well as Friends; all which appears by those immense Riches which daily iffue from the Bowels of theunknown World, and are communicated not onely to Christians, but even to the Gentiles, Jews, Moors, Turks and Hereticks, who enjoy the benefit of these generous Labours. But that which we ought primarily to consider, that by our Triumvirate Christianity was first introduced into the great Empire of Peru, and a Gate opened to the preaching of the Gospel, by which many faithfull Souls have been gathered into the bosome of the Church; so that who is it that can fufficiently admire or express the greatness of this Enterprise. Oh thou great Name and Family of the Picarros, how much are all the Nations and Inhabitants of the old World indebted unto thee, for those vast Riches they have extracted from the new; and how much more do those two Empires of Mexico and Peru owe to hee, for those thy two Sons Hernando Cortes, and Francis Picarro, and for thy Brothers, Hernando Picarro, John Picarro, and Gonçalo Picarro, by whose indefatigable labours those poor Indians have been drawn from the darkness of obscure Ignothree to the true light and knowledge of the Gospel. How much therefore is this Triumvirate to be approved, and applauded above that of the three Roman Emperours; of which Guichiardin, in his History of Florence, gives this Censure. Lai-193, a place famous for the League contracted between Marcus Antonius, Lepidus and Otacianus, who under the term and notion of a Triumvirate contrived, and executed fuch abominable pieces of Tyranny, as had never before been practifed, or named at Rome; but our Triumvirate deserves a quite different Character, as the Writings of Lopez de Gomer, Augustin de Carate, and other modern Historians will abundantly prove, whose Books and Relations we shall as often quote, as our subject matter on which we treat shall require a confirmation from their Autho-

CHAP. III.

Of the little Money which was in Spain before the Conquet of Peru.

TO make more evidently appear the great Riches which this Triumvirate porchased to the World, we must make a large digression from our design in hand, and for the more clear elucidation hereof, we must make use of the Authority of some Historians, who have noted and described the Revenue of certain Kingdoms, which before the Conquest of Peru were vastly short of that Income which they yield at present. Bodinus in his Book of Commonwealths shews both in general, and particularly specifies the Revenues of some Commonwealths and Princes, to have been of inconfiderable value before the Conquest of Peru, incomparison of their present improvements, and instances in several Estates which were mortgaged, or fold at mean prices; he tells us how fmall was the pay of Souldiers. and the wages which Princes gave to their Servants, and at how cheap a rate all things were fold; and in thort, that what was formerly valued at an hundred Crowns a year, is now worth a thousand; and that all Lands and Houses are risen twenty times in the value of their rent. Farther he inftances in the ranfome which Lewis the 9th, King of France, paid for his own Person to the Soldan of Eem; which he favs amounted to no more than five hundred thousand Florins, and this he compares with the ransome of three Millions, which Charles the first of France paid to the Emperour, Charles the 5th. for his ransome. Farther he adds. that in the Reign of Charles the 6th, which was about the Year 1449, the yearly Revenue of the whole Crown of France did not amount to above four hundred thoufand Franks, and yet in the Year 1574. When Charles the 9th dyed, the same Revenue was improved to fourteen Millions, and the like proportion of increase was advanced in all other Kingdoms and Governments, which Examples serve sufficiently to demonstrate in what manner all the World hath been enriched by the Treasures of Perm. And in regard that Our Spain hath been especially obliged to that Countrey, by the vast estillates of its Wealth from thence, we need not seek or borrovy proofs hereof from other Countries, but onely confider our oven, nor need vve to look many Ages back, but onely from the time of King Ferdinand, furnamed the Saint, vvho regained Cordova and Seville, of vvhom the General Hiflory of Spain, written by Don Alonfo the wife, makes mention; and tells us, that Don Alonfo the 9th. King of Leon, who was Father of King Fernand the Saint, made War upon him; and that his Son wrote him word, that as an obedient Child he was refolved never to refift him, and that he would gladly appeale his Anger with any fatisfaction that he should require of him; to which Don Alonfo replied, That he required of him the payment of ten thousand Maravedis, which he owed him, which when he had performed, he would then cease his Wars, and enter into Amity with him. The whole Copy of the Letter, written at large, we have omitted to recite for brevity sake; onely we have thought fit to repeat the Answer, which was wrote in this manner: That the cause of his War was for the recovery of ten thousand Maravedis, which the King Don Enriques owed for the high way which he had made to Santivannez de la Mota, and that paying this Money, the Quarrel should end; whereupon the King Fernando not being willing to wage War with his Father for ten thousand Maravedis, presently made him latisfaction; the which is related in the general Chronicle of Spain, and in the particular Life of King Fernando.

About the same time a certain Knight, who wore the red Cross as a badge of his Pilgrimage unto the Holy Land, named Ruy Dias, began to commit many infolences before his departure; for which Offences divers complaints coming againt him, he was cited to appear before the Courts of Justice, to make answer to those Accusations which were laid against him; upon which summons Diss making his appearance at Villadolid, where the Court then refided; but being informed of the appearance at manager, which were there formed against him, he in a rage and fury demany complaints which were there formed against him, he in a rage and fury demany companies which were there formed against min, he in a tage and tury departed thence, without giving any Answer thereunto: At which the King Fernando being highly displeased, immediately by process of Law banished him the Country; howfoever Diss maintained himfelf within his Castles and Fortresses, untill fuch time, that by Agreement with the King, to pay him fourteen thousand Managedis, all matters were compounded, and the Fortreffes were configned into the hands of the noble King Don Fernando. The fame History also makes mention of this following paffage, namely, That when King Fernando had possessing of one part onely, and not of the entire Kingdom of Leon, he left Manfilla, and went to Low, which was the principal City of that Countrey, where he was received with great joy and magnificent entertainment, and there crowned King of Leon by the Bishop of that City, and being in the presence of all the Nobles and Citizens, feated in the Regal Throne, Te Deum was folemnly fung, with the common fatiskaellon and rejoycing of the people, and from that time he had the Title of King of Cashile and Leon, both which Kingdoms were his lawfull Inheritance, defrended to him from Father and Mother; for these two Kingdoms had formerly ben divided, and bestowed by the Emperour to his two Sons, that is Castile to D. Sancho, and Leon to Fernando, and afterwards came to be again united together in the Noble Person of Don Fernando the third. After this the Queen Teresa the Mother of Tancha and Dulce, the Sisters of D. Fernando, seeing that her Son was become Master of the whole Kingdom, and that the was not able to make farther reliftence against him, she dispatched an Ambassadour to D. Fernando, demanding fome hare and convenient (abfiftence; which being granted, was much displeafing to some degenerate Spirits, who were in hopes of making a benefit to themfelves by the Wars between Cafile and Leon; of which Embaffy the Noble Lady Berengaria, Mother of Fernando, being informed, the laboured much to bring matters to an accommodation, being very apprehensive of the many Troubles and infinite Ruines which are caused by a Civil and intestine War; and for that reafon labouring on both fides, fine at length produced a Peace between her Son the King Fernando, and his Sifters the Ladies Sancha and Dulce, and prevailed with the King to flay at Leon, whilft she made a visit to the Queen Terefa, and her Daughters, then residing at Valontia. And then it was that Berengaria prevailed with Tom/a, and her Daughters, to quit all their Title and Interest to the Kingdom of Long in consideration of which King Fornando did oblige himself to give a yearly Annuity to each of these Sisters of thirty thousand Maravedis of Gold. To confirm this Agreement the King came to Benevente, where he met his Sisters, and there figned and fealed a Writing to them, to pay them the thirty thousand Maraveds of Annuity, making them Affigument on the places where to receive their Money, which was afterwards the Foundation of a happy Peace.

Royal Commentaries.

After this King Pernando being married to Queen Joan, he went in Progress to visit several parts of his Kingdom, and being at Toledo, he understood that Cordova. and other remote Cities of his Kingdom, were in great penury and diffress for want of Provisions; for supply of which he sent them twenty five thousand Maravalit to Cordova, and the like fum, to other Garrisons. All which fin Il sums are particularly recorded in the Chronicles which write of the Life of Don Fernando the Saint.

CHAP. V.

Shewing how little the Conquest of the new World cost unto the Kings of Castile.

Being come now to our ultimate Argument to prove the small quantity of Money which was then in Spain, before the time that the Conquest of my Countrey was effected; we cannot give a more pregnant instance, than by demonstrating how little the most rich Empire of Pern, and all the new World, not before known, cost the Kings of Castile. Francis Lopez in his General History of the Indies, having recounted many remarkable passages, we shall saithfully recise such of them as are most pertinent to our purpose; as namely, That Chrispher Columbus treated with Henry the 7th, King of England, about the Discovery of the Indies, as also with Associated the strength of England, about the Discovery of the Indies, as also with Associated the strength of England, which last was the King's Cosinographer, encouraged him to make his Applications to the Court of Spain, where they believed his Propositions might find a gratious reception: By these means Cosumbus was introduced into the Court of Castile, in the Year 1486, where he delivered his Proposals and Petition to Fernanda and Islabella, King and Queen of Spain, but they being embroiled at that time in their Wars against the Moors in the Gountrey of Granda, had little leisure to convert their thoughts to Projects of this nature. And Columbus being but a stranger, and poor in labit, and without other Credit or Interest than that of a poor Iriar, whom they would neither vouchfase to lend an Ear unto, much less to believe, was the cause of great Discouragement and Assistance in the stranger of Spainavilla, who was Auditor General, gave him his Diet at his Caterie's House, taking great pleasure to be a him hopes one day to prevail with his Catholick Majesty in his behalf; the which he accordingly effected for him, by introducing him first to the knowledge of Cardinal de Mendaça, Archbissino of Toleda, who had a great power and authority both with the King and Queen of Spain. This Noble Person having maturely examined and considered of the Proposals which Columbus made, procured hi feemed vain Projects, and without foundation, howfoever he received good Words, and hopes of a favourable dispatch, so soon as the War with Grandla should be concluded. With this Answer Columbus conceived some statisfaction and began to be esteemed in the Court, for untill that time the Courtiers turned all his Project into ridicule, and derided it as a Dream, or a melancholy sand, and a Commission of the project into ridicule, and derided it as a Dream, or a melancholy sand, of the cold, Silvet, Pretious Stones, and other rich and valuable Commodities, and to receive and take unto himself the twelsth part of all such Riches, Royalties and Rents, which he should discover and acquire in those unknown Countries, without Damage or Prejudice howsoever to the Right which the king of Forngal pretends to those parts. All which Articles of Agreement were made, granted and concluded at Granda on the 30th of April, in the year when that City was taken and subclued, and confirmed in virtue of the holy Faith, and with all the Privileges and Graces of the Royal Favour; but in regard the King had moment where we then the state of the state thouland Ducats. And now here are two things particularly observable, one of which is, that with so small a sum as this all the Riches of the Indian accused to the Royal Crown of Castile. That so soon as the Conquest over the Moos was perfected, the Wars with whom had continued for the space of eight hundred years, the Conquest over the Indians was begun, that so it may appear how zealous the Spaniards have ever been to exercise, and employ their Arms against the Enemies of the Faith of Christ. By which it appears, that by the continued and constant solicitations which Columbus used at the Court for the space of seven or eight years before he could procure his dispatch, together with the help of sixteen thousand Ducats, all Spain, and the whole World hath been winched. And having now treated of the Royal Assen, we shall descend to more womon and particular matters, to evidence the truth of

The Value of common things before the Conquest of Peru.

WHerein the Authour enlarging himself by particular instances, at how cheap a rate all things were valued in Spain, in the same manner as in the 2d, 3d, and 4th Chapters, we have, for brevity sake, thought sit to omit, and for betardient to the Reader we proceed to

CHAP. VII.

Wherein two Opinions are declared concerning the Riches of Peru, and the beginning of that Conquest.

HAving already described to what sum the Revenue of Spain did amount in former times, it would now be very Grick Garden count to what a value it is amounted and improved in these days; but I must confess, that that would prove too difficult a work for me, who have no interest or communication with the Officers of the Royal Exchequer, nor fuch intimacy with them, as to obtain to great a favour from any of them; and indeed I amperfuaded, that if I had, yet the vast quantities of Riches which pass through their Hands are almost incomprehensible, and such as they cannot number, how much Wealth, or, as I may use our own Saying, who know not what colour Flower or Meal bears. Onely this we may aver, as a matter clear and manifeft, that all the charge and expence for equipping out the Fleet against England, in the Year 1588, was all charged on the Wealth of Peru; besides which Philip the 2d. King of Carlot State Control of the Wealth of Peru; besides which Philip the 2d. King of Carlot State Control of the Wealth of Peru; file, received eight Millions of Ducats from thence in the fixee of fix years, befides all other branches of his Royal Revenue; the which fum was commanded afterwards to be paid in the term of every three years. It is farther manifelt and apparent, that foon after Philip the third came to the Crown, that the Kingdom offered another increase of his Revenue to eighteen Millions, payable in the space of fix years, the which continues to these times, besides all other Rents and Duties paid to the Crown: By these, and other particular instances before mentioned, we may collect and imagine the great improvement hath been in the Kings Revenue; the several branches of which being much more various than those of rable advance and improvement; the fum thereof is become fo prodigious and vaft, as can fcarce be valued by the Skill of our Arithmetick. By which we may valt, as can learge be valued by the skin of our Arithmetick. By which we had conclude, that if that Man is to be effected poor, who can value his Richs, P.unperis oft numerare pecus, how much muft we be plunged in our account, when we come to reckon, and fum up the Revenue of that Monarch, in the circumference of whose Territories (as Colmographers describe) the Sun never fets? All which Riches and Grandeur are to be attributed to the fuccess and labours of this our Triumvirate.

And though it be true what we have faid before, that we had little acquain tance or communication with the Officers of His Majesties Royal Exchequer; yet at length, by the friendship which I gained with John de Morales, a Native of Ma drid, who was a very honeft and intelligent Gentleman; I procured some account of the King's Revenue, with which he was pleafed to oblige me, for the better advance of this Hiflory, which I now write; the which was fo difficult a work to him, that he kept me three months before he could fatisfie me therein; and at last he delivered me this following account, which I have extracted verbains from his own Paper. "Your Worthip was pleafed to defire of me, that to fewer particular occasion of yours, I would let down in writing the rents and value of all his Majesties Revenue; the which is a business so difficult, that I cannot fumm within any tolerable compass of certainty. And indeed, though the "King hath defired it, and commanded it to be given in, for the better direction and measures of his Council of the Treasury, and ordered all to be put into a "Book, yet that work is not as yet begun, nor do we know when it will be begun, much less when it will be ended, for there are such vast Rises and Falls, fuch Advances and Abatements, that nothing can be delivered with any certainty, every thing running in such different chanels, as is impossible to reduce them to any coherence of method; but in the bulk or lump, we may affirm, that "the Revenue of the King is a prodigious Maß of Wealth and Treasure. Thus farage the Words of Morales, which we have willingly alledged in confirmation of the truth of what we have said, being desirous not to write any thing but that which we san avouch on good ground and authority. And for farther proof of this dissolity, and how hard a thing it is to summy the Revenue of this King of Spain, now Emperour of the new World, I shall produce the Testimony of John Botero, a great and an universal Historian, who, after he had made a calculate of the Revenue of the King of China, and of the Rents which Galizia, Assurias and Portugal anciently yielded to the Roman Empire; with what was the Revenue of the Kings of Navarre, France, the Emperour, Poland, England, Duke of Lorrain, King of Scotland, Swedeland and Gobband; as also what was the Income of the House of Ansfria, of the King of Navarre, yet coming to the Revenue of our King of Spain, he is there silent; for which I can render no other reason, than because this Authour coming to this Account, he sound himself so plunged and immersed therein, that he durst not adventure to fathom the same; not having, as I imagine, numbers sufficient to sum up the Tribute of his many Kingdoms, and with them the immense Riches imported from Pern.

Royal Commentaries.

And in confirmation of the great Treasure with which Peru hath enriched all the World, I have this sarther Testimony to offer from the most Reverend Father Don Panlo de Laguna, who was President of the Council of his Majesty's Exchequer, and afterwards President of the Council of the Indies, and Vice-king of the New World, and in the Year 1603. was elected Bishop of Cordova; this great Person discoursing one day with his Confessor, and others, concerning the immense Riches of Peru, did considently affirm, that from one Mountain onely of Peru, there had been transported into Spain, untill the Year 1602. two hundred Millions of Pieces of Eight, which had been registred; and that at least one hundred Millions more had been imported without Register; And I can farther add, (laid he) that twenty sive Millions in Gold and Silver have been brought into Spain by one Fleat in my time. The Standers-by hearing this, answered, We could never believe it, my Lord, but that we receive it from so authentick an Authour as your Lordship. What I say In that we receive it from so authentick an Authour as your Lordship. What I say so Spain, joined together from King Pelayo to these times, have not been Master of Spain, joined together from King Pelayo to these times, have not been Master of Spain, joined together from King Pelayo to these times, have not been Master of Spain, joined together from King Pelayo to these times, have not been Master of Spain, joined together from King Pelayo to these times, have not been Master of Spain, joined together from King Pelayo to these times, have not been Master of Spain, joined together from King Pelayo to these times, have not been Master of Spain, joined together from King Pelayo to these times, have not been Master of Spain, joined together from King Pelayo to these times, have not been Master of Spain, joined together from King Pelayo to these times, have not been Master of Spain, joined together from King Pelayo to these times, have not been Master of Spain, joined together from King Pe

But fuch as look on the Riches of Pern with more than a common Eye, are of opinion, that they have rather been hurtfull than good or beneficial to Mankind: for that Riches have been the cause of Vice, and not of Vertue, having inclined the Nature of Men to Pride and Ambition, to Gluttony and Luxury; for enjoying an affluence of Fortune, they have given themselves up to Sloth, and Effeminacy, becoming neither fit for Government in the times of Peace, nor yet for Hardship and Labour in the times of War, employing their whole thoughts and time in contriving new Diffies, and Liquours, to please their Appetite, and fantastical Fashions for their Clothing; in which they are arrived to that height of extravasince, that they fearce know what to wear, and are come to that undecency of Des, that their Habit is more correspondent to Women than to Men. And as the Rents of the Rich have been railed to maintain the Lusts and riotous Living of great Persons, so have the Poor been oppressed, and reduced to Rags, and Famine, to support the Pride and Luxury of their Landlords. And the truth is, the Poor are become much more poor than formerly; for the quantity of Money being increased, which is all accumulated into the Cosfers of the Rich, hath enhanded the price of Provisions and Commodities to that degree, that the Poor starve by the abundance of the Rich; and though the Rich have a plenty of Money, and may out of their great stores enlarge their Charities towards the Poor; yet their Alms do not answer the price of Provisions which the plenty of Money hathraifed in the World; fo in thort they conclude, that the Riches of the new World not having increased the Provisions necessary for the support of humane Life, but rather ferved to make them dear, and Men effeminate, having enfeebled them in their Bodies and Understandings, and debauched them in their Habits and Cultoms of living, the generality of Mankind is become much worfe, and less contented, and having been formidable, and dreaded in ancient times by all the World, are now rendred mean and effeminate by the corruption of their Riches, Now

Воок І.

Now as to these two Opinions, I leave every one free to follow that which seems best to him. For I being a party, and biassed by affection to my own Countrey, dare neither pretend to savour that which applauds the grandeur and glory which Pern hath brought to Spain, nor yet oppose the other, less I should seem partial, and too affectionate to my own Caule. And so we shall proceed and take the thread of our History, passing by divine savour through the beginning, middle and end of this samous Triumwirate.

We say then, that these three great Men having entred into an Agreement and Society together, and affigned to each other his several and distinct Charge and Office. The first thing they did was to build two Ships, upon one of which Franch's Picarro, in the Yeat 1525 departed from Pannan with an hundred and four even Men, by license and permission of the Governour Peter Arias de Avila, and having sailed about an hundred Leagues, they arrived at a Countrey very mountainous, and subject to Rains: The Natives were as sierce and rugged as the Countrey they inhabited, and in great numbers sallied forth to join Battel with the Spaniards, of which they killed some 3 and in four Skitmissines Picaro received seven wounds with Arrows, but he being well armed, none of them proved mortal; howsover they were forced to leave the Countrey, to their great discouragement, repenting now of the design they had undertaken. Assay of on alterwards departed from Pannas, in quest of Picarro, and coming to the same Land which was appointed for their Rendervous, were entertained with the like treatment; for the Indians being stelled by the success of the late Skirmishes, sallied out against the Spaniards with like courage, and having killed many of them, and beaten out one of the Eyes of Assay, he was stored likewise to leave the Countrey; but what land or part this was, the Spanish Historians do not tell us: At length Assay going in search of Picarro, joined with him at Chinesama, where they agreed again to land their Men, but this Countrey proving as mountainous, and as subject to Rain as the other, and the People no less serves and wariske, sallying out upon them in great numbers, forced them again to retreat unto their Ships, bestowing on them a thousand Curses and Reproaches at their departure. All which is related at large by Lopez de Gomara, to whom I refer the Reader, in case he desires to know more particulars of that Expedition.

CHAP. VIII.

How Almagro returned twice to Panama for Succour and Recruits.

A Fter this ill fucces Almagro returned to Panama for new Recruits, and brought with him eighty Men; and yet for all this force the two Captains durft not attempt the Conquest of any Countrey, by reason that the Natives made a bold and shout resistence; howsoever sailing along by the Sea Coast, they came at length to a Countrey called Catamers, which was plain and level, without mountains, and abounding with such quantities of Provisions, that they furnished themselves with all things necessary for humane sustenance; and there observing that the Indians wore great Studs and Plates of Gold on their Faces, with sine Emeralds and Turquoises, the Spaniards became again elevated in their hopes, not doubting now but to make a good Voyage, and to gain Riches and Wealth to their full satisfaction. But soon after the Spaniards lost the hopes and expectation of all their imaginary Wealth, so soon as they saw the Indians come down upon them in great numbers, with good Orders, and with desire and courage to fight, with which the Spaniards became so discouraged, that they durst not engage with them; and though they were at least two hundred and fifty Men, yet by common confent they departed, and landed at a certain Island, called the Cock Island; where having remained for several days, sometimes in hopes, and again depressed with fear, as their different Rencounters and Successes were promising, or adverse, they began for the most part to despond, and wish they had never adventured on the betterprise; onely the Captains and Commanders remained firm and constant to their first Design, resolving either to overcome, or due in their Enterprise; with this determination they agreed that Picarro should continue in the Island, and that Almage of should return to Panama, to serch Provisions, and more Recruits, but many of the Souldiers growing weary and timorous, desired to return with him, which Almagro resused to admit, or to carry Letters, lest the Souldiers advising the dangers and hazards they had sustained to their Friends at Panama, should bring a Discountation and Discouragement on their whole Design, which they had formerly magnified, having cried up the vast Treasures of those unknown Countries: In pursuit of which the resolute Constancy which these Chiefs had should be estimate of those hidden Riches.

But whatever the Captains could doe to hinder the Intelligence which the Soulders might give of their Difaftures to Panama, they could not prevent or difaption the Advices, which Men in Diffres contrived to send for their Relief; for a certain Person, who was a Native of Trustillo, and for being of the same Country with Picarro, had greater Obligations to follow the Fortune of his Leader, found out a way to fold up a Paper within a bottom of Cotton Yarn, made up in the bigness of an Egg, in which Writing all the Disastures, and ill Successo of their adventure were related, being directed to a certain Friend, subscribed by many of the Souldiers, giving an account of such as were dead, and slain, and of the present straits and necessities they were in, as also of their Consinement, not being suffered to return to Panama; at the soot of which Advice, or Intelligence,

Good Mr. Governour, We pray you confider, That there goes the Fetcher, And here frays the Butcher.

I remember, that when I was a Child I often heard these Verses repeated, whenfever Discourses occasionally were made concerning the Conquest of the New World, which became afterwards like a Proverb, or old Saying, frequent in the Mouth of every one; and in reality they proved very prejudicial to these Chiefs, whose Design was wholly lost, and all the Money they had spent, and Labours they sufficiently came all to nothing: When afterwards I came into Spain, and sound those Verses inserted in the History of Lopez de Gomara, I was much pleased to see them there recorded, because I remembred to have heard them in the times when I was in the Indies.

Piçarro is forsaken by all his Souldiers, onely thirteen Companions remain with him.

Hen Almagro returned to Panama, it was then about a year fince this Enterprife was first begun, at which time he found a new Governour, called Pedro de los Rios, a Gentleman of Cordova, who having received and perused the Petition of the Souldiers, he sent a certain Judge, called Taspr, to the Cock Island, with Commission to free all such as should be desirous to return unto Panama. This Report being rumoured abroad, such as before had engaged themselves to go with Almagro, began to withdraw themselves, saying, that since those who were alterdy on the place, were weary of their Employment, and desirous to return home, it would be to little purpose for them to take up the Cudgels which the other had laid down; the which missortune Almagro, greatly lamented, having lost all his hopes, and Picarro, when he sound himself abandoned, and forsaken of all his Men, without regard to that Faith and Engagement of Articles by which they had affociated themselves with him, he remained perplexed, and distracted with great consusting of Mind; at length plucking up his courage, that he might distinguish who were for him, and who were against him; he laid his hand upon his Sword, and drew it, and with the point thereof he drew a Line on the ground, towards Pern, and turning to his Men, said to them:

"Fellow Souldiers, This Line fignifies the Labours, Hunger, Thirft, Wearines, Wounds, Sickneffes, and all other Dangers and Hazards which are to be fultained to procure this great Conqueft, even to the lofs perhaps of Life itelf: Whofoever finds himfelf endued with Courage fufficient to undergo this great Trial, and whofe Heroick Soul is capable of the generous Thoughts of this Noble Conqueft, let him, in token, and for evidence of his brave Spirit, pass on the other fide of this Line, which shall ferve for a Testimony between me and them of their Faith and Refolution; and let such as find in themselves a Cowardly Spirit, and a Soul too mean for so sublime an Action, let them return to Panama; for my part, I will force no Man, being resolved to remain here my self with those sew that will be my Companions, not doubting but that God, for the Glory and Honour of his most holy Name, will so affish us with his Divine Providence, that we shall find no want of those who out of Fear and Cowardise forsake us.

The Spaniards having heard the conclusion of this Speech, immediately hasted aboard with all speed imaginable, left any unlucky accident should prevent their return to Panamas; for as the difficulty and sear of Labour is always more prevalent in mean and poor Spirits, than the thoughts of Honour, or hopes of Riches, so these vile and abject Souls forsook their generous Captain, who would have conducted them to the height of eternal Fame, to return ignominiously with their Judge. Howsoever thirteen remained for Companions with Picarro, who could not be corrupted or discouraged by the ill examples of the Fugitives, but rather having their Hearts and Spirits more enslamed with Disdain against the cowardly and base, they courageously passed the Line which Picarro had drawn with his Sword, and there renewed their Vows and Protestations, of Constancy and Faith, promising to live and dye with their Captain and generous Leader.

Picarro having returned them Thanks, and promifed them the Prizes and Rewards of their Conquests, they passed over in a Boat to another Island, called the Gorgona, where they endured great want of all Provisions, living for several months and days on no other fullenance than with Sea-weeds, and great Serpents, and other creeping Creatures, of which that Island yields great abundance; and is miserably insested with Rains, and subject to terrible Liestnings and Thunders in which fad and difmal place and condition they fuffered Miferies beyond exmeffion. Of all these thirteen brave Heroes Gomara makes mention but of two onely; I know not his reason for it, or why he omits to name the other elevens but now I think on't, I have observed that it is the common omission and desect of Somith Writers, not to reckon particularly the Heroes of their Countrey by on opamps, for they ought to declare their Names and Surnames, their Families, Counname, ries and Parentage, that the memory of fuch Persons, samous in their Generation for the Conquest of a new World, may be conserved unto all Ages, and their Families boalt in the honour of being allied to fuch Ancestours. The two which Gomara mentions are Peter de Candia, who was not a Spaniard neither, but a Greek, and Bartholomen Rujz de Moguer, a Native of Moguer, and Pilot in this Navigation and Voyage. But Carate was more accurate in his Relation, for belides the two former he names feven others, viz. Nicholas de Ribera, John de la Torre, Alonfo mijemo, all Natives of Venavente, Christopher de Peralta, a Native of Bacça, Alonfo de Traxillo, Francis de Caellar, a Native of Cuella, and Alonfo de Molina, born at Obrda. Besides which recited by this Writer, there was another Ribera, companion to the former, whose Name I have forgotten, perhaps it might be Jeronimo or Alonfo, but to diffinguish them one from the other, they usually called them Ribera the Senior, and Ribera the Junior; not that one was much elder than the other in years, but by reason of their seniority in the Society with Picarro, for one of them was in the number of the first Adventurers which came from Panama, and the other was of the fecond or third Expedition, which came thence with Almaero; all which particulars I learned in my own Countrey from those who difcoursed of those times, and were for the most part Eye-witnesses of the matter of faet; both which Riberas had their Shares and Divisions of Indians made to them in Cindad Real, where they left Sons and Daughters, educated with all Goodness and Vertue. He whom Carate calls Alonfo Truxillo, was fames, for I was well acquainted with him, and know that he had Lands and Pofferfions given him in Coze, and that in the Year 1560. when I departed from that City, he was still living. Moreover Francis Rodrigues of Villa Fuerte near Cozco, was another of the thirteen, and one of the first which passed the Line, which, as we have said, Almageo drew with the point of his Sword, and was living in the year abovefald, onely two are wanting of the thirteen, whose Names we know not. And thus much we have faid to illustrate the History of Carate, in honour to those Families, whose Off-foring may well boast to have been descended from such famous Ancelours. The like particulars I shall mention in other passages, where I find that Spanish Writers have been defective, that so the Reader may receive entire fatisfaction in this History.

CHAP. X.

Francis Picarro proceeds in his Conquest.

Plearro and his thirteen Companions remained many Months in the Island of Gorgona, enduring great hardships in that Countrey where are perpetual Rains, without House or Tent, or any thing to cover them, and where the best and choicest of their sood was nothing but the slesh of great Serpents, so that it seemed, as if God had sustained them by a miracle; and indeed the Divine Providence appeared most wonderfully in putting it into the Hearts of all, besides these thirteen, to return, to demonstrate unto the World, that this Conquest was not effected by Humane, but by Divine Aid; for it is hardly conceivable how, humanely speaking, it should enter into the minds of thirteen Men onely, to adventure on the Conquest of Pern. Of which tierefore we can give no other Account, than onely that the Divine Mercy compassionating the Miseries and Ignorances of shose Gentiles, was pleased to incite and instance a fire of Courage in the Breasts of those Spaniarda, fitted for such an Enterprise; for as God did under the Old Testament insus shears and an account in the trength and virtue into the Locks of Sampson, so now he was pleased by such weak means as these to bring Light out of Darkness, and make way for the effusion and spreading of his Holy Gospel.

At the end of many Months (for a dispatch could not be sooner made) the Ship arrived which Almagro sent with Provisions, but without Men; a missortune so discouraging, that one might believe they would rather have been induced to return home, than perfift in their resolution. But God so influenced their Minds with strange hopes, that they figured, unto themselves a concurrence of all happy Omens in their savour, for they no sooner saw the Ship, than that they resolved to proceed in their Voyage, and discover at least what Countrey and what People they were, who inhabited under the Equinoctial, a Region as yet unknown to the Spaniards: With these Intentions they embarked, and at length with much labour they got out of the Golf in which they were embayed; for borth the South w zarding themselves amongst the Indians, onely they sometimes watched an oppormairy to get Food and Provisions by stealth and robbery, rather than by force of Arms, or open appearance.

CHAP. XI.

How Picarro, and his thirteen Companions, arrived in

A the end of two years, after they had quitted the Island of Gorgona, for fo long they had been in making their Discoveries on the Coast, not howing well whither they went, during which time we will leave the Reathe connect what Lentrenes and Frarchings they intrained, all which other Hilborians omit, not counting the steps, and degrees by which these Adventures proceeded. At length I say, they arrived at Tumpiz, where it pleased God to work a Miracle, that those people might receive, and embrace the Catholick Faith, which was this; the Ship being here arrived, the Spaniards observables. red that the Countrey was well peopled, and adorned with many good Houses, and more flately Buildings, than any they had feen in other parts, became very defirous to make a farther discovery; but how to contrive it was very difficult, for they were fearfull to fend one man fingly, left he should be killed by the Indian, nor durft they adventure in a Body, for fear of the like fate; at length to end the Dispute. Peter de Candia being full of Courage and Christian considence, offered himself on this Adventure, telling his Companions, that in each he were killed, their loss would not be much, considering that he was but a single person, killed, their loss would not be much, considering that he was but a single person, and that if he came well off, the greater would be the Wonder and the Victory; which having faid, he immediately covered his Body with a Coat of Mail, which reached to his Knees, and put on a Helmet of the best and bravest fort, he gir his Sword by his side, took his Target of Steel in his less hand, and in the ight he bore a wooden Cross of about a yard and a half long, which being the ignal of his Redemption, he confided more therein than in his Arms of Steel or lion. This Peter of Candia was a very tall Man, and though I did never fee him, rins Peter of Canada was a very fail ivial, and thought did never recently, yethis Son, with whom I went to School at Reaba, shewed me the proportion of his Father in himself; for being a Boy, but of eleven or twelve years of age, was as big as another of twice that age. In this dress Peter de Candia left his Com-Panjons, defiring their Prayers and Recommendations of him unto God, and then with a grave and ferious Countenance and Pace he walked towards the Inhabitants, with as much Majesty as if he had been Lord Paramount of all that Province. The Indians, who were in great confusion at the Arrival of the Ship, were much more affrighted when they faw a Man fo tall, and of fo vaft a proportion, covered all with Iron, with a Beard on his Face, which had never been known or feen before amongst them. Those who met him in the Fields ran away, and gave an Allarm to their People, and all taking Arms, ran into their Caftle or Fortres, which was speedily filled with crowds; but Peter still continued his grave Countenance, and Pace towards them, which when they faw, they were in great admiration, none daring to hurt him, for they believed that he was some divine or heavenly Apparition; but to prove what manner of thing he was, the Curaca, of Lords, agreed to try him with the Lion and Tyger which Huanna Capac had recommended to their Cultody, (as we have already related in the Hiltory of his Life,) which when they had let loofe, they expected that they should kill and tear him in pieces, but this ftory is briefly related by Peter de Cieça, in the Account he gives of the Conquests and Actions of Huayna Capac in this great Province of Tumpie, the which I thought fit to transcribe word for word, that so I might have the Tellimony of a Spanish Authour, in confirmation of the truth of what I have wrote, and with the tame occasion describe the beauty of that plessant Valley of Tumbiz, for so that Authour writes. "In regard, faith he, that the Inhabitants of the Isle of Puna were always at variance with the Natives of Tumbez, the Captains of the Inga built a Fortress, which perhaps then designed with intention to employ the People, and divert their Minds from "their unreasonable Wars and Debates. So soon as this Fortress was finished "Gunyna Capal came thicher, and commanded that a Temple should be bull, and dedicated to the Sun, near to the Fortress of Tumbez, and that two hunder ded Virgins, chosen out of the most beautiful Ladies belonging to Noble Families of that Countrey, should have their Lodgings therein. In this Fortist Tumber of the Countrey, should have their Lodgings therein. Families of that Countrey, thould have their Lodgings therein. In this Fortres (of which there remain some Ruines to this day) Guayna Capac did, by his Deputy gather and collect the Tributes of the People, and laid them up there, with many pretious sewels, as also all Provisions for the Souldiers of the Garrison, and for those which marched that way; also they report, that in this Fortress the Lion and Tiger were kept, which had been sent thister by Guayna Capac, and were the same which they let loose upon Pedro de Candia, with intent that they might tear him in pieces, at that time when France property of the tothis Countrey, with his thirteen Companions, to make a Discovery of Park. In this Fottess of Timbez were many Silver-finiths, which made Vessels of Gold and Silver, and other pieces of rare Workmanship for " fervice and ornament of the Temple, which they esteemed holy and fanctifield, as also for service and honour of the bica; and for his perpetual Fame and lasting Memory, they plated all the Walls of this Temple with panes of Gold and Silver. And the Women which were dedicated to the service of the Temple had no other employment than to spin, and weave the finest for "of their Wool, which they performed with great curiofity. And in regard "we have in the fecond Part of this Hiftory related as much as we could under-"fland, or had reason to believe, concerning the Kingdom of Peru, from the time of Mango Capac, who was the first to the time of Guascar, who was the last King that descended by lawfull Succession; we shall add no farther in " this Chapter, than what will ferve to illustrate this History.

Thus far the Words of Peter de Cieça, collected out of that part of his History, wherein he treats of the great Riches of Tumpie, and of the wild Beasts which they set upon Peter de Candia, but proceeds no farther, reserving the remainder of his Story to be related in the third Part of his Works, which have not as ya been published to the World.

CHAP. XII.

Of the Miracle which God wrought in Tumpiz.

But to return unto our purpose: We say, That those wild Beasts beholding the Christian, and the Cross which he held in his hand, immediately loft their natural fierceness, and as if they had been two Dogs which he had bred up, came and fawned upon him, and call themselves at his Feet. Peter de Candia considering this Miracle which God had wrought for him, took courage, and froked them on the Head and Sides, laying the Cross upon them, whereby these Gentiles might understand, that by virtue of that Standard the savage Beasts had loft their ferocity, and were made tame. The Indians feeing this Wonder. conceived that Peter was no mortal Man, but descended from Heaven and from the Sun, and therefore with common confent adored him as a Child of their God the Sun, bringing him into their Temple, which was lined with broad plates of Gold, that so he might be informed in what manner they honoured and worshipped his Father in that Countrey.

And having shewed him their Temple, with the Vessels of Gold and Silver, and other Ornaments and Riches which were for the service of it, they conducted him to the Royal Lodgings of his Brothers the Incas, whom they esteemed also for Children of the Sun. Then they lead him through all the Palace, that he might fee the funare Halls, the Chambers, and Antichambers, together with the furniture of Gold and Silver; they shewed him also all the Vessels which were for service of the Inea, fuch as Jars, and Cups, and Pots, all which, even to the Shovels and Tongs of the Kitchin were all of Gold and Silver. Then they brought him into the Gardens, where he faw Trees, and leffer Plants, and Herbs, and wild Bealts, and creeping things, fuch as we have faid were placed in the Royal Gardens, which were all made in Gold and Silver, at which the Christian was as much astonished, as the Indians were to see a Man so strange, and wonderfull as he ap-

CHAP. XIII.

Peter de Candia informs his Companions of what he had feen, and therewith they all return unto Panama.

PEter de Candia being abundantly fatisfied with what he had feen, returned with all Joy imaginable to his Companions, taking much larger steps back. than his gravity allowed him in his march towards the people. He then informed them of all which had paffed, and what immenfe Riches he had feen, at which his Companions remained with aftonishment, being scarce able to give credit to his Relation; how dever being ready to believe what they fo much defired, they were abundantly satisfied with the Labours they had formerly sustained in quest of those mighty Treasures, and Riches, promising unto themselves the possession and enjoyment thereof, had they but the fortune to entice and persuade Men to adventure for them. And having thus discovered what they defired, and more than they expected, they returned to Panama, having not force sufficient to proceed farther. Angulin Carate reports, that three Spaniards remained on the place, after the others were departed; or, as Lopez de Gomara says, but two, who out of a curiosity of seeing those Riches which Peter de Cardia had mentioned, or out of a covetous defire of gaining some of them, in case they were such as were reported, refused to return with their other Companions. But it is not known what ted, refuled to return with their other Companions. But it is not known wat afterwards became of them, the Spaniff Historians say, that they were killed by the Indians, but that is not probable, because they were worshipped and adored by them as descended from the Sun; but it may rather be supposed that they dyed of Sickness, that Coast being very unhealthfull for the Bodies of Strangers; and these being those who perished from the number of the thirteen, dying, as is bethele being thole who perilhed from the number of the thirteen, 'dying, as is believed amongst the Indians, their Memory was forgotten, and no mention made of them in the Exploits recounted of the other Companions. These thirteen seminards consumed at least three Years in the discovery of Pern, as the Spanish Authours testifie. Angustin Carate, in the 2d. Chapter of his first Book, both thee Words: "Having made these Discoveries in the space of three Years, they returned to Panama, during which time they sustained much hardship, and underwent many Dangers; they endured Want, and Hunger, and received Wounds in their Skirmishes with the Indians; but most of all, their greatest disappoint ments were recognized from their owns civil Discovels and Dissortions the which Better the second of the processed of the property of the processed of th " ments proceeded from their own civil Discords and Diffentions, the which Pigarro did often by his prudence and gentleness accommodate and appeale; giving them great encouragement by the affurances he made them of the faithfulness and diligence of Almago, who was making provitions of Victuals, of Men, Horfe and Arms, and indeed Almago and Pigaro were both fo cordial, and zealous in this Defign, that they spared neither their Estates, nor their Lives in "this Adventure, having made themfelves poor and indebted, who were before the richeft of their Countrey. Thus far are the Words of Carate; likewife Geman avouches the like in this manner. "Francis Pigarro fpent three years in this Difcovery of Pern, having undergone great Hardthips, and Labours, with Hunger, Perils, Fears, and many other thaits. And fo concludes the Chapter.

Amongft the many acute and witty Sayings which are recounted of this famous Captain Francis Pigarro, and that which he would often use, when he perceived that his Companions were wearied, and difcouraged with various Labours they fulfained in this Difcovery, and also afterwards, when they were entired on the Conqueft, he would often fay, Miferable are we who harafi and wear out our felves to gain flrange Empires and Kingdoms, which neither we our felves, nor our Children, but we know not who, shall enjoy them. This Saying I have often heard reported from the mouth of those who were Ear-Witnesses thereof, and who were Companions with him in those Exploits. Likewvise those very Conquerours veould often repeat that saying, when after the Conquest the civil Wars arose between Gonzalo Picarro and Francis Hernandez Giron, in which most of them were flain; and in regard that Saying appeared a most universal Truth, every one would take it for his gard that saying appeared a more universal Fluin, every one would take it for his own, but certain it is, that it was the true prediction of Captain Francis Picarro, to the truth of which I also am able to give an Attestation.

Royal Commentaries.

CHAP. XIV.

Picarro makes a Voyage into Spain, and demands Aid for the Conquest of Peru.

FRancia Picarro returning with all possible diligence to Panama, acquainted Die-Rames Tracto returning With an pointed angence to Tamana, acquainted Diego de Almagro, and Hernaudez Luque, the Schoolmaster, his two Fellow-undertakers, with the immense and incredible Riches which they had discovered; with which News being overjoyed and encouraged, they agreed that Francis Picarro should make a Voyage into Spain, to desire a Commission from the Emperour, Charles the 5th for the Conquest and Government of that Countrey which they had discovered. But these three Associates had so wasted and consumed their Estates in this late Undertaking, that they had nothing remaining of all their own Fortunes, but were forced to borrow, and take up a thousand Crowns in Gold to defray the charge of this Voyage. Francis Piçarro delivered in to the Council of the Indies a relation in writing, wherein he gave information to His Majesty of all that he had seen, supplicating, that in consideration of his former Pains and Labours in the Discovery, and also of the Hazards and Expences he was for the future to undergo and fultain in the Conquest, adventuring the Bloud and Riches of his Kindred and Friends, to gain an addition of new Kingdoms and Treasure to the Imperial Crown of His Majesty, He would be gratioully pleased to grant him the Government of that Countrey. Many that heard Picuro publish and boast of such immense Riches and Treasure, did believe that it was onely a Sham, or a Decoy to invite Men to adventure with them, but a few years after verified the truth of his whole Narrative. In answer to this Petition His Majefty was pleafed to confer upon him all those Countries which he should conquer, with Title of Lord Lieutenant of Peru, as also of Captain, General, and Governour of all those Countries which the Spaniards should conquer in Pers, which then they called New Castile, to distinguish it from those parts which were named New Spain, both being gained after the fame manner; that is, as Strangers fay, at the coft of Fools, and Madmen, and desperate Fellows.

Francis Pigarro, to whose Name hereafter we will add the Title of Don, because in the Commission from His Majesty that Honour is inferted; for in those times the Title of Don was onely prefixed before the Names of Noble Persons, and was not half so common as it is now, when every little fellow assumes it, and the very Indiant, whether Noble, or not, in imitation of the Spaniards, give themselves than Trile, and are called by it. We shall also hereafter call Diego Almagro Don Dieg, for having been a Companion with Picarro in his Enterprifes, and equal to him in all his Undertakings, we cannot in Juftice deny unto him a share of his

Don Francis therefore having received his Commission, and fitted all things necessary for his Voyage, and being accompanied with four of his Brothers, and many other Persons of Quality of the Province of Estremadura, he embarked at fine province of the Province of Estremadura, he embarked at Scottle, and having a quick and profiperous palfage, he happily arrived at Panama: But Don Diego was much diffatisfied to understand that Don Francis had appropriated all those Titles and Honours unto himself, and not made him a sharer with him in those Offices, and Places of Truft, which were conferred by Commission from his Majesty, forgetting that he had equally suffered with him in all the Labours and Dangers which offered in the Difcovery: And in regard that  $D_{00}$   $D_{01}$   $Q_{02}$  had fpent more Wealth than he, having been much richer, and loft an Eye in the Service, he appeared not onely equal, but to have greater Merit than  $P_{12}$ .

These disgusts were heightned by others, who aggravated the unkindness and neglect of Pigarro towards his Companions, alledging, that from a natural Ambition he had appropriated all the Trusts and Dignities to himself; for which cause these two Companions became much estranged one from the other, until some Friends interposing between them, so reconciled matters, that they both agreed, and proceeded in their Enterprise; howsoever the Quarrel was not so well made up, but that there remained some reliques of it; for that though the Provisions were made, and all things put into a readiness, yet Don Diego could not so forget his Injuries, as to apply his mind with that zeal and warmness in his Office of making Provisions, as he had formerly exercised, which Hernando Pigaro more resenting than any other, and being a Man of a hot and fiery temper, did utter more harsh Language against Don Diego than any other; reproaching his Brother, and often charging him to be the cause of all the Wants and Hardships they sustained; to which Almagro's Brother replied, That Don Diego had reason to be remiss in his Supplies, and that it could not be expected that he should be so diligent in their concernment, who had been so bastled and neglected; and that though it were true, that according to Articles he was to share in one moiety of the Conquelt, yet being a Gentleman, and of a generous Soul, he more esteemed of Honour and Government, than of all the Wealth and Treasure in the Universe. From whence arose such as mortal Hatted between Hernando Pigarro and Don Diego de Almagn, which was never appeased, untill one killed the other. Howsoever the Difference for the present was falved up by the Intercession of some sober Person, whom Don Francisco Pigarro, and his other Brothers, who were Men of a more cool and gentle Temper than Hernando, desired to interpose, and make a Reconciliation, by reason that they were well assured to interpose, and make a Reconciliation, by reason that they were well assured to interpose, and make a Reconci

CHAP. XV.

Of the great Hardships the Spaniards endured in their Voyage from Panama to Tumpiz.

Don Francisa Pictors with his four Brothers, together with his Men and Horse, which were as many as his Ships could contain, set Sail from Panana, with intention not to touch any where untill they came to the Countrey of Tumpie 5 but the Southerly Winds always blowing in that Sea, which were contrary to the course they steered, they were forced to land a hundred Leagues short of Tumpie 5 so that sending their Ships back again to Panana, they resolved to march all the way by Land, esteeming it much easier than to turn to Windward for so many Leagues

But in their Journey by Land they fuffered much more than they would have done by the contrary Winds by Sea; for entring into a barren Countrey, void of all Victuals and Provisions, they endured hunger, and want of all things; and the way being long and tedious, over Mountains and Rocks, and their passage stopped by wide Rivers, they contrived to pass them with Floats, which they made of Timber, and Canes, and Rushes, which they fastend together, and with large Goards which they bound one to the other.

The chief Guide and Pilot over these Ferries was Don Francisco himself, who was well acquainted, and experienced in matters of this nature; the which he suffained with so much courage and patience, that for better example to his Companions, he would carry the sick and tired persons on his own shoulders over Brooks and Fords, which might be waded over.

After all these difficulties, they came at length to that Province which they call Casqui, where they found plenty of Provisions, and many Emeralds of the finest for, of which they broke many; for being not skilfull lewellers, they had an opinion, that the true Emeralds would not break, and therefore for a trial they proved them with Hammers upon the Anvil. The like they afterwards did in Tampie, where they broke many Emeralds of three or four thousand Ducats pice: But not onely these Spaniards fell into this errour, but likewise others, who afterwards came to this Countrey under the Command of the Lord Lieutenant Don Pedro de Alvarado, who destroyed many Emeralds and Turquoises of an inefimable value. But befides these disaftures, the people of Picarro were afflicted with a loathfome disease, which at first appeared with a twelling on their Heads and Faces, like Warts, and on feveral parts of their Body; but afterwards, when they came to a maturity, they were of the colour of ripe Figs, and about the bigness of them, hanging down as it were by a string, from whence great quantities of bloud iffued; the which were not onely loathforme, but very fore; and it was very ugly to behold fuch filthy Warts, or Wens, appearing on their Foreheads, Eye-brows, Nofes and Ears, for which they knew no remedy or cure. But this dilease was not so mortal, but that many of them who were seized with this diflemper, recovered, though feveral dyed; and though the difease was Epidemical to the Natives of Peru, yet it was not to to the Spaniards, many of which escaped the Evil. Many years after that time I faw three or four Spaniards at Cozco, who lay ill of that diftemper, but they recovered; and it may be attributed to some bad influence which was transient, for fince that time, that fickness hath not been known. With all these Labours, Diseases, and Death of his Companions, Don Francisco was not difinayed, always thewing himself as forward to adventure himfelf first in dangers, as he was carefull in the cure of his Friends and Souldiers. To Panama he lent twenty four or twenty five thousand Ducats of Gold to supply Don Diego de Almagro with Money, that to he might be enabled to furnish those necessary fuccours of which they had occasion; part of which Gold he gained by War, and part by the ransome of such whom he had taken Captives. Thus proceeding forwards to Timpiz, he overtook another party of Spaniards, who being moved with the report and fame of the mighty Riches of Peru, came from Nicaragna to that Countrey; their Captains, or Leaders, were Sebaffian de Belaleagar, and John Fernandez; with which happy rencounter Pigarro was highly pleafed, ye teafon that his own numbers were efteened infufficient for that Conqueft. Sebaffian de Belaleagar was by the Name of his Family properly called Mopano, but he rather chose to take his Appellation from his Countrey; he was a Twin of three, that is, two Sons and one Daughtet, born at the same Birth: His Brother was called Favian Garcia Mogano, and his Sister Anastrasa, they were both valiant and courageous, as was their elder Brother, and especially the Sister. This Relation I received from a Friar of the Order of St. Francis, who himself was a Native of Belascard was well acquainted with the whole Family of Sebastian de Rallegare. proceeding forwards to Timpiz, he overtook another party of Spaniards, who he lateagar, and was well acquainted with the whole Family of Sebaftian de Belaleacar The which Relation this Friar the more willingly gave me, because he knew that I was Writing this History, wherein I was glad to relate the extraordinary Birth of this famous Souldier.

CHAP. XVI.

The Spaniards make themselves Masters of Tumpiz, and the Island of Puna.

Don Francisco Picarro being well recruited with Spanish Souldiers, adventured on the Conquest of Puna, where Fame would have it, that there was much Gold and Silver, and great Riches; to this Island, which was twelve Leagues with in the Sea, they passed over on Floats with great hazard; and being arrived on the Land, they had many Battels with the Natives, who killed four Spaniards, and wounded divers others, amongst which was Hernando Pigarro, who received and wounded with States, another a hurt on his Knee; but the Opaniards prevailed with great flaughter on the Indians; and with that Victory gained great spoils of Gold, Silver, and Cloths, which they immediately divided amongst themselves; before the people which Hernands de Soto brought from Nicaragua, could come up to them, for he had been dispatched from that place by Almagro to carry Succours of Men and Horse to Picarro: Of which booty Soto having received advice, he made fuch hafte, that he arrived with them at the time when they were removing their Camp thence. Picarrobeing re-inforced with these supplies, thought himself strong enough to adventure on Tumpiz; and first to ingratiate himself with the Inhabitants, he sent them by the hands of three Spaniards, in quality of Amballadours, a Prefent of fix hundred of their own Countreymen, whom he had taken Captives in the Island of Puna, in expectation by fuch an atonement and piece of generofity to gain peace and friend thip with them, hoping that those people, in gratitude for their liberty, and kind treatment, would have given so kind a report of them, as might have induced them to a commerce, and good understanding: But this ungratefull people finding themselves amongst their own Friends, altered the report which formerly they had promifed to give, and reprefented the Spaniard as covetous and thirtly after Gold and Silver; and more to incenfe their Countreymen, they reported them to be lafeivious Adulterers, and fuch as would defile their Wives and Daughtets. The people of Timpiz being ill affected, and prepoffeffed with this evil report did prefently, and without so much as hearing the three Spaniards speak, deliver them into the hands of their Executioners, who having put them to death, sacrifications in the spaniar of the s ficed them with fury and rage to their Gods: the which Story is confirmed by Gonara, and Augustine de Carate; but Blas Valera, who was a very credible Authour, fays, that it was onely conjectured, and believed to be fo, because they never appeared more. But the Governour of that Countrey faith, That one of these Ambassadours was drowned going over a River, and that the two others thete Ambanacours was unowned going over a ruver, and that the two others dved of natural ficknesses, to which that Climate is very subject, and unhealthfull over or natural networks, for it is not probable that the Indians, who had observed with what submission the Lion and the Tyger had crouched in a miraculous ved with what fubmifion the Lion and the Tyger had crouched in a miraculous manner to Pedro de Candia, thould flay, or facrifice them, whom they effect of Deities. Pigarro in his paffage over the Waters on Floats and Rafts, was in great danger, as were all his people, of being caft away by the ftreams, which in those parts are very fierce and rapid, for their Floats were very unruly, and uneafier to be governed; howfoever in defipight of all, they leaped on thore, and marched the people with whom after many Bartale the Candian and accounts the people with whom after many Bartale the Candian and the content of the people with whom after many Bartale the Candian and the content of the people with whom after many Bartale the Candian and the content of the people with whom after many Bartale the Candian and the content of the content of the content of the people with whom after many Bartale the Candian and the content of t to be governed; howtoever in delpight of all, they leaped on thore, and marched boldly towards the people, with whom, after many Battels, the Spaniards remained Conquerours; and thereby the Enemy being become cowed and diffnayed by the many flaughters which were made of them, they entirely yielded: And fuppoing that these destructions were Judgments of the Sun inslicted for their Sins, ing that there defined on were Judgments of the our innected for their Sins, they endeavoured to please and pacific their Enemies by Presents of Gold, Silver, and Jewels, which they had observed to be Commodities pleasing to them, and and Jewess, which may man observed to be Commonues picating to them, and the Motives which had incited them to all their labours and dangers; and moreover, the Curaca came with all humility to fubmit and furrender his Eflate and Person into their hands.

The Spaniards confidering how prosperously their affairs succeeded by the sorune of this one Battel, relolved to fettle their first Colony in these parts, which they called St. Michael, being founded on the day of his Festival; and in this first and ancient Colony they planted feveral of their Companions in the year 1531, to receive and give entertainment unto all fuch who were shortly expected from Panama and Nicaragua.

From this place Picarro dispatched his three Ships back again to Panama to bring him more recruits of Men, and supply of Provisions; and to give more life to the design, he sent above thirty thousand Ducats in Gold and Silver, besides Emeralds, as the fruits of his Labours, and as an evidence of the vast Riches of that Countrey. But we should have told you before, that Picarro (amongst the many other favours which he received from his Majesty in Spain) had the honour and privilege granted him to entertain a Guard of twenty four Halbardiers, for projection of his Person, and greater authority of his Office and Government: Wherefore having subdued and mastered Tumpie, he designed to make choice of fuch a Guard wherewith he might with more oftentation and pomp, than he had formerly thewn, make his entry into that Country. But he could not with all the promifes he could make, perfuade any of all his company to submit so low, as to accept of that Office; for it is not onely incident to the humour of the spaniards to be haughty, and fanfie I know not what high and sublime matters; but even those who are humble, and would accept of any mean and low employmeat in other parts, do no fooner enter into these Countries, but are immediateyelevated with a new generofity and greatness of Soul, that they from to accept of ordinary preferments: But thus much I should not have adventured to have faid, had I not received this report from Spaniards, who find the like inclinations within themselves. Howsoever, there were two of all the number who accepted the Halberts, with whom I was acquainted, who both in the Conquest of that Countrey, and afterwards in the Civil Wars behaved themselves like brave Souldiers, and in reward thereof the honour of Military Commands were bestowed upon them, with a share of Lands and Jurisdiction over the Indians; they were both killed in the War, though their Names I have thought fit to conceal for feveral respects. After Picarro the Governour had quieted and setted Tumpic, and the dependencies thereunto belonging, and possess the first the Riches, he respect to Cossanta, and make a visit to King Atabuapa, the same of whose treasure was extremely inviting; and the report thereof the more probable but he was extremely inviting; and the report thereof the more probable but he was extremely inviting; ble, by the apparent Riches which were found in Timpiz. In their March thither they paffed a Countrey uninhabited, and of dead and barren Sands, extremely hot, and dry, without Water; with which, for want of knowledge of the Country, they had not provided themselves; but at length they came to certain pleasant and fruitfull Vallies, where they were relieved with all things necessary for their reformance. their refrehment. At this place the Governour received an Embaffy from the unfortunate Huafear Inca, but hove and vehich veay it came from him, is doubtfull, in regard (as vve have faid) he vvas kept a close Prisoner under severe cuflody: But it is probable that this Meffage might be fent by fome Curaca out of compassion to the true and legitimate Prince of that Empire, vvho vvas detained and oppressed by tyrannical hands: the sum of this Message vvas, to implore vvith all humility, the Justice, Righteousness, and Protection of the Sons of the God Virtaceha, vvhich he did not doubt to receive from those vvho published and gave out in all parts, that their designs vvere to relieve and succour the oppressed. To vvhich the Governour answered, that he vvas novv on his vvay to administer relief unto the unhappy Inca, and to succour all others vvho vvere under vviong and oppression.

CHAP. XVII.

Of the Embassy and Presents which the Inca fent unto the Spaniards.

WO days after this the General received another Embassy more solemn than the former, from the King Atabaalpa, brought by a Brother of his own both by the Father and Mother's fide, called Titu Aantachi, who in few words declared, that the Inca had fent him to give a hearty welcome to the Sons of his God the third with a line in the good will be bore them, and of his defire to fewe them with all his power, he had fent them a Prefent of fuch things as their Countrey afforded, defiring them to refresh and enjoy themselves with the plenty of fuch Provisions as he had made for their Journey, for that both he and all his Subjects were defirous to fee his Kinfmen, who were related with him to their common Father the Sun, whom therefore they honoured, and to whom they promine the sun of t fed all obsequiousness and allegiance. And having expressed thus much in behalf of the Inca, he afterwards (for fuch were his influctions) made this Speech from himself: Inca Viracocha, said he, thou Progeny of the Sun, since it hath been my fortune to carry you this happy Message , I presume with this occasion to besech you, that you would grationsly be pleased to grant me these three Requests: In the sirst place, that you would essen my Inca, and King Atahualpa, for your Friend, and enter into a perpetual League of peace and friendship with him. Secondly, that you would forgive, and pardon what crime or fault Socver our people have either out of ignorance, or want of due consideration, committed against you : And lastly, I befeech you, that the punishment which by Command of the great God your Father Viracocha, you have inflitted on those of the Island of Puna, and those of Tumpiz, and other parts, you would moderate and remit towards those of Cassamarca, and such others whom you shall meet; and that in regard you are an Inca, and descended from the Sun, that you would pardon and exercife that Clemency, which is one of your divine Attributes. And having faid thus much, he commanded that the Prefents should be delivered to the Governour, and the other Spaniards his companions; the which Presents were Goats, Sheep, dried flices of the flesh of wild Beasts, such as of the Huanacu, the Vicunna, Stags, Elks, and fallow Deer; of which they brought many alive, that fo they might see of what fort of Beasts those slices of dried slesh were: they prefented them also with tame and wild Conies, Partridges both dead and alive, with Water-fowl, and with innumerable smaller Birds; likewise with Mayz in the grane, and some made up in Bread; as also with Fruit both dry and green, Honey in the Combs, and in Pots, with Indian Pepper, which they call Ochu, and great quantities of drink made of their Wheat, and of that grane which they call Mulli. Moreover, they presented many Vestments of the finest fort, such as those with which the Incas were cloathed, befides Parrots, Monkies, Apes and Marmofets, and other Animals and strange Infects, which, as we have faid, were common in that Countrey: As also many Vessels of Gold and Silver to drink in, with Plates and Dishes for the Table, with many Emeralds and Turquoises. And as a particular fignal of respect to the General, they brought him a pair of such Hose as the bica himself wore, with two Bracelets of Gold, which they call Chipana; the the mea immer work, while two Practices of Golds, milest city can coppen 3 the which two were for variety and change, because the mea wears but one at a time, and that is on the Wrift of his left Arme; which is a fignal of Military Honour, which none are qualified to receive, but those of the Bloud-Royal, or Captains, or when none are familiared themselves by some notable Acts of bravery; in resouldiers, who had signalized themselves by some notable Acts of bravery; in resources, who had inguitated them to so your hold hold to so to layer; in te-ward of which, the King conferred that Ornament with his own hand; and on both these reasons and respects Don Francisco was esteemed worthy of this fignal poin more reasons and place, he was believed to be a legitimate Iffue descended from the Sun, and their God Viracocha; and secondly, his Acts of Valour and Bravery did belpeak and proclaim him for a famous and renowned Captain. And thus having made their Prefents to the Governour, and his Spaniards, Titu Atanchi thus having made their research the covernous, and his opposituation, and his prefumption, of having made fo mean and low an defired them to pardon this prefumption, of having made fo mean and low an Offering to the Children of the Sun, unto whom hereafter they would endeavour Offering to the Chicago of the Sun, and whom hereafted they would endeavour to make amends by their future observance, and dutiful performances. The Governour and Captains taking very kindly their obliging Complements, and much more their Presents, returned in the first place their thanks to the Inca, and then to his Ambaffadour: but when they understood that he was Brother to the King, to his Ambanacous: Our when they underfrood that he was brother to the King, they shewed him extraordinary honour and respect according to his quality; and laving given him a short Answer to his Embassy, he returned fully satisfied, and with high contentment. Their Answer in floot, was this, That the Spaniards were come by Order and Commission from the Pope, or High Priest, to turn them from their Idolatry, and to instruct them in the true Religion of the Chriflians: They were also come from him who was Emperour, and King of Spain. who was the greatest Prince of the Christians, to enter into a League of Friendship, and a perpetual Peace, and to make an Alliance with the Inca and all his Empire, and never to doe them hurt, or offer them any violence, besides many other things which they would more at their leifure communicate to the Inca; but neither Gomara, nor Augustine de Carate make any mention of these rich Prelents, nor of an Ambassadour, who was Brother to the King, nor of any Answer made by the Governour; onely they freak of fome Hofe and Bracelets, which they brought to the Commander in chief, and of fome Ruffles or Cuffs for Shirts, but these Authours did not consider that the Indians in their natural Habit do not wear Linen. The King Androdya fent that Meffage and Prefents to the Spani-ord, with an opinion, that thereby he might appeale the Sun, whom they fanfied to be angry, and displeased by reason of the relistence, which the Indians of the Isle of Puna, and the Valley of Tumpiz had made against the Spaniards, of whom fome of them (as we have faid) being killed, they feared a thousand judgments and punishments for their Rebellion against those who were descended from the Sun, and their God Viracocha: To the terrour of this apprehension, the Prophecy which his Father Huana Capac had delivered, came fieth into memory: which was, that after his time a strange Nation, which was not seen or heard of before, should enter their Countrey, ruine their Empire, subvert their Government, and destroy their Idolatry. And now the King Arahuaspa did really believe that the time for accomplishment of this Prophecy was come; for that unless these sew spaniards had been affisted by the power of the Sun, who was angry with his people, it were impossible that so small a handfull of Men should be able to make such stages at they had done at Panama, Puna, Tumpiz, and other parts. And now fearing the like at his own home, he ordered his Brother the Ambassadour to make it. to make those three Requests, before mentioned, in his own Name; for though Atahnalpa was unwilling to discover any such fear, or timorousness in himself; yet the apprehension and dread of these things were so fixed in the mind of Atahualpa, that his spirit and courage, which was formerly brave and aspiring, was now become cowed and low with these imaginations, and became so intimidated, that he never durst make any resistence or opposition against the Spaniards. Those who confider well these matters, have a large scope to make reflexions thereupon; some attribute these Judgments to the Justice of God in punishment of their Idolatry, and Cruelties exercised on the true Family of the Incas; but others perhaps may with more reason interpret this Invation of the Spaniards to be directed by the gratious Providence of God, who out of compassion to the ignorance and obfourity in which these Gentiles lived, was pleased by these means to introduce the light of the Gospel into those dark and unknown parts of the World.

So from as the Ambaffadours were returned back again to their King, the so-So foon as the Ambaitadours were returned oach again to their King, the Syaniards made many reflexions, and put divers interpretations on the Meffage and Prefents which were fent: Some were of opinion, that those Gifts and Offering, by how much the more rich and magnificent they were, by so much more they were to be suspected; fansying that they were designed with intention to amuse and lull them into a kind of security and confidence in their faith and simplicity, were to be suspected; santying that they were designed with intention to anuse and sull them into a kind of security and confidence in their faith and simplicity, and so surprize and kill them with more ease and advantage; and therefore looking on these Presents as sallacious, and designed for traps and snares, it was argued that they should be the more watchfull and circumspect in all their proceedings: Howsover the other spaniards, who were the greatest number, being of a less suspections nature, were of opinion that these Gifts and Offerings were onely evidences of the good will of the Indians: And that though the Rules of Military Discipline did oblige them to be always vigilant and cautious in an Enemies Countrey, yet they could not but applaud and esteem the Magnificence of the Indians, the suspection of the Words, and the Majesty of his Embassy, which to render more honourable, he was pleased to perform it by the hands of his Brother, whose countesse and discretion were very visible both in his Reasons, and in his Comportment; though for want of a good Interpreter to understand the Language of Cacon, much of his sense and Periods; but in the rendering of them, the shirthy appeared in his Speech, which seemed to be uttered in long Sentences, with their due Accents, Pauses and Periods; but in the rendering of them, the Interpreter delivered them in such broken Speeches, without coherence or sense, that they were scarce intelligible to the Spanlards; but howsoever they took all in good part, that which was wanting in the words, being supplied by the better effects of Presens. That night, and several other days after, they cheered themselves with the Presens of Arabnassya, and so marched towards Cassanaca, where though they sound not the Inca, as was expected, yet they were received theme by the Indians, who, by order of the King, had assembled both Nobles and Commoners to seast and test the Off-spring of the Sun, and Children of the God Viracocku, strowing all their Cherobers and Logings with Elouvers and G order of the rang, had antended both Probles and Commoners to leaf and they the Off-fixing of the Sun, and Children of the God Viracocha, strowing all their Chambers and Lodgings with Flowers, and sweet-sheeling Herbs; likewise they entertained them with plenty of Meat and Drink; the care and charge of all which was committed to Cullqui Human, who was the Curaca, or Lord, of Cullamara, and who in obedience to the Commands of his King, did endeavour to exceed in all points of civility and respect towards the Spaniards. But amongst the many Services which the Indians shewed to them, there was one of fingular remark; which was, that they observing that the Bits and Curbs which the Horses had in which was, that they observing that the Bits and Curbs which the Horles had in their mouths, were made of Iron, they prefently imagined that the Iron was their Meat; and therefore not to be defective in any point of Service towards the speniards, they readily brought feveral Ingots of Gold and Silver, which they laid in the Mangers before the Horles, defiring them to eat of those Metals, which were much more delicate Meat than the Iron; the Spaniards who observed and laughed at this simplicity of the Indians, commended their kindnels to the Horfes, telling them, that they could not oblige them more, than by giving them good store of that Provinder.

CHAP. XVIII.

The Governour fends an Ambassadour to King Atahualpa.

THE day following the Governour held a confultation with his Brethren and Captains, touching an Embassy to be fent to the King Atahnalpa, whereby to inform him of his intentions to make him a visit, that so he might communicate to him the matters encharged to him by the Emperour, and by the Pope; for that to be filent, and make no returns, would savour of ingratitude, and little sense of the presents and kind treatment they had received. Wherefore they agreed, that since the Inca had sent his Brother on this Embassy, that they should correspond in the like manner by the Brother of the Governour, qualified with the same character of Ambassacours Accordingly Hernando Piçarro, and Hernando de Sto were sent to the Court of the Inca, not far distant from Cassacours, where had a Royal Palace, and commodious Baths, and where was at that time a numerous concourse of the Nobility and Souldiery, which stocked from all parts to had a Koyal Palace, and commodious Daths, and where was at that time a numerous concourse of the Nobility and Souldiery, which stocked from all parts to celebrate certain Festivals agreeable to their Religion, and with that occasion to reform several corruptions and abuses, which by the licentiousness of the Wars were crept in amongst them; and for the better security and conservation of his were crept in amongst them; and for the better fecurity and contervation of his own Perfon, and advancement of his own Tyrannical Power and Authority, he enacted and established other Laws and Statutes, pretending that they were transmitted to him by revelation from the Sun: For the truth is, though Atahnalpa had Murthered as many persons of the Bloud-Royal, as he was able, yet he was still jealous, and fearfull of those sew which survived, lest any Pretender should on the present of Religious advance one of the right line to be the true and legisiment. the pretext of Religion advance one of the right line to be the true and legitimate Heir; to which end he formed new Laws, pretending that they were derived from the Sun, to equalize and balance against the ancient Canons and Statutes of Religion. These two Ambassadours were in this manner dispatched with their Interpreter Philip, who though he was a Native of the Isle of Puna, and ill versed In one or the other Language, yet he was a receifary inftrument; and fin verted in one or the other Language, yet he was a neceffary inftrument; and fuch, as for want of a better, was very ulefull. With these two Spaniards the Curaca of Colombia and the Curaca of Colombia and the Curaca of the work of the and pomp to the presence of their King, encharging them upon their lives to passen whatsoever they should command. So soon as these Ambassadours had psted Cassanarca, they sent an Indian of Quality out of those who attended them to the King Arabussa, to acquaint him of their coming, and to demand his licence, that they might appear in the presence of his Highness: To which Message the Local made answer, that they should be extremely welcome, for that their Arrival had been long defired and expected; and presently commanded one of his Major-Generals with a great number of his Men to go forth and meet those Descendants from the Control of the Men to go forth and meet those Descendants from the Sun, and perform towards them all that Worship and Veneration which appertained to them. This kind Answer of the Inca cased the Spaniards of all the appertained to them. This kind Aniwer of the Inca cared the Spaniaras of all the fear and suspicion they had conceived upon the rumour, that the Inca was encome fear and suspicion they had conceived upon the rumour, that the Inca was encome fear out to Royal Baths and Palaces, they met about the middle of their Journey in an open Plain with those Companies of Souldiers which were fair out to receive them; which so soon as Hernando de Soto espied, he set Spurs to his Horse and baldle it was them with a full careful and the soundary. is Horfe, and boldly rid up to them with a full cariere, giving them to understand, that if they had been Enemies, as they were Friends, he alone had been fufficient to encounter with them; and then turning and carveting with his Horfe, he came and flopt near the Commander in chief. And here the Spanish Historians recounting this passing, that this Commander in Chief was Atabuaha himself and that the commander in the Commander with his Horse, at which himself, and that Soto came up to his very Chair pranting with his Horse; at which though Atabualpa seemed not to be dismayed, or altered, yet several of his people, who ran away and fled to avoid his Horfe, he caused to be put to death: But this Authour was mit informed in the Relation he made, for neither was Atahnalpa Llla

there present, nor whosoever he was, did he put any to death; for if their retired ment was onely to give way or place to the Horfe in his cariere, as was probable it was fo far from being a fault, or to deserve punishment, that it was a piece of civility and respect, which they desired to shew unto those whom they esteemed civility and respect, which they desired to snew unto those whom they esteemed to be Children of the Sun; and to have done otherwise, or to have obstructed the way and passage of these strangers, would have seemed a piece of implety and prophanation towards those whom they consessed to be of Divine Race, and descended from the Heavens. Nor was Atabaalpa so suppose this understanding. as to flay his own Indians in the prefence of the Ambassadours whom he had emas to flay his own Indians in the prefence of the Annoanacours whom he had employed to pay Honour and Worfhip to them, and to affure them of all fecurity and protection. Nor is it probable that Hernando de Soto would have been fo rude and discourteous as to ride up to the very Nose of the King, with whom he came to treat in behalf of the Emperour and the Pope: By all which, it is greatly to be lamented, when we consider with how little care. Men give Relations of passages which occur in those remote parts, without regard to the reputation of that peo-ple. The Inca Atabualps (as we shall declare more particularly hereafter) shewed ple. The Inca Atabusipe (as we shall declare more particularly hereaster) shewed himself very generous and real towards the Spaniard; 3, and therefore it may be lawfull for us to render a characker of his abilities, discretion and understanding with which Nature had endued him: For in regard we have made mention at large of all the Tyrannies and Cruesties, which he committed, the rule of History doth oblige us not to conceal the mixtures of Vertue, which appeared in him, unless we would approve our selves saile by writing a Romance in the place of true History. That which I report, proceeds from the relation of many Spaniards who were present at all the action, being such as I received from their own mouths, at those times of conversation which they passed in my Father's samily, when a great part of their entertainment was to recount the many business and accidents which on of their entertainment was to recount the many patients, family, when a great put of their entertainment was to recount the many patiengs and accidents which occurred in this Conquest; the same I have heard confirmed from several Indian, who at the visits which they made to my Mother, did frequently discourse of those who at the vines which they made to my Mount, and nequently discourse of the Actions, and particularly of what happened in the Reign of Atabadya to the time of his Death, attributing all the misfortunes which betell him to the Judgment of God, for the Tyrannies and Cruelties he committed upon his own family.

God, for the Tyrannies and Cruelties he committed upon his own family.

And farther I am able to confirm the truth of these particulars from the report for the by my School-fellows, who took the trouble to extract them out of the Historical Annals of their respective Countries where their Mothers were born, as I said in the first Part of this History. To these Relations I have the Authority farther to add of that curious and accurate Father Blas Valera, who was the Son of one of those who was a fellow Prisoner with Authorapa, and was born and bred on the Consines of Cassanaeva, and so might have advantages to extract the Records from their Originals, as he himself doth attest; and indeed he hash been support leaving describing the successive and malsings which occurred in that Kingdom. very large in describing the successes and passages which occurred in that Kingdom, and which by comparing them with other Relations, I have found agreeable to the truest reports. And farther I do aver, that I shall trace the same way that the Spanish Historians direct me, making use of their Commentaries in such matters wherein they may be usefull to me, and shall add and enlarge in what they come thort, or are deficient, as in many things they may be, for want of reading and knowledge of Hiltorians.

XIX. CHAP.

Of the Reception which the Inca gave to the Embassy of the Spaniards.

But now to reassume again the Thread of our History, We say, That the Major General which was sent out to receive Hernando Piçarro, and Hernando de Soto, having performed his Complements, and adored them with profound the 2000, naving performed his Complements, and adored them with profound veneration, turned to his Captains, and Souldiers, and declared to them, that these were the Sons of their God Viracocha; at which the Indians made them a low Reverence, beholding with great admiration their Aspect, Habit and Voice, and so accompanied them to the Presence of the Inca: The Spaniards being entred, were much aftonished to behold the greatness and Riches of the Royal Palace, and the number of the King's Family, and Attendants, and fuch was the wonder of both parties, that it is not to be determined which was the greater: The Ambastadours made their Obeisance after the Spanish Pashion, with low Reverence to the Inca, who was feated in a Chair of Gold; with which the King was highly pleafed, and franding up, he embraced them with much kindness, faying Capac Viracocha, Thos are velcouse to my Danihidness the which words Blas Valera repeats in the Indian Language, being very skilfull in that Tongue, the which I omit as not necessary. Then the stage attended to first all of Gold, which were prepared by order of the stage attended the stage attended to fit the stage attended to make no difference between himself and them, and more especially, because one of them was Brother to the Governour: When they were fate, the Loca turning his Face towards his Kindred who attended him, Behold, faid he, the very Face, Commensued, and Habit of our God Viracocha, in the Jame manner and form in the Inca Viracocha, our Ancessour described, and reported to have appeared to him. As the Inca was saying the things, two young Maidens, very handfome, and of the Royal Bloud, (which they called Nuffa,) entred into the Chamber, each of them catrying two final Cups of Gold in their Hands, filled with fuch Liquour as the Incas usual ly drink, and these were attended with four Youths of the same Kindred, though not of the lawfull Line, in regard their Mothers were Natives of the Kingdom of Atahuaha. The Maidens having bowed before the Luca, delivered one of the golden Cups into his Hand, and the other to Hernando Picarro, as the Inca directed. And then Tim Atauchi, who was the King's Brother, and he that was fent on this Embaffy to the Spaniards, told Philip, the Interpreter, that he should acquaint them, that the Inca was defirous to drink with them, which, according to the sufficient of their Countrey, was an evidence of Respect, Peace and everlasting Friendship: Hernando Picarro having understood the Words of the Interpreter, made a low Reverence to the Inca, took the Cup and drank: Then the Inca had a low reverence to the mea, took the Cup and mains: Then the mis having drunk twice, or thrice, of his own Cup, gave the remainder to his Brother, Titu Atauchi: Then he took one of those Cups which the other Maiden brought, and ordered the other to be given to Hernando de Soto, who Maiden brought, and ordered the other to be given to Hernando de Soto, who did the fame thing as his Companion had done before him, and the lica had ving drank twice, or thrice, as before, gave the remainder to his Uncle, called Choquebuamam. Having thus drank, the Ambassadours began to declare their Message, but the King desired them to desire for a while, that he might behold and desire the form of the Coal Missage. behold and admire the form and figure he faw in them of his God Viracacha; behold and admire the form and figure he faw in them of his God Viracacha; and at that inftant fix Boys, and fix Girls, very well habited, came in, bringing green and dry Fruits, of feveral forts, with their fineft Bread, and Wine made of the Tree Mulli, and with them they brought very fine Towels the Seed of the Tree Mulli, and with them they brought very fine Towels made of Cotton, because Flax did not grow in their Countrey; then one of the Maidens, called Pilleu Cica Nusta, made a Speech to the new Guests, and said O vou who are Sons of Capac Inca Viracocha, taste of these things which we bring you O you who are sold of Capac and a viacocia, the symmetry of many which will be a great contenuent and fatifathion to us. The Spaniard admired much to fee fach Civility and Courtefie in a people whom they reputed barbarous, and to live in all bestiality and filthines; wherefore, that they might not seem to contemn or flight that Courtefie which they fo freely offered, they are fomething of what they had fet before them, and then faid it was sufficient, with which the Indians were highly fatisfied.

The Speech of the Ambassadour, and the Answer of the Inca.

Silence being now made, Hernando Piçarro defired Hernando de Soto to speak and deliver his Message, for that more time was not to be lost, and likewise that he would be as flort and fuccinct as he could, that fo they might return again that night, and lodge with their Companions, for that it was not prudence to confide much in those People, who were Infidels, and who perhaps might shew them such Courtesie the more easily to ensnare and betray them: So then Hernando de Soto rifing up, made his Reverence after the Caffilian manner, and uncovering his Head, fate down again, and then faid.

" Most ferene Inca. You are to understand, that in this World there are two "Mott terene Inca, You are to understand, that in this World there are two fupreme Princes, one is the Pope, who is High Prieft, and fits in the Place and Tribunal of God, the other is Emperour of the Romans, called Charling the 5th King of Spain, who having understood the blind Ignorance in which the Natives of these your Kingdoms live, despising the true God, who is the Maker of Heaven and Earth, bestowing the Worship due unto him upon his Creatures, and upon the Devil himself, who deceive and delude the have four their Coursell of Coursell of Coursell of the State Coursell of the Stat them, have sent their Governour and Captain General, 'Don Francisco Picarro, with his Companions, and some Priests, who are the Ministers of God, to " teach your Highness, and your Subjects, the Divine Truth, and his holy Law; and for this Reason it is, that they have undertaken this long Journey to your Countrey; where having received effects of your Bounty from your liberal " Hand, they entred yesterday into Cassamarca, and this day they have sent us to your Highness, with Offers of Peace and Concord, which shall endure for ever between us, that fo receiving us under your Faith and Protection, we may " have leave to preach our Law, and that your Subjects may hear and understand the Gospel, which will be of great Honour, as also of Benefit and Salvation " to your Souls.

And on this occasion Blas Valera, who was a very religious and zealous Man for the Salvation of those poor Gentiles, doth very much lament that those important Words of Hernando de Soto should fall to the ground for want of a good Interpreter, learned in both Languages, and one who was affected with fuch inward Charity, as might have moved his Heart with efficacy to have explicated the force of those Words. But, alas, it was the misfortune of that Empire, and of the first Conquerours to have no better an Interpreter than this Philip, who was fuch an ignorant Sot, as not to be able to render the fense either on one fide, or the other, but rather gave things to be understood in a different manner, and with that barbarity as spoiled the Honour and Dignity of the Embassy, of which both the Inca and Standers by were fensible, finding that the Words of the Interpreter were of a contrary fense to the matter discoursed, which caused the interpreted were of a contrary senie to the matter encounter, which called the best to fay, This flammering Fellow runs from one word to another, without underthe med to my, and promone or enough the property of the media to more, without under-familing, and from one errour to another, that his Silence were better than his Words. Which Expressions of the Inca were more fignificant in the Indian than in the Spawhich exprended of the Lord were more figuration in the main than in the spr-nib Language. And also the Captains and Lords being sensible of the Defects mb Language. And and the Capania and Lords being leminor of the Defects of the Interpreter, did attribute the ill Expressions, and want of Sense to his Ignoof the anterpreter, and not to want of Understanding in the Ambassadours, whom they estectioned and not to want of Understanding in the Ambassadours, whom they estection med for Gods, and adored them for fuch, and accordingly the Inca returned this Answer to the Ambassadours.

Royal Commentaries.

" I am much pleafed, (faid he) Divine Lords, that you and your Companions " are in my days come into these remote Countries, that so I might see those * Prophecies and Prognoftications fulfilled which our Ancestours have left us, " though in reality my Soul hath much more reason to be fad, when I confider "that the end of our Empire approaches, of which, according to ancient Pre-"dictions, your coming is a Forerunner, and yet 1 cannot but fay that thefe innes are bleffed, in which our God Viracocha hath fent fuch happy Guetts, "which shall transform the State of our Government into a better condition, of " which Change and Alteration we have certain affurance from the Tradition of our Ancestours, and the Words of the last Testament of our Father Huanns "Gapac; for which Reason, though we had certain Intelligence of your entrance into our Countrey, and the Fortifications you made in it, and of the Slaughter you committed in Puna, Tumpiz, and other parts, yet neither I, nor my Caprains, have entred into any Confultation, how, or in what manner, we might expell you from hence, because we hold and believe, that you are the Sons of our great God Viracocha, and Messengers of the Pachacamac; for which cause, and in confirmation of what my Father delivered us, we have made it a Law, " and published it in the Schools of Cozco, that none shall dare to take up Arms against you, or offend you; wherefore you may doe with us as you please, it " being Glory fufficient for us to die by your hands, whom we esteem the Di-" vine Messengers of God, by whom you must be sent, considering the Actions you have already performed: Onely I defire to be fatisfied in one doubt, How " comes it to pass, as you say, that you come to treat of Friendship, and a perpetual "Peace, in the Name of the two before mentioned Princes, and yet on the other "fide, without so much as any Summons, or fending to treat with us, or know our " Will or Pleasure towards you, you have committed such outrages and slaughters "in the Countries through which you have paffed? I conceive that the two "Princes which employed you, have given you fuch Commission to act with " fuch severity against us, without any fault of ours; and I imagine that the Pa-"chacamae hath so commanded them to proceed, wherefore I say again, Doe your pleasure with us; onely I beseech you to have compassion upon my poor "Relations, whose Death and Misfortunes will grieve me more than my own.

The Inca having ended his Speech, all his Attendants which flood round about him, were so affected with his last Words, which declared the loss of the Empire, that they shed many Tears, with an abundance of Sighs and Groans, for what the Inca had now pronounced concerning the Destruction of his Empire, he had at other times formerly repeated. And whereas his Father Huayna Capae had uttered this Prophecy, and mentioned the time to be short, and ready to be sulfilled; Alahnalpa thought of nothing else, but concluded the Fate unavoidable, and the Decree of the great Puchacamae not to be refifted; the which supersticious opinion being fixed, and impressed in his Mind, was the cause that the Spaniards so eafily conquered and subdued his Countrey, and debased his Soul and Spirit at the presence of the Spaniards; amongst the rest of the Company, which was prefent with the Inca, were two Accomptants, or Hiltorians, who with their Knots made certain Ciphers, describing or figuring all the passages of that Audience, with the Words of Hernando de Soto, and with the Aniwer of the Inca, though all was very ill expressed by the Interpreter.

The Ambafladours were much aftonished to see the Lamentations, and hear the Cries of the Lords and Captains there present, and yet observed a steaddiness and constancy in the Countenance of the Inca, and not knowing the cause and reason of so much sadness, were touched with compassion and sorrow for them. And here Blas Valera much bewails the want of a good Interpreter, that might, by a true and saithfull understanding of all that was said, have given better satisfaction, both to the Indians, and to the Spaniard; for when the Ambassadours, heard talk of the Slaughters and Outrages committed in Prima, and Timpie, they were apprehensive that the Inea had entertained some thoughts of Revenge; for the Interpreter neither knew how to render the Words of the Inea, nor the Answer of the Ambassadours.

And now the Ambaffadours defired leave of the Inca to depart, and return to their Companions; which was readily granted them, the Inca faying, That they might depart in peace, and that he would speedily go into Collamarca, to visit the Sons of the God Vitacoolis, and the Messengers from the Pachscanac. The Opaliards departing out of the Kings Palace, could not but again admire the Riches of it, and the Adoration and Worship which the people shewed towards them; for as they were going to mount their Horses; two Cronacos, with their Servants, came to them, destining that they would not distain to accept a small Present, though unworthy the acceptance of such Gods, or Godlike Men, as they were, laying before them Riches of like quality as before, though in much more abundance, such as Vessels of Gold and Silver, with Ingots of Gold, and Wedges of Silver unwrought.

The Spaniards being strangely associated at this excess of Courtesse, began to quit all sears and suspicions of any ill Designs of the Indians towards them, blaming again the ignorance of their Interpreter, who for want of Expressionshad betrayed them to many Errours, as he did afterwards to many others, as will appear in the sequel of this History.

CHAP. XXI.

How the two Spaniards returned again to their Companions, and how they prepared themselves to receive the linea.

THE two Ambaffadours being returned, made a relation of all the Riches and Greatness they had been in shall be a relation of all the Riches and Greatness they had seen in the Palace of the Inca, and of the Courtesse they had received, which appeared by the Presents, of which a share was divided to every Person. Notwithstanding all which, like good Souldiers, and cautious Men, they prepared their Horses and Arms, not knowing the occasion they might have for them the day following, and though they well knew the multitudes which accompanied Atahualpa, yet like brave Spaniards, they were not in the least difinaved, but prepared to receive them; wherefore so soon as it was day, the Cavalry ranged themselves in three Divisions, of twenty in a Troop, for they were not in all above fixty in number; the Commanders, or Captains of them Were Hernando Pigarro, Hernando de Soto, and Sebastian de Betalcagar, who at first concealed themselves under two old Walls, that so their sudden Sally might give the greater fear and furprife to the Indians. The Governour himfelf was fupported with an hundred Foot-Souldiers, which in all exceeded not that number, and for their better encouragement, he put himself in the Head of them, on the side of the Tampu, which was like a great field, where they placed themselves to expect the coming of the King Atahualpa, who soon after appeared, being carried in a Chair of Gold on the Shoulders of his People, with fuch pomp, and Majesty both of Servants and Courtiers, as evidenced his greatness in Power, and War; before his Chair came great multitudes of People, who gathered up the Stones, and deared all the ways of Rubbith, or Impediments, which might hinder his Chair-Men in the way, or cause them to flumble; with him also came great Atten-Men in the way, or caute them to flumble; with him also came great Attendars of the Nobility. His Guards were divided into four Squadrons, confliting of eight thousand Men; the first Division, which was the Van-guard, marched before the King, like Scouts, or Officers, to clear and secure the ways; two others marched on each fide, like the Wings of an Army, as Guards of his Perothers marched on each fide, like the Wings of an Army, as Guards of his Perothers and a fourth marched in the rere: The Captain, or Commander in Chief of them, was called Ruminnavi, which signifies an Eye of Stone, from a Pearl of them, was called Ruminnavi, which signifies an Eye of Stone, from a Pearl of them, was called Ruminnavi, which signifies an Eye of Stone, from a Pearl of them, was called Ruminnavi, which signifies an Eye of Stone, from a Pearl of the Chief and of a League, which was the diffance between his Palace and the Quarters of the or a League, spaniards; in going of which he was more than four hours, and came not, as we opamarus, in points with an intention to fight, but to understand the substance of the Embaffy, which was brought to him from the Pope, and the Emperour.

**Anthonalpa was informed, That the **Spaniards** were not able to walk up any afcent, or fleep Hill, and that their Footmen either got up behind the Horses, or held or neep rint, and that their Ecotinest vitted got up common the stories, of need fall by the Pectorals of the Saddles, and so were drawn, as it were, whensoever they attempted to mount any steep Ascents; and that they were not able to run like the Indians, or endure any labour or fatigue like them; with this opinion, and with a fancy that the Spaniards were of Divine Race, Atahualpa marched without any jealouse or suspicion of that which afterwards succeeded. When the King law the Spanish Infantry in 60 small a number, and that, as if they had been fearfull, they had taken advantage of a Rock to defend themselves, he said to his People, Thefe are the Messengers of God, to whom we must be careful to give no to his reupic, a nege are the tracifergers of com, to room we must be careful to gove no Offence, but rather receive and treat them with all Courtefie and Respect: Which being said, a certain Dominican Friar, called Vicone de Valverde, taking a Crucifix in his hand, approached the Inca to speak to him in the Name of the Emperour.

CHAP. XXII.

Wherein is repeated the Speech which the Friar Vicente de Valverde, made to the Inca Atahualpa.

BLUS Valera, who was a faithfull and curious Collectour of all Paffages and Tranfactions of those times, repeats unto us the whole Speech at large, which Priar Vicente made to Atabualpa; the Speech consisted of two parts, and, as Valera faith, that when he was at Travillo, he saw it translated into Latin, and wit with the proper Hand-writing of Friar Vicente; which afterwards Diego dowit with the proper Hand-writing of Friar Vicente; which afterwards Diego dowit with the proper Hand-writing of that having had opportunity often to read it, I got it by heart, and by my memory am able to insert it here in the same to five the National Wherefore to proceed; when Friar Vicente distinctly than any other Historian: Wherefore to proceed; when Friar Vicente and name near to speak to the Inca, Atabualpa did much admite to see such a Figure of a Man, so different in Habit from all the others, his Beard and Crown being sacost him with a Cross of Palms, and a Book in his hand, which some say was a Breviary, others a Bible, others a Missal. The King, that he might be informed of the manner how he was to treat this Friar, asked one of those there Indianal Man, to whom he had committed the charge to provide the Spaniards with all things necessary, or equal with the other Spaniards? to which the poor simple Indian knew Man in the Committed the charge to provide the Spaniards with all fings necessary.

to make no other reply, than that he feemed to be a Captain or Guider of the Word, (he might mean perhaps a Preacher) or Minister of the supreme God, or Messer of the Pachacamae, and that he was of different quality to the others. Then Friar Vicente having made a low Obesiance and Reverence, according to the manner of Religious Men, with permission of the King, he made him this following Speech.

The First Part of the Speech of Friar Vicente de Valverde.

IT is necessary for you to know, (most samous and powerfull King) and also for all your Subjects, who are desirous to tearn the Catholick Faith, that you and they both hear and believe the things which follow.

First that God, who is three, and jet one, created Heaven and Earth, and all the things which are in this World. That he gives the Reward of Eternal Life to those that doe well, and punishes the evill with everlasting Torments. That this God at the beginning of the World made Man of the Dust of the Earth, and breathed into him the Spirit of Life, which we call the Soul, which God made after his own Image and likeness; by which it appear, that the whole Man consists of Bods, and a rational Soul.

From the first Man, whom God called Adam, all Mankind, which is in this World, is descended, and from him we take the original and beginning of our Nature. That this Adam suned, by breaking the Commandment of his Creatour, and in him all Men that have been born since his time are under sin, and so shall be to the end of the World; for witheir Man, nor Woman, is free from this original Sin, nor can be, excepting only ow Lord Jesus Christ, who being the Son of the onely true God, descended from Heaven, and was born from the Virgin Maty, that so he might redeem and free all Mankind from its Subjection of Sin; and sincily he dyed for our Salvation upon the Cross, which was a piece wood, in form of this which I hold in my Hands, for which reason, we that are Christian do adore and reverence it.

This Jesius by his own power arose from the dead, and forty Days after he ascended into Heaven, where he now sits at the right hand of God the Father Almighty. After which he left his Apostles upon the Earth, who were his Successory, who by their Words and Adminitions, and other holy means, might bring men to the Knowledge and Worship of God, and Observation of his Laws.

Of these Apostles St. Peter was constituted Chief, as are also his Successours of all other succeeding Apostles, and of all Christians, and as St. Peter was God's Vicar, or Vicagerat, so after him were all the Popes of Rome, who are endued with that supreme Authority which God hath supen them; and which they have, and do, and shall for ever exercise with much santity and care, for propagation of the Gospell, and guiding Men according to the Word of God.

The Second Part of the Speech of Friar Vicente de Valverde.

FOR which reason the Pope of Rome, who is the High Priest now living, having understood that all the People and Nations of these Kingdoms, leaving the Worsship of the true Maker of all things, do brutishly worship Idols, and the Images of Devils, and being willing to draw them to the knowledge of the true God, hath granted the Conquest of willing to draw them to the knowledge of the Romans, who is the most powerful King these Parts to Charles the 5th, Emperour of the Romans, who is the most powerful King of Spain, and Monarch of all the Earth, that so he having brought the Kings, and Lords, of Spain, and Monarch of all the Earth, that so he having brought the Kings, and Lords, and Monarch of all the Earth, that so he having destroyed the rebelliand Popel of these parts, under his Subjection and Dominion, and having destroyed the rebelliand dibedient, he may govern and rule these Nations, and reduce them to the knowledge of God, and to the obedience of the Church.

of God, and to the obscuence of the Control.

And though our most potent King be employed in the Government of his vast Kingdoms and Dominions, yet he received this Grant of the Pope, and resulted not the trouble for the good Dominions, yet he received this Grant of and accordingly bath sent his Captains and Souldiers and southers to execute his Commands, as he did for the Conquest of those great Islands and Countries to execute his Commands, as he did for the Conquest of those great Islands and Countries which are adjoining to Mexico; and having subjected them by serve of Arms, hath reduced which are adjoining to Mexico; and having subjected them by force of Arms, hath reduced them to the acknowledgment of the true Religion of session Christ, for the same God hath comtent to the acknowledgment of the true Religion of session Christ, for the same God hath commanded, that so it should be. For which reason the Emperour Charles the 5th. hath chosen for his Ambassadour, and Lienteuant Don Francisco de Piçarro, (who is here present) that so the Kingdoms of your Highness may receive all the benefits of Religion; and that a firm Peace and Alliance your enginess many receive an inevenies of neighbor, and come a firm reace and Amaince may be concluded and established between His Majesty and Your Highness; on condition that your Highmess, and all your Kingdom become Tributaries, that is, paying a Tribute to the Emperon, Thon maift become his Subject, and delivering up your Kingdom, and all the Administration and Government thereof, Thou shalt doe as other Kings and Lords have already done, and have the same quarter and conditions with them. This is the first point: Now as to the second: When this Peace and Alliance is established, and that thou hast submitted either voluntarily, or by constraint, then thou art to yield true and faithfull Obedience to the Pop, who is the High-Priest, and thou art to receive and believe the Faith of Jesus Christ ew God. Thou art also to reject and totally to abandon the abominable Superstition of Idels, which being done, we shall then make known to you the Santity and Truth of our Law, and the Fassity of yours, the invention and contrivance of which proceeded from the Devil. All which, O King, if Thou wilt believe me, Thou oughtest to receive with readiness and good mil, being a matter of great importance to thy felf, and to thy people; for if thou shoulds day, and refuse to obey, Thou will be projecuted with the Fire and Sword of War, until we have constrained thee by force of Arms, to renounce thy Religion, for willingly or unwillingly Thou must receive our Catholick Faith, and with surrender of thy Kingdom pay a Tribute to ow Emperour, but in case thou shouldst contend, and make resistence with an obstinate mind, be affured, that God will deliver thee up, as he did anciently Pharaoh, who, with his whole Army, perished in the red Sea; and so shalt Thou, and all thy Indians, perish, and be destroyed by our Arms.

XXIII CHAP.

Of the Difficulty there was to interpret the fense and mea. ning of this Speech of Friar Vicente de Valverde.

T Pon this Speech Phas Valera makes fome Reflexions, in order to the better understanding of his History; saying, that the Historians which treat of these matters make mention of this Speech of the Friar, but howsoever with there matters make membran of this special of the Lina, but however win fonce variety, for forme leave out the first part, and others the fecond, and fome have abbreviated it in their Relations. But howfoever Blue Valera faith, that four de Oliva, and Christopher de Medina, who were Priests, and skilfull in the Indian Language, and feveral other Writers, have specified this Speech at large in both parts, as booken by Friar Vincent, and they all agree, that it was a most tarrand rude Speech, without any mixture of fweetness or allurement whatsoever, and that the Interpretation thereof was much worfe, as we shall fee hereafter; and these Authours do much more approve the Speech which Hernando de Soto and Picarro made to Atahuaha, being more gentle, and modelt, than the harn and ill-natured Speech of Friar Vincent.

And now as to the Interpretation which was made to King Atahnalpa of these Words, we may believe it was very imperfect and corrupt; for this Philip the Indian, who was all the Interpreter they had, was a Native of the Island of Puna, and born of common and blockish Parents, and was scarce arrived to the age of twenty two years, and was not onely ill learned in the Spanish, but also in the general Tongue, spoken by the Incas at Cozco, which is different from that used in Tumpie; for as we have faid at the beginning, the Language of Cozce is more refined, in respect of all other Indians, whose Language is barbarous and corrupt. And moreover this Interpreter had learned his Spanish of himself, without Rule, and fome Words onely which he had gotten up amongst the Souldiers, and lewd People, fuch as zounds, and dammee, and the like; and befides he was but a Servant to the Spaniards, and learned onely to speak like the Negroes, and though he had been baptifed, yet he was ignorant of all the Principles of Religion, having neither knowledge of Christ our Lord, nor of the Apostles Creed.

This was all the Education and Learning which our first Interpreter had in Prru, and accordingly the Translations he made out of Spanish were all impersect, and of a contrary fense; not that he made his mistakes voluntarily from malice, but from ignorance, speaking, like a Parrot, things that he did not understand; as for example, when he was to declare, and explain the nature of the Trinity, as that God was three, and yet one, he would fay, God was three, and one, that is four, the which appears by their Quipus, which is their Knots used in the Countrey of Callamarca, where these Affairs passed; and indeed he was much to blame, if we constitute the constitution of the constitution o der, that in the Peruvian Language they have no words to express the Trinity, the Holy Ghoft, Faith, Grace, the Church, the Sacraments, and other Words of the like Mysteries; for which reason the Spaniards, who study that Language in our times, and endeavour to express their mystical Notions, are forced to coin new words most accommodated to the reason of this people, and to the manner of Expressions of the most intelligent Indians, who having understood something of the Spanish Language and Learning, have of themselves framed new Words to supply the defects of their Speech, whereby the Preachers are now able to express any thing in conformity to the understanding of their Auditory. We have upon divers occasions given several Instances of the Barrenness and Defects of the Peruvian Language; and therefore we ought not to lay the fole blame on our first Interpreter; for even in these our Days, which are twenty nine Years, fince that time, there are almost as many gross mistakes made by our present Interpreters, as were by Philippillio, who never converfed with the Spaniards in other Language than his own. In fhort, I fay, that I never knew an Indian who spake good Spanish, but two Youths onely, who were my School-fellows, and from their childhood but two Touchs onery, who were my demonstrations, and nonlitheir childhood went to School, and learned to reade and write Spanish: One of which was called went to senous, and learned to reace and write opanys. One of which was called Carlos, the Son of Paulla Inça 3, belides these two, I have observed so little curiofig in the Indian to learn the Spanish Tongue, that I never knew any of them who my in the manner of their fundy either of writing or reading thereof, and never exeraddition in the real stant what came by mere converte, and common discourse; nor were the Spaniards on the other fide more studious in learning the Indian Tongue; which neglect was so great both in one and the other Nation, that those Judian Boys, who were educated with me, did never arrive to any farther knowledge, than of common and familiar words; and when any thing was to be taught them of higher matters, I was conftrained to express them in the natural terms of their own Language.

Royal Commentaries.

And if the ignorance and little improvement in the knowledge of these Tongues was to be blamed in both Nations, after twenty nine years converfation and acquaintance one with the other, how little blame then ought we to object unto acquantance one with the other, now little braile then ought we to object unto this Interpreter, for want of skilfulness in the Tongues, when first the Spaniards ented into these Countries: Nay how little ought Philipillio, and the good Friar Valverde, to be reproached for their unskilfulness in these Tongues at the begin-Valuerde, to be reproached for their unskillulnels in thele Tongues at the beginning when now after eighty years that the Indian Empire hath been flubdued, there fill want words in the Indian Language to express the Mysteries of our Holy Faith. As appears by a Catechifin which Friar Diego de Alcobaça printed and published in the year 1585, in three Languages, viz. in Spanish, in the general Language of Coco, and in the Tongue peculiarly belonging to the Province of Appara; whereby it appears, that neither of the two last Tongues had words sufficient to express Theological terms without using the Spanills, making them terms of Art adjoyned to the Indian: As for example, in the second Question of the Catechism, Art thou a baptized Christian? the common Translation hath it, Batizascha Chucanqui? Whereby it appears, that the word Canqui is the onely Indian word, but the word Baixafea is made Indian out of the Spanifs. In like manner the fourth Question is, Dost thou know the Christian Dostrine? the word do you know is Indian, but the other two words are formed from the Spanish. Besides which there are ianumerable other words in the Indian Tongue derived from the Spanish, which for brevity sake we omit; and therefore we shall instance in these few words onely, which are taught to the Indians in the proper Spanish words; and are these: God fesus Christ, Our Lady, an Image, the Cross, a Priest, Domingo, a Feast or Holy-day, Religion, the Church, Repentance, to Communicate, to Pray, to Fast, Married, a Batchellour or single Person, amancebado, or one who keeps a Woman, with many other like words in the Catechism. And though it be true that some of these words, and others of the like nature, might be expressed in the Indian Tongue, as the Name of God, &c. Howoever it was with great prudence, and religiously determined in charity to the Souls of these people, to cover the Mysteries of the Christian Faith, with Chillian words; left these people, being newly converted from their Gentilism, and being taught Christianity in their own words, should retain the same superstitious notions of God, and other things according to the primary imprellions of their Idolatry, and therefore it was judged necessary to instruct them with new words, that so, if possible, the very Memory of their superstitions might be to-

Having thus excused Philipillio, and Friar Valverde, from blame for their bad interpretation; we must add, that the interpretation he made of the Friar's Sermon, ferved rather to obscure than elucidate his sense; for when he came to explicate he Generation of Mankind, and original Sin by Adam's fall; that inflead of faythe Generation of Mankind, and original Sin by Adam's fall; that inflead of faying. That all the World finned in Adam, he would fay, That all the World heaped their Sins upon Adam. And then fipeaking of the Divinity of Christ our Lord, he faid, He was a great Person, who died for Mankind: And then when he would Catholick Doctrine.

Coming to the fecond Part of the Speech delivered by Valverde, he made some fewer errours and mistakes than in the first, because that the matter concerned more exteriour things, such as War and Arms, which were more obvious to the lense; on which occasion he extolled the Power and Magnanimity of the Emperour, and his industry in fending Captains and Souldiers to conquer the World;

the which was so ill expressed, that the Indians believed he was Superious to all as well in Heaven as on Earth. Many other things he declared, which were as ill understood as those preceding, which for brevity sake we pass by and omir And here Blas Valera takes notice of a most certain and observable truth; that to this day, though the Indian Children which are bred up and educated with our Youth, so that Spanish is become almost their natural Language, or at least as easier to them as the Indian; and are very well instructed and catechised in the Princi ples and Mysteries of the Christian Faith, yet dare not presume to explicate the Doctrines of our Religion to the Indians in their own Language, for fear left the barrenness of their Tongue should not be able to reach the height of our musteri. ous Faith, and thereby administer occasion to them of many errours and missake So that if in these late days, wherein Men are both instructed in our Learning and practifed in both Languages, fuch difficulties do arise in this matter; what in. congruities, what nonfenfe, and what Chimeras may we imagine, were at first m. tered, when Men endeavoured to express sublime Mysteries with a babling and an imperfect Tongue?

XXIV. CHAP.

The Answer which Atahualpa gave to the Friar's Speech.

When Atahualpa understood the conclusion of the Speech, which was, That by fair means, or foul, he was to renounce and quit his Kingdoms, and to remain a Tributary Prince, for fo was the command of the Pope, and the pleasure of the Emperour; and when they threatned him with fire and sword, as appeared by the figns they made, by brandishing their Arms; and that it seemed as if nothing was prepared but ruine and destruction for himself and his Army, like that of Pharaoh, he became extremely fad and melancholy, believing that those whom they called Viracochus (for they conceived that the Spaniards were Gods) were turned from them, and become their mortal Enemies; and therewith he fetched a deep figh, and cried Atac, which is as much as Oh most unhappy and miserable; which wofull groan was an evidence of the forrow he conceived at the conclusion of the Friar's Sermon: But at length recollecting himself, he answered in the manner following.

Though you have denied me all the requests I made to your Messengers, yet it would be a great satisfaction to me, to grant me the favour onely to express your sclues by a more skilfull and faithfull Interpreter, because the Manners and political Lives of Men are better understood by discourse, than by signs or actions; for though you may be Men endued with extraordinary vertues and abilities, yet unless you make them appear to me by words and discourse, I shall never be made capable to understand them by outward signs and gestures: For if there be a necessity of a common Language between Nations, who desire commerce and conversation together, much more is it requisite between people so remote as we are; for indeed to treat by Interpreters ignorant of both Tongues, is like the inarticulate found of domestick Animals; and such, O Man of God, seems this discourse thou hast made me by this Interpreter. And now, so far as I understand, methinks the discourse seems much disferent to what your Ambaffadours lately propounded, for they treated of nothing but Peace and Friendship, of Alliance and Confanguinity; but now all the Words of this Indian are nothing but Menaces of Wars, and Death, and Fire, and Sword, with the Extirpation and Banishment of the Incas, and their Progeny; and that I must voluntarily, or by force, renounce a right to my Kingdom, and become Tributary to another. From whence I collect one of these two things; that either you and your Prince are Tyrants, and rove about to plunder the World, and to disposels o thers of their Kingdoms, killing and spoiling those who owe you nothing, and have never offered you injury or violence; or otherwife you are the Ministers of God ( called by us Pachacamac) whom he hash fent to vifit us with vengeance and destruction. And if it be fo, camac) moon we want from to one solves to death, and to what punishment seever you will in-bah I and my Vassals do offer our selves to death, and to what punishment seever you will inbolb I ana mj r njim we nji or out of any dread we have of your Менасев or Arms, but in just upon 10 3 non jon jon on on on the by my Father Huayna Capac at the time of his compliance with the Commands enjoyined to by my Father Huayna Capac at the time of his dath; which was, that we should serve and honour a Nation with Beards like your selves, acan; which were to enter into these parts after his days, and of which he prophesied some years before which were to and about our Countrey, and whom he declared to be Men of better Laws, of more refined Customs, more wife and more valiant than our selves.

Royal Commentaries.

wherefore to fulfill the Prophecy and Testament of my Father, we style you Viracochas. understanding thereby, that you are the Messengers of the Great God Vitacocha, whose Will unaerpanung was Indignation, Arms and Power, we are unable to refift; and yet we are afand treatine, pro and Goodness and Mercy: And for that reason you, who are his Ministers jurea, inai in in the will, ought to abstain from such Robberies, Slaughter and Violences, as you have committed in Tumpiz and the adiagent Countries.

Joh unev place, your Interpreter acquaints me of five great Personages, whom I am to advantage, The first is God, who is three and one, that is four, whom you call the Creato of this Universe; which perhaps may be the same, whom we call Pachacamac and Vi-181 9 in. The second is the Father of all Mankind, on whom all other Men have heaped thir Sins. The third you call felus Christ, who was the onely Person excepted, who did not test sint on the first Man, but that he dyed. The fourth you name is the Pope. The fill is Charles, whom, in comparison with others, you call the most Powerfull Monarch of the Universe, and the Supreme Lord of all: But then if Charles be the Prince and Lord of the World, what need was there for the Pope to give a new Grant, and another Commission on to make War upon me, and Usurp my Kingdoms? for consequently the Pope must be a greater Prince than he, and the most powerfull of any in the World. But I cannot but most admire at what you say, that I am obliged to pay Tribute to Charles onely, and not to others = the which you alledge without giving me any reason, and indeed I cannot conceive on what score I am obliged to pay it : for if I were bound to pay Tribute and Service to any, methinks it hould be to that God, who, you say, created all things, and to that first Man, who was the Faher of all Mankind, and to that fefus Christ who had no Sins to impute unto him ; and, in fine, if Tribute were to be given, it should rather be unto the Pope, who hath Power and Authority to dispose of my Kingdoms, and my Person. And if you say that I owe nothing uno any of thefe, I should imagine that I owe much less unto Charles, who was never Lord of these Countries, nor ever saw them. And if the Pope's Grant and Concession be obligatory tome, it were just and reasonable to declare it to me, before you threaten me with War, and Fire, and Sword, and Death; for I am not so void of understanding and sense, as not to obey the Pope, in case you can show me reason, and justice, and cause for it.

Moreover, I defire to be informed who that good Adan Jesiu Christ was, who, you say, ne-urlaid his Sins on another, but that he dyed. I would gladly know, whether he dyed of a natural death, or by the hands of his Enemies ; and whether he was numbred amongst the

And farther I defire to be informed, whether these sive which you highly honour, are adored by you for Gods; for if it be fo, you hold more for Gods, than we, who acknowledge no other than the Pachacamac, who is the Supreme, and the Sun, who is inferiour to him, and the Meen, who is his Sifter and Wife. In which doubtfull Questions I heartily desire to be truly refelved by some other move able and faithfull Interpreter, that so I may be made more empable thereby to know and obey your Will and Commands.

CHAP. XXV.

Of the great tumult and disturbance which happened between the Indians and the Spaniards.

THE Inca observing the inability of the Interpreter, endeavoured to affilt him in expressions his Answer: Find, by uttering his Speech by short periods, causing him to express one thing, before he proceeded to another; and, secondly, he spake in the Language of Chineas symbol the Interpreter understood better than the Language of Cocco; by which means Philippillio did better express the sense and intention of the Inca, though he did it in a most barbarous manner. So soon as the Inca had ended his discourse, the Keepers of the Language which were the onely cypher they had whereby to conserve their traditions to sure Aree.

ture Ages By this time the Spaniards growing weary of this long and tedious discourse, began to quit their places, and come up close to the Indians, to fight with them, and rob them of their Jewels of Gold, and Silver, and pretious Stones, with which they had that day decked themselves, that in a solemn manner they might appear in their finery, to receive the Embassy which was sent them from the Universal in their finery, to receive the Embaffy which was fent them from the Universal Monarch of the World: Some Spaniards also climbed a little Tower to plunder an Idol, which they had adorned with Plates of Gold, and Silver, and pretious Stones, the which outrage caused great noise and rumult amongst the Indian; which when the Inea perceived, he cried out with a loud voice to his people, that they should neither hurt, nor offend the Spaniards, though they should take or kill their sing himself. On which passage with Valent askes occasion to say. That as God by the presence of Queen Esther mollified the Spirit of King Andiversa; so by means of the Holy Crois, which the good Friar Valverde held in his hand, he charmed the Spirit of this Cholerick and Warlike Prince Anabinatya, not onely to a degree of gentleness, and quiet temper, but even to an entire submission, and humble resignation: the which we ought to attribute to a Miracle of the divine Mercy; for God designing to reduce this people to a knowledge of the true Doctrine of the Holy Gospel, was pleased by this, and other miraculous instances, which we shall find scattered in divers places of this History, to operate on the Spirits of this barbarous people. Some Writers blame Friar Valverde for this disorder, saying, the moved the Spaniards thereunto, and encouraged them to lay hands on their Weapons, requiring them to doe justice, and take revenge for the affront which the Weapons, requiring them to doe justice, and take revenge for the affront which the King had given them, by throwing the Book on the ground which the Friar half put into his hand; and fome fay this could not be the cause, for that neither the Friar delivered a Book into the hands of the King, nor did he receive it: But the truth of all was this, Friar Valverde startled at a sudden out-cry of the Indian, arole up on a fudden from the feat on which he fate, difcourfing with the King; and running in hafte, his Book, and the Crofs which he held in his hand, fell on the ground; and then catching them up again, he ran with speed, crying to his Companions, that they should offer no hurt to the Indians, for that Atabuaha was kind and well affected towards them, and that he observed by his Answers, and demands his good intentions, to satisfie them in all matters according to his capamands his good intentions, to fatishe them in all matters according to his capacity; but the noise and out-cry of the people was such, that the voice of the Friat was not heard amongst them. And here it is to be noted, that it is not true what some Historians report of Atabualpa, that he should say, "You believe that "Christ is God, and that he died: I adore the Sun and the Moon, which are immortal: "And who taught you, that your God created the Heaven and the Earth? "To which "Valverde made answer, This Book bath taught it to us: Then the King took it in this hand, and opening the Leaves, laid it to his Ear; and not hearing it speak to him, he threw it upon the ground. Upon which, they say, that the Friat "that ing

"flarting up, ran to his Companions, crying out, that the Gospel was despised, and trampled under foot; Justice and Revenge upon those who contemn our and trampled under foot; Juffice and Revenge upon those who contemn our Liw, and refuse our Friendship. In like manner, it is fabulous what they write of the Inca, that he should say that he was free, and owed not Tribute to any, for that he knew no King superior to himself. I should be glad to be a friend to the Emperour, who hash evidenced his Power and Greatness in sending Armies into Countries so remote; but as to what you mention of Obedience to the Pope, I cannot understand the Reasons which should oblige me to a subject of the Pope. The who pretends to transfer another's right unto his friends, and renounce the Kingdom, which I hadd by Johan. "tion unto him: For he who pretends to transfer another's right unto his friends, and commands me to quit and renounce the Kingdom, which I hold by Inheriatance, to I know not whom, flews himfelf a Man of little understanding, and less justice. And as to the change of my Religion, of which I am in my conficience satisfied, and believe to be Holy; it would be dishonourable, and a folly in me to question the truth thereof, which by ancient tradition, and undoubted testimony, hath been approved by my Ancestours.

All which I say was false, and framed by the mistakes and flattery of Writers; for Advice neare questioned the right of require Tribute, here cook instead on for Atshualpa never questioned the right of paying Tribute, but onely infifted on the Reasons why, and wherefore it was due, and expected from him; which demands, or questions, put the Indians into a combustion. The Commander in chief of the Spaniards and Captains under him, fent notwithstanding the former relation which they had forged unto the Emperour, and forbid all people under fevere penalties to make any other report or narrative of what had passed in this particular: the truth of which is, as I have related it, and which may be proved not onely by the Hiltorical, or Hyeroglyphical Knots of the Province of Cassamarca, but by the testimony of several of those Conquerours, who were then present at those transactions. Blu Valera faith, That one of them was his own Father, from whom he hath often heard it confirmed. In short, we say that 5000 Indians were killed that nath often neard it confirmed. In thort, we lay that 5000 Indians were killed that day, 3500 of which were flain with the Sword, the reft were old and infirm Men, and Women, and Children, which were trampled and trodden under foot, for an innumerable number of all Ages, and both Sexes, were gathered together to fee the Solemnity of this ftrange and unheard-of Embaffy. Moreover a great number of Indians perithed under the Ruines of a Wall, which fell by force of the indians perithed under the Ruines of a Wall, which fell by force of the violent crouds of people, which pressed under the shelter of it. Two days after this defeat, the Cross was found in the same place where Friar Valverde had let it fall, for no Indian durst approach near it, because perhaps it was like that which the Indians adored in Timpix, believing that there was some Divinity, or mysterious Power in that piece of Wood; and being ignorant of the Religion of Christ our Lord, they asked pardon for those offences by which they had provoked him

And now the Indians began to call to mind the ancient Prophecy, delivered by Tradition from their Inca Viracocha, whereby he not onely foretells the change of their Laws, People and Government, but also that their superstitions and religious Ritts and Ceremonies should be confumed, and perish by fire. And in regard they were ignorant of the time when these things were to be accomplished, when the now or hereafter; both the King and his People were frook with fuch aftonilhment, that they knew not what to determine; nor did they resolve on any thing either defensive to themselves, or offensive to the Spaniards, onely they confideted and worfhipped them as Gods, and Meffengers of the Great Viracoha, whom they adored under this denomination and belief. Thus far this Relation is extracted out of the Papers of Blus Valera, which I shall willingly quote hereaster in several parts of this following History; for he was not onely a religious Man, but one very curious in finding out the truth, and fincere in laying down matters as they really were acted; in which he was not fatisfied by his Enquiries from Spaniard, but likewise took his Informations from the Indians themselves: For which reason, wheresoever I find any thing of his tending to our purpose, I shall quote them as authentick for their authority; and in the mean time, cannot but much lament his loft leaves, and scattered fragments.

CHAP. XXVI.

The Authour compares his own Writings with the Hillories of Spaniards.

OW to compare what we have faid with the Writings of Spanish Historians, we say, that the Discourse of Friar Valverde, and the Answer of Andhadpa, are delivered very brief, and in sew words, in all the printed Histories: For the truth is, the General and Captains were not very sincere, or faithfull in the Narrative they gave of passages which occurred; for to put the best gloss and colour they could on their actions, they lest our all their cruel and unjustifiable proceedings, and added whatsoever they judged to have the best appearance. What we have alledged concerning Anthonorya, how that he ordered his Subjects to resist the Spaniards, is confirmed by the authority of several Historians, and particularly by Lopez de Gomara, who in the 113th Chapter of his Book, hath these Words: "It is very observable (saith he) that though the Indians came all amegiven, nor the Signal shewed for Fight, as was agreed, in case that matters so required; for it is probable the surprize was so sudden, and the affrightment so given, nor the Signal shewed for Fight, as was agreed, in case that matters so required; for it is probable the surprize was so sudden, and the affrightment so given, nor the Signal shewed for Fight, as was agreed, in case that matters so required; for it is probable the surprize was so sudden, and the affrightment so the Cannon, the rushing of the Horses, and clattering of Armour; things of the Cannon, the rushing of the Horses, and clattering of Armour; things so understandings and reason. And a little sarther he adds: Great numbers of them perished, because they did not sight, whilst ours killed them not to use their Swords, lest in that service they should be either blunted or broken. This far are the Words of Gomara; the which is likewise consimmed by other Authours, who report, that the Indian sted so so shey saw their King taken Misoner, and that Antonadpa commanded them not to resist the Spaniards: The which we may attribute to a Miscale of God's Providence, who was pleased to conserve foner, and that Atahualpa Commanded them not to relift the Spaniards: The which we may attribute to a Miracle of God's Providence, who was pleased to conserve the Christians, and not suffer them to perish, whom he had designed to preach the Gospel: For if the Inca had not commanded them not to sight, certainly they would never have endured to fee their Prince overthrown and taken; for having Weapons in their hands, they would rather have died all in his defence, than have fuffered 160 Spaniards (whom they were able to have subdued with stones) to commit such Outrages upon them; instead whereof there was not one Spaniard either killed or wounded, unless it were Francisco de Picarro, who received a little hunt in his hand by one of his own people, as he went to feize Atahualpa. The truth is, the Indians did not fight, because they held every Command of their Inca to be a part of their Religion, and of the divine Law, though it were to the loss of their Lives and Estates. And as to what Historians report of Friar Valverde, that he himself used his Weapons, and encouraged the Souldiers to kill and destroy the Indians, and stab them with Daggers to save their Swords, and conserve them to another opportunity, is a falle report of those who wrote these passages into Spain where they might eafily at 3000 Leagues distance obtrude what stories they pleased on the minds of Men; for otherwife it is not to be imagined, that a religious Friar, a good Catholick, and a Divine, would utter fuch outragious words of Cultur, and other contractions are supported by the contraction of t elty, which became a Nero, rather than a Person of his Coat and Profession; and one who deserved the Dignity of a Bishop, in that he died by the hands of the Indians, for preaching the Catholick Faith: Which having said, let us return to the Series of our History.

CHAP. XXVII.

How the Spaniards took the King Atahualpa.

THE Spanife Horse sallying forth, attacked the Squadrons of the Indians, and ran them through with their Lances, without any opposition, and at the same time D. Francisco Picarro, and his Insantry, assailed Atahualpa with all their fury; for they imagined, that in case they could once make themselves Master of that lewel, (which was the King) they should soon gain all the Treasures of Perus, but the Indians with great numbers encompassing the King's Chair, did not offend the Spaniards, but onely endeavoured to desend and cover their King from hurch and mischief: Howsoever the Spaniards wounded them on all sides, and lanced them through the fides, though they defended not themselves, onely interposed their bodies between the King and the Spaniards; in fine, with much slaughter they opened their way to the King; the furt that came up to him was D. Francisco they opened their way to the King; the furt that came up to him was D. Francisco they opened, who laying hold on his Vestments, fell with him to the ground, though fome Historians fay that he took him by the Locks, which were very long; but that was a mistake, for the Incas wear very short Hair. In short, the Spaniards usa was a minase, for the incas wear very more train. In more, the spaniard having overthrown Atabuaha, they took him Prifoner: In confirmation of with truth, Gomara hath these words: "There was not one Spaniard either killed or "wounded, onely Francisco Picarro received a small hurt in his hand by a blow of "one of his own Souldiers, who ftrook at Atahualpa to knock him down; whence it is reported, that it was not Picanro, but another which took the King "Priloner: With which Words Gomara ends his 113th Chapter.

Now to add unto his Hiftory what he hath omitted, (as we have declared we would) we aver, that this Souldier was called Michael Aftere, who afterwards lived in the City of Huamanca, where he posseffed some Lands, and commanded over the Indians. When Arabnalpa was fallen, this Souldier took off the coloured Wreath which encircled his Temples, the which was as his Crown or Laurel of Royalty, and kept it for his prize; which gave occasion for the report, that Atahnalpa was taken Prisoner by the Souldier, and not by Picarro; but be the matter how it will, fince both vere fo near together, and not by receive, but be the matter how it will, fince both vere fo near together, and the thing doubtfull, the Honour ought to be given to the chief Commander: How/fover Michael After kept the coloured Wreath by him, until the year 1557, when he befoved it on the Inca Sayriuppe, who then deferted the Mountains to which he was retired, as shall be related in its due place. The Indians feeing their King taken, and the Spaniards still pursuing them with wounds and saughter, staid no longer, but all put themselves to slight; but not being the being able to make their escape by the way, (for the Horse had possessed themlives of that pass) they made towards a certain Wall, built of freezed Stone, in the time of the Great Inca Pachaence, when he had conquered Cassamarca; and being in great multitudes, and many hands, they over-turned above a hundred paces of the Wall, and climbed over the Ruines, over which the Horfe not being able to follow them, they escaped into the Plains. And here a certain Authour faith, that the Stones of these Walls were more tender and compassionate, than the hearts of the Spaniards; because that being charmed with pity for the miseries of the poor Indians, they trembled and fell, to make way for their flight and escape. Some Historians, they tremoted and ten, to make way to their fly, and escape. Some Historians say, that the spaniard not fatisfied to see them fly, pursued and massacred them, untill the night put an end to their cruelty: And then afterwards taking the plunder of the Field, they divided the spoil which confilled of London College and the spaniary and massacrees Scores. And Long descared filed of Jewels, Gold, Silver, and many precious Stones. And Lopes de Gomara giving a relation hereof in the x14th Chapter of his Book, faith, "That in the Palace and Bath of Atabaliba onely they found five thougand Women; which the the factor of the state of the s which though forrowfull and destitute, yet they put on a chearful counter-

nance when they faw the Christians treating them with Presents of fine Gar-Nnn 2

"ments, with Towels, and other domeftick conveniences, as also with Basons of Gold and Silver, one of which belonged to Anabaliba, and weighed eight "Arroves of Gold (which makes two hundred weight English) and was to the value of a hundred thousand Ducats, but poor Anabaliba in the mean time being much incommoded by his Chains, desired Picarro, that since it was his missortune to fall into such misery, that at least they would treat him well, and "case him of that burthen. Thus far are the Words of Gomara, which I have extracted almost verbatim, and which are of the same sense with that which is delivered by Angustine Carate. To which Authours I refer my Reader, in case any person desires to reade these matters more at large.

CHAP. XXVIII.

Atahualpa, or Atabaliba, promises a great Ransome to obtain his Liberty; and what Endeavours were made for him.

THE Nobility which escaped from the saughter of Cassamarca, understanding that their King was alive, returned to perform their Services to him Prison; onely a certain Commander called Ramminavi, who was of a different opinion to all the rest, and never affented to have Peace with the Spaniardi, or to trust them, remained behind with the Souldiers under his Command; and being enraged to find his Counsels rejacked, sled with his people into the Kingdom of Duitu, with intention to make preparations for a War against the Spaniards, and such provisions as were most conducing to his own safety: But his real design was to levy a War against Atabuaspa himself; who having been a Rebel to his own Prince, he thought it no crime to follow his example. To which end being entred into the Kingdom of Quitu, he immediately seized on all the Spaniards; but in a short time he killed them all, together with Quillisating, who was Brother to Atabuaspa both by Father and Mother, called by the Spaniards sufficient and moreover, he killed Challenchima, and other Captains and Caracas, 28 we shall declare in their due place.

The bica Atahinated being now in Prifon, and bound with Chains of Iron, treted with the Spaniards for the price of his Liberty, and offered for his Ranforme as many Veffels of Gold and Silver, as should cover the floor of the Chamber wherein he was; and perceiving that the Spaniards strugged their shoulders at it, as either not believing him, or thinking the proposal too mean (as Gomera reports) he immediately profered to fill the Room to a certain red line which he had drawn on the Wall, so far as he could reach with his hand, provided that they neither put one Vessel within the other, nor battered, or beat them close, but onely heaped them one on the other, untill they arose to the mark and line which he had drawn. And thus much we have extracted out of the 114th Chapter of Gomara's History. But not to enlarge on the Particulars related by the Spanish Historians, to whom we refer our selves; we come, in short, to that which immediately concerns the Life and Death of those Kings, the Incase, and the uter destruction of them, which was the first design and intention of this Treassis; and then afterwards, in its due place, we shall relate all the most curious and no table passages which occurred in the Civil Wars arisen between the Spaniards.

themselves: But now to proceed.

Royal Commentaries.

Acabualpa fent for much Gold and Silver for payment of his Rantome, which though amaffed in great quantities, yet wanted much of arifing to the line which though annuce in great quantities, 50 wanted much of allting to the line which was drawn; for that it feeined almost impossible to comply with the promises was grawn 5 to that to received annote impossible to comply with the promites which Mahualpa had made; wherefore the Spaniards murmured, and faid, That which manager had not complied with the promifes he had given within the time prefixed, they could not but suspect that these delays were made on detime pictures, they could not but rained that there delays were made on defigu to affemble greater numbers of Souldiers, who might be able to mafter and ligh to another free and refere their King. The Spiniards being jealous of full them, and then the and refered then range. The Spanaras being jeatous of fome fuch project, appeared angry and difcontented; which Arabnalpa perceiving by their countenance, for he was very quick of apprehention, demanded the cause of that trouble which appeared in their faces: which when he had underflood from Francisco Picarro; he answered, that if they were informed of the great distance of the places from whence he was to fetch his Vessels of Gold and Silver, they would not entertain such hard thoughts of jealousie concerning his intentions; for the greatest part of his Ransome was to be brought from Cozos, Puchacamac, Quitu, and several other Provinces, the nearest part of which was Pachacamac, and that was at least eighty Leagues distant; that Cozco was two hundred Leagues off, and Quitu three hundred; and that if they doubted of the minuted Leagues affirmed, they might, if they pleased, send Spaniards into those parts to fee and furvey the Treasure which was there, and in all places of that parts to tee and survey the Treature which was there, and in an places of that Kingdom; and being fatisfied with the quantity thereof, might pay themselves with their own hands. But the Inea perceiving that the Spaniards doubted of their fecurity with those whom he would employ to conduct them to these Treafures; he told them, that whilst he was in Chains, they were secure, and needed not to sear or doubt of their safety: Upon which Hernando de Soto, and Peter del Barco, Native of the Town of Lobon, resolved to travel as far as Cozco. When Atahnalpa understood that Hernando would leave him, he was much troubled; for having been the first Christian he had seen, he entertained a particular kindness for his Person, believing that on all occasions and emergencies he would prove his Friend and Protectour. Howfoever, he durft not fay any thing against his going, lest it should beget a jealousie, and contradict the profer he had made, and which the Spaniards had accepted: Belides thele two Spaniards, four others refolved to travel into other Provinces for discovery of the Treasures which they yielded; one therefore defigned for Quitu, another for Huayllas, another for Huayllas, another for Huayllas, and a fourth for Sicilapampa; all which, besides their primary intention of discovery, received Instructions to observe whether any Levies were making for rescue of their King Arahualpa from his Prison; but he, poor Man, being far from suspecting the Faith and Promises which the Spaniards had given him, busied his thoughts on no other contrivances, than the ways to amaß such quantities of Gold and Silver as he had bargained with the Spaniards for his Ransome, not doubting but upon the delivery thereof, to have his Chains and Shackles knocked off. Upon which supposition the Inca ordered publick Proclamation to be made in all his Kingdoms, to receive and treat the Christians, travelling singly into remote parts with joy and kind treatment in all places where they should arrive: In virtue of which Command from the Inca, and out of an opinion which the Indian entertained, that the Spaniards were Gods, and Messengers of the most High God, (as they themselves reported and published in all places) and were confirmed in a belief thereof from the action of Peter de Candia, who killed the wild Beafts (as we have faid) in Tumpiz, they received them in their Towns and Villages with all the honour, joy, and kind treatment that they were able to express. They presented them with Gifts, and such curiosities as their Countrey yielded, and offered Sacrifices to them; for out of their abundant simplicity and superstition they esteemed of the Spaniards, as Gods: And though they were not ignorant of the great flaughter they had committed upon the Indians in Cassamarca, and on those which endeavoured to make their escape, yet still they maintained an opinion, that they were Gods, but cruel and terrible, and such as were to be appealed with Sacrifices; and though these angry Delties were never to be persuaded into that gentle Mood of doing good to them, yet perhaps they wish be might be atoned, and restrained from doing them farther mischiefs.

Hernando de Soto, and Peter del Barco, with the four other Spaniards, were by or. der of the Inca carried in Hammacks upon Mens shoulders for their more convenience and expedition. Now a Hammack is a word used by the Indians in the Isla of Barlovento, and fignifies a Net made of the Leaves of a Palm, or of other Trees. which in those hot Countries is much more cool than those made of Cotton. which are used by the poorer and meaner fort of people: These Hammacks are which are used by the poorer and meaner tort of people: These Hammacks are hanged at the sour corners with Ropes about a Yard from the ground, and are much more cool than lodging upon Quilts. In imitation hereos, the Indians of Pern did use to fasten a Blanket at both ends to a Staff of about three or sour Yards long, on which he that was to ride Post laid and stretched himself at length, so that the Bearers seemed to carry a dead Corpse: This Blanket was supported by two Indians, who changed with others after a certain distance of travel, for them have designed perhaps to carry one Man, they often reliand. by two Indians, who enanged with others after a certain chrance of travel, for twenty of them being defigned perhaps to carry one Man, they often relieved one the other; and coming to a certain Stage, or Poft, they found as many others ready to eafe and difcharge them of their burthen; which was the way and manner of the Indian Pofts. This fort of Biere on which Men are thus carried, is called Huantu, or Rampa, called by the Spaniards Hamaca, being like their Cama. which fignifies a Bed-

In this manner these two courageous Spaniards, Hernando de Soto, and Peter del Barco, travelled the distance of two hundred Leagues, which is between Cassamarca and Cozco, with more fecurity and better treatment than they could have found in their own Countrey: In like manner the other four were received and carefied in all places where they paffed, and with fuch welcome joy, and hearty entertainment, as was incredible, and which the Spaniards, when they returned, had fearce the confidence to relate unto their companions.

CHAP. XXIX.

The Travels of Hernando Pigarro to Pachacamac, and of what befell him in that Fourney.

SOon after the departure of Hernando de Soto, and Peter del Barco, Hernando Picarro being moved with the fame of the vast Riches of Pachacannac, resolved to vifit that Temple; but not knowing what might happen in this Journey, he took with him a party of Horse for his better security and convoy: The Spaniards in this Journey travelling one day over a certain Mountain, discovered from the top of it on the fide of another Hill, fomething that gliffered with a brightness like Gold, and the rays of the Sun darting upon it, almost blinded the eyes of the beholders. The Spaniards proceeded towards it with great admiration, and bethe color near, they perceived it to be a heap of Pots, and Jars, and Kettles, and Paus and fuch like Utenfils made of Gold and Silver, which the Brother of Ae threaten, called Quillifeacha, (whom we have already mentioned) had amaffed totitles towards payment of the Inca's Ransome, being to the value of two Millithough some Historians report, that all did not amount, in the whole, unto recre than three hundred thousand pieces of Eight: but this must be some errour in rle account, as we shall see hereaster, when we come to reckon up the several particulars; howfoever the Mountain seemed to shine with Gold, because the Indians, who carried those Vessels up the Hill, had laid them down to ease, and rest them felves for a while, and fo had over spread therewith all the way upwards. This Narrative I received in my own Countrey from the mouth of one who was then prefent; and the same was afterwards confirmed to me in Spain by that worthy Gentleman Don Graviel Picarro, who was an Officer of the Inquilition at Cordova 3 in this journey, made a live report of the gomen Thin. We have already faid, that to foon as this Quillifeacha was come to Caffamarea with the aforefaid Treafure; he immediately advited his Brother Arabusapa to come with the atoretand Treatment the Influence and Patient, to prevent the Influence to to the Kingdom of Quite, to prevent the Influence to the Kingdom of Quite, to prevent the Influence to the Kingdom of Quite, to prevent the Influence to the Which Plot Atahuaha having for Commander Rumminavi was defiguing to make; which Plot Atahuaha having for the Commander Rumminavi was defiguing to make;

eny imprecees, that the first should in particular to Atahualpa in execution of all This Rubminavi had formerly been an Affiliant to Atahualpa in execution of all his cuelties, and tyrannical practices; fo that he was acquainted with his natural his cuertes, and tyrannical practices; to that he was acquainted with his natural temper, and well forewarned of his treachery and falle dealings; and suspecting no less from Quilifeacha, he received him like the King's Brother, and informed himself less from Quillifeacha, he received him like the rangs promer, and informed himles of the Inca's imprisonment; and the bargain for his ransome, to obtain which, they both agreed to amass all the Gold and Plate that was to be found in that Kingdom. And though Rumminavi defired nothing less than the liberty of the Inca, yet like a falle and perfidious Traytor he ferved, and treated Quillifeacha with much ince a rane and perfutions. Trayfor the first and loyal Subject; and carried this fair outfide untill fuch time as occasion offered, to put in practice his villanous de-

Hernando Picarro permitting Quillifeachia to pass before him, proceeded on his Journey to the great Temple of Pachacamae, whose immense riches, and multitourney to the great Temple of Fachacamac, whole influence riches, and multi-tude of people, which inhabited the Valley round about, furprized the Spaniards with strange admiration; but much more were the Indians associated to see the Fashion, the Habits, the Arms and Horses of their new Guests: the Novelty of which, and the Command of their Inca caused them to adore them for Gods, and to receive and treat them with fuch kindness and respect, as passes all imagination, to receive and treat them with IUCN KINGHES and respect, as paires all imagination, or expression; and so filly were these poor people, that observing the Horses with Bits and Bridles in their mouths, they imagined like those in Cassaward, that he Iron was their food; and pitying to see the poor Beasts with no better Victuals, they brought them Gold and Silver, desiring them to eat those Metals which were much more pleasant and delicate than the Iron. The Spaniard were much leasted at the impression of the Indiana and cherishing them in that opinion told pleased at the ignorance of the Indians, and cherishing them in that opinion, told them (as they had done to those in Cassanaca) that they should bring much of that fodder to their Horses, and lay it under the Grass and Mayz, for they were start described and applied from the control of the geat devourers, and would foon dispatch and eat it all , which the Indians believing, did as they defired. Of the Gold which was in the Temple, Hernando Pifurn took as much as he could carry with him, leaving his Command to carry all the rest to Cassanarca for ransome of their King; on which belief the people readily brought all, not concealing or embezling any part thereof.

Whilft Hernando Picarro was at Pachacamac, he received advice, that about forty Lagues from thence there was a certain Captain of the Army of Atabuaha, called Challenchima, who had gathered great Forces to him; upon which Hernando fent to him to come, and meet him, that they might treat of matters conducing to the publick peace and quiet of those Kingdoms, but the Indian resusing to come where the Spaniards were, Hernando adventured with great hazard of his own Person, and of the lives of his companions, to pass unto him, being a Journey not to be performed without much labour and danger both in the going, and in the return; for not onely the roughness of the way, and craggy Mountains were incommodious, but the broad Rivers gave them much obstruction; for in passing over the Bridges of Ofer, (which we have formerly described) the greatest difficulty was how to Ferry over the Horses. Wherefore this attempt was esteemed very rash and inconfiderate by the other Spaniards, to whom it appeared a vain confidence to put themselves into the hands of an Infidel, in whom, according to common report, was no faith, and into the power of a person who was surrounded with an Army. Howsoever the reliance which this Spanish Commander had on the promiles of Atahualpa, which at his departure he had expressed by signs, and had given him fome tokens which might ferve him for a Pass port, in case he should meet with any Commander or General in his Journey, fo animated Hernando, that he marched boldly towards Challeuchima; and having met, he perfuaded him to kave his Army, and to accompany him to the place, where he might fee and discourse with his King: The Indian suffering himself to be overcome by his importanity, attended Hernando; and to make the Journey more short, they cut off a great part of their way, by croffing over fome fnowy Mountains, where they had all perished with cold, had they not been relieved by the Indians, and conducted to some warm caves, whereof there are many in that passage, which were hewen out of the Rocks for reception of Travellers.

The Spaniards not having been acquainted with the ruggedness of the ways, had The Spaniards not having been acquainted with the ruggeones of the ways, had not provided themselves with Shoes for their Horses, nor Smiths to nail themselves with their Horses had suffered much, had not the Indian molted forme of their Gold and Silver, and therewith forged Shoes of Gold, instead of Iron, for the use of their Horses. Compare at the end of the 114th Chapter of his Book, mentions this passage in these words; For want of Iron, some shoot living

Horses with Silver, and some with Gold. After many such difficulties and hardships as these, Hernando Picarro and Chall. cuchima arrived in Cassamarca; where Challenchima being about to enter into the place where the hota remained, and having first put off his Shoes, and taken some thing on his shoulders in token of servitude, he with much tenderness burst our thing on his shoulders in token of tervatude, he with much tendernets burst our into tears so soon as he saw his King in Chains, and laden with Iron, attributing his Imprisonment by the Spaniard to his own default and absence. But the Inca repited, that his absence was not to be blamed, nor could any other cause be as signed hereos, than onely the Decree of the Pachacamae, of which many Propherighted network, than onerly the Detree of the Pathamana, or Which many Prophecies and Prognostications had for many years past preceded, foretelling their Invafic by new and unknown Nations, who should destroy their Religion, and subvert their Empire; as his Father Huayna Capac had foretold at the hour of his Death. And for better affurance of the truth hereof, so soon as he was taken. Death. And for better affurance of the truth hereof, to foon as he was taken, he fent to Coxo to confult with his Father the Sun, and with the other Oracles, which refolved Questions and Demands in his Kingdom, and particularly with prating Idol in the Valley of Rimac, which notwithstanding its former readines of speech was become filent; and what was most to be admired, was, that he hidden Oracle in the Temple of Pachacamac, which had undertaken on all occasions to answer the doubts and questions which were made concerning the successor. of Kings and great Men, was also become dumb, and made no answers. And of kings and great iven, was and obscure to though it was told to that Oracle that their lnea was held in Chains, and was conjured by them to advife a remedy for his release, he became deaf and silent: And moreover the Priests, and such as formerly entertained free and familiar discourres with the other Oracles, reported, that they were not able to obtain an answer, or street out the least word from them; for which cause Arahualya said, that he was greatly troubled and distracted in his thoughts, searing, lest his Father the Sun had absolutely abandoned him; for otherwise he would not have tied up the mouths of his Idols on a fudden, which he had formerly caused to be free and familiar with devout persons, not suffering them to advise, and yield them comfort in their ultimate difftres: All which were certain and inevitable fignals of their approaching mifery, and alienation of their Empire. These and such sale approchanges Authority uttered with extreme grief of heart to his General Childrehma in the Prifon where he was, beginning then to feel the pangs of confeience for his Treason and Rebellion against Huascar; in reward of which, and of all other the Tyrannies and Cruelties he had committed against him and his family, he confessed himself to be now justly punished with the like troubles and anguish in his own Soul.

How the Devils of Peru were strook dumb by the Sacraments of the Holy Mother the Church of Rome.

T is most certainly true, that so soon as the Sacraments of our Holy Mother the Church of Rome were brought into Peru, namely the Consecration of the Hoft, or of the Body and Bloud of Christ our Lord, as is performed in the Mass, and celebrated on fuch days as the Spaniards had time and leiture to hear it; and that some Indians, who had entered themselves into the Service of Spaniards, reeived the Sacrament of Baptifin ; and that likewife the Sacraments of Marriage and Penance were practifed; fo foon, I fay, as these four Holy Mysteries were and remaine were practiced; to room, I ray, as there room I room introduced into made known, and appeared, (for the other three were not as yet introduced into those Countries) the Devils became dumb and filent, and lost that familiar difcourse and conversation in publick which (as we have said) they formerly used and practifed with those Gentiles, onely they whispered sometimes in secret, with the famous Magicians, who were faid to have a greater power and influence upon them. And though at first the party of Huasear gave out, that this sullen reservedness and silence of the Oracles was caused by the anger and displeasure of the Sun for the tyrannies and cruelties committed by Atahualpa; yet at length they were convinced of a more over-ruling cause, which affected the Indians with a general fear and consternation, believing that the entrance of these new Guelts into their Countrey, had over-awed and filenced their Oracles: the which opinion served to augment the dread and reverence they had of the Spaniards, and confirm the Name which they gave them of Viracocha, who is the God espetilly adored by them, and held in more efteem and worthip, than all their petty Huasas 5 of which we have already given a more large relation.

How Huafcar Inca demanded succour and justice from the Two who went on discovery.

H Ernando de Soto, and Peter del Barco, having travelled above a hundred Leagues came at length to Saufa, where the Captains of Mahnaha held Hanglar in imprisonment; of which the Spaniards being informed, they defired to fee him; and the Inca being in like manner defirous thereof, though he was kept under clole cuftody, yet at length they obtained admittion: What discourse passed between them at that time, was not well understood for want of an Interpreter; nor could they express themselves in any other manner, than by signs. Onely afterwards it was reported, That Huasear being informed by the Indians, that the principal defign of the Symmard was to doe justice, and to relieve Men under oppression and violence, which pretence (as the Symmarb Writers affirm) was always in a specious manner published by the Spaniards from the time of their first Invasion of their Countries, and which at all times they boasted in pursuance of the Commands of his Majefty, who enjoyned them to hurt none, and to render unto every one his due: Of which (as we fay) Huafear being affured, he with more affurance of redues, complained of the tyranny, cruelty and injuffice, which he had received from his Brother Achielpa, who not content to defpoil him and his Heirs of his Kingdom and Dominions, refolved to be eave him of his life, and to that end had imprisoned him under strict and watchfull Guards: Wherefore with all earneffness he conjured them, not to abandon and leave him in that condition, but to take him with them out of the hands of that Guard, which defigned (lo fon as they were departed) to put him to death. And whereas they had published and made known unto all persons, that their intentions were to ease and relieve the oppressed, he was well affured, that so soon as they had received true information from the Captain-General of the juffice of his caufe, they would reflore him again to his Liberty and Kingdom: Upon which condition he promifed them not onely to fill the Chamber with Veffels of Gold and Silver unto the line drawn by his Brother, but that he would raife and pile them up unto the very ceiling; for the performance of which, he efteemed himfelf much more able than his Brother; in regard that he was well acquainted with the places where feret Treasures of his Father were concealed, and where his Ancestours had amasted immense Sums and Riches, which his Brother would have embezled, and much diminished, to build Temples and Altars for accomplishment of his Vows; in which he had been so profuse, that he was become poor, and unable to comply with the Ransome which he had promised. In answer whereunto, Hernando de Soto, and Peter del Barco, gave him to understand by signs, that in obedience to the Command of their Captain-General, they were obliged to proceed as far the Command of their Captain-General, they were obliged to proceed as has Cozeo, and for that reason could not stay with him, but at their return they would perform whatsoever might tend to his service and advantage: After which they departed, leaving poor Huassam more sad and disconsolate than before; for having once entertained some hopes and expectation of relief by their coming, be became absolutely desperate, and desponding of life and comfort; believing, as it afterwards happened, that their visit and discourse was a presude to his death.

How these two Spaniards arrived at Cozco, where they found Crosses in the Temples and Royal Palaces.

These two Companions proceeding on their Johnney towards Cozco, arrived on the high Promontory of Carmenca, from whence they rook a survey of the Imperial City, and much admired the neighbouring Towns and Villages which the imperial City, and much admired the neighbouring rowns and Villages which encompaffed, or were adjoyning to it. The people coming forth to meet them, received them with joy and mirth, with Muffek and Dances, erecting Triumphal Arches in the ways, crowned with Flowers and Garlands, and strowing the streets with Rushes, and lodged them in those Royal Apartments, which were called Anarucancha, belonging to Hudyna Capac; for being in their efficiention perfons of Divine Race, they allotted those Chambers for them, which appertained to their greatest and most beloved King. At the entrance thereumto was a very fair Tower, being four Stories high, each of which had a cieling of Timber, in fuch manner as covered the Royal Chambers, and which were to lofty, that to speak in conpa6, the Turret above was as high as any Spire in Spain, unless that of Seville. The top thereof was in form of a Globe, as were all the Chambers; and above all, in the place of a Weather-cock or Vayne, (which the Indians did not underfland) they had erected a Ball, which added much to the height, and was fo large, that the hollow of it contained above fixty Foot In compass, called by them Sun-tamaci, which fignifies as much as the rare piece of Architecture, there being no other building adjoyning thereunto to support or hide it. In my time it was thrown down or demolished, to make the Market place more large and airy 5 though the much is, it took not up much place, and now in lieu thereof the Jefuits have erected a high Colofco, or Pyramid, as we have mentioned in the first Part of this Hillory. The next day after the Spaniards arrived, the Indians carried them in feveral Palanchines, or Seats, placed on Mens shoulders to see and view the City 5 and as they passed, the people adored and worshipped them after the manner of their Gentilism and Religion. Nor were the Spaniards lefs surprized to see the Majesty of Cocco, with the Grandeur and Riches of the Palaces and Temples 5 which though much defaced, and despoiled of their ancient beauty, by reason of the late Wars between the Incas, and the Imprisonment of Huascar, yet they could not but much admire the excellent Architecture of the Royal Palaces, which were built without those Instruments and Engines, which are necessary for the eeeling such mighty Fabricks: But above all, they were much pleased with the The Pavements, which were curiously in-layed with divers Figures on each fide of the stream, which runs for above a quarter of a League through the City; and the multitude of people, and the numbers of Merchants (though the Commodities of the stream). modities not many) were fo great, as much pleased them to behold; especially observing the gentile behaviour of the Nobles, and the courtese of the Commodities are the courtese of the Commodities. palty, who were all defirous to ferve them, and gain their favour; and had it not been for the late Wars between the two Brothers, all things would certainly have appeared in much more beauty and splendour: But above all, they much admired to see Crosses erected on the top of the high Pinnacles of their Temples and high the second of the high Pinnacles of their Temples and high the second of the high Pinnacles of their Temples and high the second of the high Pinnacles of their Temples and high the second of the high Pinnacles of their Temples and high the second of the high Pinnacles of their Temples and high the second of the high Pinnacles ples and Palaces; the which, it feems, were introduced from the time onely that Pedro de Candia being in Tumpiz charmed, or made tame those wild Beasts which were let loofe to devour him, and which onely by virtue of the Crofs which held in his hand became gentle and domestick: All which was recounted with such admiration by the Indians, who carried the news of this Miracle unto Cozco, that when the Indians of the Crofs which admiration by the Indians, who carried the news of this Miracle unto Cozco, that when the Indians of the Crofs had a looked it also Miracle unto Cozco, that when the Inhabitants of the City had understood it, they went immediately to their Sanctuary, where a Cross of Jaspar-stone, as clear as Chrystal, remained, as we have before mentioned; which when they had brought forth, they with loud Acclamations adored and worshipped it, conceiving that though the Sign O o o 2 of the Crofs had for many Ages been conferred by them in high effeem and veneral tion, yet it was not entertained with such devotion as it deserved, because they were not as yet acquainted with its virtues. Wherefore now with stronger assurance believing, that as the Sign of the Gross had tamed, and shut the mouth of the wild Beafts, so as that they could not hurt Pedro de Candia; so also they imagined that it had a like power to deliver them out of the hands of these New-come Gueffs: On which confideration having adored the Cross, they erected several of them in their Temples, and in the Royal Palaces, like Tutelar Gods to defend their Kingdom from the violence of Enemies.

Whence it is to be noted, that these Gentiles who were Idolaters, did entirely. and with an implicit faith, devote themselves to the Cross, and therewith to the belief of the whole Christian Doctrine before the Gospel was preached to them It is most certain, that after the Death of Huama Capac (as we have mentioned as the end of his Reign) the Indiana remained in great fear and consternation, apprehending that the time approached in which their Idolatrous Religion was to be at an end, and therewith their Empire, Greatness and Dominion was to expire And though many years past many Predictions were uttered of this nature by their Southfayers and Magicians, the which were confirmed by their Oracles, and divers Prodigies; yet they were delivered in fuch obscure terms, that nothing was clear, or intelligible, from thence, untill such time as Huayna Capac, by I know not what Spirit, explained and interpreted those Prophecies with such clearness. as evidently pointed at the coming of the Spaniards, and the propagation of the Gospel, declaring that the Empire of Peru was to end with his Life. And this is the true reason why the Indian adored and worshipped the Spaniardi for God, with such humility and submission, as we have declared, being certainly assured. that these were the people in whom the Prophecy of their King was to be accom-

Of all these matters Hernando de Soto, and Pedro del Barco, gave due intelligence to their Captain-General, with farther information of the incredible Riches found in that City, which were beyond all imagination, as also of the kind treatment, duty and respect, which they had received from the Indians, by virtue of that Edict and Command which Atahualpa had caused to be proclaimed in all parts of his Dominions in favour of the Spaniards. In like manner the other four Spies, or Discoverers, which were fent into other parts, dispatched their Informations of all things they had feen, and which had happened to them. All which news declaring the immense Riches, and the adoration which was paid to their Companions, the other Spaniards received with great joy and satisfaction: But as to the Prophecies of Huayna Capac, they esteemed them for no other than Witchcrastes and Sorceries of the Indians, of which they made no account or esteem. CHAP. XXXIII.

Of the Subtilty of Atahualpa, and the Death of the King Huafcar Inca.

A Usuffin de Carate having related the Discourse which Huascar Inca had entertained with Hernando de Soto, and Pedro del Barco, (which was the same that we have already related) and how they had left him in a sad and despairing condition, he farther proceeds in the fixth Chapter of his fecond Book in this man-

"And fo (fays he) they proceeded on their Journey, which was the cause of the Death of Husseav, and the loss of all that Gold which he had promised; for "the Death of Huajcar, and the lois of all that Gold which he had promined; for the Captains to whose Custody he was committed, immediately gave intellified gence to Atabaliba by the Post, of all that had passed, which when he had well considered, and that if once the Injustice which he had done to his Bro-"ther should come to the knowledge of the Spanish Governour, together with the Promises and Intimation which Huasear had given of a greater abundance of "Gold than he could engage for, he greatly feared that his offers would be fo prevalent with the Christians, (whom he observed to be coverous and thirty of Gold,) that they would not onely take the Kingdom from him, and transfer it to his Brother, but, to free themselves from all other troubles of competi-"tion, might also deprive him of his Life, for which they had fo just an occasion on the score of his Brother, whose Kingdom he had traiteroully usurped, with "the Death and Slaughter of all his Kindred, for which reason he resolved to "kill Huassar: But in regard he seared to commit that Murther, because he had heard the Christians frequently say, that one of their principal Laws was, That heard the Christians frequently say, that one of their principal Laws was, That heard the Christians Bloud, by Man should his Bloud be spilt; he therefore, he who shed Man's Bloud, by Man should be some the Mind of the before he would enter upon this Attempt, thought fit to try the Mind of the Spanish Governour, in what manner he would be concerned for an Act of this nature. To perform which with the more Subtilty and Diffirmulation, he feigned himfelf one day to be very fad and dejected, weeping, and fighing, and relufing to eat, or speak. And though the Spanifh Governour was very interpretate to know the cause and reason of his Melancholy, at length with much adoe he made Answer, that he had received information, how that one of his Captains had killed his Brother Huafear, in the Hands of those to whose Cultody he had committed him; the which he deeply referred, for that he was his Elder Brother, and his Father; and though he detained him a Prifoner, and under reftraint, yet it was not with any intention to doe him hurt, but onely to secure him in such a capacity, as might disenable him from making any Attempts on his Kingdom of Quitu, which did not at all appertain unto him; for that Province having been obtained by his Father's Conquests, was conferred and bequeathed by Testament to himself, being no part of the Inheritance which belonged to the Elder Son. In Answer hereunto the Governour bid him be of good chear and comfort, for that Death was natural and common to all, and that fo foon as the Countrey was quiet and fettled, he would enquire into this Murther, and punish those who should be found guilty of that great Crime. Atabatiba observing that Marquis Pigarro was little concerned for the matter, refolved to kill his Brother, and accordingly his Commands were put into Execution with fuch speed; that it was hard to distinguish whether Huafcar was put to Death before or after the time that he teflified his Sorrow in prefence of Picarro. The fault of this unhappy accident is commonly objected against Hernando de So10, and Pedro del Barco; for that they being Souldiers, ought not to have been ignorant of the Duty and Respect they owe to the Commands of their General, which are not to be dispensed with on any pretence or occasion whatsoever, without express Order to the contrary. The Indians report, that when Huafear faw that there was no remedy, but that he must dve. he uttered these Words with great passion. I have been Lord of this "Countrey but for a floor time, but as to my Brother that Traitor, by whose Command, I that am his natural Lord, am put to death, he shall enjoy his Government for a much soften time than I have done. Wherefore when the Indian had heard that Alaba. liba was afterwards put to death, (as shall be related in the following Chapter) "they believed Huascar to have been of the true and legitimate Progeny of "the Sun, who had illuminated him with a prophetick Spirit, touching the Fate of his Brother. And likewise Huascar farther declared, that when his Father gave him his last farewell, he enjoyned and commanded him, That when a "People, or Nation, which were white, and had beards, should invade his Do-" minions, that he should labour to make a friendship with them, for that they " were to become Lords of that Kingdom. Thus far are the Words of Anonstine Carate.

For my part, when I find the Spanish Writers to relate things fairly, and with the truth, and gravity of History, I am more pleased to make use of their words verbatim, than my own; for as I am an Indian, and not a Spaniard, their words and expressions must be more proper than mine; the which Rule we shall always observe, unless it be where the Spanish Histories are desective, and want Addi

But to return unto the Relation which Augustin de Carate hath given; It is to be noted, that he briefly touches many particulars, which we have more at large related in this our History, as namely, that which concerns the Tyranny, the Craft and Diffimulation of Atahualpa, when he proved the Mind of Francis Picarro, how, and in what manner he would take the Death of Huascar; for in realist had the Spaniard been as wary and as fagacious as was this Indian, and had prefently replied upon him, and told him plainly, that I know, and am well affired, that it was you that killed this Person, and that therefore I shall instict such punish. ment on you as your Crime deferves; it is most certain, that he would then have been better advised, and never have adventured on this Murther of his Brother; but when on the contrary, he perceived an indifferency in the Governour, who little suspected so much evil in a person of that simplicity; he then took courage and resolution to put his wicked Intention into practice against the Inca his natural King; which confummated all his other cruelties; Nor did he onely put him to Death, but killed him barbaroufly, cutting his Flesh into slices, and throwing them none knows where; but the Indians report, and believe, that they are his Flesh out of mere rage and malice against him. Acosta saith that they burnt him. And Carate mentions, that the diligence and speed, used in sending the Dispatches for his Death, were not by the Posts, but by Fires or Beacons, which the Chafquis, or Postmasters, were ordered to make both by night and day, for greater expedition, when any matter required extraordinary hafte. In like manner this Authour touches on the Prognostication which Huayna Capac had left, concerning the Invasion which the Spaniards were to make into those Countries, and of which they were to become Mafters. He also farther proceeds, and tells us, that Hernando de Soto and Peter del Barco were not blameable for not remaining with Huafcar, as he defired, and for not hearkening to the proposition he had made to them, which imported three times the Treasure, which his Brother had promised, because in reality they did not understand him; for otherwise no doubt, but those Men, whose business was neither Conquest, nor their Embassy matter of War or Peace, but onely to see that the Promise made by Atahnalpa for his ransome, were complied with, would have readily embraced the more advantageous Offer of three times the value made by Huascar. And thus these two Spaniards excuse and clear themselves from what was objected against them, touching the Death of

Thus this unhappy Inca, the last of the Monarchs of that Empire fell and ended his Days, having been a Spectator of all those Cruelties and Murthers which his Brother had exercifed upon his Vaffals, Servants, Uncles, Brothers and Sons, and as to his own Perfon, had been used with such Hardships and Severity in Prison, as were insupportable, and which Diego Fernandez relates to have been in this manner:

Whilst "these things passed, Francis Picarro, with other Christians his Companions, en-"tred the Countrey, and took Atabalipa Prisoner in Caxamal. Thus far are the

CHAP. XXXIV.

Don Diego de Almagro comes to Cassamarca; and what Fears and Apprehensions Atahualpa conceived before his Death, by Comets and Apparitions in the Heavens.

Feer the Death of poor Huafear, which happened in the manner as before re-A lated, Atahualpa did neither thereby obtain the liberty of his Person, nor fecure his Life; but on the contrary, in a few days afterwards, orders were given to put him to death, the manner of which is related by Aignfin de Carate, and Lopic de Gomara, both which agree in the particulars of this passage, as they doe in other matters of this History.

Heaven often punishes those who trust more in their own Plots and Artifices. than in the ways of Reason and Justice; for God suffers their Mischiels and Contrivances to fall upon their own Heads, an Instance of which we shall speedily give in the fequel of this Hiftory. For now we must know, That Don Diego de Mongro was departed from Panama, on a very good Ship, carrying with him tieth Men, and good Supplies, in order to a farther Conquest; and his Enemies report, that his Design was to advance farther to the Southward than Piçarro, whose Govemment, as yet, was not extended more than two hundred Leagues to the South, from the Equinoctial Line; and that he intended to fet up for himself, and act on his own Foundation; the which, as is reported, was discovered by the Secretary of Almagro to Picarro, whom his Master hanged for his Treachery. But be it as it will, this is certain, that Almagro being on his way, and receiving intelligence of the Impriforment of Arabnalpa, and of the incredible Riches which he offered for his Ransome, resolved to change his Design, and to join himself with his victorious Companion; for that according to Articles of Agreement between them, one half of the Benefits and Profits appertained unto him. Accordingly Almagro, with his Souldiers, arrived in Cassanarca, greatly wondring to see those heaps of the Souldiers arrived in Cassanarca, greatly wondring to see those heaps of Gold and Silver which they had anassed together. But in a short time afterwards the Souldiers of Picarro plainly told the People of Almagro, that in regard they had not been present at the taking of Atabualpa Prisoner, no share of those Riches and Spoils before the Almagro. Spoils belonged to them, which were already gained, nor no part of that which was wanting to reach the Line which Atahualpa had drawn, and promifed in payment of his Ransome. Which when the Almagrians had heard, and considering the largeness of the room, believed that if all the Gold and Silver of the World were amaffed together, it would never arrive or reach to the height of the Line, they presently cried out, that the Inca should be killed, so that they might receive their share of what should be collected after his Death. These and the like reafons were fufficient to arraign and execute this great Prince Atahualpa, who observing the Quarrels amongst the Spaniards, and their incessant noise, and wranglings, he fadly suspected that the Fury of those Jars would at last turn to his destruction. the which Fear and Apprehention was increased by the Oracles, which were now become filent to all his Questions and Demands, and by the reports which the Indians gave him of new Stars, and Comets, which appeared, all which, in time of lefs Extremity than the prefent, were ever interpreted as bad Omens, and fignals, and, according to their superstitious Observations, were esteemed to portend utter Destruction and Ruine.

tend utter Destruction and Ruine.

But that which above all things appeared fatal to him, was a certain great Comet of a darkish green colour, little less in breadth than the Body of a Man, and of a yard in length, which shewed it self at night, being much of the same size and shape as that which appeared before the Death of his Father Huagna Capac, of which when Atabuaspa had notice given him, he was extremely troubled, and desired the Spaniards to give him the leave and liberty to be brought forth, that he might see it with his own Eyes; which when he had done, he was so structly be became fuller and silery and well and melancholy, that as formerly he became fuller and silery and well. fadness and melancholy, that, as formerly, he became fullen and filent, and would entertain no converse with any Person whatsoever; the reason of which, when Picarro had pressed very earnestly to know, Atahualpa to satisfie him gave him this Answer. Apn, faid he, (which is General) I am now assured that the time of my Death approaches, being certified thereof by the appearance of this Comet, for that another of the like nature with this showed it self not many days before the death of my Father; and in regard that such Prodigies in the Heavens do always precede the Death of Kings, and portend nothing but Calamities, and the Subversion of Empires, I cannot but imagine my self concerned, being to leave my Kingdoms before I have enjoyed them. Indeed when I saw my self first in Chains, I shought there would be little distance between my Imprisonment and my Grave, of which I am now fully certified by this Comet; and now I have given routh real Cause of this my sadness.

The Governour, to comfort him, bid him be of good courage, and not to trust or confide in such fignals, to which no Credit was to be given; for that on the contrary he might shortly expect to be freed from his imprisonment, and reso red to his Kingdom. Howfoever Arabnatpa, whose Faith was placed in the function of his Gentilism, gave no belief to the assurance of Picarro, but remained in his Dumps, and disconsolate as before. Peter de Cieça, in the 65th Chap. ter of his Book, mentions the fame concerning this Comet, and tells us how fuperstitious those Indians were in these Astrological Observations.

and despaired of his Liberty, not being able to put the thoughts of Death out of his mind; the which accordingly happened fifteen days after the appearance of the Comet, as Giega confirms in the aforesaid Chapter.

CHAP. XXXV.

Hernando Piçarro returns to Spain, to give an Account of what had succeeded in Peru.

THE Governour, Don Francisco Picarro, not regarding the fears and apprehen-fions of Atabualpa, was elated in his Hopes and Expectations, by those farous which good fortune had cast upon him; and resolving to follow and improve his success, he judged it convenient and necessary to render an account to prove his fucces, he judged it convenient and necessary to render an account to His Majesty of all matters, which unto that time had occurred in Pern; the which Intention being moved to Almagro, his Companion, and his Brothers, it was agreed by them to dispatch Hernando Picarro into Spain, with Advices to His Majesty of what had happened, that so their Services might be rewarded according jefty of what had happened, that fo their Services might be rewarded according to their Merit. And in regard Hernando Piçarro was employed as a publick Perfon in behalf of the Commonalty, or the whole Company, It was ordered that fo much should be taken out of the heaps which were already collected for the Ranfoneof Anabudpa, as would serve to defray his Charges; and moreover that he should carry with him the value of two hundred thousand Pieces of Eight in Gold, and one hundred thousand in Silver, for that fifth part which appertained to the King, on account of the Ransome of Arabudpa; the which Gold and Silver were as the fifth Fruits, and as an earnest of that Treasure and Riches which they have already, and are yet to carry from my Countries to His Maiesty. The Silver have already, and are yet to carry from my Countrey to His Majefty. The Silver, 28 Anythin Carate reports, was carried in pieces of maffy Plate, a Relation of which he gives in these Words:

"They agreed (faid he) to fend Hernando Piçarro to give a Narrative to His "Majefly of their prosperous Successes, which had occurred untill that time; but whereas as yet they could not make a just computation of what share His Mawhereas as yet they could not make a part compensation and they took from their elfly was to receive out of the Collections already made, they took from their "Heaps the value of two hundred thousand Pieces of Eight in Gold, and twenty thousand Marks in Silver; for which they chose the most fair and weighty wouland marks in Silver; for which they choice the molt fair and weighty Pieces of Plate, for the better show and appearance in Spain. All which were weighed out, and the Jars, Pans, Figures of Men, and Women, and Sheep, were all cast into the Scale to make up the full weight and value already mentioned. With this Prize Hernando Picarro embarked, to the great grief of Attached biliba, who had a great kindness for him, and entertained such confidence in him, that he freely communicated all his thoughts to him, wherefore at his departure he faid to him:

And do you go, Captain, I am troubled for it at my very hear; for when you are gone, I am fure that fat Fellow, and that blind Rafeal, will foon make an end of me; meaning Almagra, who, as we faid before, was blind of one Eye, and Alonfo Requelme, His Majetty's Treaturer, whom he had observed to murmur and quarrell about him on the occation before related. And fo indeed, "it happened, for no fooner was Hernando departed, than that immediately they contrived his Death by means of their Interpreter Philipilito, who was mey contrived his Death by means of their interpreter Finapiano, who was "an Indian, &c. And Gomara confirms what we shall more at large hereafter relate, That Hernando Picarro carried the fifth part of what appertained to His Majesty on account of the Ransome of Arabualpa, and he farther adds the May the March of the Ransome of Arabualpa, and he farther adds these Words.

"The Truth of what paffed is this: Hernando Picarro carried no more with "him from Cassanger than what is before mentioned; but soon after his departure followed the Death of Atabaliba, and then a Dividend was made of his the followed the Death of Atabaliba, and then a Dividend was made of his Ransome; untill which time his Execution was rather deferred, than his Life P p p "granted, or Freedom intended. Afterwards fixty of these Adventurers returned into Spain, having made a Division of their Spoils, which amounted to forty or fifty thousand Pieces of Eight a Man, besides the fisth which appetained to His Majesty. These Persons departed after Hernando Piçavro, and overtook him at Nombre de Dios, where they embatked, and returned altogether in company to Spain. Thus we see how all Authours agree together in the same Relation of this matter.

Soon after the Departure of Hernando Piçarro, Hernando de Soto and Pedro del Barco returned from Coxco, giving a Report of the Riches which they had feen in that City, as alfo in the Temples of the Sun, and in the Palaces of the late Kings, in the Fortresis, and in the Sanctuaries, and private Cells, where the Devil entertained Difcourfes with their Wizards, Priests, and others his Votaries; all which places being esteemed sacred, were adorned with Gold and Silver; the like report was also brought by the other sour Discoverers. The Spaniards being highly pleased with this News, were impatient untill they could take possessing by the other four Discoverers. The Spaniards being highly pleased with this News, were impatient untill they could take possessing the Treasures; which that they might hasten with the more convenience and security, they speedily determined the Death of Anabasas, to prevent the infurence of the People, that with the more ease, and with the least opposition, they might seize the Gold and Silver which was lodged in the Imperial City, and in other parts. Both the aforesaid Authours agree in all the material circumstances relating to the Death of Anabasas, wherefore we shall repeat the very Words of Lapre. de Gomara, specified in the 119th Chapter of his Book, the Title of which is as followeth.

CHAP. XXXVI.

Of the Death of Atahualpa; and how he was arraigned by Justice, and upon the falle Information and Testimon, which was given against him.

THE Death of Atabaliba was forwarded by a means, the least expected, for "Philipilio", the Interpreter, falling in love with one of the Wives of Atabaliba, whom he intended to marry, after he was dead, raised a report, that "Atabaliba had secretly, and under hand, given order to raise Men, whereby to overcome the Christians, and free himself. So soon as this report came to be spread, and noised amongst the Spaniard, their Jealousise created a Be list; so that some cried out to have him killed, for security of their own Lives, and of those Kingdoms; others were of opinion, that they should not imbuse their Hands in the Bloud of so great a Prince, though never so faulty, but ta ther that they should send him to the Emperour: This certainly had been the best course, but the other prevailed by means (as some report) of that party which came with Aimagray, for they conceiving that no share of the Spoil would appertain unto them, during the Life of Atabaliba, and untill the conditions were complied with, which, according to Agreement, were made for his ransome; and Picara being also of opinion, that his Death would free the Spaniard of much trouble, and render the Conquest and Possision of the Countrey much more easse, a resolution was taken by general consent to put him to Death. In order to which, that things might appear with a better face of sufficient many strengths. Hadjon

" Hudfar, King of those Countries, and for designing to raise War against the "Spaniards, though this last was a sale and malitious suggestion of Philipillio, who "Spaniards, though this latt was a rane and maintious suggettion of Philipillo, who brought the Indians for Witnefles, making them to fay what he pleafed; and in regard the Spaniards underflood not the Language, whereby to cross examine the Witnefles, all that Philipillo alledged paffed for current, and good Teffimony; howfoever Atabaliba flifly denied it, faying, That fuch an Accu-" Tentimony's nowtoever znaganian tilly defined it, raying, That fact an Accur(" fation could have no ground of Reason in it, considering that he remai-"fation could have no ground of Meaton in it, confidering that he remained under fuch Guards, and Chains, that it was impossible for him to make an escape; wherefore he persisted in his Denial, threatning Philipillio, and desiring the Spaniards to give no credence to his Words. After Sentence of "defiring the Spaniards to give no credence to his Words. After Sentence of Death was paffed upon him, he complained much of Francisco Piçarro, for that having promised him his Life upon payment of the Ransome agreed, he afterwards faltered with him, and put him to Death. Wherefore he earneftly intreated him rather to transport him into Spain, than to imbrue his Hands in the Bloud of a Person who had never offended him, but "rather enriched him, and done him good. As they carried him to Exe-"cution, those who attended to comfort him, advised him to desire Bap-"tiln before he dyed, for that without that they threatned to burn him "alive: Whereupon being baptized, he was bound to a Post; and there "frangled. His Burial was celebrated according to the Manner and Rites of "Christians, Pigarro also put himself into mourning, and performed his Fu-merals with Pomp, and Solemnity. As to those who were the causes of his Death, Divine Vengeance overtook them for this sin; so that in a "his Death, Divine Vengeance overtook them for this fin; so that in a "flort time afterwards they came all to unhappy ends, as will appear in the fequel of this History. Thus Atabaliba dyed by a violent Death, before which he ordered his Body to be carried to Quitu, and there buried a mongst the Kings, his Ancestours by the Mother's side. If the Baptisin he mought died was from his heart, most happy he, but if not, the Murthers and Bloud he was guilty of will be set to his Account in the World to come. He was naturally of a good Disposition, wise, courageous, frank and open hearted. He had many Wives, and left some Children: Though he usure purple Wreath, or Diadem, until he was imprisoned; nor would he ever spirit upon the Ground, but, for Majesty and State, (when he had occasion) he would spit in the Hand of a principal Lady, whom he loved. The Indiana were in great admiration, when they heard of his untimely "The Indians were in great admiration, when they heard of his untimely Death, which they efteemed for an accomplishment of the Prophecy of "Hualch", who being of the true and legitimate Off-spring of the Sun, was "divinely inspired to foretell the coming of his speedy Fate. Thus far are the Words of Lopez de Gomara.

But to return now to the Remarks which this Authour makes on the ill Interpretation of this Philipilio, and how he suborned the Indian Witnesses to resilite whatsoever he desired; he concludes that the sault was chiefly his, in regard that the Spaniards wanting Language, could neither examine the matter, nor dive into the Truth of it. And hence we may collect what salse and imperfect Notions he must have rendred to the Indians of the Catholick Faith: So that as for want of a true understanding of the Indian Language, Harmando de Soto, and Pedro del Barco, abandoned Hunsea, and exposed his Life to the subtility of his Brother; so also Atabaliba dyed, and both these powerful Kings incurred the same sate for want of true understanding, and saithfull Interpretation of all matters.

Atabutapa ordered his Body to be enterred in Quitu, amongst the Relations of his Mother, rather than in Cozco, with the Ancestours of his Father; for though the Funerals of Kings were much more pompous and stately in Cozco, than the Solemnities used by the Caciques in Quitu, yet considering how destable his Memory would be to the People of Cozco, for the Cruelties and Murthers he had committed on their natural Kings, he believed that his Body would be abused, and his Ashes never suffered quietly to repose in the Sepulchre of his Ancestours; and for that reason he chose rather to be buried Ppp 2 amongst amongst his own People with obscurity, than with greater Ornament and amongst his own recopie with obtainty, and with greater Grannent and State by the angry and incented Citizens of Cowo. It is most certain that Atabuaha did not bind his Head with the coloured Wreath, until he had Atabanapa did not bind in Fread with the Coloned Vyreath, until he had taken his Brother Hungear Prisoner; for before that time that Ensign of Regality belonged to his Elder Brother, who was his Sovereign Lord; but at the was taken, and imprisoned by him, he then proclaimed himself for the universal Lord, and with his Dominions he usurped all the Marks of Power which belonged to them, as we have before related.

But now to confider that an Indian, who was an Idolater, and who had been guilty of fuch horrible Cruelties, as Atahualpa had been, should receive the Sacrament of Baptism at the hour of his Death, can be esteemed no other wife, than as an Effect of the infinite Mercy of God towards fo great Sin. ners as he was, and I am. At his Baptisin Atahualpa was named Don John Blus Valera fays, That Friar Vincent de Valverde laboured many days before his death to teach and instruct him in the Articles of the Catholick Faith; during which time the Inca finding himself in Prison, and Chains, and without other Society or Attendance of Indians, excepting a Youth, who was his Kinfinan, and permitted to ferve him, he was flruck with fuch a dump of Melancholy on his Spirits, that he remained almost intensible. Upon which the Spaniards brought him out of the Prison, and called the principal Indians to his Affiftance, who feeing their Lord in that condition, immediately fent for their Chief Herbalists to ease and cure him. So soon as those Physicians came they felt his Pulse, to discover the nature and force of his Fever; but not as they felt his Pulle, to discover the nature and force of his Fever; but not as our Doctours, who try the Pulle at the Wrist, but laid their Fingers on the rop of the Nostrils, and under the Eye-lids; after which they gave him a Drink, made of the juice of certain Herbs, of great Virtue; what they were, is not known, unless that onely which is called Payeo. Moreover he faith, that this Drink put him into a violent sweat, and caused a long and sound sleep, as they which his Fever left him, and being returned again to his Senses, he was commanded to receive Baptism, for without it they threatned to burn him albut, as they had done Hubbutines at Maylo, who was King of the Pumire. and we see they had done Hubbutines at Maylo. as they had done Huabutimoe at Mexico, who was King of that Empire; and to affright him into Baptifin, the Pile of Wood was kindled, when they notified this Sentence to him. At length he faid that he was contented to be baptized, after which Proclamation being made of the Crimes for which he died, he was tied to a Poft, and strangled. In all which particulars the Spanish Historians ages, and also that he remained three months in Prison.

Of the Information and Process which was given in, and made against Atahualpa.

THE Trial of Mahualpa was long and folemn, though Gomara touches upon it in thort. But the manner was this:

The Governour himself was Lord Chief Justice of the Bench, and with him prefided Don Diego de Almagro, his Companion; the Clerk of the Court was San-cho de Cuellar; there was also an Attorney General appointed in behalf of the King, and Council allowed for Atabualpa; and others were affigned to bring in the Winefles, and take their Testimonies upon twelve several Interrogatories; there were also two other Judges named, to be Affistants, and give their opinions in the Case, whom, for respect, I think not fit to nominate, though they were suf-

The first Interrogatory was this: Did you know Hungna Capac and his Wives? and how many had he? The 2d. Was Hnascar Inca his lawfully begotten Sun and Heir of this Kingdom? and was Atabualpa illegitimate, and a Baltard, and not Son of the King, but of some Indian of Quim? The ad. Had the Incn other Sons befides those before mentioned? The 4th. Did Atabualpa inherit this Entpire by virtue of his Father's Testament, or did he usurp it by Tyranny? The 5th. Was Hussen disinherited of his Kingdom by his Father's Testament, or was he declared Heir? The 6th. Was Huafton still living, or was he dead? or did his dye a natural Death, or was he killed by order of Atahnalpa? and when was it, either before or fince the coming of the Spaniards? The 7th. Was Atahnalpa and Italian and Idolater? and did he command his Subjects to factifice Men and Children? The 8th, Did Atabualpa raife unjust Wars? and was he guilty of the Bloud of much People? The 9th. Did Atahnalpa entertain many Concubines? The 10th. Did Mahnalpa receive the Tribute of the Empire fince the Spaniards took the possession of it? and did he consume and embezle it? The 11th. Do you know that fince the coming in of the Spaniards that Atabaapa hath given Presents or Gifts out of the Royal Treasury to his Kindred and Captains? and how, and in what manner hath he embezled and wasted the Wealth of the Publick? The 12th. Do you know that King Atabualpa hath fince his Imprisonment treated with any Captains and Souldiers to rebell, and raife War against the Spaniards? and what Levies of Men, and what Preparations of Arms have been made for War? Upon these Interogatories they examined ten several Persons; seven of which were Servants to the Spaniards, and three of them were not, that so they might not appear to be their Creatures; yet they all declared what loever Philipilio put into their Mouths, as Gomara affirms. Onely there was one Witnels, who was none of the Servants belonging to the Spaniards, called Quespe, who was Captain of a Company, being the last that was to be examined, suspecting that the Interpreter would say something which he had not testified, he, to prevent it, answered in the control of the control o flort, either in the Affirmative, or in the Negative, faying either 7, which is yes, or Manan, which is no. And left the Interpreter should fallifie these Words, which were not well understood by the Persons present, when he spake in the affirmative, he would nod with his Head two or three times, and when in the negative, he would shake with his Head and his Right-hand, at which the Judges much admired, being pleafed with the fubtility of the Indian. Howfoever the Death of Itahnalpa being determined, Sentence was paffed upon him, and accordingly he was executed, as we have already declared, though many of them, as well feel. well fuch as belonged to Picarro, as those who came with Almagro, who were of a generous Spirit, differted, and protested against the Fact. The Names of the most eminent amongst them were Francisco de Chaves, and Diego de Chaves, who were Brothers, and Natives of Truxillo, Francisco de Fuentes, Pedro de Ayala, Diego de Mora, Francisco Moscoso, Hernando de Haro, Pedro de Mendoça, Juan de Herrada and Alonso de Avila, and Blus de Atiença, with many others; all which were of one nion, that it was not lawfull to put a King to death, who had treated them kind. ly, and had never done them any Injury; and if in case he were guilty of any Orime, they should transport him into Spain, there to be tried by the Emperour, and not by themselves, who had no Power or Jurisdiction over Kings. That they and not by themselves, who had no Power or Jurisdiction over Kings. That they should consider the Honour of the Spanish Nation, which must greatly siffer in the Reputation of the World, and be branded with Tyranny and Cruelty, when soever it should be objected against them, that they had put a King to death, during the time that they had given their Parole to the contrary, and were under Obligations of Treaty, and Articles, for his Ransome, of which they had already received the greatest part. That they should be cautious how, and in what manner they stained their great Atchievements with an Act so foul and inhumane as this; that the fear of God should restrain them, who, after so barbarous Action, could not expect Bessigning or Successive agreeable to their barbay besigning to could not expect Bleffings, or Successes agreeable to their happy beginnings. but on the contrary, Misfortunes, and Ruines, and an unhappy end to all those who had a hand in this Wickedness. That it was not lawfull to put any Man to death, without hearing what he could fay in his own Defence; that they appealed from their Sentence to the Emperour Charles the 5th. and in the mean une conflituted funa de Herrada Protectour of the Person of King Atahualpa. These and many other particulars of this nature, they uttered not onely in Words, but allo in Writing, folemnly protefting before the Judges against this Fact, and against all the evils which might be the confequences thereof. Nor were those on the other fide less bitter and violent against those who favoured Atahnaha, calling them Traitors to the Royal Crown of Castile, and the Emperour their Sovereign, the augmentation and enlargement of whose Dominion, they had endeavoured to prevent. That by the death of this Tyrant they might feather own Lives, and the entire Dominion of that whole Empire, all which the contrary would run great danger and hazard. Of all which, and of the Multinies which these Diffenters caused, they would inform His Majesty, that so he might diftinguish between such who were his loyal Subjects, and faithfull to his Service, and those who were Traitors, and mutinous, and obstructive to the enlargement of his Dominions. Thus were the Discords enflamed to such a degree, that they had broken out into a Civil War, had not some more moderate Men, and lefs paffionate, interpoled between both Parties, and reprefented how defluctive and fatal fuch Differences might prove to both fides, and to the fucces of the Defign in hand, in case that Christians, on the score of Infidels, shouldenter into a Civil War. They moreover reprefented to those who maintained the Cause of Atabuaspa, that they should consider how they were no more than fifty in number, and inferiour to the contrary party, which confifted of three lundred and fifty; fo that in case they thould pretend to decide the controverse by Arms, the Issue would be their own destruction, and the loss of that rich King dom, which now they might fecure by the Death of this King. These Reasons and Confiderations abated the Spirits of those who protected Acabualpa, so that they concurred with the others in his Sentence of Death, which was accordingly

Royal Commentaries.

CHAP. XXXVIII.

Of the Wit and Subtilty of Atahualpa; and of the Treafure which was collected towards his Ransome.

Tabualpa (as we have faid) was of a quick and ready Understanding, an In-A flance whereof we have in this paffage, which indeed haftned his Death; for he observing the Spaniards to read and write, did believe that it was a Gift natural to them, and born with them, to try which he defired a Spaniards, who came to visit him, or that was one of his Guard, that he would write the Name of God on the Nail of his Thumb; the Souldier having vyrote, as he defired, he asked three or four Souldiers, one after another, vvhat that Word meant, they all told him, that it vvas the name of God. At length Don Francisco Piçarro came all told him, that it vvas the name of God. At length toon framely to have anie in, with vvhom after he had discoursed a vvhile, he asked him the meaning of those Letters vvhich yvere vvrote on his Nail: Novy Picarro not knowing elther to vivile or read, answered that he could not tell, by which he collected, that the knowledge of Letters vvas acquired, and not natural; and from that time ever after he conceived a meaner efteem of the Governour than before; for that (as vve have faid) the Incas, in their Moral Philosophy, vvere taught, that the Royal Family, Nobles and Gentlemen, ought to exceed their Inferious in knowledge and Vertues, as appears in the Trial of Novitiates, (as we have formerly related) who were to run through all Exercises and Hardilips, which might try and approve them; so when Atabusapa had discovered the Ignorance of Picarra, who being the Governour, and Chief, vvas, according to his Rule, to have excelled all his Inferiours in Learning and Vertues, he conceived a meaner Opinion of him, which when the Governour had observed, he grew angry and offended with him, which haftened the Death of Atabualpa. This paffage I have head from those who were then present, which may be a caution, and an advertishment to Noble Persons in the Education of their Sons; for that for want of Reading, and Writing, and a little Latin, they may fall into Difgraces, and be fibbled to Affronts; though indeed in those times ignorance was more excusable than in this prefent age, which affords many Mafters in Spain, where all Sciences and Learning flourish, and where Noble-men value themselves not more on their bonourable Birth, than on their vertuous Education, which yields a Lustre like pretious Stones enchased with Gold.

Another thing is reported of Atahnalpa, for an Instance of his Wit and good Understand, which was this, that amongst many other things, which the Spanium of then there was one who had a Glass Cup, of the finelt fort of Metal, which was made at Venice. The Merchant of it hoping for a good Reward, prefined it to the King Atahualpa, (who received it to kindly, that (though he was then a Prifoner) he ordered ten of his Cups of Gold, and Silver, to be given the Spaniard in return thereof. The Inca looking and admiring much the curiofity of the Workmanship, asked one that frood by, if any other befides the Kings of Calife were ferved in fuch Vessels; to which he that made the Answer, supposing that he means the Casife and not the Workmanship, replied that not onely that he meant the Glass, and not the Workmanship, replied, that not onely kings and Nobles, but the Commonalty of Spain, made use of those Glasses which when Ataknalpa heard, he let it stall from his Hands, saying, that things so common, were not worthy the esteem of a King. At which Words of an Indian all Persons the start is a start of the start of the Persons then present did much admire.

Thus was Atabualpa put to Death by formal process of Justice, (as is related) and before the quantity of Gold and Silver which he had promised for his Ranfome was fully completed, because time was not given him to make due compliance, though some report, that they put him to death after he had paid the entire quantity: but whatloever that was, the Spaniards divided to every Man his Share, in the nature of Spoils taken in War. But what the value of this Ran. fome was, Augustin de Carate, and Francis Lopez, who wrote in those days, vari oufly report. I suppose that their Errours were in the heap or mass, I shall men tion former particulars thereof, that we may make a better judgment of the whole matter.

Carate, in the 7th Chapter of his fecond Book, hath thefe precife Words.

"There was due to His Majefty for his Fifths, thirty thousand Marks " of pure, fine Plate, wrought and embofled; and in Gold an hundred and "twenty Millions of Marks, &c. Gomara, in the 118th Chapter, faith. That Francisco Picarro, after he had made an Essay of the Gold and Silver, he cansed them to be weighed, and found fifty two thouland Marks in good Silver, and a million and three hundred and twenty fix thousand and five hundred weight or Ducats of Gold. In case we compare these two Authours together, we shall find that Gomescomes short of the Sum which Carate mentions, at least one hundred thousand Marks of Silver; because that to make the King's Fifth to amount unto thirty thousand Mark, the principal must consist of one hundred and fifty thousand, the like Errour, and much more, there is in the Gold; for whereas Carate faith, that His Maiefty's Fifth of the Gold amounted unto an hundred and twenty millione of Marks, which must be a plain Errour in the Print; for if according to the value we multiply every Mark of Gold at seventy two Ducats, the sum will be come so vast and immense, that there will scarce be numbers in Arithmetick sufficient to contain the account. And if by Marks they mean Maravedis, the Frrour will be as low on that fide, as it was excessive in the other, because an hundred and twenty millions of Maravedis make onely three hundred and twenty thousand Ducats, which likewise is more evident, as will hereaster appear by the account of Division, which these Authours make, in the share and proportion which belonged to every fingle Person out of the Ransome of Atahualpa, whereby they make the value of the Gold, reduced into Silver, to amount unto seven hundred and eighty fix thousand and fix hundred Ducats. According to which I am inclined to make out every Man's share and proportion of Gold and Silver, rather than to follow an opinion of such incredible Sums as are before mentioned And herein I am more willing to give credit unto Carate (who was Accountant General) in fuch Sums as he fets down precifely, than to the reports of Goes and Comers, who speak at random: Onely as to the quantity of Silver which was divided, I follow that which Gomara relates, because Carate is filent in that particular, as also in the proportions divided to each Captain, as appears by his History; onely the share which appertained to the General we have taken upon the information of those who were present. Both Authours agree, that the Horsemen were fixty in number, and the Foot, or Infantry, one hundred and fifty Though Cieça de Leon, speaking of Cassamarca, where Atabualpa was imprisoned faith, that those who took him were fixty Horse, and an hundred Foot; in which report concerning the Foot, I rather follow this Authour than Gomara; for besides that he was actually in Peru, when he wrote of these matters, I am also much more apt to keep within the compass of Accounts, and set down ten too little, rather than five too much.

These Authours also differ much about the shares which every Souldier received; for to the Souldiers they allot fix parts in Gold, and one in Silver; and to the Governour, and his Captains, and the People with Almagro, they give three parts in Gold, and one in Silver. Why in those times the Gold so much exceeded the quantity of the Silver, (the contrary to which now appears in all parts of the World) the true Reason is this: Because that the Incan Kings were always Masters of more Gold than Silver, of which they made no other use than to adom their Temples, and Royal Palaces, not esteeming them in the place of Riches, or Treasure. Moreover there was much more difficulty in digging Silver, than in finding Gold. For Silver, as we see in the Mines of Potofi, is setched from the Bowels of the Earth, into which they fink fometimes two hundred fathoms, as Acofta reports in the 8th Chapter of his 4th Book, which such as have the curiofity may read and learn with what incredible labour that Metal is extracted, for which cause the Incas would not exact their Tribute from the People in that Metal, but Gold is procured with much more ease, being sound on the Surface of the Earth, being washed down from the Mountains with sudden Rains, and with the fall of the Waters is found in Brooks, and on the Banks of Rivers; and generally in all parts of Pern, though more in some parts than in others; this Metal, rally in an parts of tern, though more in tome parts than in others; this metal, when the Indian find, they wash it, and life it as Goldsmiths do their Cinders, and afterwards made Prefents thereof unto their Kings.

But to return again unto our purpose, which is to determine what the value was of that incredible Ransome, for our better judgment wherein, vve shall set down the feveral particulars mentioned by the aforefaid Authours. As to the valie and difference between Gold and Silver, there was in those days, as well as now in Spain, about twenty per Cent. in the efteem of Gold above that of Silnovy in again, about evenily per dom. In the effective of Gold above that of Silver, and rather more than less, but for more plainness, vve vvill reduce the Weights of Gold and Silver to Ducats of Caffile, of eleven Ryalls and one Man. verigins of a Ducat. Novv to come to the Division, Carate faith, that the share to every Horseman came to 12000 Weight, that is Ducats in Gold, besides Silver; for every Horfeman had a fourth part more than a Foot-man, and yet notwithflanding Atabaliba had not complied with the fifth part of what he had promifed for his Ransone. And in regard that no share of this Ransome belonged to Almago and his Souldiers, because they were not then present when Atabaliba was made a Prisoner, howsfoever the Governour bestowed a thousand Ducats on every Souldier, as a Gratuity, and an Encouragement: This Carate affirms. Gomara faith, that the share to every Horseman amounted to 370 Marks of Plate, besides Gold; and to the Captains thirty or forty thousand Ducats a piece. And now after we have summed up the whole, which these Authous put to account, of every parcel, let us subtract the fifth, and then we shall easily compute what the fumm total amounted unto, and how much belonged to every Man for his fingle

To the Governour they divided 200000 Ducats, of which 150000 was in Gold, and 50000 in Silver; belides the Chair in which the Inca was carried, weighing 25000 Ducats of Gold, which being thrown into the Heaps amongst the other Riches, appertained to him, as Captain General. To the three Captains of Horse their proportion was 20000 Ducats in Gold, and 30000 in Silver. To the four Captains of Foot the like fumm was proportioned of 20000 Ducats in Cold, and 30000 in Silver. To the hundred Foot Souldiers their share amounted unto 900000 Ducats in Gold, and 195000 in Silver. To the two hundred and foris Spaniards which came up with Almagro, a largess was given of 80000 Ducats in Gold, and 60000 in Silver. And to Almagra himself 30000 Ducats in Gold, and 10000 in Silver, besides the Allowance which his Companion made him our of his own share, as shall hereaster be more particularly mentioned. The fifth of all which, deducted from these several parcels in Gold, amounted unto 546250 Ducats, and the fifth from the Silver unto 15750 Ducats. And in regard, as Hiflorians report, that the Silver was purified, and much finer than that which we call Standard, and was by four Ryalls per Mark better, or of more value; we shall add the fumm of 38160 Ducats unto this Account, being for fo much as this Silver was more refined and better than the common Standard. And not to weaby the Reader farther with these long Accounts of every particular summ, we flull caft up the total, with allowance of twenty per cent. advance, in the value between the Gold and the Silver; with twenty per cent. difference between the Piece of Eight and the Ducat; so that an hundred Pefos in Gold are worth an hundred and forty four Ducats, according to which we shall easily make up the several summs in Gold. And in regard that Historians do not mention whether the Gold was fine, as they do that the Silver was refined and purified, we shall Suppose that the Gold was worth twenty two Quilats and an half, as in the Standard in Peru, and not twenty four Quilats, as in Spain, for then we should add to the whole value of the Gold 218500 Ducats, which arises on the Quilat and are half of Advance; but because the Spanish Writers do not mention that difference, we shall likewise leave it out in this Account, lest we should seem to insert any thing without good Authority. As to the Silver, there is no other difference than of twenty per cent, between the Piece of Eight and the Ducat. We fay then that the Gold, which fell to the share of the Governour, together with the Royal ·252000 Ducats. Chair, amounted unto-

-60000 the Silver unto-1 29600 To the three Captains of Horse in Gold--36000 in Silver --

So that the fumm total of the Ransome of Atahualpa amounted unto 4605670 Ducats, of which fumm 3933000 Ducats are the value of the Gold, and the 672670 Ducats are the value of the Silver, accounting therein the advantage upon the fine. ness above the Standard; both which summs together amount to the aforesaid total of 4605670 Ducats. This was the value of those Riches which thes paniard gained in Peru, but much greater was that which they found in Cozco, when they made their entrance into that City, as Gomara and Carate report, and as we shall declare hereafter in its due place. Blas Valera faith, that the Ransome of Atahuahaa. mounted unto 4800000 Ducats, the which he reports on the Authority of the Indians, who had fet down an account by their knots of every particular parcel which was brought from the feveral Provinces; but we shall rather follow the account given by our Historians herein, than that of the Indians; though Blau Valera differs from the others, and makes the fumm greater by 194330 Ducats, than what is before mentioned. In those former times such great summs seemed incredible, because they were not known, though now they create no great Wonder, since it is manifest, that for these thirty years past, there have been imported ten or twelve Millions every year in the River of Guadalquivir; the which my Countrey having fent as an Offering to Spain, and all the old World, hath thereby been more profitable to Strangers, than kind and natural to her own Children.

Gomara in the 118th. Chap. of his Book speaking of this Ransome, hath these Gomara in the 118th. Chap. of his Book speaking of this Kantome, hatchfilled Words. "Framsifeo Pigarro fent the fifth part of his Spoils, together with a Re" lation of his Successes, by his Brother Hernando, unto the Emperour, and with him returned many of the Souldiers very rich, with twenty, thirty and forw thousand Ducats a Man. In short, they brought away almost all the Golds." ling the Bank of Seville with Money, and the World with the fame and difference of the proof of the world with the state with the state of the state of the World with the state " course thereof, and with desires of that enterprise. Thus far are the Words of Gonara. It is well known, that those who returned were fixty in number. The Governour shared to his Companion 120000 Ducats, being so much as appertain ned to him out of his proportion. To Hernando de Luque, the Schoolmafter, nothing was divided, because it was known, that he being already failed, could be no farther usefull, so that Historians have no occasion to make other mention concerning him.

XXXIX. CHAP.

Of the Discourses which the Spaniards made upon these Af-

 $B^{\rm Y}$  the Death of these two Brother-Kings, (or rather Enemies) Huasear and Anahualpa, the Spaniards became absolute Lords and Masters of both their Kingdoms; there being none remaining to defend the People, or make head against them; for the race of the Incas, being almost extinct, the Indians were like Sheep without a Shepherd, having none to govern them, either in Peace or War; and besides, the Civil and intestine Discords between the Factions of Huaswar; and bendes, the Cavil and intercall able, fo that both Parties, being defirous to gratifie the Spaniards, made them the Instruments of each other's Revenge. Moreover those Captains who were of Andmalpa's party were divided amongst themselves; for some of them made head against the Spaniards, as we shall see hereafter, and others disbanded the Armies under their Command, with intennereatter, and others disbanded the Armies under their Command, with intention to fet up an Inca of their own choice, supposing that he would be more kind and indulgent to them than a strange Prince; the Person whom they elected was Paullu, the Son of Huayna Capac, being one of those who had made his escape from the Cruelty of Atabualpa. The Person who had the principal hand in this Election, was the Major General Quizquiz, who was in Cuntisum when the News came of the Imprisonment of Atabualpa, and untill that time had been an Energy to Paullu. But manager and violent professing cause Man to story the an Enemy to Paullu. But urgent and violent necessities cause Men to stoop unto mean and low Actions, and more especially Tyrants, and Men of poor and base Souls, who finding themselves sinking, regard neither Honour nor Conscience, but onely such means as tend to their own vile and mischievous Designs. Quiequiz was an Officer of Arabualpa, and a front and an experienced Souldier. To Paullu they gave the coloured Wreath, but he received no fatisfaction in that Royal Signal, because he knew that the lawfull Inheritance belonged to Manco has, and not to himself; which when Quizquiz observed, and that Paulin was old, and not defirous of the Government, he then fet up for himfelf, refolving to contend with his own Force and Prowefs; and accordingly having raifed an Army, he marched towards Cozco, to know what was become of his King Ana-hadipa; upon which March we shall leave him, until we come to the time and place of his Actions.

The Spaniards observing with what Honour and Adoration they were generally received by the Indians, and that, according to the report made them by the fix Spaniards who went on Discovery, all Veneration and Service was paid to them; they often entertained familiar Discourses one with the other on that Subject, making various Reflexions on the causes thereof, as the fancy of every Man did fuggest. Some would attribute the success of all to their own Prowels and Valour, for that the Indians feeing them fo frout and refolute, believed them to be invincible, and fo out of mere fear and terrour fubmitted and yielded, and framing a thousand Rodomontado's of their own Conduct and Courage, searched not for any cause beyond themselves, nor restected on the Prophecies of Husyns Capac, which forerold the coming of the Spaniards into their Countrey, who should defroy their Idolatry, and their Empire; and out of this superstitious Belief yielded all up without resistance. Howsoever there were some more considerate than the reft, who being zealous for the fervice of God, and for the propagation of the Christian Faith, attributed all their Successes to the miraculous Operations of God, in favour to the propagation of the Gospel, that so the Faithfull, as well god, in favour to the propagation of the Gospel, that so the Faithfull, as well god, in favour to the propagation of the Gospel, that so the faithfull, as well god, in favour to the propagation of the Gospel, that the third of the faithfull god propagation of the go as Infidels, beholding them with wonderfull attention, the one might be thereby induced to receive the Faith with readincs and love, and the others be encouraged Qqq2 to preach it with fervour and charity towards their Neighbours, and with due to fipect towards God, who hath thewed them fuch great and miraculous works.

And indeed we may aver it for a truth; that it could be no lefs than miraculous. That a Spaniard or two should travell alone two or three hundred Leagues in an Enemies Countrey, and be carried through it on Mens Shoulders, and all Re. fpeet and Adoration paid to them, as if they had been Gods, whenas they might have thrown them over fome Bridge, or down some precipice, or by other means have eafily deftroyed them, is a confervation above all humane Wifedom and Direction, and ought to be folely attributed to the Divine Providence, by fuch as profess themselves good Christians, and Preachers of the Gospel of Jesus Chrift. Others improving this confideration and Argument farther, did fone times in prefence of the Governour discourse to this effect. That in regard Ashualva had received Baptism, it had been more conducing to the quiet of that Kingdom, and propagation of the Catholick Faith, to have conferred him alive and paid him all Honour and Respect, requiring of him, that since he himself was become a Christian, that he should publish an Edict in savour of that Religion, commanding all his Subjects and Vassals within a certain time to be bantized; certainly this course would have been extremely prevalent for thee or four most pungent Reasons, every one of which singly might have been sufficient to have converted the whole Nation, how much more, when they all concurred to gether.

As first, The Command of the Inca, to which in the most trivial matters Obedience is yielded, as to the Law of God, how much more would it be in the Case of Religion, delivered by those whom they in their own Minds esteemed to be Gods.

Secondly, the Natural Obedience which they always yielded to their Inca.

Thirdly, The Example which the King had given in being baptized, would easily have besorten a conformity in his People. And, Fourthly, That which would have appeared most specious and obligatory, and which comprehends the force of all together, would have been the Precept of Athahaspa, declaring, That in purfuance of the Prophecy of his Father Haspaca-pac, delivered in his last Will and Testament, signifying the Obedience they were to yield to those new Guests, who were to enter into their Countrey, whose Law and Religion was much better, and more excellent than theirs.

Had (I fav) the Preachers taken advantage of this convincing Method of Arguments, certainly the Gospel would have entred and spread without opposition; but God in his fecret Judgment would not admit of these Methods, that so those matters might come to pass, which afterwards succeeded.

CHAP. XL.

The Effects which the Civil Discords between the two Incan Kings, who were Brothers, did produce.

THE War which was raifed between the two Kings Huafear and Atahualpa, who were Brothers, was the carle of the coal and facilitated the Entrance, and the Conquest vehich the Spaniards made of that Country, vyhich being for the most part craggy and mountainous, and full of difficult Passages, might otherwise have been easily defended. But God, vyho in his Mercy designed the propagation of the Gospel in those Countries, vvas pleased for the more easie introduction thereof, to permit those seuds between those two Brothers.

Acolla speaking summarily of this Point, in the 22d. Chapter of his 6th Book. hath these Words. "Huayna Capae vvas succeeded in Cozeo by one of his Sons, "called Tito Cust Gualpa, (he means Inti Cust Gualpa) aftervoards he vvas called "Gualcar Inga, and his Body burned by the Captains of Atahualpa, vvho also vvas the Son of Guayna Capac, and raised Arms against his Brother in Quitu, and "came against him with a powerfull Army. At that time the Captains of "Andmalpa, namely Quizquiz, and Chilicuchima seized upon Guascar Inca in the "City of Cocco, after he vvas declared Sovereign Lord and King, and indeed he was the lawfull Heir and Succeffour. Great was the Confusion and Noise " which this Action made through all parts, both of the Kingdom, and of the "Court. And whereas it was their Custome upon all great Emergencies of Af-"fairs, to have recourse unto Sacrifices, the People finding themselves in no ca-verse, praying, that fince they were not able of themselves to deliver their King out of Prison, that he would be pleased to fend some People from Heaven, who might procure his Freedom. Whilst they were intent to the solemn performance of this Sacrifice, News was brought, that a certain People was come by Sea, and having landed, had feized Arabualpa, and kept him Prisoner. And in regard that this Affair happened just in that conjuncture of time, when this Sacrifice was offering, and that the People were very few in "number, who had feized on Atahnalpa in Caxamalca; they gave the name of Viracochas to the Spaniards, which name continues to them unto this day, upon " a belief, that they were fent from God for rescue of their King; and indeed "the People would have been confirmed in this opinion, had the Spaniards followed those Methods which were pursuant thereunto. And on this occasion we ought seriously to contemplate the Wiscdom of the Divine Providence, which conducted the Spaniards into those Countries in that seasonable conjuncture of Affairs, when the Divitions between the two Brothers were grown up to a Civil and an Intestine War; without which advantage, which begat in up to a Civil and an intertine vvar; without which advantage, which object in the Indians a belief, that the Spaniards were a People dropped from Heaven, it had been impossible for such a handfull of Men to have become Conquerous of "that numerous People, the lofs of whofe Countrey was recompended to them, "by the gain which Heaven was to their Souls. Thus far are the Words of Acofea, with which he concludes that Chapter, wherein with much brevity he fums up the War between the two Brothers, the Tyranny of the one, and the Right of Succession which appertained to the other, the Imprisonment of them both, and the small number of Men which took Atahualpa Prisoner, and how gratious the Divine Providence was to those poor Gentiles in their Conversion; what Name they gave to the Christians, and the Esteem which they had of them, upon an opinion that they were come from Heaven: All which particulars we have already declared, and fet forth at large. We are now to tell you the reason of that name of Viracocha, given by them to the some ards, which was this: So foon as they faw the Spaniards in their Countrey with that Beard and Habit, in which the Phantasme appeared to their Inca Firacosts, the which Apparition the Indians ever afterwards adored for a God, as he declared himself to be. And that when some time after they saw that the Spaniards had as their first entrance taken Atahualpa Prisoner, and in a few days afterwards had put him to death by form of Law, and in such manner as is due to Murtherers and Malefactours, and had at his Execution, by the Voice of a Crier, published the Tyrannies, Cruelties and Treason against Huascar, for which he suffered, they were then really convinced, that the Spaniards were Sons of the God Viracocha and were descended from their Father the Sun, to punish Atabualpa for his Crimes and to revenge upon him the Bloud of his Brother, and of all that Family. And what did moreover confirm this Belief, were the Cannon and Musquets which the Spaniards used, and which the Indians took for proper Arms and Ammunition of the Sun, giving them the name of Illapa, which lignifies Thunder, and Lightning. and Thunderbolts. And to the Name of Viracocha, they added the Title of Inca. as properly belonging to them on score of the Relation they had to the Sun their Father, from whom they descended; the which Title they gave to all the Conquerours of Peru, from the first, who entred with Francisco Picarro, to those who came in with Almagro, and afterwards with Don Pedro de Alvarado, all whom they adored for Gods; the which Esteem and Veneration for them continued until the Covetousness, the which Esteem and Veneration for their continued using the Covetousness, Luxury, Cruelty and Severity, with which in a barbarous manner many of them treated the poor Indians, discovered the falsity of this vain Opinion, and opened their Eyes; giving them to understand, that such as were so different in their Morals, and in all their Actions to their ancient Incus, could not be descended from the Sun, and consequently could not merit the Title of Incas how soever they continued the Name of Viracocha, for the similitude they had in their Habit, and Beard to the Phantasine, or Apparition. Thus did the Indiana under that, and heard to the Phantaine, or Apparation. Thus did the main judge of those Spaniards who were cruel, and ill natured to them, calling them Cappay, which is the Name they give to the Devil; but on the contrary, such a were gentle, kind and compassionate towards them, they not onely confirmed their former Titles which they had given them, but added thereunto such other compellations as they attributed to their Kings, as Intipchurin, Child of the Sun, Hanc-chacuay, a Lover of the poor; and when they would higher exalt the Goodness and Vertue of those Spaniards, who treated them kindly, they called them the Sons of God, which when they would express in Spanish, for the Name of God, which is Dios, they would pronounce it Tim, because the Letter D, is not in the Indian Language. So Tinspacharin is with them the Son of God, though in these times, by learning the Spanish Tongue, they are come to a better pronunciation. Such Honour and Veneration did these poor Indians thew at the beginning to those Spaniards who were compassionate, and good natured towards them, and the like respect do they still bear towards the Clergy, as well as to the Seculars, in whom they observe the brightness of Vertue to thine with Humility and Gentlenefs, without Avarice or Luxury; for the Ludians are naturally of a good dilpolition, very meek and humble, cordial to their Benefactours, and gratefull for the least favour or good they receive. The which natural proneness to make acknowledgments for good Offices done, they derived from the ancient Cuftoms of their Kings, whose Studies were for the publick wellfare of their People, by which they merited all those Names and Surnames of Renown, which were attributed by their People to them.

Royal Commentaries.

Of the Faithfulness which the Indians of Peru shewed unto the Spaniards when taken by them in the War.

THE Indians of Peru held this Maxime or Principle. That if any yielded himself, or having been taken by a Spaniard in the War, he was thereby become his absolute Slave, and esteemed him by whom he was taken to be his hecome his anionite Stave, and effective from the was taken to be his Idol, and his God, and that he ought to honour and revere him for fuch; and to obey, ferve, and be faithfull to him unto the death, and not to deny him eight of the Child Courtey Departs 1875 of Child to oney, rerve, and be faithful to find the death, and not to deny firm either for the fake of his Countrey, Parents, Wife or Children. Upon this Principle they preferred the Wellfare of a Spaniard, who was their Mafter, before all other confiderations whatfoever, and would fell or betray their own Family, if omer connectations whattoever, and would left of bettay their own ranning, it their Mafter required it, and that it were necessary or conducing to his Service; by which means the Spaniards never wanted Spies, nor Intelligence of whatsoever passed amongs the Indians, which was of great use to them in the Subjection and Conquelt of that Countrey; for they believed it to be a real duty in them to be obedient unto those to whom they had yielded themselves Captives; and therefore would engage in fight on their Mafters fide, against their own Countreymen and Relations, as if they were their mortal Enemies: When some Spanish Troops in their March had taken some Indian Captives, and that the Commanders would fhare them amongst the Souldiers according as every Man wanted a Servant, the hadan would refuse to acknowledge any other for his Master, than him onely to whom he had yielded himself; and when they were told, that it was the Rule of War to divide equal shares to every Souldier, and that he who was already provided, was to permit his Companion to be equally accommodated: The Indian answered, that he would obey on condition, that when the Christian to whom he was allotted had taken another Captive, that he might have the liberty to return to his Mafter to whom he had first submitted; the like Fidelity the Women also professed. Three Indians taken in this manner I lest in the House of my Father, and Lord Garcilasso de la Vega, one of which was called Alli, which is as much as to fay Good; he was taken in a Battel, of which there were many in Collato, after the Indian had made their general Infurrection, in one of which this Alli fought like a very front Soulder, and having engaged far with some few Persons, he took no care to fave himself, until he saw all his Companions put to slight, and hardby care to rave numers, until ne raw all his Companions put to light, and hardly purfued by the Spaniards, and having then little hopes of fafety or refuge, he laid himfelf amongst the dead, to which posture he had opportunity to compose himfelf by the darkness of the night, and casting away his Shirt, he wallowed in the bloud of the slain, that so he might seem to be one of them.

The Spaniards returning from the pursuit unto their Camp in several Companies, three or four of them happened to pass that way, where this Indian lay counterfeiting the dead Man; and whilft they evere viewing the dead, my Lord and Master Garçitasso de la Vega observed one of them to pant, and dravy his Breath, vyhereupon he vyent near him, and touched him vyith the point of his Spear, to try if he had sense, and overe living; so soon as the Indian selt the prick he immediately flatted up, and cried for quarter, fearing that there vvas nothing lefs than Death for him. After vvhich he remained in the Service of my Father, with the Eddition of Cubio contains the base decade appeals about the service of the ser with that Fidelity and Subjection which we have already expressed, being desirous to evidence the fame on all occasions. He vvas aftervvards baptized, calling himself John, and his Wife Isabel.

CHAP. I.

Don Pedro de Alvarado goes to the Conquest of Peru.

HE Fame of the great Archievements in Peru, and the Riches thereof was now spread in all parts with such Renown, that as Lopez de Gomara in the z6th Chapter of his Book reports, the Spaniards crowded in such numbers to take a share of the Gold, that Panama, Nicaragua, Quahutemallan, Cartagena, and other Plantations, and Islands were almost dispeopled, and lest desolate. Amough the rest Admiral Don Pedro de Alvarado, one of the most famous and renowned Captains of that age, being not contented with the Glory and Riches he had acquired by the Conquest of the Empire of Mexico, Utlatlan, and Quahntemallan, refolved to augment his Greatness by his attempts upon Peru. To which end he obtained a Commission from the Emperour Charles the fifth, to conquer, plant and govern all that Countrey which he should gain, at such a number of Leagues distant from the Jurisdiction and Conquests of Francisco de Picarro. For this Enterpile he made Levies of many front Fellows, and moreover many Gentlemen of Quality from all parts of Spain offered their Services, especially those of Estremen-nor, because Don Pedro himself was a Native of Badajoz. This noble Perfon, amongst his many other Excellencies of Nature, was endued with fuch numbleness and activity of Body, that thereby he saved his own Life, when the Marquifs del Valle was forced to make a retreat from Mexico: for the Marquis del Valle was forced to make a reteat from Packtor; for the Indians having broken the Bridge over which the Spaniards were to pass: This the Indians having broken the Bridge over which he carried in his hand, the point of Which having fixed in the Bodies of the dead, he took a running leap of twenty five Foot clear over the Bridge; at which the Indians were so much astonished, and wondred, that they called him a Son of God. This Passage Lopez de Gomara for the Lorente of his Bodie where treating of the Conquest of and wondred, that they called him a Son of God. This Pallage Lopez de Gomard touches in the 107th Chapter of his Book, where treating of the Conquest of Mexico, and of Hernando de Cortes, he hath these Words, which we have delivered verbatim: "When he returned to them, though some fought very stoutly, "yet he found many killed. He lost his Gold, his Baggage, and Prisoners. In fine, his Men were routed, and his Camp dispersed, and nothing remained in that posture in which he had lest it; howsoever he rallied as many as he could, "put them in the front, and he hintiest brought up the rere. And Pedro de Alwardo was ordered to rally what Forces he could, and to make head against the Enemy, but they charged him to home, that he was not able to withstand

Enemy, but they charged him fo home, that he was not able to withfrand them; when seeing his Men slain round about him, and that if he staid, there was no possibility to escape; he followed Cortes with the Lance in his hand, and patsing over the dead bodies, and such as were wounded and groaning, he care to the Bridge Cabrera, and leaped over it with his Lance, at which not onely the Indians, but the Spaniards were afforished, for that no other was able to doe the like; some indeed there were who attempted it, but falling short, they were afformed. Thus fax frequire World of Gomana.

of the great activity of this Gentleman; and that the fecond time after Mexico was fubdued, how he had fet two Marble Pillars at each end of the Arch of the Bridge, for marks of the leap which he had taken; to which, for the truth of what I have faid, I refer my felf, in case they be still remaining, though it is a wonder.

if envy and emulation of this Age hath not destroyed them.

The first time that this Don Pedro de Alvarado was at Seville, with design to embark for the Indies, he, with some other young Sparks his Companions, ascended to the top of the Steeple of the Great Church to enjoy the Asr, and take a view of that most pleasant prospect; where seeing a Beam thrust out from the Tower of about ten or twelve Foot long, and had been there placed some sew days before for a Scassfold, to mend some part of the Steeple. One of those Gentlemen that was with him, I do not well remember his Name, but he was a Native of Cordova; knowing how much Don Pedro did boatt, and avail himself of his activity, he on a sudden laid aside his Sword and Cloak, and without speaking a word, went out of the Tower upon the Beam, measuring of it foot by soot, untill he came to the end of it; and then turning about, walked back again with the same even steadiness as before.

Don Pedro observing this bold action, and believing that it was onely to dae him, scorned to be out done; and therefore keeping on both his Sword and Cloak, threw one end of his Cloak over his left shoulder, and the other part holding close under his right arme, and his Sword with his left; he in that police marched forth upon the Timber, and coming to the end thereof, gave a fuden turn round, measuring it with the same footing back untill he came to the Tower. Certainly it was a very bold and daring action both of one and the other. And ther time it happened, that this Don Pedro, with some other of his youthfull Companions, going to Hunt, met some Countrey sellows, who to out-up each other, were jumping over a certain Well, that was very broad, some of which leaved over it, but some would not adventure. At length came Don Pedro, and he placing his seet together, just at the brink of the Well; Now, said he, this were a god standing jump, if I durst adventure it: With that he gave a leap, and reached the other fide onely with the fore-part of his feet, and gave again on a fudden a jet back to the very place where he had taken his leap forwards. These and luch like seats of activity are recounted of this Gentleman, and others who were sm ployed in the Conquest of this new World, as if God, who had that great Work for them to doe, had endued them with abilities of body and mind proportioned to fo great an enterprize; for if the very Journey it felf through those unknown parts with peace and quietness, were a matter of labour and hardship; how much Arms But in reality, it was the Divine Affistence which co-operated with the Proweß of these Heroes; for without such a miraculous concurrence, humane power could never have attained to fuch mighty Atchievements. Thus we have mentioned something of the Activity of Alvarado; but his Acts and Monuments of his Valour are recorded in the Histories which write of Mexico, Nicaragua and Peru, though not so fully as his great Worthiness deserved.

Moreover, he was so comely a Person both Walking, and on Horse-back, that returning one time from Mexico into Spain, to clear himself of some Asperions which his envious Adversaries had charged upon him; and coming, as his duty was, to kis the Emperour's hands, and render him an account of his Services: His Majesty being then at Aranjaez, in one of the Walks of that Garden, and seeing Don Pedro with a manly gate, and handsome Air coming towards him, asked who he was? and being told that it was Alvarado; This Man, said the Emperoup, bath not the sastion and meen of a person that can be guilty of such altions as are charged upon him: And so acquitting him of all the calumnies with which he was slaundered, he gave him his hand to kiss, and received him to savour.

It was upon this Voyage when he returned a Married Man into New Spain, and carried with him feveral young Ladies for Wives, to those who had conquered that Countrey, and were fetled there in good Houses with riches and prosperity that Country, and at Huahutimallan, was there received with great joy of the people, and in his own House, with Balls and Dances, which continued for mapeople, and it has over though, what had banked, which continued for many Days and Nights. It happened that one day, when all the Conquerours were ny Days and Pognis. It happened that one day, when an the Conquerours were fate in the great Hall, to behold the Dancing; and that the Ladies were also looking out of the Jealoufies, or Latices, where, after the modelt fathion of Spain, they remained unseen: One of them said to the others, What, are these the Conquerours with whom we are to Marry? What, faid another, with these Old rotten fellows? Let those Marry with them that will, for my part, I will have none of them; the Devil take them, for they look as if they had been come from Hell; for some of them are Cripples, others Lame and Maimed 3 Some without Ears, others with one Eye, or half a Face, and the best of them hath been slashed and hacked over and over again. No, replied the other, we are not to Marry them for their good Looks, but to inherit the Estates they have gained ; for ther being old, and worn out, are to dye quickly, that we may Marry again, and chuse what song brisk fellow we please, as if we were to change an old Kettle for a new Pot. One of thele Old Gentlemen standing near these Ladies, and not seen by them, overheard all this discourse; and not enduring the scorn with which they treated these Old fellows, he replied upon them with affrontive terms, and high indignation. and told all that he had heard unto the company ; faying, Marry with them who will for me ; and Ill warrant you they will well reward your kindness to them. Having said thus much, he returned home, and prefently fent for the Parson, and Married his Indian Woman, who was of Noble Birth, and on whom he had already begot two or three Children; which he made legitimate, that they might inherit his Plantations and Estate, rather than that Gallant, whom the Lady should chuse to enjoy the fruits of his labours, and make fervants and flaves of his Children. There have been some few in Peru, who have followed his example, and Married Indian Women; but the most part have yielded to the pleasure and counsel of the Lady. The Children of these Conquerours can by experience tell us the truth of this matter, and in the Alms-houses, where they now remain, may lament the loss of their Inheritances, acquired by their Fathers Toils and Valour, and enjoyed by Strangers and Aliens, not related either to Father or Mother. In the beginning of thole times, when an Indian Woman had brought a Child to a Spaniard; all the whole family of that Woman were devoted, and fwore themfelves flaves and fervants to that Spaniard, worthipping and adoring him as their Idol, because he had entered into an affinity with them; and hereby they became very usefull to the Spaniards in their Conquest of the Indies. It was one of the Laws made by the Conquerours of the new World, That every one should enioy the Lands which were divided to him for two Lives, that is, for his own and his Son's life; and in case he had no Ghild, then the Spanish Wife was to come into the Inheritance, and barred all the natural Children, as if the Lady had contributed more towards the Conquest, than the Indian Mothers: by which means itcame often to pass, that the fine Ladies changed their old Husbands for young

Of the difficulties and dangers which Don Pedro de Alvarado and his Companions sustained in their Voyage.

This brave General Don Pedro de Alvarado was accompanied with many other worthy Gentlemen of Quality; in which number was Garcitasso de la Vega, my Lord and Father, whom Cieça de Leon calls Captain Garcitasso; and in the 42d Chapter of his Book uses these words: "General Don Pedro de Alvarado was accompanied with Diego, Gómez, and Alonso de Alvarado, which latter is now Ma." reschal in Pern, as also with Captain Garcitasso de la Vega, John de Sauvedra, Gomez de Alvarado, and other Persons of Quality, and arrived at a place near to the Quarters of Diego de Almagro; upon which such contests and quartels arose between the two Parties, that it was feared, that matters would have broken out into an open desiance, &c. Thus sar are the Words of Cieça; where it is observable, that he onely calls Garcitasso de la Vega Captain, and the other Gentlemen; with all whom I had a personal acquaintance, unless it were with Pedro, and Diego de Alvarado. In their passage by Sea from Nicaragha to Phanh Viejo, they suffered much for want of Water, and other Provisions; for upon a belief or supposition, that the Voyage would not be long; and being in geat haste to depart, they omitted to take Aboard all those things which were necessarily for their Voyage. The like want both of Victuals and Water, they suffered after they were Landed, as will appear by the Relations of the Accountant Agastin de Carate, and the Priest Lopez de Gomera, both which agree in the same Narative, onely with this difference about the value or price of the Horse which they were forced to kill in the Journey, wherewith to give food to their Ma. Wherefore I have thought fit to set down the Words of Gomera in the 117th Chapter of his Book; wherein he briefly touches on all the particular Labous and Difficulties which Don Pedro and his Companions endured in this Expedition; part of which are as solloweth:

"The Riches of Peru being published in all parts, Pedro de Alvarado obtaineda " Commission from the Emperour to discover and plant Colonies in those Countries, which were not as yet inhabited by any Spaniards: And in the first place " he dispatched Garci Holguin with two Vessels to discover the Countrey, and bring intelligence of what had lately passed in those parts. Holguin soon after returned with great commendations of the Countrey, and with mighty admiration of the vast Riches which were taken and seized by the Imprisonment of Atabaliba, reporting also that Cozco and Quin, a Countrey not far from Potolic ejo, were extremely rich. Upon this advice they resolved to sail thinker, and accordingly in the year 1535, they armed out five Ships, and embarked there upon four hundred Spaniards, and many Horfes. With these Alvarado Landed in Puerto Viejo, and marched towards Quitu, enquiring always for the way, until they came to certain great Plains, encompassed with very losty Mountains. " where they had all perished for want of Water, had they not by chance lighted " upon a fort of Canes, which were filled with Water; and to fatisfie their hunger, they are the Flesh of their Horses, which they were forced to kill, though they were worth above a thousand Ducats a Horse; though Carate saith, that every Horse was worth about four or five thousand pieces of Eight Spanish Mo ney; and truly I think, that this was the most probable value, because I head fo much in Perm. The Volcano of Quitn (which is a burning Mountain) threw up such quantities of Ashes by a terrible irruption which continued for many " days, that all the Earth was covered with them for above eighty Leagues round; and when it burns with its fierceness, such flames ascend from it, that they may be feen at a hundred Leagues diftant, and make fuch a noife, that they alfonith more than Thunder and Lightning: They were forced also to Fell the Woods "to make a paffage: They paffed also several snowy Mountains and Desarts, (a thing very strange so near the Equinoctial) in that cold Countrey sixty of their thing very strange so near the Equinoctial) in that cold Countrey sixty of their people were frozen to death; so that when they were escaped from the Snows, they returned hearty thanks to God, who had delivered them from that dandering they returned hearty thanks to God, who had delivered them from that dandering they stayed all the Gold and Silver to the pit of Hell, which had enticed grain tempted them to a condition of staving both with cold and hunger. Thus sar are the Words of Gomara; and then Carate proceeds, and says, "Thus did they travel without hope, or comfort, or power to succour one the other; did they travel without hope, or comfort, or power to succour one the other; with him, finding them so tired and weary, that they could travel no farther, with him, finding them so tired and weary, that they could travel no farther, one himself able to carry them; he sate down with them to take some repose, during which time they were all frozen to death; and though the Man could have escaped, yet such was his compassion to his Wise and Children, that he would rather perish with them, than forsake them in that condition. With swould rather perish with them, than forsake them in that condition. With such abour and difficulty as this they passed the snowy Mountain, rejoycing such when they had got over to the other side. Thus far are the Words of much when they had got over to the other side. Thus far are the Words of much when they had got over to the other side. Thus far are the Words of much when they had got over to the other side. Thus far are the Words of the such was the first spanish woman which came to Peru, should thus most unhappy fate, that the first spanish Woman which came to Peru, should thus most missensible perish.

As to the five hundred Men which these Authours account to have been with As to the five hundred Men which these Authours account to have been with Mourado, I have been informed from several that were with him; that they were no less than eight hundred Spaniards; perhaps they might be no more than five nundred that came from Nicaragua, and that when they were landed in Peru, other hundred that came from Nicaragua, and that when they were landed in Peru, other recruis might join with them; so that in the Plains of Rivecpampa, where Alwarado, rand Diego da Almagro entered into Articles of Consederacy together, they might arise to the number of eight hundred: But another Historian makes a difference of three years time between these matters, but that is not much to our purpose. As to the Canes in which they found the Water, called Tpa, they are common.

As to the Canes in which they found the Water, called Tpa, they are commonly as big as a Man's leg or thigh, though the end of them is not thicker than the finger of a Man's hand: they grow in no other than in hot Countries, where they make use of them to Thatch their Houses: The information they had of the Water was from the people of the Countrey, who guided them to the Canes, some of the which contained fix Gallons of Water, and some more, according to the bigness which contained fix Gallons of Water, and some more, according to the bigness of them, which is proportionable to their height. Angustine Carate in the 10th Chapter of his second Book, writing the Journal of this Don Pedro de Alvarado, gives this description of the Canes: "In this Journey, saith he, they endured "much hunger, and greater thirst; for such was their want of Water, that had "now not met with Groves or Thickets of Canes, which yielded good and whole" some Water, they had all perished. These Canes are commonly about the bigness of a Man's leg, every knot of which contained about a quart of Water, ness of a Man's leg, every knot of which contained about a quart of Water, "ness of a Man's leg, every knot of which contained about a quart of Water," ness of a Man's leg, every knot of which contained about a quart of Water, "ness of a Man's leg, every knot of which contained about a quart of Water," ness of a Man's leg, every knot of which contained about a quart of Water, "ness of a Man's leg, every knot of which contained about a quart of Water," ness of a Man's leg, every knot of which contained about a quart of Water, "ness of a Man's leg, every knot of which contained about a quart of Water," ness of a Man's leg, every knot of which contained about a quart of Water, "ness of a Man's leg, every knot of which contained about a quart of Water," ness of a Man's leg, every knot of which was their want of Water nor Springs in that dy "having a natural propriety to imbibe or fuck in the nightly Dews which fall "having a natural propriety to im

How the Body of Atahualpa was carried to Quitu; and of the Treason of Rumminavi.

GO soon as Don Francisco Piçarro, and Don Diego de Almagro had buried Atalus, they travelled to Cozeo, visiting in their way thither, that very rich Temple, which was situated in the Valley of Pachacamae; from whence they carried away all the Gold and Silver which Hernando Piçarro had lest behind, not having been able to take it with him. From thence they proceeded to Cozeo, in which Journey, though they had many steep and craggy Mountains, many swift Torrents and deep Rivers to pass, yet they met no very great difficulty, but that onely which we shall hereafter relate.

And thus leaving them on their way, let us return to the General Challenchima, and other Captains of Atabuaipa, who joyned themselves with the Nobles of the Gourt, and other principal persons, who remained in Cassamara. So soon as the Spaniards were departed from that Province on their Journey to Corco, the badians took up the Body of their King, and according to his Command transported it to Quien, where they interred it with such decency as became the Burial of a Prince, and yet with such little pomp, as was agreeable to a conquered people, that had yielded to the subjection of a foreign and stranger Nation.

Remainavi seemed the most forward of any both to receive the Body of the King, and to Embalm it, though already corrupted, and tending to putrefaction; and in the mean time he secretly made Levies, and prepared a way to set by himself in the Government, dissembling all respect and obedience to Quillifier cha, the Brorher of Atabuaspa 3 and that he might try in what thanner his mild should affected to Rule and Dominion, he persuaded him to bind his head with a coloured Wreath, if he were desirous to revenge the Death of his Brothstall which Rummismavi uttered with design to blind the understanding of Quillifier chan, and cover his plots and evil intentions, until he could bring his affairs to maturity; but to this persuadion Quillificacha resused to hearken, saying. That the Spaniards would not easily quit their Empire 3 and in case they would, yet relevisers so many Sons of Huanna Capac surviving, who were ready to lay their claim to the Government, and had a better right and title to it than himself; that some or other of them would adventure to assume the Government; and that the people would appear in vindication of the just title and cause of the undoubted Heir, for whose sufferings by the late unhappy Wars and Miseries they had a true sense and compassion.

This prudent and cautious Answer of Quillifeacha did not alter the sinister designs and intentions of Rumminavi, for being both a Tyrant and Barbarous, he resolved to proceed, and set up his own interest, telling his samiliar friends in their private discourses with him, that according to the Practices and Examples which he had seen, the right to Rule and Govern belonged to the strongest; for that he who could wrest the Power into his own hands, and kill his Master, as Atahualpa had Murthered his Brother, and as the Spaniards had Atahualpa; the same had title sufficient to constitute himself Chief and Supreme Lord. Rumminavi remaining firm in this principle, and resolute in this design, made great preparations to receive Atahualpa, assembling the people together under pretence of performing the funeral Obsequies of their late Inca; the which Solemnity, though formerly continued for the course of a year, was now concluded within the space of sifteen days. At the end of which, Rumminavi judging not fit to let passo.

fair an opportunity whereby to compass his designs; for that fortune having put into his hands all those whom he intended to kill, as namely the Sons and Brother of Atahnaspa, the chief Captain Challeuchima, with many other Captains and Lords then present, he resolved to execute his bloudy purpose. To which end he invited all the great Persons there present to a Dinner, that being together they might treat of affairs, and consider of the way and means how to secure and defend themselves from the Spaniards; he also nominated Quilliscatha for Vice-king, or Regent, in the Kingdom of Quitu, during the Minority of the elder Son of Atahualpa, who was as yet but an Infant.

The Captains and Curacas accordingly affembled in the Palace of the Inca. where many things were proposed, but nothing determined: At length Dinner was brought in, which was very fumptuous, having been provided at the coft and charge of Rumminavi. Dinner being ended, and the Meat taken away, the Drink was brought in, which they call Sara, and in other Tongues Wignamy, which, as we have faid, is a fort of Liquour forbidden by the Indian Kings upon pain of Death; for that on a fudden it feizes the spirits, and intoxicates in such manner, that such as drink it remain (as it were) dead for fome time, and without fense. Acofta faith, that it inebriates much foner than Wine. For though of their common liquour they make great quantities, yet this immediately intoxicates. So foon as Rumminavi perceived these Captains and Curacas belotted, and stupisted with this Liquour, he fell to his work, and cut all their throats; amongst which was Ghallenchima, Quilliscacha, and all the Sons and Daughters of Arabuaipa, not leaving one alive that was capable to oppose his defign. And to create a greater terrour of himself in the minds of the people for he pretended not to be obeyed for love, but for dread and fear, he flead off the Skin of Quillifeacha, and therewith covered a Drum, the Skin of the head hanging to it, that so like a good Scholar and Officer of his Master Ata-hualpa, he might appear with all the Ensigns, and marks of tyranny and cruelty. Carate mentions onely, in short, this barbarous Cruelty. Peter de Cieca saith, that Francisco Pigarro burnt Challenchima in Sacsahuanna, but this was not the Challeuchima whom we mean, but a Kinfman of his of that Name, but of less fame and renown. He also adds, that the General Chalkuchima was prefent at the Death of Atahnalpa, and that he carried his Body to Quitu, as before related, and that he was afterwards Murthered there by the hands of his own people.

CHAP. IV.

Rumminavi takes all the Select Virgins of a Convent and Buries them allive.

TWO Spanish Historians treating of the Cruelties of Rumminavi, specific amongst the rest, one of the most barbarous pieces of inhumanity that ever was committed: They fay, that when Rumminavi came to Quitu, where enterrain. " ing some discourse with the Women, he said to them, Cheer up, and be mern, "for the Christians are now coming with whom you may foliace your fetues, at which fome of the Women happening innocently to laugh, thinking no hurt he spoiled "their iest, and cut their throats, and burnt down the Closet or With drawing. " room of Atahualpa: These are the words of one of the Writers, and the other agrees with him in the same sense. But the truth of the story is this: The Tvrant one day went to visit the Convent of those who are called the Select Virgins, with intention to chuse out from those Women who were there placed, and feparated for the use of Atabualpa, some of the most beautifull and pleasing to his fancy, in regard that he being declared King, all the Women, Estate, and Riches of his Predecessour devolved to him with the possession of the Kingdom. Difcourfing one day with these Ladies concerning the present state, and successes of affairs, he described the behaviour and Habit of the Spaniards, whose Bravery and Valour he extolled to a high degree, faying, That it was no shame to fly from their irrefiftible fury; that they were a strange fort of people with Beards in their faces, and were mounted upon creatures called Horses, which were so strong and fierce, that a thousand Indians were not able to withstand the violence of one of them, and with the swiftness of his carriere was so terrible as to rout, and put them all to flight. He added farther, That the Spaniards carried Thunder and Light ning with them, by which they could kill the Indians at two or three hundred Paces diftant from them, and that they were armed with Iron from head to foot. In fine, after he had described them with high admiration, he said, that they wore a certain kind of Codpiece, like a Box wherein to inclose their Genitals; it is to be supposed, he meant the Codpiece to the Breeches, (used in the days of Our Henry the Eighth) which was a fashion neither modest nor usefull. The Women hearing the latter part of the Story, burst out heartily into a laughter, suppofing that they had rather pleafed than angred Rumminavi therewith: but he on the contrary interpreting their laughter to be an effect of unchast and dishonest defires, and that they would joyn and concur with the Spaniards when occasion of fered, he was transported with such rage, that it broke forth into this surious language: Ah wicked Whores and Traytoresses, if onely with talk of the Spaniards you are so pleased, what would you doe and att with them, if they were present? But I shall take care to spoil your sport and passime with them. So soon as the words were out of his mouth, he immediately commanded his Officers to take and carry all the Women, as well the young as the old, to a stream of water which runs by the City, and to execute upon them the same punishment which their Law inflicts, which is to bury them alive; according to the Sentence they were carried thither, and there interred alive under great heaps of stones, which were thrown upon them from certain Mountains and Rocks, which lye on both fides the River. Thus did this barbarous Tyrant discover more unhumane cruelty, and relentless howels, by this Murther committed on poor filly Women, who knew nothing but how to Knit and Weave, than by his bloudy treachery practifed on flout Souldies, and Martial Men; and what farther aggravates his crime, was, that he was there present to see the execution of his detestable Sentence, being more pleased with the objects of his cruelty, and his eyes more delighted with the fad and difinal fight of fo many perifhing Virgins, than with any other prospect or colous which could have been presented before his view. Thus ended these poor Virgins, dying onely for a little feigned laughter, which transported this Tyrant beyond his senses: But this villany passed not unpunished; for after many other Ourages he had committed, during the time of his Rebellion, against the Spaniards, and after some Skirmishes with Sebastian Belascagar, who was sent to supers him, as we shall hereaster relate; and after he had found by experience, that he was neither able to resist the Spaniards, nor yet by reason of his detestable cruckies to live amongst the Indians; he was forced to retire with his Family into the Mountains of Antia, where he suffered the sate of other Tyrannical Usingers, and there most miserably perished.

CHAP. V.

Of two Skirmishes between the Indians and the Spaniards.

THE Governour Don Pedro de Piçarro, and his fellow Souldiers, which with the recruits that Almagro brought with him, made up the number of about three hundred and fifty Spaniards, marched careledy towards, Cocco, and with such fecurity, as if they had no Enemy to encounter, and as if the whole Kingdom had been their own, travelling from one Town to another, as in their own Couninduced their own, traveling from one fown to another, as in their own Country, without fear or apprehension of any thing. Capite in the 8th Chapter of his fecond Book, touches on this particular, and relates a brave Exploit performed by the Indian Captains, as we shall see hereafter, though he varies something from others in their Names. The Inca Tith Alanchi, Brother of Atahnaha, seeing the King a Prisoner, and his Ransome agreed, travelled into divers parts of the Kingdom to collect all the Gold and Silver he was able, that therewith he might purchase the freedom of his Brother; and being returned as far as Cassamarca with valt riches in Gold and Silver, he received news of the Death of his Brother, and that the Spaniards were departed for Cozeo, and securely travelling on their way thither in no order or posture to receive an Enemy: the which when Titu Attachi had heard and confidered, he disburthened himfelf of his Riches; and ha ving gathered and joyned what forces he could in a Body, he purfued the Spaniand as far as to the Province Huayllas, and amongst the people called Totto, where with fix thousand Men he made an affault upon the Spaniards, and took eight of them Prisoners, who were as yet in their Quarters, amongst which was Sancho de Coulder, who was the Clerk that drew up the Indictment and Sentence of Death against Anahualpa. Carate touches upon this passage, and says it was Quizquiz that did this Exploit, but he miftakes one for the other, and makes no mention of any taken. Whilst matters passed thus in Huayllas, the Spaniards had another Skirmish with the Indians, who were Commanded by Major-General Quizquiz, one of the most famous Captains belonging to Atahnalpa, of whom we have already made mention: For he having at Cozco received advice that his King was taken and made a Prifoner, marched with his Squadron, confifting of eleven or twelve thousand Men towards Cassamarca, to endeavour either by fair or foul means the releasement of his Inca; but meeting with the Spaniards on his march thither, he engaged with them, and fought a front Battel, which Historians relate in thort and confusedly, but much in favour of the Spaniards. The truth of what passed is this: Quixquiz having understood by his Scouts, that the Spaniard were approaching, and that they marched careless, and without order, he laid an Ambuscade within the Woods and Rocks; and having ranged his Men in a half circle, he attacqued them in the Rere with such bravery, that four Spaniar ds were wounded, and ten or twelve Indians, their Servants, were killed. The Gowere wounded, and ten or twelve Indians, their Servants, were killed. The Gowere wounded, and ten or twelve Indians, their Servants, were killed. The Gowere wounded in the Van-guard, being Allarum'd at the furprize of his Servants.

Rere, detached two Captains of Horse for the succour and relief of them, supposing that the Indians upon fight of the Horse would immediately run, and he but to flight, as formerly they had done in Cassamarca, where they abandoned and forfook their King. So foon as the Horse came up to the Station of Quit. anice he made a feigned retreat to certain Rocks and Mountains, where the Horse could not pass, nor doe any service, continuing still a defensive Fight, as they retired, entertaining the Spaniards with a Skirmish for the space of three hours. by which time their Horles became faint and tired; of which the Indian taking advantage, fallied forth with that whole Body, which by the Command and Conduct of Quizquiz were lodged within the Rocks and Mountains; and affailed the Spaniards with such fury, that they killed seventeen of them; though a certain Historian mentions onely five or fix, besides some that were wounded and others taken Prisoners, and the rest escaped by the swiftness of their Horses. Of the Indians seventy were slain; those that were taken, were Francisco de Cha. ves, who was one of the Chief Commanders; Pedro Gonçales, who was after wards an Inhabitant of Truxillo, Alonfo de Alarson, Hernando de Haro, Alonfo de Hojeda, who fome years afterwards fell into fo deep a melancholy, that he lost his fenses and understanding, and died in Truxillo; also Christopher de Horozco, Native of Seville; John Diaz, a Gentleman of Portugal, besides several others of less account, whose Names time hath abolished. Alonso de Alarcon was taken by the fall of his Horfe, with which his Leg was broke flort off at the Knee; and though the bone was afterwards fet by the Indians, who took great care of him, and of the others who were wounded, yet he remained lame for ever

Quizquiz having gained this advantage, like an experienced Captain, would not flay untill the remainder of the Spanish Forces were come up, but retreated with his people towards Cassamarca, to meet with Tith Atanchi, Brother of the late King, who (as he had heard) was on his march: And to cut his way as short as he could, he passed a great River, and then burnt the Bridge, because it was made of Oliers, that so the Spaniards might not be able to follow in the purfuit of them.

Having met with the Inca Atauchi, they both agreed to return to Cassanna there to consider of Affairs, and to treat of those things which might conduce to the common good, and welfare of the people; and to accordingly they proceeded.

The Indians put Cuellar to Death, and enter into Articles with the other Prisoners.

SO foon as the Inca Titu Atauchi, and Quizquiz, were entred into Cassamarca with the Spaniards their Prisoners, they examined the Indians concerning the Death of their King Atahualpa; and being informed that Cuellar had been Clerk, and drawn up the Indictment, and made all the Process against Atabualpa, and had been present to see their King executed: And being likewise informed that Francis de Chaves, and Hernando de Haro, and others then Prisoners, had appeared in favour of Inca Atahuaipa, and that they interceded for his Life and Liberty with fuch heat and earnestness, that they adventured their own lives in his cause: Upon which full hearing and information of the matter, Titu Atauchi, and Quizquiz, and the other Captains, refolved that the Clerk Cuellar for his bold attempt on the Life of their King, and for having notified the Sentence, should be put to death in the same form and manner as their King was executed. But as to the other Spaniards, out of respect to Francis de Chaves, and Hernando de Haro, who had appeared in favour of their Inca, order was given for their Cure, and that they should be well treated, and civilly used; and that being recovered of their wounds, they should be dismissed with freedom and presents. According to this determination the Counsels were executed; for Cueltar being taken out from the very Prison where Atahualpa had been lodged, and being carried to the very same place of Execution, with a Cryer before him, Proclamation was made as followeth: The Pachacamac commands that this Auca, which signifies as much as Tyrant, Trayter, &C. and all those who have had a hand in the Marther of our late Inca, should be put to death. Not that this form of a Cryer was according to the use of their Countrey, but onely in imitation and revenge of what had been done to their Inca, and accordingly Cutlar was tied and strangled at the very same Post at which Atabusapa had been Executed; with which a shout was made, Thue may all thy Compawass perifly. Cuellar being dead, they left his body exposed the whole day to common view, and towards the Evening buried ic, imitating in all particulars the forms used by the Spaniards in Execution of Atahualpa. But as to Francis de Chava, and his other Companions, fo foon as they were cured of their wounds, and wee in a condition to travel, they bellowed on them Presents of Gold, and Silver, and Emeralds, and dispatched them away with several Indians to carry them on their shoulders: But first they capitulated with them, as Representatives for the other Spaniards, and agreed on several Articles of Peace and Friendship: the principal of which were these: "That all the Acts of War, and Hostility, and Injuries hitherto committed on either side, shall cease, and be pardoned, and injuries hitherto committed on either side, shall cease, and be pardoned, and " forgotten. That for the future a Peace shall be established between the Spaniard and the Indians, and that they shall offer no hurt or damage to each other. That the Spaniards shall not deprive Manco Inca of his Empire, because it is his right to Govern, being lawfull Heir. That the Indians and Spaniards in all their Commerce and Negotiations shall treat amicably together, and afford help and succour each to the other. That the Spaniards shall fet those Indians at liberty, whom they hold in Chains, and that for the future they shall put none of them into Irons, but freely to tife them in their fervice. That the Laws made by the palt Incas, in favour, and for the benefit of their people, and which are not repugnant to the Christian Law, shall be conserved inviolably in their force and virtue. That the Governour Don Francisco de Picarro shall in a convenient time fend these Capitulations into Spain to be there ratified and confirmed by his Im-Perial Majesty. All which the Indians, as well as they were able, gave to understand unto Francis de Chaves, partly by figns, and partly by words, which were interpreted by by the Indians, who were Servants to the Spaniards, and had been taken with them and whom Time Atauchi taught and inftructed word by word, that fo having the matter well inculcated to them, they might be better able to utter and express his matter well menicated to them, they might be better able to utter and express his meaning. The Spaniards observing the great generofity with which they were treated by Titu Anachi, and his people; and that when they were Prisones to them, and lay at their mercy, and that they might have proceeded against them as guilty of the Murther of their King, and Disturbers of the common peace and quiet of their Nation; yet then on the contrary they strankly restored them unto their liberty with Prefents of Gold, Silver, and pretious Stones, dispeeding them away with attendance to carry them, and with other Accommodation for their toprney: In fine, when they confidered all this, and the reasonable Articles and Terms which the Indians proposed, they could not but admire, and remain confused at the peaceable and quiet disposition of the Indians: Moreover, when contined at the peaceanie and quiet emporition of the mains. Moreover, when they were under cuffody, and in hourly expectation of Death, and had time, as Men, to reflect on their prefent condition, they much lamented their remifiels, and want of care to instruct the Indians in the Doctrine of the Gospel; howso ever, refolving for the future to make amends for that default, and being embold. ned by the gentle temper of the Indians, they adventured to ask leave, that they might demand onely two things from them: To which the Indians replied. That whatfoever they should require, should readily be granted. Hereupon Francis de Chaves faid, that he did in the Name of the Governour, and all the Spaniards. require that the Incus, and all their Captains and Lords, should receive the Law of the Christians, and consent, that it should be freely preached in all pages of their Empire. Secondly, That whereas the Spaniards being Strangers and Alions in that Countrey, had neither Servants nor Lands to ferve and maintain them; that a substituence should be granted to them, as to the Natives of the Kingdom, that Indian Men and Women may be allowed to serve them, not as Slaves, but as hired Servants. To which answer was made, That as to what concerned the Law of the Christians, they did not onely not reject it, but did earnestly intrest them immediately to fend to the place where the Governour refided, defiring him with all convenient speed to furnish them with such Preachers and Priests, as might inftruct them in those Precepts and Principles which were necessary for them to know, promifing for their parts to treat and use them kindly, and with fuch honour and reverence, as if they were Gods; for they were well affired from the teltimony of their late Inca Husyna Capac, that the Law of the Spaniard was much better than their own; and though they had no other reason to entertain such a belief, than the bare recommendation of their Inca, yet that was so prevalent, as to engage them to all obedience, ufefulness and service towards the Spaniards; the truth of which had been evidenced by their Inca Atabuatpa, had he been suffered to live, yet he had sealed this sincere obedience with his bloud; and therefore they might be confident they could ask nothing but what would be granted to their fatisfaction. The Covenants which were this agreed, were by their Historiographers recorded on their Knots; and licence being given to the Spaniards to depart, they took their farewell, and being laden with Prefents, and accompanied with a numerous Attendance, they proceeded on their Journey in fearch of their Governour. And as they were on their way, Francisco de Chave, and his Companions, being confidering Men, fell into discourse concerning the late passages; and reflecting thereupon, they were of opinion, that the words and actions of that people were fo well agreeing to reason, as did not savour of the Gentilism and Barbarity in which they were nurtured, but were Miracles of the divine inspiration insused into the Souls of that people, disposing their minds to receive the Doctrine of the Gospel with ease and readiness; on which encourage ment they resolved to persuade the Governour, and the other Spaniards, to send Millionaries to that intent and purpole into those parts: And though they were all generally of the fame mind in this particular, yet the Devil, who is the common enemy of Mankind, endeavoured by all his wiles and artifices to obfine the convertion of those Indians; the which in a great measure he effected by the aid and affiltence of his diligent Ministers the feven mortal Sins, which being in those times of liberty let loose, greatly prevailed, committing all those outsides. geous Villanies which might bring a diffepute on the profession of the Gospel. Hence arose those Wars, which in a short time after were waged between the Indians and the Spaniards, occasioned by perfidiousness and non-performance of the Articles, for that Pride would not stoop, nor consent to a restitution of the Kingdom to his proper and lawfull Matter. Afterwards Anger prevailed, and railed War between the two Companions Pigarro and Almagro; which being maintained by Envy and Emulation, one not supporting the greater power of the maintained by Envy and Emulation, one not supporting the greater power of the other, continued untill both of them perifhed in a competition for Authority, for Almagra was killed by the Brother of Picarra, and so was Picarra slain by the Son of Almagra. These Wars were followed by others between that good Governour of Annager, Trick With whom I was acquainted at Madrid in the year 1562,) and Don Diego de Almagro Junior 3, for Pride, which is the Mother of Diffention, was fo prevalent in the mind of this Youth, that having neither a Spirit to fubrit to his Lord and Sovereign, nor Power to maintain his Dominion, he perished in his nis Lord and Sovetoning in 17 Siver to manual raised a War between the Vice-king folly. Soon after Covetousness and Tyranny raised a War between the Vice-king Blaco Numez Vela, and Gonçalo Piçarro; the which in a few years after was followed by Stirs and Combustions between Don Sebastian de Castilla, and Francisco Hernandez Giron, occasioned by Gluttony and Luxury. All which Wars succeeding one after the other, for the space of twenty five years, were raised by the malice and contrivance of the Devil, as we shall demonstrate in their due place, and were great obstructions to the propagation of the Gospel; for by reason of continual disturbances, neither the Priests could freely Preach, nor had the Infidels leifure nor convenience to receive the Doctrine of Faith, being under the continual amazements of Fire and Sword, and other miferies; in which the Indian had a greater thate than the Spaniards, being oppreffed by both fides, and compelled to fupply both Gamps with Provisions, and carry the burthens for them on their shoulders with wonderfull patience and labour 3 of which I my felf have in part been an Eye-witness.

CHAP. VII.

Of the Entrance of the Spaniards into Cozco, and of the great Treasure which they found there.

So soon as the Inca Titu Atauchi had dispeeded Francisco de Chaves and his Companions with the aforesaid Capitulations, he sent an Express Messenger to Inca Manco Capac, who was his Brother by the Father's side, with advice of the Articles agreed, and of all particulars which had passed; that so being well informed of all matters, he might be provided to act and treat with the Spaniards. The General Quizquiz sent in like manner to advise him, that he should by no means disband his Army, but rather increase it, untill such time as he had wholly means disband and serled matters with the Spaniards, lest being secure, and over confident of their kindness, he should fall into the same snare, and run into the same sate which his Brother Atabuasha had already suffered.

With these Informations and Advices the Indians sent their humble Submissions to Manco Inca, acknowledging him for their Supreme Lord and King; for though they had been Enemies to him whilst he stood in competition with his Brother Atabulapa, yet that difference being now ended by his Death, all was resonciled; it being agreed at a Council of War, that the Empire should be resonciled to that person unto whom the Succession did by lawfull Inheritance appersonant: And on this soundation they resolved to unite their forces for Expulsion of the Spaniards, in case they could not live in amity with them, believing themselves much more formidable by this concord and union, than when they were divided into several Factions and Parties.

The Prince Manco Inca received the Advices of his Brother, and the Address. of Quizquiz, with much joy, being much pleafed to find that those who were his late Enemies, were now reconciled and joyned with him in his jult claim and title to the Empire. And herein he was the more fatisfied to understand, that the Spaniards concurred in the like intentions, having on all occations opening declared their inclinations to right and justice. Upon which prefumption the Inea adventured to apply himself to the Spaniards to demand Peace and Friendship, and in fimple and fincere manner to require the Government and Dominion over his Kingdom, according to the Capitulations which his Brother Titu Atanchi had fent to him. And here we shall leave him for a while in his preparations for such an Address, untill its due time and place, and return to our Francisco Picarro, who he ing better advised by the late damage which his people had fustained from Tive Atauchi, did now march with more caution, and less fecurity than before; so that they met no confiderable Encounters, unless a few flying Skirmishes near the Cirv of Cosco, from whence the Inhabitants fallied out to defend a Pass; but making a feeble and poor refiltence, they haltily fled to their Houses, from whence carrying away their Wives and Children, and what Stock and Goods they could collect, they retired into the Mountains, being greatly affrighted with the reports of what had fucceeded in Cassamera, for that Countrey having been subject to the power of Atahnalpa, made some refissence, being desirous, if possible, to revenge the Death of their Prince. Gomara treating of this particular passage, hath these words: "'The next day the Spaniard entred into Coxco without any opposition, "and presently they fell at work, some to unrip the Gold and Silver from the "Walls of the Temple, others to dig up the Jewels and Veffels of Plate, which "were buried with the Dead, others pillaged and rifted the Idols, and facked the Houses, and the Fortress, where still great quantities of Gold and Silver were conferved, which had been there amaffed and laid up by Guarna Capac. In fhort, there was more Gold and Silver found in this City, and in the parts about it, than what was produced at Caxamalea, by the ransome of Atabaliba: How foever, the particular share belonging to every individual person did not amount unto fo much as the former Dividend, by reason that the number was greater which was to partake thereof; nor was the fecond fame so loud as the first, which published the Triumph of Riches with the Imprisonment of a "King. A certain Spaniard entering into a Vault, found there an entire Sepul-" chre of Silver, fo thick and maffy, that it was worth fifty thousand pieces of Eight; others had the fortune to find fuch as were of less value, for it was the custome of rich Men of those Countries to be buried in this manner up and down the Fields, and there to be laid in State like fome Idol: Nor were the Spaniards contented with this prize, but still thirsting after greater Riches, were hot in the pursuit of the Treasures of Huayna Capac, and of others hidden by the ancient Kings of Cozco, but neither then, nor afterwards, were any of those " Treasuries known; howsoever they tortured and vexed the poor todians with le " vere usage and cruelties, to shew and discover to them the rich Sepulches. Thus far are the Words of Gomara, extracted verbatim from the 124th Chapter of his Book. Carate in the 8th Chapter of his fecond Book, speaking of some Spaniards, who went in pursuit of an Indian Captain, faith as follows: "And not being able to meet with him, they returned to Cozco, where they found a greater prize both of Gold and Silver, than that in Canamalca; all which the "Governout divided amongst his people. Thus far are the Words of Carate.

And now I suppose by these Authorities, it hath been sufficiently proved; that the Riches which the Spaniards found in Cocco, were greater than those taken in Cassamarea; and to acquit my self in the truth of what I relate, I am pleased to cite, or quote, the Spanish Historians, and to specific their Names, left I should feem like the Magpye, to deck my self with borrowed feathers.

But to return now to those Treasures, which, as Gomera mentions, were discovered by the Spaniards under ground both in Cocco, and in the parts adjacent: It is certain, that for the space of seven or eight years after the Spaniards had remained in quiet possession of that Empire, several Treasures were discovered both within and without the City; and particularly within the Precincs of that Palace called Amurucancha, (which upon the division made, sell to the lot of Antonio Altamirano) and where it happened that a Horse galloping round a Court vard of that Palace, strook one of his feet into a hole, which they supposed at hift to be some old Sink, or drain for Water from the House; but looking more narrowly, they found the hole opening to a Jar of Gold, weighing above two hundred pounds weight, for the Indians make greater, or lefs, of thefe, as their occasions require, using them to boil their Drink and Liquous in. With this occasions require, they found others of Gold and Silver; and though they were not fo bige, yet they were valued at above eighty thousand Ducats. Moreover, in the large, yet they were valued at above eighty thouland Ducats. Moreover, in the Convents of the Select Virgins, and particularly in that part which fell to the share of Pedro del Barco, and afterwards came to the possession of Hernando de Seguid, who was an Apothecary, and with whom I had an acquaintance; this Hernando de Seguid, who was an Apothecary, and with whom I had an acquaintance; via, who was an exponency, and with which I had an acquaintance; this Hermando altering his House, and removing some part of the soundation, sound a Treasfure of seventy two thousand Ducats, with which, and with above twenty thousand Ducars more, which he had gained by his Practice, he returned into Spain, where I faw him at Seville, where, in a few days after his Arrival, he died for mere grief and forrow that he had left Cozco, as several others have done, whom I knew in the fame condition. Hereby it is manifest, that the Treasures which the Spaniand found in that City, when they made their entrance first into it, were very confiderable, as were those also which were afterwards discovered. And it is probable, that the Riches had been much greater, had not the Indians, as we have faid in the first Part, hid them away, to conceal them from the fight of the Spaniards.

CHAP. VIII.

Of the Conversion of an Indian, who defined to be informed of that which was the true Law of Mankind.

THE first day that the Christians entred into the Imperial City of Conce, an extraordinary matter paffed between a Spaniard and an Indian, which was this: A certain Gentleman, who was a Native of Truvillo, called Alonfo, Ruye, toving about, and facking the City as the others did, chanced to enter into a House, from whence the Master came forth courteously to receive him; and at first speaking to him with a similing countenance in his own Language, bid him welcome, telling him, that for many days he had expected his coming, for that the Pachacamae had by Dreams and Vitions affured him, that he should not dye untill a stranger Nation should come, which should instruct him in the true Law which he was to follow. And since, said he, I have languished all my life with this desire in my heart, I am consident that you must be that person which is designed to instruct me. The Spaniard not understanding at first the words which the Indian said to him, yet he apprehended, that what he uttered was very kind, for he had learned thole two words in the Indian Language, You are very welcome, which the Spaniards express in four; and also guesting by the chearfulness of the Indian's countenance, that he was defirous of his conversation, so often as his leisure would admit, nor fo much out of a placency in his company, as for fome fober and religious end, he refolved to ftay, and take up his Lodging with the Indian, who, during the time of his aboad, entertained and treated him with as much kindnefs and accommodation, as his Cottage could afford. At length three or four days being paft, and the first find for the form of the form things a little fettled and quieted after the Spaniards had facked the City, Alonfo Rose went out to find Philip the Interpreter; and having found him, he returned with him to his Lodging to be better informed of what he as yet imperfectly underftood; and at first he proposed several Queries concerning his Customs, and manner of living; in answer unto which, he gave them to understand, that he had been a Man of an humble and peaceable Spirit, contented with his own formula fortune, and never offered injury or violence to his Neighbour; That he was defirous to be informed of that which was the true Law of Mankind, for that his own Law did not answer or fatisfie the many notions he had conceived in his mind of a better and a more fublime Religion. Hereupon the Spaniard endervonred in the best manner he could to instruct him in the Principles of the Ca. volled in the celt mainter is continued in the flould worthing God in the Trinity, and the Trinity in Unity: And because (as we have intimated before) that there wanted words in the Indian Language to express that Mystery, he advided him to keep the word Trinity, and the word Credo in his memory, for that those words would let him in unto that Faith, which the Roman Church, which is the Mother of all good Christians, doth believe and embrace. And having repeated these words often, and having to several questions made to him, answered to in the Affirmative; a Priest was called, who being satisfied in what had naffed and that the Indian defired to be a Christian, he was baptized to the great fatisfaction of all three, that is, of the Prieft, the Person baptized, and of Alonfo Royce. who was his Godfather; in a fhort time after which, the Indian ended his days with much joy and comfort, that he died a Christian. Afterwards Alosso Representation turned into Spain with fifty thousand pieces of Eight in his Purse, the which he had gained in Caffamarca, Cozco, and other parts; but being troubled with fouples of Conscience for having gained his Wealth unjustly, he applied himself to the Emperour with words to this purpose:

Most Sacred Majesty, I am one of those Conquerours of Peru, to whom a share or proportion of the spoils thereof have been divided to the Import of fifty thousand pieces of Eight, which I have brought with me into Spain; but being troubled in Conscience for these illestten goods, I come here to make restitution thereof unto your Majesty, who is Supreme Sovereign of that Empire. If your Majesty will be so bountifull as to grant me any share threat, I shall receive it as from the true Lord and Master, who hath power to make me a just and lawfull title thereunto; and if not, I shall remain contented, and believe my self unworth of your Majesty's Grace and Bounty.

The Emperour accepted the Restitution as an effect of an honest and a constitutious mind; and in lieu thereof, bestowed upon him a Revenue in see of sour hundred thousand Maravedis of yearly Rent, together with the Command or Lordship of a small Village called Marta, situate near the City of Truxillo; which now a Nephew of this Alonso Ruzz doth possess and inherit; and besides the quietness of conscience which this Rive reaped by this restitution, he also intested and improved his Estate thereby, having obtained a greater parcel of Land dan his money could have purchased, given in see to himself and his Heirs for ever, and which at present is descended and possession by his own kindred; whereas the Divisions made in the Indies were not to continue longer than for two Lives, which are almost all extinct at this time. And it is very pemarkable, that what Estate hath begin brought from the Indies, (though not arising by the Division of Lands, but by other ways) hath not continued to the third Heir; whereas this Estate of Ruis wears like Iron; and descends intailed to the right possessour, and his Heirs for ever. And so let us return to the thread of our History. V (Sand)

CHAP. IX.

Don Diego de Almagro joins his Forces with Don Pedro de Alvarado, and Belalcasar to suppress Rumminavi.

Don Francisco de Piçarro, and D. Diego de Almagro, were busily employed in gathering, heaping and disposing of the Treasure which they had found in Core, and the parts thereabours, when the News came that Don Pedro de Alvarado was arrived in Peru with Commission to Govern and Command all those parts which he should conquer; that he was inforced with five hundred Men, most of which were Gentlemen of Noble Birth, and of the flower of Spain, well mounted on Horfe-back, well Armed, and well Accounted with all matters fit for War. This news possessed the minds of the Spaniards with an apprehension of galousie, that these people came to disposses them of the Riches and Wealth which they had gained; for fuch is the condition of humane nature, which can never be entirely happy, or prosperous without some mixtures of allay. Wherefore the Governour fent his companion Almagro with a hundred Spaniards to prevent the milchief which might happen; and so to defend the Sea-coast, as to obfluct their Landing, or otherwise to corrupt the Army by certain infinuations and promifes, alluring them to abandon the defign of their own Leader, and join with them in an enterprize which was already prosperous, and brought to maturity. Almagro acted according to these Instructions, but the success thereof we shall declare afterwards, being obliged first to recount other important matters which were transacted at that time; for we must know, that soon after the departure of Almagro, Francisco de Chaves, and his Companions, arrived at Cozco, giving an account unto the Governour, and the other Spaniards of the civil and generous treatment which he had received from Titn Atanchi, and his Captains, speoffing the Care, the Entertainments, and the Prefents bestowed on them, as also the Attendance and Accommodation which had been afforded them for their Journey; and also the Articles which they had entred into, in behalf of the spamards with the Indians; and, in fine, they related the methods of Justice which had been executed on Guellar with the formalities of the Cryer and Executioner.

Great was the joy which the Governour, and the others conceived to fee Franoffo de Chaves and his Companions, ( whom they had given over for loft ) to return in fafety; and more was their wonder, to understand and hear the civility and kind treatment which the Indians had used towards them; as also the Particulars of the Death of de Cuellar, being a passage very observable, that they should onely vent their anger and revenge on his fingle Person, and not onely suffer the others to escape, but to contribute to their departure with freedom and honour: But that at which the Spiniards most admired, were the Capitulations and Conditions proposed by the Indians, which evidenced a fincere desire of Peace and Friendship with the Spaniards, and a Zeal to imbrace the Doctrine of the Holy Golpel; in all which the Spaniards were defirous to agree, and comply with them; but the troubles which arose upon the coming of Don Pedro de Alvarado gave a stop to those intentions, so that there was no farther discourse of peace and quiet, or propagation of the Gospel, onely alarums and incitements to War and Cruelty were lieard, which involved the Indians and Spaniards in a mutual calamity, as will appear by the fequel of this History.

At the same time almost intelligence was brought to the Governour of the great flaughters and tyranny which Rumminavi had committed in Quitu, that he was there raifing Men against the Spaniards. To suppress which Insurrection, and punish this Tyrant, and obviate all those mischiefs which these beginnings might produce, the Governour immediately dispeeded away Captain Schaffian de Belalesgar with Horse and Poot, well provided of all things, to re-inforce Alms-379; who marching with all diligence, and with more care and watchfulness than formerly, to prevent furprize, met some Encounters on the way, with certain Captains of Atahualpa of small note, who hearing of the Imprisonment of their King, had raifed fome people in a confused manner; and being but few in norm King, later factor the Mountains, to guard fome Paffes on the Rocks and Precipers, which were difficult to take. And though they had been informed of the Death of Atabualpa, yet they Disbanded not their people in expectation of Sum. mons from fome of the next of Bloud, who might require their affiftence to revenge the Murther of their King: For which reason several small Companies were feathered over the Country without Chief or Commander to Marshal or Con. dust them, which had they been united together to guard and defend those dist. cult Paffes, might have done the Spaniards great milchief. With this fort of Souldiers Sebaffian de Belalcaçar had feveral flight Skirmithes, but they quickly defered the Fight, and gave over before much hurt was done; onely CupayTupannii, which is as much as to fay, Tupanqui the Devil fought very foutly, having killed five Spaniards, and wounded fourteen, and might have cut them all to pieces, had be been supplied with force sufficient. Lopez de Gomara, who was one of his Catho. lick Majeffy's Chaplains, writing of thete Skirmithes in the 128th Chapter of his Book, calls him Captain Zopo Copagni; and Augustin Carate, who was the Emrerour's Accountant, in the 10th Chapter of his fecond Book, names him Cana Ca pagai, which comes nearest to the true word; but to give him his true Name, we must call him Cumae Yupanqui, which fignifies the handsome Yupanqui, because that when this Indian was young, he was of comely features, and of a well flaped and proportioned body; for the word Cumac, as we have mentioned in the Poetry used by the Inc.is, fignifies handsome or beautifull.

He was a natural Son of one of the Royal Bloud, his Mother was of the Kine. dom of Quitu; he was bred up with Atahualpa; and for his skilfulness in Martial affairs, merited the honour to be one of his Captains. After that Atahualhahad taken his Brother Huascar Prisoner, and committed many cruelties; this Man was a chief instrument in the execution of all his bloudy practices, and invented many exquisite torments to be inflicted on the Enemies of his Master, which could no ver enter into the head of the King, or any others to perform; following brein the custome of wicked Servants, who having neither the fear of God, nor the thame of the World before their eyes, perpetrate all Villanies to gain the god will and favour of their Masters, for which reason the Captains and Servansof Academalpa observing his cruel and diabolical nature, changed his Sir-name of Comme into that of Cupay, which fignifies the Devil. This Indian after he had made some little opposition against Sebastian de Belalcaçar, and done him what hurt he was able, retired into some obscure places unknown both to Indians and Spaniards, Howfoever it is believed, that being abhorred by the Indians for his wicked practices, and living in fear of the Spaniards, not daring to cohabit with his own people, nor trust himself with Strangers, he fled to the craggy and wild Mountains of the Ar tis, there to live and affociate with Tygers and Serpents, in such manner as other Captains his Companions had done. From this Enterprize Belalcaçar proceeded, and came to Quitu, there to give flop to the Cruelties of Rumminavi, and to punish him; Rumminavi (as we have faid) fallied forth to meet and skirmish with him; but in all Encounters, the Indians, who were few in number, and ill disciplined, were worsted without almost any damage to the Spaniards. For this Captain, by reason of the many cruelies he had executed on his own people, having Murthered his fellow Souldiers, with the Brother and Sons of his own King, and buried the Select Virgins alive without any reason or justice, he became so hated and detested by the Indians, that none would appear on his fide against the Spaniards, though he pretended to revenue the Death of their King Atahuatpa. Thus not being able to make head against Atahuatpa, he retired with melancholy and despair into the Mountains; the which place, according to these Examples, became also a refuge to some symiards, as we shall hereafter declare.

CHAP. X.

The hopes and fears of Almagro; he is for faken by his Interpreter; and an Agreement is made with Alvarado.

THus honest Don Diego de Almagro marching in Quest of D. Pedro de Alvarado, encountred some Skirmishes by the way with encountred some Skirmishes by the way with the Captains of Atahnalpa; but so inconsiderable they were, that they were scarce worthy to be mentioned : And in regard he had certain intelligence that Alvarado was Landed, and was marched up into the Countrey, he proceeded flowly, that he might not mis his way, or wander into parts diffant from him, of whom he went in fearch.

sebaftian de Belaleaçar, who was sent with recruits to re-inforce Almagro, having chased Rumminavi and his Captains from Quitu, proceeded with all diligence in Quest of Almagro, and having joined his Forces with him, they defeated some Squadrons of Indians, which were scattered over those Provinces. In which Enterprise they chose rather to employ themselves, than to attempt Alvarado, for knowing that he was a Man of courage, and his people flout and good Souldiers, they would willingly have declined all engagements with him, could they have come off handsomely, without shame or dishonour. In these doubtfull terms they mained, untill Alvarado approached near their Quarters, and had taken feven of their Horse which Almagro had sent for Forrage into the Countrey; but Alexardo immediately released them, so soon as he understood unto whom they belonged, and had been informed of all other matters and circumftances of these affairs, for the delign of Alvarado was not to trouble or diffurb the first Adventurers in their Conquelts of Peru, but onely to affift and join with them in their Enterprize. This generous Action of Alvarado eased Almagro in a great measure of his fears, efterning it for an evidence of Peace and Friendship: But in regard he had sent no Message by the Horse-men which he had freed, he remained doubtfull between hope and fear, not knowing what his intentions and meaning might be.

Whill Almagro remained in this thoughtfull condition, an unhappy accident increased his fears, which was the flight of his Interpreter Philip the Indian, who hearing that Albarado was nearly approached, he took occasion one night to run to him, carrying away with him a principal Cacique. When he was come to Alvarido, he informed him of the small number that was with Almagro, and that the Comacon which were with him were defired to revolt, and take his part, and to ferve him; the like Example he affured him, that the people of that Kingdom were inclinable to follow, undertaking to bring them all under his Dominion and Obedience, and in the mean time to guide him to the Camp of Almagro, where he might eafily furprize, and take him without much opposition. Though Alvarado was well pleated with the report and proposals of Philip, yet he thought not fit to follow his counsel, having a more advantageous prospect of succeeding better by another method; for he was jealous of this Indian, who having been falle, and perjured in the evidence he had given against Atabualpa, he could not believe that he would ever prove faithfull to him; for this Traytor had falfly fworn, that Maduralpa defigned to Maffacre the Spaniards; upon which testimony Sentence of Death was passed upon him: But to be short in this story; an interview was agreed upon between Don Pedro de Alvarado, and Don Diego de Almagro, and accordingly they met in the Plains of Riverpampe, which the Spaniards call Riobamba, where both Squadrons were drawn up, and remained in a pofture to engage in Battel; but when they came near to make the on-fet, both fides were touched with a natural fente of Bloud, and proximity of Alliance, being almost all of the Countrey of Estremens, to that the common Souldiers, without permission or Orders of their Generals, mixed together in common discourse, offering to each other Conditions and Articles of Deace and Amity, as it hath at other times happened between the Souldiers of Julius Cafar and Pompey, and of Fetrein: and Afranius 3 Ttt 2 for though Almagro, who was much inferiour in number, not having the fourth part of the people which Alvarado had with him, was well pleafed with the Treaty 5 vet rather than condescend to base and dishonourable terms, both he and his people were ready to dye bravely with Swords in their hands: But the Souldiese on both fides (as we have faid) being inclinable to an Accommodation, a Truce was made for twenty four hours; during which time the Generals met, and with the affiftence of the Lawyer Caldera, a Native of Seville; they agreed on feveral Articles and Conditions, as followeth: That both fides should equally share in the prize already gained, and in what should be gained for the future. That Alvarado should march with his Forces along the Coast to the Southward to make discovery of the Kingdoms and Provinces which lay on that side. That Picarro and Almagro should remain in possession of the Countries they had subdued, and and Almagro model tenant in porterior of the Counter they had modeled, and labour to secure their Conquests. And that the Souldiers both of one part, and the other, might freely pass, and travel from one Jurisdiction to another, either into the new Discoveries, or into the Countries already conquered. These are the Articles which were then published to please and gratifie the Souldiers of Alvarade, who, as Cieca, Gomara and Carate report, were composed of many Gentle men, that were apt to refent the least matter which might be ungratefull to them.

But the fecret Accord not fit to be published was this: Almagro engaged to pay unto Alvarado a hundred thousand Pesos of good Gold, (accounting sour hundred and fifty Maravedis to each Pefo) a Pefo in English money makes about a Noble. In confideration of the Souldiers Horses, and other Accourtements of War which he had brought with him, that having received this Money, he should return to his Government of Huahutimallan; and that he should swear, as afterwards he did, never more to return unto Pern, during the Life of the two Companions. Picarro and Almagro: upon which agreement both parties remained with munual fatisfaction.

The Articles being in this manner concluded and figured, Almagro burnt the Craca alive, for having treacherously for faken his Colours, and had in the same manner dealt with Philip the Interpreter, had not Alvarado interceded in his behalf Upon which passage Gomara in the 129th Chapter of his Book, discourseth as sollows: " Almagro (faith he) did not find wherewith to pay these hundred thou fand Pesos of Gold in compliance of his obligation to Alvarado, out of the be nefit and gains of the late Acquisitions, although in Caramba there was a Tenple plated in the in-fide with Silver, which perhaps he would not take away, "untill fuch time, as either he had first procured the consent of Picarro thereund, or else had found some ways to dispose thereof. And so both of them proceeded together unto St. Miguel de Tangarata, but Atvarado dismissed several of his Company, suffering them to plant and settle themselves with Belalcaçar in 2011 th, conserving to himself the brayest and stoutest of his Companions. Thus far are the Words of Gomara, which I repeat and alledge his Authority for what I have declared. Of all which matters and occurrences Almagro gave intelligence to Don Francisco de Picarro.

XI. CHAP.

Almagro and Alvarado march together unto Cozco. The Prince Manco Inca comes to treat with the Governour, who gives him a magnificent Reception.

THE Spaniards having with mutual joy folemnized the Peace and Amity which was concluded and agreed between both Parties, the two Governours, Almago and Alvarado, (for to the laft I attribute the Title of Governour, as well as to the others, because that he was entred into the same Consederacy and League with them,) gave orders to Captain Sebalfian de Belalgacar, to return unto Quiti, for fecuning the Peace and Quiet of that Kingdom; for that fome petty Commanders of the Indians roved up and down the Country, to cause Disturbances and Infurrections. This being difpatched, other matters were to be provided for, and particularly it was thought fit to raife a Fortress, and furnish it with a Garparticularly it was thought fit to rate a Fortrels, and furnish it with a Garison to defend themselves from the Spaniards, who upon the same of the vast Riches of Pern, crouded in great numbers from Panama, and Nicaragua, to take a share thereof with the present possessions; to oppose which the Garrison was provided with Men, and Arms, and Provision sufficient to defend it. As to Don Pedro de Alvarado, who, according to the Articles agreed and published, was to return unto his Ships, and sail along the Coast towards the Southward, there to return and profiles new Dominions of Kingdoms and Provinces declared that conquer and possess new Dominions of Kingdoms and Provinces, declared, that he had a mind to travail by Land, and make a vifit to the Governour Don Franoffe Pierro, and to divert himself a while in the fight and survey of those parts; the which was but a bare pretence, that he might the better colour and conceal the fecret agreement; and upon this occasion it was resolved, that Almagro should fend one of his Officers, who was called Diego de Mora, (with whom I was afterwards acquainted.) to command the Fleet in his place and stead; and accordingly Aburrado dispatched his Orders to Garciholguin, to deliver up the charge of the Fleet into the Hands of Diego de Mora, the Person commissionated and entrusted by both Parties, in regard, that according to the late Agreement, the Ships and Men, and all that belonged unto them, were to be employed in the publick Service, and defrayed at the common expence. Necessary Orders being taken herein, the two Governours proceeded on their way towards Cozco, where we shall have them in their Journey for a while, and return to the Successes of Picarro, who being left at Cozco, as vve have faid, many particulars vvere transacted by him, which we shall mention in order, that so we may keep the due Method of our History, both as to time and place.

Manco Inca, moved by the Advices which his Brother Titu Atauchi, and his Major General Quizquiz had fent to him, (as we have before specified) prepared himself to make a visit to the Governour, and to demand of him the restitution of his Empire, and performance of those Capitulations which his Brother, and the principal Nobles of his Kingdom had made, and concluded with the Spanithe principal Nobles of his Kingdom had made, and concluded with the Spanithe principal Nobles of his Kingdom had made, and concluded with his Confidents, and upon which point entring into divers Confultations with his Confidents, whether it were better to go in a peaceable and friendly manner, or attended with a strong and powerfull Army; in which matter the Counsels were much divided, fometimes being of one Opinion, and fometimes of another; though the generality followed the Advice of Quizquiz, who was of opinion, that the Inca ought to be well guarded, left his Fate thould be like to that of his Brother Arabnalpa, who trusting to the good Nature and generous Disposition of Strangers, fell into those fnares wherein he perished. But whilst they were thus in Dispute, and con-

Sons and Brethren of mine, We are now going to demand Justice of those whom we estem for Persons who are descended from our God Viracochia, and who at their first entrance into these our Countries, declared, that it was their sole and proper Design to administer fullis to all the World; fo that I cannot imagine that they should refuse the concession and grant of that which is so just and ressonable as our Claim and Title to the Kingdom: for if these bear ple are of the true Race and Off-spring of the Sun, as our Foresathers were, who tanoh w Truth for a Principle, and that our Actions are to Square and correspond with our ward. and Promises, then certainly they cannot deny what they have so solemnly engaged to berform. for if they do, why should we longer esteem them Godlike, or to have any thing of Divinits in them, who so palpably disown it by their Tyranny and falseness? For my part, I would rather confide in the Reason and Instice of our Cause, than in our Power and Arms; for if they be, as they pretend, Messengers from the God Pachacamac, they will fear to offend him, knowing that there is nothing more inconsistent with the Divine Nature than Iniustice and especially in those who being made his Ministers for the execution thereof, do usurb that to themselves, which is the Right and Property of another. Let us therefore go to them. armed with the Justice of our Cause, for if they are Gods, (as we believe them to be) they will alt like the true and legitimate Off-spring of the Sun, and like our Incas, will readily yield our Empire to su. For our Ancestours did never deprive the Curacas of their Hereditary Rights, nor take a Forsciture of them in the Case of Rebellion; much less ought these Spaniards to develt us of our Inheritance, and of our Empire, who did never oppose them. but rather yield and resign up all upon their sirst Summons. Let us therefore go to them in a peaceable manner; for if we go armed, they will imagine we intend to make War unon them, and with that pretence deny the most reasonable thing we can demand; for coverous Men, armed with Power, are glad of the least excuse, or pretence to deny that which is no quired of them. Instead of our Arms let we carry fuch Presents with us, as may serve to appeale the Anger of enraged Men, and pacific the Displeasure of offended Gods. Let us salver what Gold, and Silver, and pretious Stones we can gather; let us take what Birds and Beafts we can get, as also the best and most delitious Fruits that our Countrey yields; and with these let us in the best manner we are able present our selves before them, for though the Ancient Power, and force of our Kings is low, and failing, yet let us still keep up the Honour of a truly Noble and Royal Spirit of the Incas. And if all this will not prevail with them to n. flore unto us our Empire, we may then absolutely conclude, that the Prophecy left unto usb our Father Huavna Capac is accomplished; that our Monarchy is to be translated to a for reign and stranger Nation, our political Government destroyed, and our Religion abolished. part of which Prophecy we our felves have feen fulfilled; and if the Pachacamac hath fo adained these things, what can we doe but submit and obey? Let them doe what the please. but let not us be wanting either to the Rules of Reason, or Justice.

When the Inca had uttered these Words with a Majesty becoming his Quality and Condition, the Captains and Curacus burst out into Tears, lamenting to confider, that the time was now coming, which would be the ultimate Term and Per riod of their Empire. Having wept a while, and dried their Eyes, the Curacu and Officers made provision of such things as the Inca had appointed, and prepared fuch an Equipage as might become the Majesty of their King, though inferious to the Train and Magnificence of his Ancestours. In this manner he travelled to Cozco, attended with many Curacus and Lords, together with their Relations and Dependents; for of his own Kindred there remained but few, who had escaped from the Cruelty and Tyranny of Atabualpa. At the News of their near approach, all the Spaniards, both Horie and Foot, came forth to meet and receive them at a far diffance from the City. So foon as the Governour was come near to the Inca, he alighted from his Horse; as also the Inca did from his Chair, which was not, as formerly, made of Gold, but of Wood; for though the Counsellours of the Inca advifed him to take his Chair of Gold, and march in that State which became the Dignity, and wear the coloured Wreath about his Head; yet he refused both one and the other, efteeming it very improper for him, who was a Petitioner, and came to ask the Restitution of his Kingdom, to appear before them with the Ensigns of his Regality, as if he intended in despight of the Spaniards, by appearing with the Badge of his Regal Power, to affume and vindicate the Poffession and Dominion of his Em pire; wherefore he judged it more proper for him to wear the Wreath of a pale yellow Colour, for that, as he faid, the Viraccobas, meaning the Spaniards, would underfland him thereby to be the true Heir apparent of the Kingdom. In short, being come near one to the other, the Governour made his Reverence to the Inca after the Cafillian manner, and bid him welcome; and the Inca replied, that he was come to ferve and adore those whom they efteemed for Gods, and as Messengers sent from the supreme Pachacamae. Their Words were few, and their Discourse short, for want of good Interpreters; after which the Governour prefently retired to give place to the other Spaniards, and to his two Brothers, John and Gonçalo Picarro. The Inca being advertised that these two were Brothers of the Apu, which is, Captain General, he embraced and thewed them great respect; for it is observable, that the Inca, before he came to this Interview with the Spaniards, had provided himfelf with a certain Indian, who was well acquainted with the Spaniards, and gave him notice of the feveral Captains, and Commanders, and Officers, and of their Degrees and Qualities: This Indian was Servant to a Spaniard, and informed their Degrees and Quanties. This toman was servant to a symmara, and mornied a Curaca which flood near to the King of every Man's condition, which he accordingly whitpered him, fo that being advertised thereof, he treated every Man with some kind of difference, testisying to all in general his Love and Affection for them, which he expressed by the chearfulness of his Countenance, his Words and Gestures. And at last, turning to his own People, he said to the same purpole as Arabualpa had done, when he first saw Hernando Picarro, and Hernando de Soto, These Men (said he) are the true Sons of our God Viracocha, for so they resemble him in their Behaviour, in their Beards and Habits, and therefore do justly challenge all Duty and Service from us, according to the Commands enjoined as by our Father Huayna Capac, as appears by his last Will and Tostament.

CHAP. XII.

The Inca demands Restitution of his Empire; and what Answer was returned to him thereupon.

Hese Discourses being ended, the Spaniards mounted on Horseback, and the Inca into his Chair; then the Governour took the Left hand of the Inca and his Brothers, and the other Captains and Souldiers marched in the front, each Company by it self; one Company was commanded to bring up the Rere, and a Guard of twenty four foot-Souldiers were ordered to attend and march by the Chair of the Inca. Thus when the Indians found themselves to join in one Body with the Spaniards, they were highly pleased to be so honoured, and esteemed worthy to affociate and to join company with those whom they adored for Gods. In this order they entred into the City with great Joy and Triumph, the Inhabitants going forth to meet them, with Dances and Songs composed in Praise of the Viracochus; for the poor people were overjoyed to fee their Inca, and to understand that the true and lawfull Heir, which had escaped from the Tyranny of Atahualpa, was now to fucceed into the Throne of his Ancestours. The Street through which the Inca was to pass, was covered with a fort of their Rushes and Canes, and some triumphal Arches erected at a certain distance each from the other, decked with Flowers after the Fashion which they used at the Triumphs of their Kings. The Spaniards conducted the King to one of the Royal Palaces, called Cassana, situate in the Market-place, fronting to the Coloffeo, belonging to the Jefuites, where they left him highly pleafed, and big with expectation to be reftored to his Empire; for measuring the good Intentions of the Spaniards by the kind reception which they gave him, the Inca and his Attendants were fully perfuaded that the days were now returned, in which they should enjoy the ancient Peace, Quiet and Freedom, which flourished in the time of their Ineas. So soon as the King was fettled in his Lodgings, the Officers delivered the Prefents which they had brought to the Governour and his Virnocohus, who received them with fo many Thanks and kind Words, that the Indians were infinitely pleafed and overjoyed at the gratefull acceptance of them. This was the onely happy day, crowned with Honour and Contentment, that this poor bica had ever known in all the course of his former Life; for in the time of his Brother Atahnalpa, he remained under great persecutions, slying from place to place in perpetual dread and sear; and the remainder of his Days, untill the time of his Death, admitted of little more Confolation than the former, as we shall see hereaster in the Sequel of this Story. When the bica had a little reposed himself in his Lodgings, he sent to Francisco Chawer, and his Companions, letting them know, that he was desirous to see, and to be acquainted with them on the good report and character he had received from his People concerning them; so soon as they were come he embraced them with all demonstration of kindness, and having drank with them, according to the custome of the bicas, he told them, besides many other kind expressions, that their Actions shewed them to be the true Off-spring of the God Viracocha, and Brethren of the bicas, because they endeavoured to deliver Ausbualpa from Death, which worthy Act he would ever acknowledge and recompence, desiring them to esteem him for their Brother, considering that they were all descended from the same Race and Lineage of the Sun; and then he presented them with Vesses of Gold, and Silver, and pretious Stones, which he had brought apart for this Gentleman, and his Companions, which were taken so kindly, that Chaves, in the name of the rest, returned his Complement, and said, that they were all Servants of his Highness, and would evidence so much when occasion should offer, and that what they had endeavoured for his Brother, was onely in compliance with their Duty, and Obligation, and that if he doubted of their Reality, they desired him to make a trial of their good-will and services for him. Then the bica embracing them again, dissified them, highly satisfied with the Presents he had made them of Jewels, and of Gold, and Silver, Turquoises, and Emeralds.

Two days after his Arrival, the Prince Manco Inca proposed to the Governour that he might be restored to his Empire, according to the Articles agreed between the Indians and the Spaniards, and that a firm Peace and an Alliance might be made between them: That Priests should be sent to preach and propagate the Law of the Christians unto the Indians, as the Spaniards had themselves proposed; and that for what concerned the Inca to perform, he was ready to give his orders, that they should be well received, and treated with high Veneration and Esteem in all the principal Provinces of the Empire; where they would find the People very docible, and willing to be instructed in their Faith, upon the assume they had received from their Father Hungha Capac, who at the time of his death did attest, that the Law of the Christians was better than our own: And whereas this heir Father had by his last Will and Testament ordained, that his People should obey and serve the Spaniards, they were ready to comply with his Injunctions therein, and to resign so much, and what part of the Kingdom they should desire, into their Hands.

To which the Governour returned this Answer, That his Highness was welcome to his own Imperial City, and that he should rest, and take his Repose with quietness and security: That he was very well pleased to know his Will and Pleasure, that so the might give him a proof of his readiness to comply with his Defires: And that as to the Capitulations which were agreed, they were so just and reasonable, that nothing could be objected against the performance of them. After which some Discourse past, but very short, for want of an Interpreter. The next day the Governour holding a Consultation with his Brothers, and the rest of the Capitains conclining the days and which were the best for the Capitains conclining the days of the Capitains capitains conclining the days of the Capitains capitains capitains and the capitains capit

The next day the Governour holding a Confultation with his Brothers, and the rest of the Captains, touching the demand which was made by the Inea, several opinions arose upon the Debate, but it being considered, that the possession of the Kingdom had no other meaning than the binding of the Inea's Head with the coloured Wreath; the Governour, with his Attendants, went to the House of the Inea, and without farther Presace, or long Oration, desired him to take immediate possession of his Empire; for had he been acquainted with the custome of his Countrey, he should not have remained one moment without the Ensign of his Royal Dignity upon his Head; and that as to the Division of the Kingdom, they would treat more sully hereaster, when matters were a little better settled in quietness, for that at present the Indians had made Insurrections in divers places, which were not yet appeased; but as to the Services which the Indians were to perform towards the Spaniards, and the modification of the Peace, which was to be maintained, he remitted all to the Disposition of the Inea, to order and design that which should be most agreeable to his own Good-will and Pleasure, which the Spaniards would embrace with a chearfull readiness; but as to the Preachers which were intended to instruct his People in the Divine Law, they had so sew Priests amongst them, that as yet they could not spare any, but that when a new supply came, which they did shortly expect, they should be immediately dispeeded upon this Errant; for that the chief Design of the Christians was to retract the Indians from the Errous of their ways, and to shew unto them the folly of their Superstition and Idolatry. With these Affurances the Indians were greatly satisfied, and the Inea delayed not immediately to bind his Head with the coloured Wreath; which Ceremony was attended with great Joy and Triumph, though for want of those of the Bloud Royal, and of many Curacas or Barons, who were cut off by the Cruelty of Atabuassa, the solemnity was nothing so splendid and magnificent as in the times of the ancient Ineas, when the great numbers of Nobility added Glory to the Court; yet the young Gallants rejoiced to see that Festival, how mean soever, at which the old Men grieved, who remembred the times of the Great Huansa Capac, and had seen the splendour of his Court.

CHAP. XIII.

How the two Governours marched in pursuit of Major General Quizquiz.

IN our former Discourse, we lest Don Pedro de Alvarado, and Don Diego de Almagro, with their brisk Souldiery on their march towards Cozco, where the Governour Don Francisco de Picarro kept his Court; and as they were on their way. News was brought them, that the Major General Quizquiz had ghered great Forces, and was encamped in the Province of Camaris, having with him much Gold, and Silver, and other pretious Commodities, with great Flocks and Herds of Cattel. The Fame hereof increased in the telling, as is usual, wherefore the Governours refolved to march that way to defeat that Army, and destroy the Tyrant, having understood from the Indians, that there was no other Army besides that in all the Empire. Though Quizquiz was strong in his numbus, yet he was not willing, or very ready to engage with the Spaniards; for in regard that both he, and the Inca Titu Atauchi, had fent the Articles and Capitulations to the Governour, which they had concluded and agreed with Francisco de Chaues and his Companions, (as we have before mentioned,) they remained in ex-pectation to hear of a general Peace between the Indians and the Spaniards, and little dreamed of any Forces which were marching to destroy them. This security and confidence was much increased by the persuasion of the Inca Titu Atauchi, on whose Words uttered at the hour of his Death they much relied; for we must know, that this poor Inca died a few days after he had difinified Chaves and his Companions; his end being haftned by the melancholy, he conceived for the fad fate of his Brother Atabuaha, and by the news of the bloudy Tragedy, acted by that Traytor Rumminavi in Quitu on his Kindred, Brothers, Captains, and on the innocent select Virgins. All which Massacres and Villanies committed by a Valfal on the Bloud Royal, and on the Life of his own Inca, he esteemed to be forerunners of the entire subversion of the Empire, and of the Majesty of his Family, and being overwhelmed with the fense thereof, he called for Quizquiz, and his other Captains, and told them plainly, that they should endeavour to make a Peace with the Virgueothes, and should serve and adore them, according as the Inca Huagna Capac had by his last Will and Testament ordered and commanded them; who being the Oracle of that time, his Ordinances and Rules were esteemed indispensible, therefore they should endeavour to please the Viracochas, who were the Offfring descended from their Father the Sun, and of the same Lineage with the Incas all which he farther enforced and confirmed by virtue of the Command and

Charge committed unto him by his Father Huanna Canac

With such Arguments as these, and in hopes and expectations that the Capitula-With fuch Arguments as thete, and in nopes and expectations that the Capitulations would be maintained, Quizquiz remained very fecure in the matters of Wars and though he received intelligence that the Governours were marching towards him, yet he apprehended no hurt, nor received an Allarm, onely he detached a bout an hundred Souldiers, under a Centurion or Captain, (which is the smallest number that the Indians have in a Company,) this Centurion the Historians Governous and the Indians have in a Company, and the Indians for Contraction of the Contraction of the Indians and Indians I number that the majors have in a Company, it is Contained the full original  $G_{th}$ , mara and Carate call solarco, which fignifies fix Mountains, for C, oth fignifies fix, and ore a Mountain, for he was born in a Valley between fix lofty Mountains, (such as are common in that Countrey,) and they say, that his Father and Morhey (fuch as are common an that Country,) and they hay, that his rather and Mother were in his company, which must be upon some extraordinary occasion, for Women never go to the War with their Husbands; perhaps it might be to keep up the story of his Birth, and of his Life, for the Indians by such like Names, and by such Sayings, or by Cyphers, or Hieroglyphicks, and by their Verses and Poetry have conserved the Traditions of their History; and have therein comprehended the fuccess of all their Matters in a compendious manner, as for example; the Embaffies fent to their Incas, and their Answer thereunto; the Speeches made in Peace and War; what fuch a King or Governour commanded, with the punish-Peace and War; what fuch a king or Governour commanded, with the punishments inflicted; and in short, whatsoever was transacted in the publick Affairs. All which the Historians, or Notaries, taught unto their Children by Tradition, instructing them in Cyphers, and short Versicles, and in such short Words as the Name of this Captain, and in such other Brief Sayings as we have already declared; by help of which, and of their Knots, an Indian would read or recount the paffages of his Time, as well, or faster than a Spaniard could reade Books writ with Letters, as Asoft restifies in the 8th Chapter of his 6th Books not that these Knots furnished him with Words, but onely called things to his Memory, which having studied day and night, he became versed in every particular, so so be able to render an account of his Office. All which though we have formerly declared at large, yet having so pertinent an Instance as this Name of Captain Collago, we have thought it not impertinent to repeat the fame, that we may verifie what we have formerly reported, and to help the Memory of the Reader. This Captain, as we have faid, was fant by Quizquis for a foout to difcover the March and Force of the Spaniards, and to know their Intentions towards him; but the filly Wretch was not so cautious as he ought to have been, but suffered himself to be surprised, and taken by the Spaniards, who carried him to Alvarado, and by him the Spaniards were informed of the place where Quizquiz was quartered, and of the numbers and force he had with him, so they marched with all expedition towards him, and being near, they watched all night to beat up his Quarters early in the morning. This Exploit was committed to a party of Horfe, which travelling over rocky Hills and Ways, for the space of a Day's Journey, most of the Horse cast their Shoes, so that they were forced to shoe them by candle-light, as the Writers of this matter do generally agree. All the next day they continued their Journey with great haste and expedition, lest 2012quiz should receive intelligence of their March, by return of some of those they met. and so they proceeded until the next day in the Evening, by which time they were come within fight of the Camp of Quizquiz, who upon their appearance immediately fled, with all his Women and Attendants. This is affirmed by Ca rase, and Gomara reports almost the same thing; the which is a sufficient proof, that Quizquiz never intended to make War on the Spaniards, or was provided for it; for if he had, certainly he would have been better guarded, than by a company of Women, and domestick Attendants; nor were his Souldiers so inexpert, or unskilfull in War, as not to have appeared with Arms at the Camp, or Rendezvous upon the Summons of their Captain, which might have been speedily effected by passing the Word from one to the other. But this amusement and stupid security of Quizquiz may well be attributed to the Providence of Heaven, which had designed the Sumiards to be Preachers of the Gospel. Moreover Quizquiz depended on the Capitulations which the Indian had made with Francisco Chapter of which those Sumiards who marked against him were not informed. Chaves, of which those Spaniards who marched against him were not informed, for Don Diego de Almagro was departed from Cozco with his Forces, in fearch of Alvarado, before Francisco de Chaves had brought the News thereof. So the Spaniards being ignorant of the Goodwill and Intentions of Quizquiz, went with Defign rodeftroy him, which had been avoided, had there been a true and right underto denity matters between them; but the Devil, who always delights in Dif. ord and Mischiess, had by his Artifice contrived to prevent the true Information. that so matters proceeding to Bloud and Tyranny, the Indians might be possessionable with a similar and prejudicial esteem of the Spaniards; and of the Christian Doctrine they professed to propagate.

CHAP. XIV.

Three Battels between the Indians and the Spaniards: and of the Number of the Slain.

Vizquiz observing the haste which the Spaniards made towards him, did imagine that their Design was to engage him to fight, and therefore repenting too late of his Security and Neglect, and being mad, and ashamed for his Folly and flupidity, he retreated as well as he could, unto the top of a craggy and rugged Mountain, which was unpaffable, and inacceffible for Horses, where he seged Mountain, Which was impartable; and in the mean time, to amule and employ the Spaniards, he fent a certain Captain, whom the Spaniards call Guaypalcon, though his proper Name was Huaypallea, the fignification of which I do not well understand, because it is a word of the Language of Quitn; but this Person, as we faid, was sent with Commission to raise what Forces he was able to oppose the Spaniards, and having gathered some numbers together, he durst not assault Alvarado, fearing the great Body of his Horfe, which drew themselves up on such Ground, where they might be most serviceable, and not fight upon a disadvantage. Howsoever he found an opportunity to engage Almagro, who, to encompass Quisquiz between him and Alvarado, was mounted with his Horse to such a craggy and asperous part of a mountain, that he was in danger of being entirely lost and deseated, as Carate consums by these Words: "Huspaleon, fays he, with his Souldiers, went to engage Almagro, who, with his "Horle, was got up to the ridge of a Mountain, the afcent unto which was fo "fleep, that they mounted by turnings and windings, and had wearied and tired "all their Horles; and befides, the Indians threw down from the top mighty" "great Stones, called Galgar, which tumbling five or fix furlongs down, carried thirty or forty more before them, and thele drove innumerable others, before "they came to the bottome. Thus far are the Words of Carate, the which are confirmed in like manner by Gomara, as we shall see hereaster.

Almagro was greatly incommoded by the fall of these Rocks which killed both his Men and Horse, and he himself also was in great danger of his Life, to avoid which, he was forced to take another way less rugged, that so he might be enabled the better to come at Huapallea, who fearing to fall between the two Commanders, retreated to the safeguard of a steep and craggy Mountain, by help of which he valiantly defended himself untill night; for in such inaccessible places as twose, neither the Horse nor Foot could be of Service; and the Indians had a great advantage of the Viraccehas, or Spaniards, who were laden with Armour and offensive Memory. The sight had a specific and the Indians of the destroyer and the Indians of the Memory. fensive Weapons. The night being come, Huappallea, by help of the darkness re-treated with his Souldiers into more fast and secure places. The Day following the Spaniards fell in with the Rere-guard of Quizquiz, who not dreaming of War or fighting, marched with their Army divided into two Bands, at least fifteen Leagues distant one from the other; as is reported by Carate in the 12th Chapter of his 2d Book, and in the fame Chapter he hath these Words following. "Don "Diego, and D. Pedro rallied all their Forces together, and the Indians, by the obfourity of the night, escaped, and went to join themselves with Quizquiz, and the 3000 Indians, who taking their way by the Lest-hand, cut off the Heads of

fourteen Spanisteds, whom they had encountred at a distance from the Main Ro dv. and fo marching forward they overtook the Rere-guard of Quicquiz: then the Indians fortified themselves at the Pass of a River, where they faced the sources niards for a whole day, and suffered none of them to pass, whilst others of niards for a whole day, and suffered none of them to pass, whilst others of them passed over above; then the Spaniards intended to make an Attempt upon the Indians, who had taken the side of a very high mountain; but it had like to have proved stall to them, by reason that the Spaniards in that craggy and rugged ground; could not make a Retreat when they pleased; so that many of them were wounded, as namely, Captain Alonso de Alvarado, who was run through the thigh, as was likewise a Lieutenant, and all that night the Indians kept strict Watch. But so soon as it was day, they quitted the pass on the River, and fortified themselves in the Mountains, where the Spanards left them in quiet, because Almagro did not judge it convenient to continue his Quarters in that place. Thus far are the Words of Carate, with whom Gomara agrees, and in the 130th Chapter of his Book hath these Words: "Quizquiz flying, and running away, had not gone many Leagues before the Spaniards sell upon his rere; which when the Indians perceived, they defended the Banks of a River to keep the Spaniards from passing. Their numbers were so great, that whilst some maintained the passage of the River, others above got over, and put themselves into a posture of fight, intending to encompass the Spaniards on all sides, and to kill and take them as they pleased; then they possessed themselves of a little Hill, which was very rocky, to secure themselves from the Spanish Horse, from "which with some advantage and fresh courage they renewed the Fight, and killed some of the Horse, which could not easily turn or move in that rugged place, and wounded several Spaniards, of which Alonso de Alvarado de Burga was run through the thigh, and Don Diego de Almagro himself narrowly escaped. Thus far are the Words of Gomara. The Spaniards which were killed in this Fight, and died afterwards of their wounds, received in the three late Skirmifhes, were fifty three in all, reckoning the fourteen which Carata mentions, and eighteen were cured of their wounds: The Horses killed were thirty four, one of which was that red of their wounds: The Horles killed were thirty four, one of which was that of Almagro, which was overthrown by the rowling down of a Galga or Rock, which struck him a-thwart his hinder leg, and broke it, with which Man and Horse came to the ground, and had the stone taken them full, both of them had been beaten to pieces. Of the Indian not above fixty were killed, for the Rocks were their protection, on which the Spaniards and their Horse sought with great disadvantage; for which reason Almagro withdew his Forces, and would not farther engage in those places, being troubled at the loss he had received in those two days Engagements, which Congress in the reach Classes of his Rocks mention in days Engagements; which Gomara in the 130th Chapter of his Book mentions in fhort, and describes the unhappy Encounter which our Men had with the Rereguard of Quizquiz, &cc. Blus Valera reckoning up the most Memorable Battels, and which had been the most fatal to the Spaniards of any in Poru, he mentions eight, besides several other Skirmishes of lesser moment; and numbers this in the first place, calling it the Battel of Quitu, because it was sought on the frontiers of that Countrey; and fays, that the opaniards had then been most certainly defeated and destroyed, had not the Divine Providence, which designed by their means to propagate the Golbel in those parts, appeared for them: And also the Spaniards, who were then present in those Engagements confirm the same; and I have heard many of them declare, that they often gave themselves over for lost in their Fights with the Indians 3 and that when things feemed to be desperate, and according to humane reason, without all hopes, and possibility of escape, then presently, and on a fudden, their fortune would turn, and by fome unexpected accident from Heaven they became victorious. And discoursing on these matters, and of the great dangers and hazards they had sustained, they would often say, that if the Indians, who came with no intention to fight, and without any order being divided into four Squadrons, were able to doe them so much hurt, and put them into so much disorder; what would they have done, had they been aware, and had come with design to engage under the Command and Discipline of their Commander Quizquiz, who was accounted a famous, and a renowned Captain, as Gomara reports, when he relates the Story of him, and of the manner whereby he was put to Death by his own Souldiers.

After all which Don Diego de Almagro fent to gather the spoils, which the Historians mention to have been a thousand head of Cattel, and about a thousand Indian Men and Women for service, which were forced or pressed to attend the Camp; and which sinding themselves free, and at liberty, ran away, and sled to the Spaniards. As to the fine Linen and Cloth, little appeared, for the Indians, rather than be troubled with too great baggage, burnt it; and likewise madaway with the Gold and Silver, and concealed it in such manner, as it never after came to light; of all which Almagro gave intelligence to the Governour, and of the success of the two Battels, and dispatched his Advices by Indians whom he sent with his Letters: And also that Don Pedro de Alvarado was on his Journey towards Cozoo to make him a visit, that so he might accordingly provide for his reception.

CHAP. XV.

The Governour departs from Cozco to meet Alvarado; he fees him and pays him the Money according to agreement.

THE Governour Pigarro having received intelligence of the loss of the Men and Horse, which were killed by the Souldiers of Quizquiz, was very much troubled, esteeming it of ill consequence for the Spaniards to be baffled, or the reputation which they had gained, to fuffer and be impaired in the opinion of the Indians; but there being no remedy for what was past, but onely patience, he encouraged his Souldiers, and advised them to proceed more warily for the future. And in regard he was advised that Alvarado was marching towards Cozco, he was delirous to prevent him, and fave him the trouble of a long Journey; and therefore to cut matters short, he provided to make him the payment for which Almagro had agreed, and with that to perfuade him to return; for though he defired to see him, yet it might be inconvenient, and cause some disorders to have three Governours, as in reality there would be within that Jurisdiction. For these Governours, when they were poor, might possibly agree in co-ordinate rule each with other; but being rich and powerfull, and in a condition of Sovereignty, which admits of no equal, and perhaps of no Second, they could not long continue Peace, and a Brotherly Alliance; the which discord caused by Ambition, was the Original of all the misfortunes and fatal calamities which befell them, as will appear in the sequel of this History. On this consideration the Governour, that he might haften the dispatch and return of Alvarado, resolved to go and meet him as far as the Valley of Pachacamac; so that he might neither travel at too far a distance from the Sea-coast, and might excuse him from a Journey of two hundeed and forty Leagues, as the going would be from Pachacamae to Cozco, and the return back again to that place; and befides, he was not willing that he should see the Imperial City, and the Grandeur and Riches thereof, lest the temptations of that Wealth should cause alteration, and a breach of the Articles agreed; and therefore he was impatient untill he saw them again ratified and confirmed. As to the Equipage for his Journey, he took the opinion and fense of his Brothers, and other Officers of his Army; recommending in the mean time the Person of the Land of the La the Inca unto their care, and all other matters which were necessary to conserve their Peace and League with the Indians. And in order thereunto he discoursed with the Inca, and told him, that it was convenient for him to absent himself for some days, whilst he could make a Journey to the Valley of Pachacamac, for performance of some agreements made with the Spaniards, who were lately come into those Countries; on confirmation of which, the Articles made between the Indians and Spaniards did much depend, which should be faithfully complied with at his return: and therefore he defired his licence to make that Journey for a few days, leaving in the mean time his Brothers, and other Spaniards, in the Service of his Highness, who, he supposed, would be acceptable to him, in regard he essentially med them for his Kindred, and to be of the same Lineage and Off-spring from the Sun. To which the Inca made answer, that he wished him a prosperous Journev; and as to his two Brothers, and the other Viracochas, he would take them into his care, and treat them with fuch respect and kind usage, as that he should have cause to render him thanks for the same at his return. And having said this, he immediately dispatched a Message to the Commanders of the several plant ces and Countries through which the Governour was to pass, that they should an point their Subjects and Vaffals to attend his coming, and wait on him in the fame point their subjects and varias to drain in cheming, and wat of min in the fame manner, as on his own Perfon; and moreover, that they flould provide a Guard of two hundred Men to attend and conduct the Governour, and to change them every three days, fo that they might be more fresh and active in his Service.

Royal Commentaries.

The Governour having understood what the Inca had appointed in reference unto him, took his leave and farewell of him, making choice of thirty Horse to attend him on this Journey; and being come to Saufta, he received intelligence that Don Diego, and D. Pedro de Alvarado were to pass by the way of Pachacamac, to visit that great Temple in those parts: Wherefore he hastened his Journey, that he might meet them in that pleafant Valley, and there receive and treat Abardad, and demonstrate that honour to him which was due to a famous Captain of his Quality and Renown, and accordingly preparations were made for his reception and treatment. Twenty days after the Governour had been at Pachacanna, Don and treatment. Twenty days after the Governour had been at Pachacamae, Don Pedro de Alvarado arrived there, being received by him with all the carefles and demonstrations of respect and kindness that could be expressed; for he gave positive command to his People and Officers, to own and acknowledge Alvarado for their Chief and Governour, and to give him that title folely; and as to himself and Almagro, to diffinguish them by no other titles of Honour, than their own proper Names; and accordingly, during all the time that Alvarado remained at Pachacamae, Picarro refused to take cognisance of any cause, matter, or thing, whatsoever, but referred all to the judgment of Alvarado, whom he commanded his people to observe and obey; seeming extremely rejoyced with the fight and presence of fo many Illustrious Cavaliers, who were come in the train and company of Alvarado, and whom he honoured and complemented with all the demonstrations of respect and civility that could be expressed. After some days had passed with ceremony and complement, and with the fatisfaction of mutual contentment, Picarro paid to Alvarado the hundred thousand Pesos of Gold, as was agreed, with an additional Aid of twenty thousand more to pay the charges of his Journey this ther, belides many Emeralds and Torquoifes of confiderable value, and feveral Ryals Plate, there, believes many Emeriants and Torquonies of confiderable value, and leveral which is nine Veffels of Gold for his use and fervice. And indeed the succour and reputation the which Alvarado brought to this enterprise might well deserve such a reward for the Horse, Men and Arms which he brought with him, so terristed and affrighted the Souldiers of Atabuaspa, that they entirely yielded and resigned their whole Empire into the hands of the Spaniards: In consideration of which, the Governour honestly and justly, without farther dispute or scruple, paid the Money, as was agreed, with the other advantages as asoresaid; though others were of opinion (as Gomara and Carate report) that Pigarro had done better if he had not paid the Monev. but rather had taken Alvarado and fent him Prisoner to Spain, for having by force of Arms invaded his Territory, in regard that such a compact which was made with Almagro by force of Arms, was not obligatory; or at least if the Money was to have been paid, yet that he should pay him no more than fifty thoufand Pefos of Gold, (which made one hundred thousand pieces of Eight) because that the Ships and Arms were not more worth, two of the Ships belonging to Picarro himself; and as to the Men, Horses and Arms, they belonged not to Alusrado, but were the Goods and Estates of other Men. Howsoever, Picarro being a Man of honour, and one who more regarded his word and reputation, than the evasions which some would suggest to him, whereby to cause him to violate and break his Faith and Word: He paid Alvarado in that noble and generous manner as we have expressed, with regard to that honour and respect which one Gentleman ought in all dealings to perform towards another. And though the agreement was made by his Partner, yet he efteemed it obligatory to himfelf, preferring his Paroll of Honour before any interest whatsoever. And though some did object, that Almagro made a blind bargain, and did not well confider of the value object, that Abraggo made a Dima Dargam, and did not well confider of the value of the Ships, or perhaps was inforced to that Engagement; yet Piçarro returned a full answer thereunto, That a Gentleman ought well to confider of his promife before he gave it, and not to pretend afterwards that he was furprized, being before he gave it, and not to pretend afterwards that he was furprized, being by the mless of a Souldier, and of a Gentleman, engaged to a performance of his words. And on the contrary Alvarado might have alledged, that in case they element they proved the statement of the provider of the statement o feemed themselves agrieved, they needed onely to restore things to their former fare, in which they were before the agreement, and leave him then to make his belt advantage. And as to the price of the Ships, which they supposed might be over-charged, were the advantage duly considered, which they brought by the forcours and recruits of Men, Horle, Arms and Guns; the reputation of which brought a terrour on all that Empire, and reduced it to fubjection, nothing could have been esteemed too great to have procured that affistence, much less when it was obtained at fo small a rate, as the bare fraight did amount unto. In fine, Picarre, who was noble and fincere in his dealings, replied to those who gave him contrary advice, that no confideration of benefit or profit could balance or fland in competition with his Faith and Honour; and so with this constancy and resobutton he rejected the low and degenerate counsels of mean-spirited Men, and applied himself to receive and treat Alvarado with all the esteem, kindness and magnificence that he was able.

CHAP. XVI.

of the unfortunate Death of Don Pedro de Alvarado.

Dmiral Don Pedro de Alvarado being greatly satisfied with the kind and obli-A ging treatment which Don Francisco de Picarro had made him, they took their leave and farewell each of other with all the kind expressions and complements imaginable, offering mutual fuccours and affiftences as the affairs and emergencies in which they were now engaged, should respectively require. So Alvarado returned to his Government of Huahutimallan, where he reposed not long, or enjoyed the riches and prosperity which he had acquired; but being exalted with his triumphs and his good fortune, which had ever attended him from his Youth, be proceeded to higher Actions and Atchievements, being reftless, and desirous of vain-glory, untill he perished therein, as we shall find hereafter. And though the fuccess hereof doth not properly appertain to this History; yet considering the unhappy and lamentable end of this famous Captain, who had performed so many brave Exploits in divers Countries, which the Renowned John de Grijalva had discovered, and in the Conquest of the Empire of Mexico in company with Hirnando Cortes; and lastly, in the Province of Guatimala, or Huahuimallan, which he conquered by his own Arms, and in other parts of New Spain: Besides all which, we may add the Conquests which he made in Pern, for without his aid and affistence that Empire could never have been secured. Howsoever, he died, as Gomara in the 210th Chapter of his History of the Indies reports, besides many other particulars worthy to be mentioned, which I have extracted verbatim, as Pedro de Alvarado remaining quiet, and peaceably fettled in his Government of Huahutimallan and Chiapa, the latter of which he exchanged with Francisco "Montejo for his Dominion of the Hondurss, obtained licence of the Emperour to discover and plant a Colony in Quim, which was one of the Provinces of Peru, and a Countrey which was rich, and not as yet possessed by the Spaniardi. On this Adventure, in the year 1535, he armed and fet forth five Ships, upon which and upon two others which he fraighted in Nicaragua, he embarked five which and upon two others which he transpired in Avenue and handed at Puerto Viejo, hundred Spaniards, and many Horses; the which being landed at Puerto Viejo, hundred Spaniards, and many Horses; the he marched to Quitu, having in that Journey endured much cold and hunger. the news whereof affected the minds of Picarro and Almagro with jealousie and fear. At length he fold the Ships, Guns, &c. for two hundred thousand pieces of Eight; which having received, he returned rich and triumphant unto Hustimallan. After which he built ten or twelve Ships, one Gally, and other Pin. naces which were light, and rowed well with the Ore, with defign to make naces which were fight, and a farther discovery towards the Cape of Vallenas, called by some California. In the year 1538, Friat Marcot de Ni, a, and other Franciscan Friats travelled by Land through the Countrey of Culbinacan, at least three hundred Leagues to the Westward, and much farther than the Spaniards of Xaliveo had as yet discovered, and returned with high commendations of the Countries, and of the Riches and good Air of Sibola, and other Cities Upon the relation of these Friars, they resolved once to send an Army by Sea to those parts under the Command of Don Antonio de Mando, a, Vice-king of New Spain, and Don Fertiando Cortes Marquis de Valle, who was Captain General of New Spain, and first Discoverer of the Coast along the South Sea; but not agreeing upon Articles, they quarrelled, and so Cortes returned into Spain, and Alvarado was fent in his place with the Ships before mentioned; for which the Money, as aforefaid, was paid him. Alvarado failed, as I conceive, with his Flect to the Port of Navidad, and thence travelled by Land to Mixico, where he agreed with the Vice-king upon an adventure to Sibola, without any regard to the gratitude he owed to Cortes, who was the Authour of all his fortune In his return from Mexico, he passed through Xalixco, to subdue and reduce the people of that Kingdom, who had made an Infurrection, and were in defiance against the Spaniards. At length he came to Equilar, where Diego de Lopes was making War against the Rebels, and joyning his Forces with him, they stormed the Indians, who had fortified themselves on the corner of a Rock with such resolution, that having killed thirty of them, they put the rest unto slight; and having climbed up into a high and narrow Rock, many of their Horses came tumbling down the Precipice: And whereas one of them came fliding down just upon the Horse of Alvarado, he, to avoid him, alighted, intending to give him way, and save himself; but the Horse in his fall striking on the edge of a Rock, turned his fall just on Alvarado, and carried him headlong with him down to the bottom; the which misfortune happened on Midsummer-day, in the year 1541, and in a few days after died of the bruifes he had received at Egatlan, which is a place about three hundred Leagues distant from Huatimallan; he conferved his Senses, and the judgment of a Christian, until the last; for being asked where his chief pain was, he answered, in his Soul: As to other matters, he was a Man of a free and chearfull temper. Thus far are the Words of Gomara; and at the end of the same Chapter he adds, "That he lest no Estate, nor did there remain any Memory or Relicks of him, unless what is before re-" cited, and a Daughter which he had by an Indian Woman, which was after-"wards Married to Don Francisco de la Cueva; and so he concludes that Chapter. This Relation is the very fame which is commonly current in Pern, with all the circumstances thereof; onely they differ in this, that one says it was a Horse that tumbled upon him; and the other, that it was a Rock, which was thrown down by the fall of a Horse; 'tis probable that it might be the one as well as the other, and that the Horfe and Stones might come all rowling down together. Belides, I was acquainted with his Daughter, and with one of his Sons, who was a Mongrel or Meflizo (as we call them) born of an Indian Woman, named Don Diego de Alvarado, a Son worthy, and not degenerating from a Father of such great renown, for he refembled his Father in all his Vertues; was a true pattern of him in all circumstances, nor did he differ from him in the very misfortune of his Death; for having with other Spaniards made his escape from the Battel of Chelqui, Inca, he was afterwards killed by the Indians in the pursuit, as we shall hereafter relate in its due place.

Thus ended the Life of this worthy Cavalier Don Pedro de Alvarado, he was Knight of the Habit of St. Jago, and one of the most dexterous with his Lance of any that passed into the New World. His unhappy Death was greatly lamented at Gozco by all those who had been his followers in that Empire; many Masses were said for his Soul at that time, and for several years afterwards; I my self have been present at some, which were said for him, when I was there. Whensoever any occasion was offered to make mention of him, I have heard several Gentlemen remember him with great praise of his Goodness and Vertue; and some of them specified and recounted the kindnesses and good offices he had shewn to them in particular: And whereas he was very familiarly acquainted, and converfant in my Father's house; I have been an Ear-witness of divers passages relating to his my range strong to the generofity of his great Soul: One of which was this: The in their Voyage to Peru his people suffered much for want of fresh Water: that when they came to Tumpiz, they became very fickly, and many of them were 60 weakned by the Calenture Fever, by reason of the Thirst they had endured, that they were not able to leave the Ship and Land on the shore. Wherefore Alwarado himself landed from the Ship, and provided them with Water: and though he had fuffered as much by Thirst as any of them, yet he would not rafte a drop of Water untill he was affured that the Sick had drank, and all the Ships-company had been provided. Many other generous Acts of this nature were related of this worthy Gentleman; though Gomara in his Writings gives a different character of him, which he must have received from some of those (as there were many) who were envious and emulous of his Vertues and Fortune: And though it was impossible to suppress the same of his Exploits and Adventhree, which were notorious to all the World, yet at least they endeavoured to ediple and disparage the glory of them. Of which this Authour being sensible, did in part excuse and clear himself of the falsity of those reports which were given; and so concludes the 192d Chapter of his Book with these words: He that doth well, and is not praised, lives amongst bad Neighbours, &c. And this he said. becanse he knew that in all estates of Men, there are some who are envious and slandeters, and unworthy the fociety of good Men, being inclined to speak a lve, rather than to utter truth in commendations of another. And now we shall return to the Affairs of Peru, and to the Transactions therein' since the departure of Don Pedro de Alvarado from thence.

CHAP. XVII

Of the Foundation of the City de los Reyes, and of the City of Truxillo.

QO foon as the Governour had disimissed Don Pedro de Alvarado, he immediately gave notice thereof to his Partner Don Diego de Almagro, then at Cozco, and therewith sent a great number of those Gentlemen which came with Alvarado, to be entertained in the Service of the Prince Manco Inca, and his Brothers, John and Gonçalo Picarro, defiring them to be serviceable to the Inca, and kind to the Indians; for in regard the Inca surrendred himself voluntarily, and of his own accord, he would not have him lose that confidence and affection which he had conceived of the Spaniards; in the mean time the Governour remained in the Valley of Pachacamac, with design to build a City near the Sea-coast for the better advantage of Trade and Commerce: And having confidered upon this matter with his friends, he dispatched several persons experienced in Maritime affairs, to discover on both fides where was the most convenient place for a Port or Harbour. At length being informed, that four Leagues to the North of Pachacamac, there was a very fafe Port right against the Valley of Rimac; which when the Governour had viewed and surveyed, he transplanted the people which had begun to settle a Colony in the Valley of Sansa, which is thirty Leagues from Rimae within the Land, unto that convenient place where he founded the City of los Reges in the Year 1534.

But as to the precise year, Authours differ very much; for some make it some and others later: and fome will have it in the year 1530, leaving out the a. Rue mor to insist on these several opinions, let us compare the times with the great and notable Actions which succeeded; for it is most certain, and therein all Authorse agree. that it was in the year 1525, when Picarro, Almagro, and the School-mafter Hernando de Luca, did first enter into Articles of their Triumvirate. Three years afterwards were spent in the discovery, before they arrived the first time at Tree viz. Two years farther passed before they could finish their Voyage into Spain to procure their Commission to make a Conquest, and before their return back to Panama with Ammunition and Provisions for such an undertaking. In the year 1531, they invaded the Island Puna, and also Tumpie; and in December of the and in March following, being the year 1532, he was put to Death, in Ottober following they entred into Goezo, where the Governour refided untill April 1533, when news came of the Arrival of Abrae rado: and in September he departed from Cozco to meet him, and pay him the Monev according to agreement. And about the beginning of the year 1534, being Twelfth-day, or the Day of the Kings, he laid the Foundation of that City, and fo called it la ciudad de los Reyes, or the City of the Kings: In remembrance of which he made the Arms of the City to be Three Crowns, with a Star thining over them; the Form or Model of it was very beautifull, for the Market place was very wide and large, unless perhaps it was too wide for the City, the Streets also were wide and streight; so that from every corner of them cross-ways, the Fields may be feen on all fides. On the North-fide there is a River, from which several Chanels are cut, to water the Lands round about, and to supply every House in the City with water. This Town, at a distance, makes no good shew, nor appears well, because the Houses are nor covered with Tile, but thatched with a fort of Straw which that Countrey yields; for in regard it never Rains in that Climate, nor for many Leagues distant on either side along the Coast, the coverings of the Houses are all made of a fort of Straw, or Rushes, which grow in that Countrey; on which laying a kind of Mortar, or Earth, mixed with Straw, two or three fingers thick, it makes a good defence against the Heats of the Sun: But as to the Buildings themselves, both within and without, they are good and commodious, and they daily improve their Art in Architecture. This Town is about two small Leagues distant from the Sea; but as the report is, the parts nearest to the Sea are best inhabited. The Climate is hot and moist, and much of the same temperament with that of Andalucia; the difference of which is onely, that the Days there are not fo long, nor the Nights fo short in July and Angul, as they are here; to that the Sun ariting there more late, and fetting more early, hath not time to heat and warm the Earth, as in those Regions where the Days are longer; to that though the fituation be nearer the Sun, yet the Nights being long, the Earth hath more time to become cool, and to be refreshed: But in regard the Heats are constant, and admit of small remissions, the Inhabitants being habituated or accustomed thereunto, do invent and contrive preventions and remedies against the Heats, both in the coolness of their Houses, Garments and Bedding, which they so cover and sence, that the Flies and Gnats ( with which that Countrey is much infelted) can have no passage to hinder or disturb their repose, either by day or night; for in these lbw Grounds and Marshes, the Gnats are extremely busie and troublesome, as well by day as by night; those which are busic at night, make a buzzing, and are of the same colour with such as we have here, onely that they are much greater, and sting so terribly, that the spanards say, that they will bite through a pair of Cordovan Boots; perhaps indeed they may pass a knit Stockin, with a Linen one under it, but not if it were of Cloth or Kerfy; and incleed in some Countries they are much more keen and hungry than they are in others: The Gnats which are troublesome by day, are little, and not much unlike those which are here bred in Shops, and generated from Wine; onely they are of a yellowish colour, and so thirtly of bloud, (that as I have heard credibly reported) many of them have been seen to burst at the same time that they have been fucking: To try this experiment, I have fuffered forme of them to fuck of my bloud, as much as they would; and when they were full; they would drop off, and rowl, but were not able to go or fly: The flings of these Gnats are in some degree poisonous, especially to some forts of shells, in which they will make little wounds, though not dangerous, or of great momentBy reason that the City of los Reyes is of a hot and moist Air, Flesh will immediately corrupt in it; and therefore when it is newly killed and bought, it must be eaten the same day, which are all qualities different to the Climate of Cozco, that being hot, and this cold, or temperate. The Cities and other Colonies of Spatiends, which are fituate along the Coast of Perm, are all of the same temperament with the Town of los Reyes, being under the same degree. All the other Gites within the Land from Quinn, as far as Chaquishaa, which runs for the space of seven hundred Leagues North and South, are of a pleasant Climate, not being cold as Cozco, nor hot like Rimac, but of an equal and moderate temperature; excepting onely the situation of Pososi, where the Mines of Silver are, is extremely old, and the Air penetrating. The Indians call it Puna, which is to say, a Climate, not habitable by reason of coldness; howsoever the love and thirst of Silver had invited such numbers of Spaniards and Indians to that place, that at present it is the most populous, and the best served with Provisions of any Countrey in all Perm. Acosto in the 6th Chapter of his 4th Book, mentioning the Greatness of that Colony, says, that the Town, that is, the place inhabited is two Leagues, ship in the compass.

Thus much shall be sufficient to have spoken in general of all the Cities and Plantations of Perm, fo as that we need not treat farther of any one in particular: But to return to the City of los Reges; we fay, that the Governour Francisco Picarro having founded this City, and divided the Lands, Fields, and Inheritances togethere with the Indians amongst his Spaniards, he descended to the Valley of Chimo, about eighty Leagues Northward from Ios Reyes, along the Sea-coast, and there built another City, which to this day is called Truxillo, and was so named in remembrance of his own Countrey: At which place also he made a division of Lands to the first Conquerours, to whom he marked out the several Provinces. Lands and Possessions, which belonged to every person in reward of the labours and hazards which every person had sustained. The like he persormed in the City and Countrey of los Repas, where he with great applause and satisfaction asfood to every Man his share and due proportion; so that it appeared as if the Land began to be at peace, and all things to dispose themselves towards quietness and enorment: And having thus justly shared to the first Conquerours their dues, it was not to be doubted, but that he would deal with others, who were to follow with the like equality. And being thus well employed, as this famous Cavalier ever was in all the course of his life, we shall now leave him for a while to reat of other matters, which at the same time passed amongst the Indians.

How the General Quizquiz was flain by his own Souldiers.

"Hat we may omit nothing material of all those matters which occurred as that time in Peru, it is necessary for us to give an account of what success befell the General Quizquiz, the Captain Huaypallea, and their Forces; who being animated and encouraged by the advantages they had gained over Don Pedro de Alvarado and Almagro in three feveral Skirmishes, began to presume themselves able to drive the Spaniards out of their Empire; and especially Huappallea was the more confident, because in the absence of Quizquiz he had been the Chief Commander in those late Battels, which so vainly puffed him up in his own imagingtion, that he became prefumptuous, and fecure in his strength and fortune. Hereupon these two Commanders marched towards Quin, with design to make new Levies of Men, and Provisions for a War against the Spaniards; but they had not made many days march before they were disappointed of their hopes and expectations; for the Curacas, as well as the common Indians, being affrighted and fore-warned by the late treachery of Rumminavi, and jealous left they should act over the like practices that the others had done, refused either to follow them to the War, or obey their Commands, which were for bringing in of Provisions; for amongst all the Captains of their Army, there was none of the Bloud-Royal that appeared, nor any person with a Title to the Kingdom of Quitn, either derived from Atabualpa, or Manco Inca, who being the onely Lawfull and Universal Heir of all that Empire, might countenance the design. With these difficulties, and in straits of Provisions, Quizquiz was labouring when his Purveyors fell into the hands of Sebastian de Belalcagar, by the Advices which his friends the Indians had given 3 for they being generally defirous of a Peace, were troubled at all acts and motions which tended to a War 3 and in regard that there was no Army afoot against the Spaniards, but this onely, they were desirous to see it deseated; fo that upon this advice Belalençar surprized the Foragers, and easily destroyed them, and took many of them Prisoners; such as escaped, carried the news of their defeat, and that the Viracochas were very numerous and strong; for having but the day before found fo many of them in a body together, they were undeceived in the reports they had, that the Spaniards, or greatest part of them, were departed out of the Countrey with Alvarado and Almagro. Upon this advice Quizquiz affembled all his Captains to confider what would be most expedient in this case, proposing it necessary to make a retreat for the present, in order to gather Provisions, which were greatly wanting, and then on a fudden to affault the Viracochas, and profecute them untill they had entirely destroyed and extirpated them out of their Countrey; but the Captains amongst whom Huaypallea, (who ever fince the late successes, was acknowledged the Chief) were of a different opinion, 'esteeming it their best course to render and submit themselves unto the Spaniards, to defire Peace and Friendship with them; whom to subdue, it was a madness to imagine, fince experience had thewn them to be Invincible; and that it was impossible to get Provisions from the Indians, who had withdrawn themselves from their obedience; and in that starving condition, how difficult would it be for them to make War upon a victorious Army; and which it were more easie to overcome with fair words, and kind treatment, than to resist a people come from Heaven, which upon submission would readily entertain Friendship and Peace with them. And in regard the Prophecy foretold by the Inca Huayna Capac (namely, that a stranger Nation should be Lords of that Nation) was now fulfilled, it was in vain to tempt the fortune of War longer. But Quizquiz being a frout Man, and a Souldier, declared against this manner of submission, upbraiding his Souldiers with cowardife and pulillanimity of spirit; and with haughty and proud Language told them plainly, that he had no need of their Counsel in this case, nor in any other whatsoever; and therefore he required them as their General to obey and follow him, if they hoped for Success and Victory as their General to obey and follow him, if they hoped for Success and Victory in this Enterprise. But the Captains, who from the time that they had been worsted in several Skirmishes, which they had had with Alvarado, and Almago, began to lose much of the Respect and Honour which once they conceived for beingings, because they believed he had not behaved himself with that Courage which he professed in divers Engagements against the Spaniards; so that now, quitting all Respect towards him, they told him plainly, That since he was so averse to all Peace and Friendship with the Virscochus, and so resolute to maintain the War, and consident of Victory, that he should make no Delays, but immediately engage in Fight with the Spaniards, which would be much better than cowardly to retire, and rather honourably to dye like brave Souldiers, than to perish in the Mountains and Desarts with hunger, like miserable People: And

Quizquiz was not a little nettled to find his, Captains replying fo briskly twon him, the which confirmed him in the belief of what he had for some days sufpeded, that there was fome Mutiny contriving against him in the Army, and therefore he told them, That he plainly perceived that they passed or transferred the respect they had for him unto Captain Huapallea, the which he could not endure, and thereof admonished them to amend speedily, before he proceeded to punish this cheir Offence. And in the mean time he gave them to understand. That he took notice of the liberty they used in their insolent Discourse, which sayoured of Rebellion and Disobedience towards their Commander; into which would make a ftrict Enquiry, and Examination, and punish both the Mutiniers, and the chief Leader of them. Huappallea thinking himself reflected upon by this Discourse, began to huff, and be very angry; and being elated, and his Spirits raifed by his late Successes, and being sensible of the great Esteem which the Captains had for him, he made an Attempt, which none believed he had Courage to doe, and wrested the Javelin which Quizquiz held in his Hand, and societ is from him; the which Weapon was the Ensign of his Command, like those Truncheons which our Generals carry in their Hands, and is called by the lidion Chaquiapu; with this Lance, or Javelin, Hunpallea ran him through the Breast, and being in like manner seconded by the other Commanders, every one mean, and being in like manner reconnect by the other Commanders, every one of which had a blow at him with his Weapon, he was foon dispatched. Thus Quequite ended his Days, being the laft and the most famous Souldier of all the Captains and Servants of Atabushpas, his Fate was like that of his other Companions for the Justice of Heaven allways provides punishments agreeable to Mens Offeness, and raises up one Tyrant to punish and afflict another. Hereupon Hustice and the other Companions disharded their American and contract of the con galla, and the other Captains disbanded their Army, and every one in a difguile thifted for himfelf, retiring into places where they thought they might live most hidden and obscure; howsoever they lived in perpetual fear and apprehenfion of being betrayed by their own People.
